though far less interesting than that of the Frankish and Lombard Kingdoms which expanded into the Feudal system, may seem to demand a passing notice. Its chief distinction from them was in the still greater influence arrogated by the Clergy in temporal affairs. The Visigothic Prelates are admitted in some degree to have deserved this superior power.* While the Prelates of the Frankish Empire had degenerated into fighting and hunting Barbarians, the Visigothic Bishops respected themselves and were respected by the Public; and the regular discipline which they maintained in their Church had some beneficial though imperfect effects upon the peace of the Kingdom. The spiritual Convocation, or National Council, of the Clergy appear to have had a concurrent power with the Nobles and great functionaries of the State, if not also the initiative voice, in temporal legislation; and many salutary laws of the Visigothic Code owed their enactment to this mixture of Barbarian freedom and Ecclesiastical policy in the General Assembly of the Noble and Episcopal Orders. The election to the Crown, and the subsequent control of the Royal administration, were vested in the united choice of the Bishops and Palatines, and preserved in the privileges of a powerful Aristocracy; and, after the failure of the Royal line of Alaric, the succession was still limited to the pure and noble blood of the Goths.† We may add a fact to this summary which has escaped the great authority from whom we are borrowing, that, though revolution, cruelty, and anarchy disturbed the series of the Visigothic, perhaps as thickly as of the Merovingian Kings, the unity of the State was never broken by the mischievous custom of Regal partitions; and the laws and the internal polity of the Spanish Monarchy were on the whole far more equable and uniform, and probably better administered, than those of the Frankish Empire.‡

To this favourable exercise of Ecclesiastical influence must be darkly contrasted the horrid spectacle of Religious persecution, which it was employed to excite and aggravate. The Visigoths, at the epoch of their conquest of the Peninsula, and for above a century afterwards, like most of the Barbarian nations, professed the Arian Heresy; the descendants of the Roman Provincials of Spain adhered to the Orthodox Visigothic Creed; and this diversity of Religion was sufficient to produce and perpetuate the worst excesses of a furious bigotry. The cruelties to which the Arian Bishops stimulated their Monarchs against the subject Catholics, the sudden conversion of the Visigothic Court and Clergy to the oppressed Faith, and the proscription to which the Arian opinions were in turn exposed, are events belonging rather to Ecclesiastical than Political History. Two circumstances, however, in the Annals of the Visigothic Church deserve mention in this place for their connection with the temporal affairs of the Monarchy. In the reign of Leovigild, the Religious divisions of the State produced a furious Civil war, in which the rebels were led by his own son, Hermenegild. That young Prince had espoused a daughter of one of the Merovingian Kings; and the shameful violence to which the Religious constancy of his Catholic

Spain.
From
A. D.
476.
to
A. D.
755.

Immense power of the Clergy.

Religious Persecution Arianism of Goths.

Reign of Leovigild.

* Fide supra, p. 287.

† Ibid. Chron. Goth. p. 721.

‡ Mariana, Hist. de Rebus Hispania, lib. vi. c. 1—6.

* Gibbon, vol. vi. p. 376.

† Ibid.

‡ At least all this may fairly be inferred from the spirit of careful legislation which breathes through the Visigothic Code (published in the Benedictine Collection, Recueil des Hist. &c.) already quoted.

History. bride was exposed, by the bigotry of his stepmother, was followed by his own conversion from Arianism and revolt against the Royal and paternal authority. The disaffected Catholics supported his cause; and it was not until after a long and sanguinary struggle that their rebellion was subdued. Hermenegild himself fell into the hands of his parent, and his repeated treasons justly forfeited his claim to the mercy with which he was at first treated: though even his aggravated guilt can scarcely excuse the ultimate and unnatural severity of a father, who pronounced the alternative of his son's death or return to the Arian profession. He sealed the sincerity of his conversion to the Catholic Faith with his blood; and the Romish Church has canonized his memory, and perpetuated one of her gloomiest legends in the martyrdom of St. Hermenegild.*

From
A. D.
476,
to
A. D.
755.
Conversion and revolt of his son Hermenegild.
A. D.
578. to
A. D.
584.
Martyrdom of Hermenegild.
A. D.
585.
Conversion of the Visigoths.

Recared, the first Catholic King.
A. D.
586.

This shocking tragedy clouded the glory and happiness of a reign, which had otherwise been distinguished as the brightest in the Annals of the Visigothic Monarchy of Spain. But, by what must appear an unaccountable change of opinion, unless we attribute a strong revulsion of popular sympathy to the fate and the cause of Hermenegild, the Arian Clergy and nation within a few years voluntarily adopted the Creed which they had strenuously proscribed. Recared, the brother of the martyr, had embraced the same Faith: but with more timidity, or prudence, or filial reverence, he avoided to disturb the last days, and perhaps to aggravate the remorse, of his unhappy parent; and it was not until Leovigild had sunk into the grave, that the new King avowed himself a Catholic, and invited his people to share his conversion. Notwithstanding a conspiracy and a partial revolt, which he quelled, Recared at once succeeded in his purpose; a general Council of the Arian Prelates and Nobles yielded to his exhortations; and the mass of the Visigothic nation strangely hastened to abjure in one hour the Heresy to which they had clung for two centuries.†

Persecution of the Jews.
A. D.
612,
to
A. D.
710.

The second circumstance to which we have referred, in the connection between the Ecclesiastical and Political Annals of the Visigoths, was the persecution of the Jews. That unhappy race had settled in great numbers in Spain long before the epoch of the Visigothic conquests; and the wealth which their industry had gradually accumulated seems to have offered the first temptation to oppress and ruin them. The Canons of the Visigothic Councils, during almost the whole of the VIIIth century, are filled with traces of the spoliation, the tortures, and the misery of every kind, by which the Jews were punished for the exercise, and compelled to the abjuration, of their Faith; and these merciless enactments but too closely anticipated, if they did not first suggest, the detestable spirit of the more modern Inquisition. By Siebert, near an hundred thousand of the Jews were compelled, on pain of death, to receive the sacrament of Baptism; Clintilla, one of his successors, decreed the banishment of the whole race; and it was only a refinement of avarice and cruelty that rescinded the sentence, to detain the victims of repeated confiscation and persecution within the grasp of their tyrants. The political effects of Persecution are in all Ages nearly the same; and the detestation which the Jews cherished against their Christian oppressors, naturally impelled them to become the secret but active auxiliaries of the Saracens in the overthrow of the Gothic Monarchy of Spain.*

That memorable event, however, was immediately produced or precipitated by intestine disunion among the Visigoths themselves; and the Mohammedan conquest of the Peninsula was first invited by the treason of a Christian Chieftain. At the opening of the eighth century, the successors of Mohammed had extended the empire of their Religion and nation to the Western limits of Africa; and the victorious career of Mouna, the Lieutenant of the Caliph Walid, was only arrested by the walls of the Visigothic fortress of Ceuta, in Mauritania, and the bravery of its Governor, Count Julian. The motives which suddenly converted the gallant defence of that Nobleman into a traitorous alliance with the infidel enemy, are involved in much real obscurity; and a suspicious tale of Romance† is all that remains to supply the want of better Historical materials for the barbarous annals of a troubled and calamitous epoch. It was the dishonour of Count Julian's daughter by his Sovereign Roderic, according to the legend, which provoked the treason and suggested the fatal revenge of the Chieftain. But this story is scarcely sustained by the few authentic facts of the Saracen conquest which have descended to us; and the distracted state of the Visigothic Monarchy, which at the time was torn by the feuds of the Clergy and Nobles, and divided in allegiance between the reigning Sovereign and the sons of the last King, Witika, may justify the suspicion, that the introduction of the Saracens was less the work of one man and the vengeance of his private wrongs, than the desperate project of an ambitious and broken faction.

The crimes of Witika had provoked the revolt of his subjects; and on his deposition, Roderic, the representative of one of the most illustrious Houses of the Gothic lineage, had been raised to the Throne. In the insolence of his Regal fortunes, Roderic might forget the practice of former virtue, the duties of his office, and the fate of his licentious predecessor. He is accused of having wasted his talents in debauchery: it is only certain that, whether through his vices, or their restless turbulence and factious spirit, a portion of the Gothic Clergy and Nobles had become disaffected and estranged from his Government. Encouraged by this temper of the Aristocracy, the sons of Witika secretly asserted their title to the Crown; their uncle Oppas, the Ecclesiastical Primate of the Kingdom, favoured their pretensions; and it is probable that Count Julian had entered into the same cause, and incurred the disgrace and danger of an abortive conspiracy. But, whatever were his political fears and disgusts, or his private injuries, the station which the Count occupied in the Monarchy gave him but too ready a means for the accomplishment of his policy or vengeance. His extensive domains, his high rank, and his numerous retainers made him a powerful leader; and the government both of the Southern Provinces of the Kingdom and its African dependencies enabled him to betray the keys of the Peninsula to the formidable enemies who were already at its gates. To the Lieutenant of the Caliph, he exposed the wealth and the weakness of his

Spain.
From
A. D.
476,
to
A. D.
755.
Fall of the Visigothic power.

Its probable causes.

Intestine dissension.

Reign of Roderic.

Disaffection of the Nobles.

Treason of Count Julian.

* Mariana, Hist. de Rebus Hisp. lib. v. c. 12—14.

† Ibid. lib. v. c. 14, 15.

• Mariana, lib. vi. c. 1—18, passim.
† Mariana has laboured hard (lib. vi. c. 21.) to weave the Romance of Count Julian's daughter Cava into the thread of genuine History; but he quotes no contemporary evidence; nor, in fact, does any exist for this legend of, probably, some much subsequent creation.

History. Country: the slothful vices or unpopular government of the King; the disaffection of the Nobles; and the corruption of a people, who, in the long disuse of arms and the temptations to luxurious indulgence, had utterly degenerated from the energy and prowess of the old Gothic character.

From A. D. 476. to A. D. 755. Conquest of the Peninsula by the Saracens. A. D. 710. Fired with ambition at the prospect of so splendid and easy a conquest, Mousa delayed only for the permission of the Caliph to undertake the enterprise; and an experimental descent of a few hundred Mohammedans on the Spanish coast having sufficiently confirmed the report of the traitor, and proved the defenceless condition of the Kingdom, a more serious invasion was repeated in the following summer. In transports provided by the Gothic Count, and at the head of only seven thousand Arabians and Moors, (or Africans,) Tarik, an intrepid Saracen, crossed the strait between the ancient Pillars of Hercules, and pitched his first camp in Spain, on the rock which owes its modern appellation of Gibraltar* to his name. Conducted by Count Julian and his followers, and reinforced from Africa, the Saracens were rapidly successful; and the defeat of a Gothic army under Ecdico, roused Roderic himself from his dream of indolent security to the opposite error of a presumptuous rashness. His summons to the national defence was obeyed by the Nobles and Clergy of the Gothic Monarchy at the head of near one hundred thousand followers; but the numbers of this disorderly host, unpractised in arms and divided by treason, were feebly opposed to the firm array of twenty thousand veteran Arabians and Moors, breathing a common spirit of fanaticism, and flushed with the promise of an opulent realm.

Birth of A. D. 711. The temerity of the Gothic King staked the fortune of the Monarchy on a single battle; and on the banks of the Gaudalete, near the town of Xeres, the Christian and Mohammedan armies met in the memorable and sanguinary encounter, which was to deliver the fairest portion of Spain to the dominion of the Arabs for eight hundred years. Notwithstanding the decay of their national vigour, and the evils of their disunion, the Goths still fought with some remains of a spirit worthy of their ancient renown; and the event was for several days adverse to the Saracens, until the treachery of the Archbishop Oppas, who, with his nephews, suddenly drew off his troops from the Christian line and charged his astonished countrymen, spread dismay through their ranks, and produced irretrievable disorder, a general flight, and a tremendous carnage. Roderic himself escaped from the field only to perish in the waters of the Guadalquivir;† his fall involved the immediate ruin of the Monarchy; and the long series of the Visigothic Kings of Spain terminates with his death.

Before the panic-stricken and disunited Christians had leisure to collect their scattered strength, or recover their broken spirit from the fatal field of Xeres, Tarik had rapidly advanced to the Gothic Capital of Toledo; received the submission of its inhabitants; and, by seizing that seat of the Monarchy, prevented any attempt to fill the vacant Throne. The surrender of the Capital was imitated by every city in the Saracenic line of march; and in a few months Tarik triumphantly overran the whole length of the Peninsula from South to North, and extended the Musulman conquests from the rock of Gibraltar to the bay of Biscay. So rapid was the career of Tarik that, when Mousa, whose jealousy was unworthily excited by the glory which his officer had acquired, hastened to supplant him by landing with a fresh army in Spain, there remained little more for him to accomplish than the reduction of the cities which had lain out of the route of his precursor. Of these, Seville and Merida alone resisted with obstinacy before they submitted to the common lot of capitulation; and in less than three years from their first descent, the Arabians had securely established the long dominion of their race and their Religion in Spain.

The fate of the mass of the subjugated nation, and the settlement of the Musulman conquerors in their new possessions, will each claim a brief notice, and may be comprehended in the same rapid view. After the first excesses of warfare were over, the Saracens treated their new subjects with remarkable lenity: the Christians were permitted to enjoy the undisturbed exercise of their Religion and laws; the tribute which the conquerors imposed, did not, except where the resistance had been obstinate, exceed the usual taxes of the Visigothic Kings; and there can be no doubt that the general fertility and wealth of the Spanish Provinces, and the prosperity, happiness, and numbers of the people, were largely improved and multiplied under the beneficent rule of their Arabian Lords. The toleration, which was only permitted to the Christians, was measured with a more abundant and cordial spirit to the Jewish population of Spain. That oppressed and persecuted race had hailed the Saracen invasion as the glad signal of deliverance and revenge. They had, both in secret, and afterwards more openly, rendered the conquerors most important services during the prosecution of the enterprise; and they were rewarded by the gratitude of the Mohammedans with almost every immunity and privilege which they could possibly desire. Throughout the Middle Ages, the Jews enjoyed in the Moorish Provinces of Spain the happiest seats any where permitted to them; and the bonds of fidelity and protection between them and their Musulman masters remained unbroken until the final ruin of the Arabian Monarchies.

The alliance between the invaders and the traitorous faction of the Goths, which had introduced them into the Kingdom, was probably less sincere: but it does not appear that the Saracens violated their faith even towards the instruments whose baseness they must have despised. Of the fate of Count Julian himself, indeed, History has preserved no authentic trace; and the natural hope that he did not escape the retribution which his crime had deserved, has been indulged only in the romantic creations of a Poetical justice. But it is known that the sons of Witika were invested by the Saracens in their private and patrimonial estates; even their subsequent family disputes were equitably adjusted before the impartial tribunal of the Caliphs; and the Gothic origin of their descendants was gradually mingled, by intermarriage, with the noblest blood of Arabia.

But it was not possible that the violence of conquest could equally respect the rights of the whole Christian population. The numerous bodies of the victorious Saracens, who seated themselves in the Peninsula, until, by colonization or conversion, they overspread the Spanish Provinces with a Musulman

Spain.

From A. D. 476. to A. D. 755. Conquest of the Peninsula by the Saracens. A. D. 713.

Fate of the conquered population.

Toleration granted to, and tribute imposed upon, the Christians.

Favour shown to the Jews.

Faith kept with the Christian traitors.

Settlement of the Arabians and Moors.

* Gebel Tarik, or the mountain of Tarik—the ancient Mount Calpe.

† Such, in opposition to the romantic imaginings of the Spanish writers, is the unvarnished relation of Roderic's death in the best Arabian Historians. Biblioth. Arabico-Hispana, vol. ii. p. 327.

History.

From
A. D.
476,
to
A. D.
755.

people, must originally have been established in their lands at the expense of Christian proprietors; and though the manner in which the spoliation was conducted is not recorded, it cannot be doubted that many of the Goths must have been violently dispossessed of their lands. It may be conjectured that the confiscated estates of those numerous adherents of the unfortunate Roderic, who had fallen in the defence of their Country, or who preferred an honourable resistance or exile to an ignominious submission beneath the Infidel yoke, afforded a great means of provision for the Saracen colonists. But the numbers of the original conquerors were perpetually reinforced by hordes of fresh adventurers from the various regions of Asia and Africa who arrived under the command of the successive Lieutenants of the Caliphs; and the distinction of their races in the Spanish Cities and Provinces was long cherished by the pride of their descendants. The Asiatic bands of Palestine, of Emesa, and of Damascus, were seated at Medina-Sidonia, at Seville, and at Cordova; the Gothic Capital of Toledo was occupied, and the central Provinces were thinly overspread, with Tribes of Persian and Arabian birth; and the beautiful region of Grenada, the longest preserved and the most precious gem in the Spanish Empire of the Arabs, was assigned to a numerous colony, who boasted a peculiar descent from the purest and noblest blood of their native deserts. The crowd of Africans, who had followed the standards of Mousa and his successors from Mauritania and Egypt, were scattered over the surface of the Peninsula, and might be distinguished on its opposite shores, in the Provinces of Portugal and in Murcia: but, by a curious caprice of fortune, the Moors of Africa, the proselytes, the subjects, and the inferior companions of the Saracens, have been suffered to embrace in their familiar name the whole Arabian population of Spain.*

The subsequent Annals of Spain under the dominion of the Arabians belong, according to our plan, rather to the Mohammedan than the Christian division of Political History. But the slow revival of a Christian Monarchy in the Peninsula is a portion of our present subject. After the fall of the Gothic Kingdom, great numbers of the inhabitants from the Eastern Provinces fled into France: but a few of the harder spirits, who embraced the nobler alternative of resistance, had retired into the lofty mountains of Asturias; and a small inland district in the most inaccessible part of those natural fastnesses, became the cradle of the modern Monarchy of Spain. Pelagius, or Pelayo, a Goth of noble, or perhaps even of Royal blood, who is said to have rallied the poor remnant of the national army after the battle of Xeres, became the leader of these fugitives in the North, and the founder of a new Christian Kingdom: but nothing can be more obscure and uncertain than the first foundation of the little State which was gradually to expand into the Monarchy of Leon and Castile. Tradition has justly consecrated the invincible constancy and patriotism of the handful of brave men, who, amidst the wreck of their national fortunes, still disdained a base submission to the Saracen yoke; and who chose rather to assert, at the point of their good swords, a life of poverty and freedom in the barren mountains of Asturias, than to share the wealthy servitude of their degenerate Countrymen. But Pelayo and his followers were, it is probable, in the outset, enabled chiefly to maintain their independence by the obscurity of their retreat and the neglect of the conquerors. Seven years elapsed between the battle of Xeres and the date assigned by the Spanish Chroniclers to the first encounter between the Saracens and the Asturian Christians; and even the story of the expedition despatched by the Caliph's Lieutenant, Alakor, against their reviving State, and of the tremendous overthrow given by Pelayo to his numerous army in the mountains, is disfigured and exaggerated by the Monkish Legends, into the miraculous destruction of one hundred thousand of the Infidels.

If we credit, in any degree, the magnitude of this and a subsequent defeat which Pelayo is declared to have inflicted on the Saracens, it must seem very inconsistent with the sagacious policy which tempered the fanaticism of the Mohammedans in those Ages, that they should have turned aside from the task of reducing an enemy already so dangerous in the heart of their Spanish Empire, to undertake the more distant and arduous conquest of France. It is far more probable that the shock which their power sustained from the arms of Charles Martel in that disastrous expedition, the declining vigour of the Caliphate itself, and the dissensions among the Spanish Arabians, which immediately preceded its triple division in Asia, Africa, and Spain, all conspired to favour the silent and neglected growth of the Christian State in the Asturias: which in its origin could scarcely have sustained an open and regular struggle against the undivided force of the Saracen conquerors. We have little knowledge of the internal condition of the North of Spain in that dark and troublous era: but it was perhaps the same dissensions of the Moorish Governors, that cherished the first germs of two other free Christian States in the Pyrenean mountains, which afterwards swelled into the Kingdoms of Aragon and Navarre. The increase of the Asturian State is more distinctly marked. After the intermediate rule of Favila, the sword or sceptre of Pelayo descended to his son-in-law, Alfonso I., the real founder, perhaps, of the Asturian Monarchy; who, availing himself of the internal distractions of the Moors, broke from his mountains into Galicia, reconquered that Province, and consolidated the strength and compactness of his Kingdom. It was during his reign that Spain, by the dismemberment of the great Saracen Empire, afforded the splendid seat for an independent Caliphate, and the revival of an Omniad dynasty in the West, under Abdalrahman: but at this epoch we may conveniently postpone both the Christian and Mahomedan Annals of the Peninsula, for a future consideration.*

Spain.
From
A. D.
476,
to
A. D.
755.

Favoured by the dis-ensions of the Arabs.

Silent reval of the Christian Monarchy in Asturias: under Pe-layo.

A. D.
718,
to
A. D.
734.

Germ of the Christian Kingdoms of Aragon and Navarre.

Alfonso I., King of As-turias.

A. D.
739,
to
A. D.
755.

Triple division of the Caliphate.
Abdalrahman, first Caliph of Spain.

A. D.
755.

* The original, or at least earliest, authorities for the History of the Saracen conquest of Spain, are contained in the Arabic writers, copied into the Bibliotheca Arabico-Hispanica of Casiri, vol. ii, passim from p. 31 to 331; and in the Chronicles of King Alfonso III. of Leon, (Pagi, Critica, vol. liii.) and of Roderic of Toledo, ad c. 9. See also the more modern text of Mariana, Hist. de Rebus Hispania, lib. vi, c. 19 ad fin. Among our English Historians the subject has been adorned by the labours of Gibbon, c. 51; and of Mills, History of Muhammedanism, 2d Edit. p. 109—116, an elegant specimen of learning and condensation.

* The revival of the Christian Monarchy, and the Arabian Annals of Spain from the conquest to the triple division of the Caliphate, must be gleaned from Roderic Toletan, Hist. Arab. c. x.—xviii. Chron. Alfonso Regis, c. lib. Arab. Hisp. ub. suprà; and Mariana, lib. vi, c. 1, 2.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LI.

THE REIGN AND EMPIRE OF CHARLES THE GREAT, OR CHARLEMAGNE.

FROM A. D. 768. to A. D. 814.

History. This reign of Charlemagne * stands out in prominent relief from the History of the Dark Ages: a distinct epoch of solitary grandeur dividing two long periods of Barbarian tumult and disorder. It forms that signal and equidistant point between the destruction of the Roman Empire and the slow revival of social cultivation, which alone breaks the dull continuity of six centuries of anarchy; and it offers the only contrast of organized power on which the mind can repose amidst the disrupted elements of political civilization. It intervenes between two examples of degenerate dynasties and two periods of corrupted Barbarism: between the common decay of the original Royal Houses of the Northern nations, and of the Imperial line which supplanted them; between the dissolution of the free Gothic Democracies, and the consolidation of the Feudal system.

Division of the Frankish Monarchy between the sons of Pepin. Notwithstanding the fatal experience of the Merovingian custom of partition, it was imitated by the second Royal line of the Franks. Pepin le Bref bequeathed his extensive dominions between his two sons, Charles and Carloman;† and the usual evils of the division were immediately shown in the quarrel of the brothers and the insurrection of their tributary States. These turbulent members of the Empire, no longer compressed into unity and obedience under the vigorous sceptre of Pepin, were immediately encouraged to attempt the recovery of their independence by the youth, the inexperience, and the dissensions of his sons. If the talents of the young Princes had been similar and their lives equally prolonged, their rivalry would have perpetuated the first disorders of their common reign: but Charles surprised his enemies by an early display of extraordinary ability and valour; and his fortunes at once acquired the decided ascendant over those of his feebler brother. He forcibly stripped Carloman of a part of Austrasia, which was in dispute between them; quelled an effort of the deprived Duke of Aquitaine to reestablish his independence;* and overawed both the tributary Sovereigns of the Bavarians and Lombards, who were disposed to renounce their allegiance. The politic marriage of Charles with the daughter of Desiderio, the Lombard Monarch, gave a hollow promise of friendship, which was shortly broken by the death of Carloman. Seizing the inheritance of his brother's infant sons with little opposition, Charles was no sooner master of the whole Frankish Empire, than he insultingly divorced his Lombard Princess; and the resentment which Desiderio rashly betrayed, and the asylum and countenance which he afforded to the widow and children of Carloman, entailed a total ruin upon the declining Monarchy of the Lombards.

That Kingdom was in no degree equal to a contest with the power of the Frankish Empire, even if Desiderio, with the usual imprudence or fatality of his House, had not also outraged the Papacy, and by his aggressions compelled the reigning Pontiff, Adrian I., to implore the succour of the hereditary protector of the Holy See. At the call of the Pope, the Frankish Monarch, like his father, descended with alacrity from the Alps, besieged Desiderio in his Capital of Pavia, and compelling him to surrender at discretion, finally extinguished the national independence and dynasty of the Lombards. The widow and children of Carloman, as well as Desiderio and his family, fell into the hands of the victor, who is said to have conveyed all these Royal captives to France. History is silent on their subsequent fate; and the Lombard Monarch and his children may either have perished by violence or have been suffered to languish out their days in obscurity: but there can be less doubt that the infant nephews of Charles were inhumanly sacrificed to the safety of his usurpation. The conquest of Lombardy was not com-

France, Germany, Italy, &c.

From A. D. 768, to A. D. 814.

Charles sole Monarch. A. D. 771.

His conquest of the Lombard Kingdom. A. D. 774.

* The only original authority that can be relied upon for the History of the reign and actions of Charlemagne is his Secretary, Eginhart, who composed both a well-known Life of the Emperor, and the Annals of the Carolingian Monarchy, which we have before quoted. These Works, with the occasional light thrown on the government of Charlemagne by his Laws or Capitularies, (which have been collected in the Work of Stephen Baluze, Capitularia Regum Francorum, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1680.) form the only authentic materials out of which various modern writers have raised their Historical superstructure.

† This partition, however, was rather in fact ultimately the work of a National Assembly, after the death of Pepin. French, Feodo assemblee generale convenu, says Eginhart, ambos uis regis constituitur. Eginhart, Vita Caroli Magni, c. 4. They repeated the division; or rather, it should seem, made a new one.

* Though composing an integral portion of France itself, the Province of Aquitaine was not completely brought under the immediate dominion of the Crown, until the repeated rebellion of its Dukes had been punished by confiscation, imprisonment, and death. Guillard, the modern biographer of Charlemagne, has laboriously attempted (Histoire de Charlemagne, vol. ii. p. 60, et seq.) to trace the Merovingian descent of these Princes.

History.

From
A. D.
768.
to
A. D.
814.

pleted, until after a revolt which was punished by the defeat and death of a Duke of Friuli: but another great Chieftain, whose family had established the Lombard Duchy of Benevento in Southern Italy, successfully resisted the Frankish arms, and was finally permitted to preserve at least the forms of independence. It was the policy of the conqueror rather to annex the Lombard Kingdom by an equal union to his Empire, than to treat it as a subjugated Country. The great aristocracy of the Lombard Dukes, or Governors of Provinces, whose functions and power had become hereditary, remained undisturbed; the people were suffered to retain their own national laws and customs; and Charles was contented with the paramount Sovereignty and the general allegiance of Northern Italy.*

Subjugation of the Saxons.

A. D.
775.

From the easy task of completing the valuable conquest of that Peninsula, by the acquisition of its Southern Provinces, which were still subject to the Eastern Emperors, the ambition of the Frankish Sovereign was strangely diverted to the wild and distant forests of Saxony. Though a considerable portion of Germany had been embraced within the Merovingian Monarchy, the fierce and Pagan Tribes or confederacy of the Saxons, which extended over its Northern regions, had always in a large sense maintained their independence. The bold spirit of freedom, with which this rude people disdained a foreign yoke, was associated with an insurmountable repugnance to Christianity; and the obstinate resistance and frequent rebellions of the Saxons, seem to have been chiefly excited and aggravated by the religious zeal of the Frankish Monarch. In his first or second expedition into Saxony, after a sanguinary contest, of which the details would be odious to humanity and are little worth particular record, Charles had received the submission and enforced the reluctant Baptism of several thousands of the people, when his attention was invited, by the arrival of a Saracen Emir in his camp at Paderborn in Westphalia, to the opposite extremity of his dominions.†

Expedition
into Spain,

The dissensions among the Moorish Governors of Spain had at this period attained their height in the struggle between the adherents of the Abbasid and Omniad dynasties of the Caliphate; and the Emir of Saragossa, after being expelled from his possessions, had traversed France and Germany to implore protection from the most powerful enemy of his national Faith. Charles promptly accepted an office which gratified his insatiable thirst of dominion; and soon after assembling a great army on the Spanish frontier, he descended from the Pyrenees and penetrated without difficulty to the banks of the Ebro. The tremendous renown of his grandfather's victory had not been effaced by the lapse of half a century from the memory of the affrighted and degenerate Saracens; their divisions or fears made his power irresistible; and the capitulation of Saragossa completed the rapid conquest of the country between the mountains and the Ebro, which, under the title of the Spanish March, he permanently annexed to the Frankish Empire. The Emir of Saragossa was faithfully restored to his government: but the supreme administration of the March was confided to a Frankish Count, who resided at Barcelona, and whose successors and permanent extension of his Empire to ne Ebro.

A. D.
778.

continued for four centuries to acknowledge at least the feudal superiority of the French Crown.*

The termination of Charles's Spanish expedition was remarkably contrasted both with its substantial success and the general splendour of his reign. While his victorious forces, on their return into France, wound through the defiles of the Pyrenees, they were suddenly attacked by the Gascons: an aboriginal, or at least Keltish race, whose possession of that region had survived the long revolutions of Ages, and the vicissitudes of the Roman, the Gothic, and the Saracenic conquests. In the pass of Roncesvalles, these hardy mountaineers succeeded in cutting off the rear guard of the Frankish host, and capturing the immense booty which encumbered its careless or toilsome march. History obscurely betrays the real circumstances of a disgraceful and calamitous defeat, of which the magnitude is more strongly attested, since the memory has been imperishably preserved, in the wildest traditions of Romance. One of Charles's principal Commanders was slain in the rout; and the prowess and fall of the Paladin Roland in the fight of Roncesvalles, was long the dearest theme of those early fables of chivalry, which have been so luxuriantly adorned by the Italian muse.†

From the Spanish, the attention of the King of France reverted to the Italian Peninsula; and his next visit to the latter Country was principally employed in settling the Kingdom of Lombardy upon his infant son Carloman, or Pepin. He accordingly caused the young Prince to be solemnly presented with the ancient diadem of the Lombard Kings, the Iron Crown of Italy: that symbol of an imaginary right, which was in after ages so often to form the prize of foreign conflict; and which, in our own times, after typifying the ambitious pretensions of the modern Charlemagne,‡ has descended upon the brows of an Austrian dynasty. The infant King of Lombardy was left to grow up among his new subjects; but the restless activity of his parent was soon summoned a second time from the Italian plains to the forests of Northern Germany, by the intelligence of a fresh insurrection among the Saxons. The unconquerable love of freedom, or the blind hatred of Christianity, which distinguished that people, was animated by the hero Witikend, who, like another Arminius, headed his nation in the obstinate struggle against the double yoke of conquest and civilisation. Disdaining submission to the force which he was not prepared to withstand, the Saxon Chieftain, during the former successes of Charles, had retired into Scandinavia: but the general revolt of his Countrymen was the signal for his return; and before Charles could

Revol of the Saxon people Wikend

* L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, vol. ii. p. 291.

† This Spanish expedition of Charlemagne is briefly related in the 1Xth chapter of Eginhart, our only original authority of credit. But the fabulous exploits of Charles and his Paladins against the Saracens, which form the daring theme of the Romances of the Middle Ages, are reflected and multiplied, like many-coloured hues of prismatic light, from the lustre of his real achievements.

‡ At a distance of ten centuries, the reestablishment of a French Empire, suggested to literary adulation the obvious resemblance between its first and second founders; and several acts of Napoleon attested his eagerness to accept the comparison. His assumption of the Iron Crown was a palpable copy of Charlemagne; and his legislative labours, his patronage of Letters and the Arts, and the magnificence of his public works, might have justified the parallel:—if the enlightened conqueror of our times had expiated the cold selfishness of his devastating ambition with the same unaffected sympathy and zeal for the welfare and happiness of his people, which have sanctified the memory of the illustrious Barbarian.

* Eginharti, Annal., ad annum 768—776. Vita Car. c. 5, &c. Annal. Bertiniani, apud Muratori, Script. Rer. Ital. vol. ii. p. 475—498.

† Eginharti, Annal., ad ann. 778.

France,
Germany,
Italy, &c.

From
A. D.
768.
to
A. D.
814.

Victories of Charlevoix the Slavonic Tribes and Huns.

A. D.
789.

A. D.
796.

Consolidation and extent of his Empire.

Greatest power, and reputation of Charles.

His intercourse with the Eastern Empire.

History. reach the theatre of action, Witikend had inflicted a severe defeat upon his Lieutenants. The approach of the Frankish King with a formidable army revived the terror of his power; the Saxons, as usual, submitted at his presence, only to await a more favourable opportunity of insurrection; and Witikend, deserted by his followers, fled again for refuge to the North. Charles then resolved, with a cool and detestable cruelty which has left an indelible stain upon his memory, to quell the spirit of the whole Saxon people by an appalling example of severity. All the principal men of the nation being convened to attend his camp at Verden for the purpose of homage or counsel, the peaceful assembly was suddenly surrounded by his troops and disarmed; and four thousand five hundred Saxons of the noblest blood of their nation were led out and beheaded on the same spot.*

Subdued by Charles: let his atrocious ministry of the Saxons
A. D.
788.

produces a new conspication.

Extermination of Witikend,
A. D.
783.

Protracted conquest of
the Saxons.

Final settlement of Germany by the interchange of Saxons and Frankish colonies.

This horrible butchery, so far from producing the desired effect, only gounded a brave and ferocious people to fury and vengeance. They everywhere flew to arms; Witikend once more appeared as their leader; and a war of extermination raged for two years longer, until Charles, either relenting in his policy or sincerely weary of endless massacre, converted his victories into the means of conciliation. The courage of the surviving Saxon leaders had been broken by repeated defeats, they gladly listened to his overtures of mercy; and even Witikend himself, as if yielding to the spell of inevitable destiny, at last tendered a faithful submission, and acknowledged the Religion and dominion of the victor. His example had a powerful influence upon his Countrymen: but it did not prevent a frequent recurrence of insurrection and massacre; nor were the Saxons finally subdued, and the remains of Paganism extirpated in Germany, until after above thirty years had elapsed of frightful persecution and bloodshed. Even in the total subjugation of their Country, the most resolute freemen or the fiercest idolaters, preserving their spirit untamable, retired to the forests of Scandinavia; and carrying with them their hatred of the Frankish name, while they gradually mingled their blood with the Tribes of the Northmen, or Normans, these Saxon exiles swelled the piratical swarms which were shortly to issue from the shores of the Baltic, and took a deadly vengeance on the Carolingian Empire for the original wrongs of their nation.†

The great talents and incessant activity of Charles, the magnitude of his power, and the constancy of his fortune, had barely sufficed for the conquest of a people, whose rebellion was renewed as often as he withdrew his armies or even his presence from among them. A transfusion of races was adopted as the only alternative of perpetual revolt or gradual extermination. By the wisdom of the conqueror, Frankish colonies were settled on the Elbe and the Weser; and bodies of the Saxons were compelled to transport themselves to Italy, and more numerous into Flanders and Brabant: in which latter Provinces they still maintained that inextinguishable passion for freedom, and resistance to tyranny, which, fostered by the spirit of Commerce, became for many centuries the proverbial inheritance of their brave and industrious descendants. In their native seats, the remains of the Saxons were permitted to retain their own laws; they were governed by Dukes of their own blood; and while their union with the body of the Frankish Empire was gradually effected, the independence and distinction of their national character were in a great measure preserved.

The victories by which Charles subjugated, or at least curbed, the other barbarous nations who disquieted the Eastern frontiers of his Empire, were associated with circumstances less repugnant to humanity, and almost equally important in their results. The Slavonic Tribes, who had overspread the modern regions of Bohemia, Prussia, and Poland, were in general compelled to acknowledge obedience to his sceptre; and the first of those Countries, at least, may be numbered among the conquered Provinces which he annexed to his dominions. It required a more arduous effort, and a sanguinary and devastating struggle of several years, to reduce the Huns or Avars of Pannonia to a similar subjection: but after the Frankish arms had penetrated to the Royal village of those Barbarians, and all the flower of their race had perished in several engagements, the wreck of the nation accepted the mercy of the conqueror; and the frontier of the Empire was permanently extended over a part of the modern Hungary and Dalmatia, to the junction of the Danube with the Save, and the shores of the Istrian gulf.*

These conquests on the Eastern extremity of the Frankish Empire seemed to put the seal to its grandeur and security. The traitorous machinations and frequent rebellions of Tassillon, the Duke of Bavaria, a kinsman of Charles, in concert with the Saxons and Huns, had justified a lenient sentence of deposition; the whole of his great Duchy was incorporated into the general Monarchy; and the Carolingian dominions extended without intermission from the Ebro to the Elbe and the Lower Danube, and from the North Sea to the Mediterranean and the Adriatic, over a part of Spain, the whole of France, and Germany Proper, with portions of Bohemia and Hungary, some Dalmatian Provinces, and Italy, as far as the present Neapolitan frontiers. The completion of this geographical circle by the arms and the activity of Charles opens the most glorious epoch in his long and fortunate reign. The supremacy of his power and the renown of his great talents were acknowledged, not only in his vast dominions, but throughout the Western world, in the respect and fear of the Saracens of Spain, in the reverence of the Christian Monarchs of Gallia and Asturias, and in the homage of the Scottish and perhaps of the Saxon Princes of Britain.† The fame of his greatness extended even to the distant Court of the Mohammedan rulers of Asia and Africa; and Haroun Alraschid, his contemporary, and the most illustrious of the Abbasid Caliphs of Bagdad, sought an interchange of embassies and compliments with his Throne, and cultivated a ceremonial friendship, which was protected by distance from any interruption, and could not be endangered by the collision of political interests.‡

Upon less doubtful motives than curiosity or vanity, the reputation and power of the Frankish Monarch commanded the respect and excited the dread of the only Potentate who might pretend to dispute with him the obedience of the Christian world. The sceptre of

* Eginhart, Annales, ad ann. 788—794. Vita Car. c. 15.

† The respectful correspondence of our Saxon Egbert with Charlemagne appears rather apocryphal. But see Gaillard, vol. ii. ad p. 384, &c.

‡ Egin. yr. Vita, c. 16.

* Eginhart, Annales, ad ann. 783.

† Ibid. ad ann. 783—786.

VOL. XI.

History. the Eastern Empire was now held by a woman and a mother, whose unnatural ambition was defiled with the deposition and cruel mutilation of her own son. After depriving him of his birthright and his eyes, Irene reigned alone as Empress of the East; and her alarm at the increasing power of the Frankish Monarchy had been artfully evinced in the intrigues by which she had instigated the unsuccessful revolt of the Dukes of Bavaria and Benevento and the Slavonic Barbarians. After the failure of these machinations, she endeavoured, if the Chroniclers of her own nation may be believed, to divert the hostility and allure the ambition of Charles, with the hope of sharing the Imperial title, and uniting the Frankish and Grecian Empires by the possession of her hand.*

With whatever truth and sincerity the proposal may have been made and accepted, its fulfilment was frustrated by a revolution which suddenly precipitated Irene from the Throne of Constantinople; and the formal elevation of Charles to the Imperial dignity was reserved for another political architect. This was Pope Leo III., the successor of Adrian I. A sedition at Rome, in which the nephews of the late Pontiff compelled Leo to fly for his life, reduced the new Pope to throw himself upon the protection of Charles, and paved the way for a signal exhibition of his gratitude to his benefactor. Charles, after restoring the fugitive Pope in triumph to his seat, proceeded in person to Rome; heard the accusations of Leo's enemies; constituted himself the judge of his innocence; and feigned a reluctance to receive the recompense of this service, for which it is probable that he had privately stipulated. Leo was popular at Rome; and his restorer was welcomed in the ancient Capital of the world with the enthusiastic plaudits of the citizens. Ever since the first delivery of Rome from the oppression of the Lombards by the Carolingian arms, both Pepin and Charles had exercised a general, though not very definite Sovereignty over the city, with the vague and unmeaning title of Patrician, which had originally been borne by the Lieutenants of the Eastern Empire. A more august appellation was now to confess the allegiance of the Romans, and to assert the succession of the Frankish Sovereigns to the purple of the Cæsars. During the celebration of high mass at the festival of Christmas, on the last year of the VIIIth century, and in the Church of St. Peter, while the French King knelt before the altar, Leo suddenly approached him and placed an Imperial crown on his head, with the exclamation, which was immediately echoed in the shouts of the people, of "Long life to Charles Augustus! crowned by the hand of God: the great, pious, and pacific Emperor of the Romans!" The authority of the Pope to confer this dignity might vainly be demanded, but the new Emperor was at least worthy of the honour; the restoration of the Empire of the West may be formally dated from the solemn event; and the coronation of CHARLEMAGNE has, perhaps, more than any other single circumstance, indissolubly united the well-merited epithet of greatness with his name.†

Protection of Pope Leo III.

A. D. 799.

And coronation as Emperor of the West.

A. D. 800.

* Theophanes, Chronographia, p. 401—402. In the reign of Nicephorus, the successor of Irene, a solemn Treaty was concluded between him and Charlemagne which, (a. n. 802.) on the basis of possession, adjusted the limits, and proclaimed the alliance, of the Eastern and Western Empires.

† Eginhart, Anales, ad ann. 799—800. In the contest for supremacy between the Empire and the Papedom, which fiercely

The elevation of Charlemagne to the Imperial dignity introduces the most splendid, the pacific glories, of his protracted dominion. In a natural division of his reign, that event marks the triumphant term of his conquests, and the settlement of his Civil administration. In a period of thirty-two years, which were passed in incessant hostilities, he had extended his possessions from the Rhine to the Elbe and the Save, from the Pyrenees to the Ebro, and from the Alps to the borders of Calabria: the remaining fourteen years of his life were almost wholly occupied in unwearied and laudable efforts to consolidate and ameliorate the institutions of his Empire. An era of general peace was maintained, with few interruptions, by the fame of his talents and power, and the dread of his arms and activity; and the establishment of tranquillity was followed by efforts for universal improvement in jurisprudence, learning, manners, and morals. Among the Franks, he restored the regular convocation of the National Assemblies, which had fallen into some disuse under the Merovingian Kings. He laboured to introduce order into their meetings, and encouraged their legislative deliberations for the common weal. While he left the people of the conquered Provinces as much as possible in the enjoyment of their own ancient privileges and customs, he endeavoured to modify and amend their Barbarian institutions. He even meditated the comprehensive design of reducing and reconciling the contradictions of the Roman and Barbarian law into one uniform Code of jurisprudence throughout his whole Empire; and the magnitude of this conception, which a single life was too short to mature, at least attests the capacity of his mind and the elevation of his views. He also mingled actively in the Ecclesiastical affairs of his Empire; and even, with the tone of command or protection to the Latin Church, interposed in her controversies and dictated the proceedings of her Councils. It was in the same plenitude and security of his own power, that he lavishly increased the privileges and authority of the Clergy, whom he intrusted with a large share in the administration of the Empire. With too abundant a confidence in their superior qualifications for office, he extended the jurisdiction of the Bishops over his temporal tribunals; he forbade the lay Magistrates to entertain causes against churchmen; and he thus elevated the influence of the Episcopal Order above all former example and authority.*

With less questionable advantage to his subjects, this great Monarch reformed the coinage of the Empire and enacted the legal divisions of money, provided by his laws for the correction of innumerable abuses of administration, and laboured to ameliorate the slavish condition and to diminish the oppression of the common people.† The same wise and benevolent zeal for the advancement of general civilization and happiness, agitated the Middle Ages and has been more harmoniously continued to modern times by the zeal of literary and antiquarian partisans, the circumstances of Charlemagne's coronation have been variously regarded: but the simple fact remains the same, that the Pope first conferred the Imperial diadem upon a Prince whose general sovereignty he had already acknowledged, and afterwards paid him the homage of a subject. See, chiefly, Muratori, Anales d'Italia, ad ann.; Pagi, Critica, vol. iii. p. 418; Giazaroni, (Historia d'Napoli), vol. i. p. 395; Gaillard, vol. ii. p. 412—446; St. Marc, Abrégé Chronologique, vol. i. p. 440—450.

* Steph. Baluzi, Capitulare, (Caroli.) vol. i. p. 227, 904, 995, 1105, &c.

† Baluzi, Capit. passim.

France, Germany, Italy, &c.

From A. D. 768, to A. D. 814.

Pacific glories of his subsequent reign

Efforts in legislation.

Supremacy in Ecclesiastical affairs.

Measures of social improvement.

History. was shown in the number and variety of the public works which he directed: in the construction of roads and bridges, the opening of navigable rivers, and the creation of a marine to foster the commerce and protect the coasts of the Empire. Among these projects, the attempt to complete a communication between the German Ocean and the Euxine by connecting the Rhine and the Danube with a canal, deserves a particular and honourable mention for the grandeur of the design, although it miscarried in the execution.* The failure has been imputed to the rude state of the Arts and the ignorance and unskillfulness of a dark Age: yet, if the difficulties of the work were not really insuperable, it is a greater reproach to the superior intelligence and power of modern times, that at the distance of ten centuries, the magnificent conception of a Barbarian mind remains still unaccomplished.

All these useful efforts to associate his greatness with the welfare of his people have justly raised and perpetuated the renown of Charlemagne far above the ordinary fame which is lit up in the desolation of conquest. Yet, to the eye of scholastic enthusiasm, it is his zealous endeavours for the encouragement of Learning, imperfect and transient though they were, which have shed the purest and most pleasing lustre on his memory; and, with their usual prodigality of gratitude, men of letters have delighted to confer that immortality on the genius of Charlemagne, which Princes have ever cheaply won by the patronage of intellectual studies. But after every deduction for the tastelessness and superstition which disfigured his purposes, the foundation of Schools and the collection of Libraries, the attempt to form an Academy in his Court, and the persevering and successful desire to gather the few learned men of every Country around his person, are all positive evidences of a real sympathy for literary excellence, which not only overcame the original deficiencies of a neglected education, but rose far superior to the rude spirit of his times.†

All the glory and fortune of Charlemagne, however, could not exempt his declining years from the heavy cares of Empire and the ordinary afflictions of humanity. The perpetual anxiety for the repression of abuses which his edicts evince, betrays also the inefficiency of his best efforts, and reveals the internal disorders of his reign and the miseries of the lower class of people. The very extension of his conquests had served only to enlarge the assailable circle of his dominions; and his subjugation and settlement of Northern Germany first threw down the barrier which had concealed the general weakness of Europe from the fierce natives of Scandinavia. At least the advancement of the Frankish frontiers to the Elbe, and the flight of the Saxon exiles to the shores of the Baltic, were almost immediately followed by the emerging of those piratical fleets from the Scandinavian seas, which in a few years spread desolation throughout the coasts of the Ocean and Mediterranean. The genuine origin or fortuitous union of those merciless swarms of adventurers, who became so terrible to the less barbarous nations under the name of Northmen, Normans, or Danes, is buried in the obscurity of Scandinavian legends; but the Age and the Empire of Charlemagne first witnessed and sustained the scourge of their perpetual invasions. Nursed in the wild storms and cold of their native regions, and habituated to a tempestuous navigation, these Northmen fearlessly braved every peril, and were unequally opposed by the less hardy people of milder climates, whose defenceless coasts invited their roving activity, and whose possessions tempted their ravenous appetite for plunder. In a few years after their appearance on the Ocean, they extended their desultory ravages along the shores of Germany, England, France and Spain. Their descents were sometimes repulsed by the vigilance of Charlemagne and the victories of his navy: but all his power was insufficient to check the incessant expeditious and avert the progress of their numerous fleets. Even during his life they penetrated into the Mediterranean; and on the first spectacle of their vessels from a port id that sea, the aged conqueror is said to have wept in prophetic sorrow at the evils which threatened his Empire.

In his family the heart of the Emperor was doomed to suffer some of the severest trials which belong to the parental condition: to witness and survive the death of his children. His eldest son, Pepin, whose legitimacy is doubtful, had engaged in an unnatural rebellion, and was justly punished by confinement to a Monastery in which he died. Two other of his sons also, Charles and Pepin Carloman, closed their lives before him; and the death of his favourite daughter Rotrude filled up the measure of his affliction. These misfortunes, indeed, were soothed by the filial piety of Lewis, his only remaining son, whom he rewarded by associating with him in the Government. In the last year of the Emperor's life, a solemn Assembly of his States was convened at Aix-la-Chapelle, to confirm his intention; and the Imperial Crown being laid on the altar, Charlemagne, as if he foresaw and desired to prevent the usurpations of the Church, commanded the Prince to place it on his own head, in token that he received and held it alone of God, his father, and his people. Charlemagne survived this remarkable ceremony only a few months; breathing his last in the seventy-first year of his age and the forty-seventh of his reign.‡

The character of Charlemagne has been perhaps sufficiently described in the political, the military, and the domestic transactions of his memorable life. But, on a formal estimate of his qualities of heart and mind, our judgment should in fairness be confined, and his real merit should be measured only by the moral and intellectual standard of his own times. Apart, indeed, from the accidents of his position at an epoch of thick barbarism and ferocious violence, we may readily discover in many features of his conduct the true and unchangeable elements of greatness. His universal ambition of excellence, the magnitude of his conceptions, his benevolent purposes of social improvement, and the indefatigable activity of his spirit, could be the natural products of no particular state of civilization, and less than any, of the times in which he lived. In whatever age of the world he had filled a Throne, these capacities would probably have numbered him among the most illustrious of mankind: but the positive as well as the

France, Germany, Italy, &c.

From A. D. 768, to A. D. 814.

Domestic afflictions and death of Charlemagne. A. D. 814.

His character.

* Eginhart, Annales, ad ann. 794: with a commentary on the attempt, in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, vol. xvii.

† Eginhart, in Vita Car. postm., and especially c. 25. and 29. But the efforts of Charlemagne for the promotion of Learning are best collected and developed in the Hist. Littéraire de France, vol. iv of the learned Bénédictines.

• Thegan. Chron. Fidei Ludovici Pii, c. 7.

‡ Eginhart, ad ann.

History.

From
A. D.
768.
to
A. D.
814.
Estimate of his achievements

apparent splendour of his character becomes immeasurably enhanced by a contrast with the darkness which surrounds it.

Considering him merely as a conqueror, it would not perhaps be difficult to detract largely from the fame of his exploits and the wisdom of his policy. It has been objected against the originality of his merit, that he did no more than conquer with the means which the two heroes of his race who preceded him had prepared and bequeathed to his hand: but neither were the most celebrated conquerors of the ancient and modern world, Alexander, the first two Cæsars, Mahomet II., Charles XII., and Napoleon, any more than Charlemagne, the absolute creators of the military power which they wielded. There is more justice in the remark that it was the fortune of Charlemagne never to encounter an antagonist worthy of his arms, or equal in strength, discipline, and union to the contest with his troops. Enemies utterly incapable alike of singly resisting the force of his Empire or of confederating for their mutual defence, were easily subjugated in detail by his numerous armies. It extremely depreciates the value of his achievements, that his best trophies were torn only from the degenerate Lombards, the barbarous Saxons and Huns, and the disunited Saracens of Spain; and both his martial genius and his glory are heavily impeded in his disgraceful and unrevenged defeat by the mountaineers of Gascony.

and policy
as a conqueror.

The policy which directed the arms of Charlemagne, and the theatre of their employment, has been as freely questioned as the merits of his success. It has naturally excited the surprise of Historians, that he abandoned the brilliant completion of his rich conquests in Italy and Spain, to consume thirty laborious campaigns in the forests and wilds of Germany and Pannonia. There can be little doubt that it would have needed far inferior efforts to extend his Empire over the whole of those two Southern Peninsulas of Europe, than he wasted in the barren consummation of his victories over the Saxons. The weakness of the Greek Empire must have delivered its Provinces of Southern Italy an easy prey to the Frankish arms: the fatal dissensions of the Saracens in Spain offered a splendid prize to his ambition. Nor, if his strong but misdirected anxiety for the propagation of Christianity be held to account for his perseverance in the Saxon wars, is his indifference to the pursuit of his Spanish conquests the more explicable: since his Religious zeal and his thirst of glory might have been equally gratified, and his ambition would have been more highly rewarded, by the expulsion of the Infidels from one of the wealthiest and most ancient Kingdoms of Christian Europe. It has been ingeniously suggested that, in his expeditions beyond the Rhine and the Elbe, Charlemagne perhaps aspired to save his Monarchy from the fate of the Roman Empire, to tame the enemies of civilization, and to oppose a rampart to the North against the future torrent of the Barbarian migrations. But this defence of a policy,—which, besides, is only imagined in the opinion, without being supported by any contemporary declaration of the purpose,—is rather plausible than justified by the event. The utility of the precaution would be signally exposed in the subsequent devastations of the Norman pirates; and the Northern conquests of Charlemagne could not extinguish, if they did first rouse, the fierce energies of the Scandinavian race, who mercilessly lacerated anew the Provinces of the second Western Empire, with the same fatal wounds which the earlier Barbarian invaders had inflicted on the first.

Whatever errors may be fairly imputed to the military conduct and judgment of Charlemagne as a conqueror, are deeply aggravated when we view them in connection with his intolerant and sanguinary bigotry. With the furious zeal of a Barbarian, he outraged the gentle spirit of Christianity, when he attempted the forcible conversion of the Saxon idolaters; and true Religion and policy must equally condemn the cruel and injudicious violence which substituted the horrors of persecution for the persuasive truths of the Gospel. The laws of a conqueror who punished the refusal of Baptism, the relapse to Paganism, and even the eating of flesh during Lent, with the penalty of death, degrade the bigotry of Charlemagne even below the ignorant ferocity of Clovis, or the fanatical proselytism of the Koran. The perpetual revolts of the Saxons were chiefly provoked by these atrocious edicts; and the Capitularies of Charlemagne offer a sufficient explanation for the obstinate resistance of that people, and an eternal reproach to his own memory. Nor, without even the same excuse of a mistaken zeal for Religion, was he incapable of yet greater cruelties in the unscrupulous gratification of his ambition; and both the fate of his brother's children and the shocking massacre of the Saxon thousands in cold blood, are paralleled only by the worst atrocities of a Tartarian despot.

France,
Germany,
Italy, &c.

From
A. D.
768.
to
A. D.
814.

His Religious intolerance and cruelties against the Saxons

These excesses of Religious and Political cruelty are the deep shades in the bright character of Charlemagne; the darkening vices of a great nature which, though far from sanguinary by temperament or in wantonness, could scarcely be expected to escape from the contagious influence of a superstitious and ferocious Age. In the judgment of more humane and enlightened times, it requires nothing less than the benevolent attributes of his Civil administration to redeem the offences of his ambition and bigotry: but, even in analyzing his crimes, we ought at once to lose their remembrance, when we compare the benefits of his reign with the previous and subsequent misery of Europe. Seldom has the violent acquisition of power been equally sanctified by its use; and posterity has done justice to the merit of Charlemagne, when it has rested his greatness chiefly on the qualities which were least appreciated in his own times, and conceded to his legislative labours for the public happiness, his encouragement of pacific Arts, and his protection of Learning, the renown which it detracts from his sanguinary conquests and persecuting fanaticism.

Contrast of wisdom, and benevolence in his Civil administration.

In the Civil administration of Charlemagne, however, some prominent faults are readily discernible. His legislation extended only to the wants of his own immediate reign; and the unsettled Constitution of his Empire, neither provided for the stability of its foundations, nor secured the fabric of Society beyond the term of his own life. Though he frequently convoked the National Councils of the Franks, he neither organized any vigorous system for perpetuating an absolute Monarchy, nor dictated any plan for the improvement and composition of those Representative Assemblies which are the essence of all free Governments. While his sons lived, he even intended the continuance of that custom of partition which had proved the ruin of the Merovingian Monarchy; and his sagacity was not displayed in any effort to prevent the dissolution of his ill-considered Empire.

Defects of his government.

History. But the most striking Political error of his Government was the encouragement which he gave to the power of the Clergy. In this he was doubtless actuated by the most magnanimous trait in his character—that respect for intellectual superiority, which led him to cherish an Order who engrossed all the knowledge of the times. His esteem for Learning, the remains of which they alone possessed, his anxiety for the support of Religion and the advancement of civilization, and his conviction of his own strength, might all impel him to select the Clergy for the most intelligent, virtuous, and pious instruments of his designs. But this generous confidence had some fatal effects for his own posterity, and the independence of Society. It gave to an ambitious Hierarchy the future means of subjugating the Thrones of Europe to their influence: the Imperial supremacy which restrained the pretensions of the Ecclesiastical Order expired with the genius of Charlemagne; the extravagant pretensions of the Romish Church, if not also of the Papacy itself, were in a great degree of his creation; and the despotism which the Bishops established over the temporal affairs of the Empire almost immediately after his death, may clearly be traced to the share in Civil administration which he had habituated them to exercise.

His domestic and personal qualities. In estimating the private character of this great Prince, the same large allowance is to be made for the manners of the times, which is demanded in the consideration of his public conduct. The licentiousness of his domestic life, the unscrupulous divorce of nine wives, and the unrestrained indulgence of innumerable amours, are sufficient stains upon his morals: without the aggravated charge of an incestuous passion, which appears to have had no other foundation than in the popular mistake of some modern writers.* The frugal economy of his Imperial household, and the temperate simplicity of his own habits in apparel and diet, which Eginhart, his Secretary and Biographer, has minutely described, may be favourably contrasted with these grosser propensities, though they will not extenuate their scandal; and his amiable and generous qualities as a parent, a master, and a friend, at least prove that his moral infirmities were associated with all the finer and better feelings of our nature. But it is his intellectual tastes and occupations in the midst of the coarse and brutalizing ignorance of Society, which most gracefully redeem his subjection to the common vices of his station and times. His own education was defective and late; and he was indebted to perpetual and laborious study in his mature years, and even in old age, for the sum of his acquirements. As a scholar, these were not perhaps great, even in comparison only with the most erudite of his contemporaries: but the solicitations and liberality with which he attracted men of Learning and merit to his Court, and the delight which he took in their conversation, show his eagerness to repair his own deficiencies, and explain the mode in which he improved his knowledge. Eginhart celebrates his familiar command of Latin, his ready perusal of Greek, and his acquaintance with the chief Sciences, such as they were, of the times: Grammar, Rhetoric, Logic, and Astronomy. The fluent eloquence with which these acquirements were displayed might be a natural gift; a quick apprehension probably enabled him to gather most of what he knew from oral communication; and we are astonished by the plain testimony of Eginhart to his ignorance even of the mechanical rudiments of writing, which it was the laborious and imperfect effort of his latter years to acquire.† But the illustrious qualities and accomplishments of Charlemagne are not to be measured by the pedantry of the Schools. In whatever point of view we regard his intellectual character, we shall find it still surrounded with all the originality and loftiness of a truly great mind: his errors and vices were those of his Age, his talents and virtues were his own.‡

* The fond zeal of the good Benedictines (Hist. Litt. de France) for the memory of so illustrious a patron of Letters has tempted them to disregard the plain confession of Eginhart, (Vita Car. c. 25.) that his Imperial master “tentavit scribere, &c. ut manuum fingendis literis non proficeret. Sed parum prosperè successit labor præceptoris et viri inchoatus.”

† The most elaborate view of the life, Empire, and character of Charlemagne is to be found in the Work of Gaillard, (4 vols. 12mo.) before quoted. But it errs in the usual partiality of biography. An opposite fault may be objected to the otherwise masterly sketch of Gibbon, c. 49—who cannot forgive the memory of the Emperor for his support and elevation of the Church. The industrious and impartial Schmidt (Hist. des Allemans, vol. ii.) is here a safer guide than either the French Biographer or the English Historian.

* This error has strangely originated in a palpable misinterpretation of a passage in Eginhart, Vita Car. c. 19. which indeed gently insinuates, in no very enigmatical language, not the infamy of the father, but the scandalous reputation of his daughters.

France, Germany, Italy, &c.

From A. D. 768. to A. D. 814.

His intellectual tastes and acquirements.

General grandeur and elevation of his mind.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LII.

OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, FROM THE DEATH OF JULIAN, A. D. 363, TO THE END OF THE IVth CENTURY.

History.

From
A. D.
363.
to
A. D.
400.

We now resume the thread of Ecclesiastical History, which, as yet, has not guided us beyond the death of Julian. During his short reign, and, indeed, in the whole intermediate period, from the accession of Constantine, the external History of the Church is so intermingled with Civil and Political History, that we have thought it more convenient to treat them together than separately. In the present Chapter we propose to offer a rapid sketch of the chief outward events affecting the fortunes of Religion for the few remaining years till the close of the IVth century; and we shall afterwards, in pursuance of the system which we have heretofore adopted, review the chief Ecclesiastical Writers and Heresies who adorned or distracted the Christian Church in the whole course of the same century. It is only necessary to premise, that if we here speak of certain Heresies not yet noticed, as if the reader were already familiar with them, this anticipation, which is, indeed, a matter of necessity, must neither surprise him, nor create a suspicion that ought to be omitted. A full account of the doctrines of the Arians and of the disputes excited by them will be given under the head of Heresies. They bear such a prominent part in the transactions of this period, that it would be difficult to avoid all mention of them in writing the external History of the Church.

Policy of Jovian.

A. D.
363.

Jovian, the successor of Julian, a zealous Christian, conducted himself with great temper and moderation in Ecclesiastical affairs. He lost no time in restoring the free exercise of the Christian Religion, and in abolishing the Laws enacted by Julian to degrade and oppress the Sacerdotal Order. He restored the privileges and immunities of the Church, placing it in nearly the same condition in which it had been left by Constantine. He recalled the Prelates banished during the preceding reign. He manifested his attachment to the Orthodox Believers in the Trinity by the attention which he paid to the illustrious Athanasius, who became his principal adviser on the affairs of the Church; and by checking the petulance of the Arians when they pertinaciously attempted to regain the ascendancy lost since the time of Constantine. But, though decidedly Orthodox, he wisely and magnanimously forbore to persecute either the Sectarics or the Pagans.* He granted a full and free toleration to all Religious opinions and all modes of worship, and he showed a sincere desire to allay Religious animosity,† and to promote peace and unity in the Church.‡

Valentinian, whose great qualities as a Sovereign and a legislator were strangely contrasted with the natural violence and ferocity of his disposition, steadily pursued the temperate and judicious policy of his predecessor. He, indeed, severely prohibited the nocturnal sacrifices of the Pagans, and magical incantations, and occasionally restrained those Sectarics§ who were reputedly guilty of flagrant immorality, or obnoxious as disturbers of the public peace. But, with these few exceptions, he allowed the free exercise of Religious worship to all, extending the equal protection of the Law to Heretics, Jews, and Heathens.|| In consequence of this moderation, and of the Emperor's strict and vigorous administration of the Laws, the Western Churches, generally speaking, were little disturbed by the Religious animosities or rancorous Persecutions, so disgraceful to the reign of Constantine.¶

Of the Christian Church, &c.

From
A. D.
363.
to
A. D.
400.
Valentinian
His Reign was moderate tous.
A. D.
364.

* Theodoret (lib. v. c. 21.) represents Jovian as having interdicted the worship of Idols, and this statement is adopted by many modern Ecclesiastical Historians. But Theodoret, a contemporary Orator, and himself a Heathen, positively asserts the contrary; and his testimony is quoted, and not contradicted, by Socrates.

† It is probable that either the direct influence of the Emperor, or the knowledge of his pacific sentiments, brought about the Synod of Antioch, in which a sort of reconciliation took place between the Anomœan party of Acacius of Cæsarea, and the Catholics who adhered to Meletius, Bishop of Antioch. The former agreed to receive the definitions of the Nicene Council, and the latter abated something of their rigour respecting the use of the term consubstantial. The consequence was that the sincerity of the Acacians was doubtful, and Meletius and his friends were stigmatized as Semi-Arians and Macedonians.

‡ For a more detailed account of Jovian's proceedings, the reader is referred to Socrates, lib. iii. c. 24, 25. Sozomen, lib. vi. c. 3, 4, 5. Theodoret, lib. iv. c. 1—4.

§ Particularly the Manicheans and the Donatists, the former of whom were accused of licentiousness, and of practising magical incantations at their secret meetings. The Donatists were regarded, not only as rebels against the Civil authority, but as guilty of sacrilege in rebaptizing the members of a different communion.

|| After the death of Julian, the Heathen Temples were often attacked, and sometimes demolished in popular tumults. Valentinian allowed guards to be stationed for their protection, and at the same time consulted the feelings of his Christian subjects by forbidding any Christian soldier to be employed in that service.

¶ Socrates, lib. iv. c. 1. Sozomen, lib. vi. c. 6. Theodoret, lib. iv. c. 6.

* Some original documents, containing a curious account of the conferences between Jovian and the Arian deputies from Alexandria, are inserted in the II^d volume of the Works of Athanasius. Compare Bletier, Histoire de Jovien, tom. I. p. 138—147.

History. The Church of Rome was at this time peaceably governed by Liberius, who, after his return from banishment, retracted his profession of Arianism and his condemnation of Athanasius, and adhered steadfastly to the Orthodox party. That party, superior in numbers, and no longer oppressed by the tyranny of Constantius, or the insidious policy of Julian, speedily regained the ascendancy.* On the death of Liberius, a violent and disgraceful conflict arose between two rival candidates for the vacant See, hitherto unexampled in the annals of Christian Rome, though by no means uncommon in later Ages. Damasus, a Spaniard by birth, was elected to succeed Liberius, an election made, it appears, in due form and with the sanction of the public authorities; but a considerable party in the Church, dissatisfied with his character and with his conduct during the Arian Persecution, protested against his appointment, and elected one Ursinius in opposition to him. The Prefect Juventinus endeavoured to put a stop to those irregular proceedings; upon which a popular commotion was excited, and a number of the friends of Ursinius assembled in the Basilica of Sicinius. There they were attacked, and many cruelly massacred by the armed partisans of Damasus. The popular fury on both sides was so great, that the Prefect was compelled to provide for his safety by leaving the city; nor could the tumult be quelled but by the utmost exercise of Imperial authority. The victory remained with Damasus; † his election was confirmed; and the rival Pope, with many of his abettors, was banished from Rome. With this exception, the tranquillity of the Western Churches experienced no material interruption during the reign of Valentinian, and Christianity continued to make silent but rapid advances, both in the Roman Provinces and among the independent Barbarians. By the vigorous, and, in the main, judicious enactments of Valentinian, the prosperity of the Western Church was greatly promoted, and increased dignity and importance were attached to the Christian profession.

Very different was the condition of the Eastern Churches under the rule of Valens, brother to Valentinian, but resembling him in nothing but his faults. A proselyte to the opinions of Eudoxius, the Arian Archbishop of Constantinople, by whom he was baptized, he is said to have solemnly sworn, at the instigation of that Prelate, to exert all his power in favour of the party espoused by him, and to the prejudice of Catholicism. It does not appear that he molested the Pagans, or even the Heretics; but all who adhered to the Nicene* opinions were exposed to a severe Persecution. At Constantinople, and in many other places, the churches were forcibly taken away from the Orthodox and transferred to the Arians. Meletius, Bishop of Antioch, Eusebius of Samosata, Gregory of Nyssa, and many other Catholic pastors, were banished, and the most arbitrary measures were employed to force persons of every age, sex, and condition to abjure their Faith. In Cappadocia those measures were opposed, with some degree of success, by the zeal and activity of Basil, Bishop of Cesarea, and his friend Gregory Nazianzen; the high character and firm and intrepid conduct of both of whom commanded the respect, or excited the awe of the Emperor, and procured them an indulgence which was granted to few. At Alexandria, also, Athanasius was protected from the Imperial officers by their fear of a popular commotion; and during his life his followers experienced comparatively little molestation. After his death, the Arians, supported by the Prefect Palladius, forcibly introduced Lucius, a man previously conspicuous by his rancorous opposition to Athanasius, into the vacant See. Peter, who had been appointed to it by the unanimous consent of the Catholics, was imprisoned; all the Clergy who espoused his cause were banished; and throughout Egypt innumerable acts of cruelty and oppression were exercised upon those who adhered to the Nicene doctrines, especially the Monks, whose zealous opposition to Arianism † rendered them peculiarly obnoxious.

The Arians might, perhaps, have been more successful in their efforts to secure a complete ascendancy if they had not been weakened by their own dissensions. Their numerical strength was greatly increased by the accession of the Goths ‡ of Mœsia and Thrace, who, as

Of the Christian Church, &c.

From
A. D.
363.
to
A. D.
400.

A. D.
373

Went of unity among the Arians.

* A copious, and, probably, somewhat exaggerated account of the sufferings of the Orthodox under Valens, is given by Sozomen, lib. iv. c. 4. & seq.; Sozomen, lib. vi. c. 6. & seq., and particularly by Theodoret, lib. iv. c. 22—36.

† Gibbon (vol. i. c. 25.) extenuates the Persecution of Valens, and tries to make it appear that his agents often exceeded their master's instructions and intentions. In such matters it is almost impossible to discriminate between the portion of blame due to an arbitrary monarch, or to his advisers and agents; but the maxim, Qua fuit pars alterius, parit per se, seems as justly applicable to Princes as to persons of an inferior class. It is certain that many severities were exercised against the Catholics, of which the rigorous prohibition of their Religious worship was not the least. It is no less certain that Valens often interfered personally in the controversy in a busy meddling manner; and the character given of him by the impartial Marcellinus, who represents him as in crudelitatem proclivum, subrogatus ingenti, injuriam, iracundiam, criminibusque sine differentia veri et falsi facit, autem non, would not lead us to suppose that he greatly disapproved of the cruelties inflicted in his name on a Body of men who illustrated his views and inclinations; but rather make us suspect that, on some occasions, his direct share in them was greater than Gibbon is willing to admit.

‡ The time of the first conversion of any considerable portion of the Goths to Christianity, and the immediate occasion of their embracing Christianism, are so variously stated by the Ecclesiastical Historians, that it is difficult to arrive at any certain conclusion on those points. The different accounts of the ancient writers are industriously brought together by Mosco, Geschichte der Deutschen, book vii. sec. 39, 40. p. 317—322. However, there seems no reason for doubting that many of them embraced the Christian Faith early in the IVth century; that about A. D. 372, the Pagan King of the Visigoths, Athaulph, instituted a severe Persecution against many of his sub-

* Liberius, in his Epistle to those Eastern Bishops who renounced Macellonianism and Semi-Arianism, (apud Sozomen, lib. iv. c. 12) represents all the Western Bishops as having disavowed the profession of Rimini, and embraced the doctrine of the Nicene Council. This, however, must be understood with some limitation, as the important See of Milan was then, and for some time, after occupied by the Arian Prelate Auxentius. In the year 364, Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers, had a vigorous contest with Auxentius, endeavouring to prove that he was a Heretic, and unworthy of the situation which he held. But Valentinian, to whom the matter was referred, being either deceived by an ambiguous Confession of Faith drawn up by Auxentius, or resolved to proceed with strict impartiality in those contests, not only maintained him in the possession of his See, but ordered Hilary to quit Milan.

† A petition presented to the Emperor by two Presbyters of the party of Ursinius, it is asserted that Damasus marched in person to the attack, at the head of his Clergy and a body of hired Gladiators, and that of a hundred and sixty dead bodies which were found, not one belonged to his party. The account excites the colour of Baronius, and is discreetly passed over in silence by Fleury and other Roman Catholic Historians. The reflections which the Heathen Ammianus Marcellinus takes occasion from this incident to make on the ambition, luxury, and worldly-mindedness of the Roman Pontiffs, are too well known to need quoting.

‡ Soz. lib. iv. c. 29. Sozomen, lib. v. c. 23. Ammian. Marcellin. lib. xvi. c. 13.

History.

From
A. D.
369,
to
A. D.
400.

and Eunomania.

Religious liberty greatly abridged by Gratian.
A. D.
367.

it is said, through the influence of their Bishop, Uphilas, embraced the doctrines of Arius in the time of Valens, and by their subsequent conquests disseminated them through a great part of Western Europe. But the divisions^a among them were almost infinite, and (though frequently relating only to minor points of doctrine) effectually prevented all unanimity and concert in their proceedings. Many of the Semi-Arians and Macedonians were so jealous of the ascendancy of the pure Arians, that rather than hold any communion with them, they chose to reunite themselves to the Catholics.†

The Eunomians were at variance with all other sects, and even among themselves; so that though Valens was able for a time to harass and depress the Orthodox, he could not organize his own party, composed of such discordant materials, into a compact and permanent society.

Gratian, the son and successor of Valentinian, though of a mild and pacific disposition, did not exercise his father's impartiality in Religious matters. Imbued by St. Ambrose,‡ Bishop of Milan, with a strong attachment to the Catholic Faith, and, perhaps, with something of an intolerant spirit, he soon showed a disposition to circumscribe the liberty hitherto enjoyed by the Sectaries. He appears, indeed, to have tolerated the Arians;|| but the Eunomians, the Photinians, and the Manicheans were prohibited from holding any public Religious assembly; and the Donatists were commanded to surrender all the churches in their possession to the Catholics, and forbidden, under severe penalties, even to hold any private conventicle. When the death of Valens placed Gratian at the head of the Eastern Empire, the exiled¶ Prelates were immediately recalled; and though not immediately restored to their lost dignities and emoluments, especially where the Arians were numerous and powerful, it was not difficult to perceive that such a measure was in contemplation. The Pagans, though nominally tolerated, were subjected to various vexatious restrictions; their Priests were deprived of many privileges and exemptions, hitherto enjoyed by them; and plain indications were given that the liberal policy observed by Jovian and Valentinian was about to be succeeded by a very different system.

It was reserved for Theodosius, a Prince of greater talents and energy than Gratian, but acting upon the same maxims, and under the influence of the same advisers, to carry this change into effect. Immediately after his baptism,* his zeal for the Catholic doctrines displayed itself in a series of intolerant enactments against Heretics.† On his arrival at Constantinople, where Arianism had predominated during forty years, Demophilus, the successor of Eudoxius, was immediately required to embrace the Nicene Faith, or renounce his Bishopric. As he refused to change his principles, he, and the Clergy who adhered to him, were expelled from the city. Gregory Nazianzen, who, upon the death of Valens, had come to take charge of the oppressed and scattered Catholics of Constantinople, was chosen to fill the vacant See, by the arbitrary interposition of the Emperor, rather than by a regular canonical appointment.‡ The Sectaries were prohibited from holding any Religious assembly within the walls of towns, and a commission was issued, by which the Imperial officers were empowered to eject them from the churches which they had usurped, and to reinstate the Catholics. This mandate was rigidly enforced, and, shortly after, the Heretics were forbidden to consecrate Bishops, or to erect places of worship, either in the cities or the country. Little opposition was made to these sweeping measures. In many districts the Arians were in an humiliating minority; in others, where their numbers were greater, they were so divided into factions, as to be incapable of unity of purpose. Their Religious principles, moreover, were but ill calculated to support them in the hour of trial.|| They were dispersed and intimidated, and gradually conformed to the established system; and thus the public profession of that doctrine, once triumphant throughout the Roman Empire, was suppressed almost without a struggle.

While Theodosius, in the East, thus endeavoured to jects on account of their attachment to it; and that their lapse into Arianism took place during the reign of Valens.

* Socrates, lib. v. c. 20—24.

† This reconciliation, perhaps more apparent than real, took place in the year 365, chiefly through the influence of Eustathius of Sebaste, whose subsequent conduct made it appear that he acted more from policy than conviction, on this occasion.

‡ Upon the death of Auxentius, A. D. 374, Ambrose, who was then Governor of the Province, was chosen to succeed him by popular acclamation. Though a layman, and not even baptized at the time of his election, he applied himself so zealously to his new profession, that he quickly surpassed most of his contemporaries, and became, through his talents and his influence with the Emperors, the great arbiter of the affairs of the Western Churches. It is easy to perceive that the authority of the Bishops of Rome was very insignificant compared with that exercised by Ambrose.

§ Sozom. lib. vii. c. 1.; and for Gratian's Laws against Heretics, see Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. 5. l. 4, 5.

|| The Arians would not have escaped, if the second Constitution of Gratian, published A. D. 379 against Heretics, "Omnes vestra," had been acted upon to the full extent of the letter. But this does not seem to have been the case; at least the Arians were allowed to retain their churches, even those which they had usurped from the Catholics, till some time after the accession of Theodosius.

¶ Though persons who have suffered under Religious Persecution are seldom disposed to show much forbearance towards those whom they regard as the authors of their misfortune, sons of the restored Catholic Bishops had the magnanimity to offer to leave their Arian competitors in possession of their Sees, in case they would consent to embrace the Nicene Faith. Sozom. lib. vii. c. 2.

 Gratian's Laws against the Pagans do not now appear in the Theodosian Code. They are, however, mentioned by the Heathen Orator Symmachus. Relist. ad Valentinian, as well as by Ambrose, in his Reply to Symmachus, and are appealed to in a subsequent Constitution of Honorius, Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. 10. l. 20. De Paganis:

* Theodosius was baptized in the beginning of the year 380, at Thessalonica, by Ascholinus, Bishop of that place. The famous Law, "Consecro populus," which declares the Faith professed by Pope Damasus and Peter of Alexandria to be the only true one, and every departure from it to be impious and heretical, was promulgated a few days after. Sozom. lib. vii. c. 4, and compare Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. 1. l. 2. De Fide Catholica.

† The Theodosian Code (lib. xvi. tit. 5. De Hereticis) contains not fewer than fifteen rigorous Constitutions by this Emperor against the various denominations of Sectaries.

‡ The exercise of the Catholic worship had been so completely suppressed at Constantinople that Gregory was forced to assemble his congregation in a private apartment; and even this proceeding was attended with some risk. The apartment was called domus, as being the place of the resurrection of the Nicene Faith. Sozom. lib. vii. c. 5.

§ The question of the validity of Gregory's appointment was rendered still more perplexed, by Maximus the Cynic, a worthless person, who first initiated himself into Gregory's favour, and then surreptitiously obtained consecration, as Archbishop of Constantinople, by the Egyptian Bishops. The Western Prelates were at variance with those of the East about this time, and for a while they espoused the cause of Maximus, and opposed the promotion of Gregory.

|| Gibbon's remarks on the cause of the want of firmness manifested by the Arians at this time, (vol. v. ch. xxvii.) though not in a friendly spirit, are, upon the whole, just and well worthy of attention. The whole tenour of Ecclesiastical History shows that a Christian Sect, denying the divinity of the Saviour, carries a principle of decay in its own bosom.

Of the Christi Church,†

From
A. D.
369,
to
A. D.
400, Policy at legislation of Theod sius.
A. D.
379.

Consec
Ambrose.

History. suppress Heresy by penal enactments, and to unite the Orthodox (with whatever success) by the convocation of the Council of Constantinople.* Ambrose exerted himself zealously to the same purpose in the West. Through his influence, Palladius and Secundianus, the only Arian Bishops of note within Gratian's dominions, were condemned and deposed at the Synod of Aquileia. The accession of the younger Valentinian revived, however, the hopes and spirits of that Sect. His mother, Justina, had long been a proselyte to their doctrines, though she concealed her sentiments during her husband's lifetime. The virtual sovereignty of Italy and Illyricum having fallen into her hands by the death of Gratian, she employed it to secure a free exercise of their Religion,† and an equality of privileges for her own party. But when, in pursuance of those objects, she demanded that one of the principal churches in Milan, in the possession of the Catholics, should be surrendered for her accommodation, she was encountered by Ambrose, who declared himself ready to suffer every extremity rather than allow the churches of God to be contaminated by the worship of Heretics. The Empress strained every nerve, not neglecting intimidation, to carry her point, but the firmness and intrepidity of the Archbishop prevailed. Shortly after, Justina, or her ministers, contrived to obtain a sentence of banishment against Ambrose, apparently under the pretext that he had infringed the toleration granted by the Emperor to his Arian subjects. But the Archbishop, foreseeing the dangers to which his flock would be exposed during his absence, boldly refused to obey the sentence, and though matters proceeded to such an extremity that he was actually besieged in his Cathedral by the Imperial troops, his firmness, aided by the enthusiastic zeal of the people of Milan in his cause, and by the dexterous interposition of a few miracles,‡ (a species of machinery already extensively employed,) finally triumphed over all opposition.§ The influence which Theodosius soon after obtained in the affairs of Italy finally extinguished the hopes and completed the downfall of the Arian faction in the West.

Though Theodosius was severe in enacting penalties against Heretics, he was, upon the whole, lenient in enforcing them, and was satisfied with preventing the public profession of obnoxious opinions. It was reserved for the usurper Maximus, aided by two Catholic Prelates of very equivocal character, to set the first example,

* This Synod created more divisions than it healed. The Macedonians, whom the Emperor hoped to reconcile, were completely alienated; the differences already existing between the Western and the Eastern Churches were augmented, and the illustrious and amiable Gregory Nazianzen fell a victim to the jealousy of his brother Prelates, being forced to resign his Archbishopric in order to make room for Nectarius, a man much inferior to Gregory in every respect, and elected under circumstances highly discreditable, both to himself, and those who patronized him. Seeom. lib. vii. c. 7, 8.

† It is extraordinary that the Constitution whereby Valentinian grants his Arian subjects the most ample liberty of conscience, and in which he even seems to admit the Orthodoxy of the Creed of Rimini, is still extant in the Theodosian Code, under the title De Fide Catholicæ.

‡ He was directed, in a dream, to the bodies of two unknown martyrs, Gervasius and Prothasius, by which holy relics the usual miraculous cures were wrought. The Arians discerned the artifice, and exclaimed against it; but the Empress and her advisers dared not contend against the Religious frenzy of the people.

§ We have a circumstantial account of these contests with Justina from the pen of Ambrose himself. Epist. 20, 21, 22, &c. Compare Seeom. lib. vi. c. 13.

one alas! too fatally followed, of persecuting Christians to death for their Religious opinions. Their victims were Priscillian, Bishop of Avila, in Spain, with several of his followers, male and female. He had imbibed a system, compounded, as it is said, of the errors of the Manichæans and of the Gnostics, first introduced into Spain by an Egyptian named Mark; and, by his eloquence and address, he had made many proselytes. His errors, or his popularity, excited the alarm of Idacius, Bishop of Meriola, and Ithacius, Bishop of Sossu, by whose joint influence his doctrines were condemned at the Council of Saragossa. Not satisfied with this triumph, they obtained, after much importunity, a sentence of banishment from the Emperor Gratian against Priscillian and his followers. The leaders of the party, however, contrived to procure the revocation of that sentence, and the restoration of their churches. On their reinstatement they engaged the people and the Imperial officers so completely in their interest, that Ithacius was in his turn compelled to fly. Full of resentment, he applied to Maximus, as soon as the death of Gratian had left that usurper in possession of Spain and Gaul, and represented the principles and conduct of the Priscillianists in the most odious light. Maximus warmly espoused his cause, and ordered Priscillian and his principal associates to be apprehended and tried by an Ecclesiastical Synod at Bourdeaux. Priscillian having appealed to the Emperor, the Cause was carried before the Civil Tribunal, and, notwithstanding the humane intercession of St. Martin of Tours, who represented that exclusion from the pale of the Church would be a sufficient punishment, and that it was a thing unheard of, that Secular Judges should take cognizance of errors in Faith and Doctrine, he was finally condemned and executed. Six of his associates, among whom were Euchrocia, a noble Aquitanian matron, and Latronianus, an eminent poet, shared the same fate. Instantius, a Spanish Prelate, already condemned by the Synod of Bourdeaux, was deposed and banished to Scilly; the meaner disciples were dispersed through various parts of Gaul.* These proceedings, equally irregular and barbarous, excited general reprobation; and it is to the honour of Ambrose and St. Martin, whose zeal for the Catholic Faith sometimes amounted to intolerance, that they openly and fearlessly expressed their abhorrence of the sanguinary conduct of Maximus, and for a long time refused to hold Religious communion either with him, or his instigators, Idacius and Ithacius.

The Religious liberty of the Pagans, though considerably abridged by Gratian, was yet greater than had been allowed by the Laws of Constantine and his immediate successors. The Priests and Vestals were deprived of their immunities; the revenues of the Temples were confiscated for the service of the State; but the Heathen rites of their forefathers were still allowed to those who were conscientiously attached to them, provided they abstained from nocturnal sacrifices and magical incantations. But when Theodosius, in the early part of his reign, prohibited the immolation of victims, their superstition was attacked in its most vital

Of the Christian Church, &c.

From A. D. 363. to A. D. 400.

Fate of Priscillian and his followers.

A. D. 364.

* Sulpic. Sever. Hist. Sacr. lib. ii. c. 65.

† The Laws of this Emperor and his successors against Heathenism, which are numerous, are preserved in the Theodosian Code, lib. xvi. tit. 10. De Paganis Sacrificiis et Templis.

History.

From
A. D.
363.
to
A. D.
400.

part,* and, in the course of a few years, the success of his measures against Heresy, and his triumph over Maximus emboldened him to proceed to steps of a still more decisive kind, and to attempt the entire subversion of the already tottering fabric of Paganism. A Commission was issued to the Prefect of the East, directing him to close all Heathen Temples within his jurisdiction; and while the Imperial officers were engaged in this task,† assisted by the Clergy, and especially by the Monks, with a vigour not always strictly legal, Theodosius gradually increased the rigour of his legislative prohibitions. A Law was passed in the year 391, declaring that to enter a Heathen Temple, with a Religious purpose, was an offence liable to a fine of fifteen pounds of gold; and in the following year, not only all public, but even all private and domestic, exercise of Heathen rites was interdicted under the severest penalties.‡ In some few instances, the intemperate and tumultuous proceedings of the Monks in destroying the Temples, excited the opposition of the fanatical Heathen peasantry, and at Alexandria a serious commotion, fatal to many Christians, was occasioned by the injudicious measures of the Patriarch Theophilus. But, generally speaking, the Pagans showed little disposition to incur the rigorous penalties of the Laws, still less to become martyrs for a Religion so little calculated to inspire real faith or fortitude. Some show of zeal in the cause of Paganism was made at Rome, where the votaries of the ancient superstition still had a strong party, both among the Senate and populace. But the eloquent exertions of Symmachus, the champion of Heathenism, were easily baffled by Ambrose,§ who encountered him with equal ability, better argument, and a confident reliance on the support of his Sovereign; and not long after, a more important victory was gained, in an enactment by the Senate, carried, through the influence of Theodosius, by an overwhelming majority, that Christianity should for the future be the sole Religion of the Roman State. This decisive measure sealed the ruin of Paganism in Rome and its dependencies. The Senators and Nobles hastened to conform, nominally at least, to the dominant Religion; the inferior citizens followed their example, and St. Jerome was in a little while able to boast that every Heathen altar in Rome was forsaken, and every Temple had become a place of desolation. Arcadius and Honorius, the sons and successors of Theodosius, trod closely in his steps; the zealous efforts of the Clergy, especially of St. Martin of Tours, in the work of conversion and instruction, powerfully seconded the vigorous measures of the Emperors, so that, at the close of the IVth century, the open profession of Paganism was confined to the inhabitants of some obscure Provinces, and to a few Philosophers and men of rank, whose talents, on the one hand, or whose Civil and military services, on the other, induced their Governors to tolerate or connive at their Religious opinions. Of the converts thus obtained to Christianity, many, doubtless, were honestly and fairly convinced by force of argument, and thus far were the interests of true Religion promoted. But it is to be feared that the arbitrary measures of Theodosius were, upon the whole, injurious to the purity and welfare of the Catholic Church. The churches were filled with hypocritical pretenders, who, influenced by secular force or sordid self-interest, assumed the denomination of Christians, while their hearts were still attached to their former superstitions. It would have been happy for the Christian Church if the evil had been confined to the mere admission of these spurious members. But, unfortunately, their Spiritual rulers, aware of the insincerity of this portion of their converts, and anxious to conciliate them, rashly compromised the dignity and truth of Christianity, by adulterating it with Pagan superstitions and human inventions. The evils caused by thus alloying pure Religion with superstition and falsehood have subsisted ever since; and most of the gross and debasing practices which deform Christianity in Roman Catholic Countries, may be distinctly traced to this source.

The retrospect of the IVth century, the most important period, perhaps, between the first promulgation of Christianity and the Reformation, is in some points of view not unfavourable. The boundaries of the visible Church were extended, and the numbers of her subjects were considerably increased. In the earlier part of this century the Gospel was preached with success, and Churches were organized in Armenia, Iberia, and Abyssinia. A considerable Tribe of Saracens, also, subject to Queen Mavia, or Moavia, is said to have embraced Christianity in the reign of Valens. Many of the Pagan Gauls were converted, chiefly through the exertions of St. Martin of Tours. In the time of Theodosius the Gospel began to make some progress in the frontier Provinces of Germany; and if the Irish Annalists may be credited, the Culdees formed various establishments on the coasts of Ireland and Scotland, and laboured diligently to instruct and enlighten the barbarous natives. It must be admitted that this gratifying picture of the triumphs of the Gospel has its dark side; indeed, a full and impartial view of the subject is calculated to give the enlightened and pious Christian almost as much pain as pleasure. As the Church increased in numbers, she also increased rapidly in wealth, power, and influence, and the evils which seldom fail to follow in the train of prosperity, soon began to manifest themselves. Artful and unprincipled men perceived the power of the Christian Religion upon the human mind, and abused it to their own evil purposes. Ambitious Sovereigns learned to make the Church an engine of State, and equally ambitious Ecclesiastics conceived the bold design of subjecting the Civil power to Spiritual tyranny. Errors in doctrine were made inveterate by severity and injudicious opposition; errors in practice were frequently connived at through sordid and selfish motives. Thus Schisms and Heresies were multiplied and perpetuated; seeds of corruption were sown, which speedily grew up in rank

Of the Christian Church, &c.

From
A. D.
363.
to
A. D.
400.

Progress of Christianity during the IVth century.

A. D.
395.

* There is an ambiguity in the Law published A. D. 381. Si quis vetitis sacrificia. (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. x. l. 7. De Paganis) which might seem to justify the inference that every species of sacrificing was not prohibited. Zosimus and Libanius both concur in affirming, that the immolation of victims was forbidden about this time, and that only the use of incense was allowed; but it is not quite clear whether they allude to the above Law, or to the one addressed to Cyneget, A. D. 385. Vid. Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. x. l. 9. with Godefray's commentary.

† Theodoret, l. v. c. 21. and Sozomen, l. vii. c. 15. give an account of the destruction of idolatry in the Eastern Empire.

‡ The terms of the Law are sufficiently comprehensive: Nullus omnino stans curatibus simulachris, vel innotent victimarum cordis; vel secretorie piaculis, Larem igne, mero Genium, Penates nudare veneratiles, accendat lumina, imponat turra, eria suspendat. Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. x. l. 12. The penalty imposed was confiscation of the house or property where the offence was committed, or, in certain cases, a fine of twenty-five pounds of gold.

§ Ambrose, Epsist. 17, 18.

History.
from
A. D.
363.
to
A. D.
400.
Persecution.

and mischievous luxuriance; and, perhaps, it is not too much to affirm, that nearly all the erroneous doctrines, corrupt practices, and Religious fictions of the present day may be traced to this period.

After the death of Julian, the Church suffered but little from external violence, at least within the limits of the Roman Empire. If we except the Persecution under Valens, the effects of which were transient, she was uniformly protected by the Civil power, and her worst foes were those of her own household. The sufferings of the Christian subjects of Athanaric the Goth, are probably exaggerated; but there seems no reason to doubt that martyrdoms occurred among them. Nicetas and Sabbas are spoken of as the most eminent victims: of the former, little is known; the Acts of the latter have been preserved, and, making allowance for an alloy of the marvellous, from which few Histories of martyrdoms are exempt, there seems no reason to doubt their authenticity. The last Persecution under Sapor, King of Persia,* between the years 390 and 370, was of a more serious character. That Monarch, exasperated by Political and Religious causes against his Christian subjects, pursued them with such unrelenting rigour, that the Church in that Country never completely recovered from its effects.

Sufferings of the prophets
Carthage

The disposition already shown by the Bishops of Rome to encroach upon the rights of their brethren, was held in check during the lives of Theodosius and Ambrose. The Pontiff Damasus was succeeded, in 365, by Siricius, a man of moderate abilities, and remarkable only as the first Pope of whom we have any genuine Decretal Epistles. He was succeeded, A. D. 398, by Anastatius, whose claim to notice rests only on his condemnation of the Works of Origen, which he probably did not understand, and on his persecution of the learned Rufinus, Origen's apologist and translator. At the same time, the Patriarchs of Constantinople, placed by a Decree of the Second General Council on an equality with the Roman Pontiffs, began to extend their jurisdiction and their prerogatives. Their views were greatly promoted by the celebrated Chrysostom, who succeeded Nectarius in 398, and who soon showed that his ambition equalled his genius. On the death of Peter of Alexandria, Timothy, a man of little note or influence, governed that See for about four years. He was succeeded by Theophilus, an able, bold, active, ambitious, and unprincipled man, famous for his vigorous proceedings against Hethenism, and still more so for his cruel treatment of the Origenists, and his rancorous persecution of Chrysostom. In the mean time the Church of Antioch was disturbed by a singular Schism. When Eudoxius was translated from Antioch to Constantinople, Meletius was regularly ordained in his room. A small faction, however, called the Eustathians, suspecting his Orthodoxy, refused to acknowledge him as their lawful pastor, and persuaded Lucifer, Bishop of Calaris, to consecrate a Presbyter named Paulinus, in opposition to him. The Schism was prolonged and aggravated, first by the obstinacy of the Popes and other Western Bishops, who adhered to the cause of Paulinus; and afterwards by the perverseness and bad faith of the Fathers of the Council of Constantinople, in appointing Flavian as Meletius's successor, in spite of an express pledge, that upon the demise of one of the rival Prelates, the survivor should be allowed to remain in possession of the disputed See. After the death of Paulinus in 389, his party, not choosing to acknowledge Flavian, elected one Evagrius. The dispute was not terminated till the year 398, when, upon the death of Evagrius, Theophilus of Alexandria had the address to prevail upon his party not to appoint any successor; and Chrysostom persuaded the Western Bishops to admit Flavian to their communion.

The death of Theodosius was of no advantage to the Sectaries, as Arcadius and Honorius rather increased than relaxed the severity of their father's laws against Heresy. At the close of the IVth century, the different denominations of Arians, and the Macedonians, weakened by their own dissensions and by the want of able leaders, dwindled into comparative insignificance, and in many places conformed, outwardly at least, to the Catholic Church. The Manichæans, though proscribed and declared infamous, were still numerous, and, to the best of their power, evaded the rigorous laws directed against them, by dissembling their opinions, and disguising themselves under a variety of appellations. The steadfastness with which the Novatians adhered to the Nicene Faith during the Arian Persecution, procured them a degree of indulgence scarcely experienced by any other Sect; and their Church at Constantinople, under the direction of Sisinnius, an able and accomplished Prelate, is described as being in a flourishing condition in the time of Arcadius. The numbers and the factious spirit of the African Donatists, rendered them exceedingly troublesome both to the Civil and Ecclesiastical power. The rise and progress of this Sect, and the various Synods which were assembled in order to repress them, will be treated in another Chapter.

Of the Christian Church, &c.

From
A. D.
363.
to
A. D.
400

Condition of the principal Sects

* The best account of the Persian Persecutions is contained in the Syrian Martyrology, published by Stephen Assemani. In the first part of the Work, attributed to Maruthas, the sufferings of the Christians under Sapor are described in a simple, unaffected manner, and without the garnish of improbable miracles, so usual in narratives of this kind.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LIII.

OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS OF THE FOURTH CENTURY

History.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

The Christian Writers of the IVth century are much more numerous than those of the IIId and IIId; and their Works are, generally speaking, more voluminous, and of a more elaborate nature. We deem it unnecessary to dilate much on their general character as authors, since the remarks already made on the merits and defects of their predecessors are no less applicable to them. In learning, eloquence, and in the graces of composition, many of them equalled, or perhaps even excelled, their most eminent Heathen contemporaries: but these excellences are greatly obscured by their want of method and precision; their frequent substitution of declamation for argument; and, most of all, by their willingness to adopt or connive at the growing superstitions of the Age, and to adulterate the purity and simplicity of the Gospel with human inventions.

As it would greatly exceed our limits to furnish regular Biographical accounts of all the Theological writers of this century, or to enter into a detailed examination of their voluminous productions, we shall omit those of whom no writings, or only a few inconsiderable fragments, have been preserved, and we shall compress our remarks upon the others into as brief a space as possible. Instead of making two distinct classes of the Greek and Latin authors, we shall henceforth arrange them all according to the strict chronological order, as nearly as it can be ascertained.

ARNOBIUS.

CIRCITER A. D. 303.

Arnobius was a native of Africa: the date of his birth and that of his death are equally unknown. Little, indeed, can be ascertained respecting his personal history, except that he was originally educated in the principles of Heathenism, and that he taught Rhetoric at Sicca Venera, a city of Numidia. Being convinced of the falsehood and folly of Paganism, and of the truth of Christianity, he composed his Work Adversus Gentes, while yet a catechumen, chiefly, as St. Jerome* informs us, with the view of satisfying his spiritual instructors of the sincerity of his conversion. This Work consists of VII Books; it is of a polemical character throughout, being a direct attack on the whole system of Heathenism. After refuting the popular calumnies against Christianity, and vindicating the character of our Saviour and some of the principal doctrines of the Gospel, he exposes, at considerable length, and with all the acrimony of a new convert, the absurdities of Polytheism, and the irrational nature of the Religious services of the Pagans. As might be expected of a catechumen, he shows himself only moderately acquainted with the genuine doctrines of the Gospel; and is, throughout his Treatise, much more successful in attacking the system which he had renounced, than in pleading the cause of that which he had recently embraced. His style is of a declamatory cast, somewhat harsh, and occasionally disfigured by African barbarism, and an affectation of antiquated words. It is, however, animated, nervous, and forcible; and the whole Work plainly shows the author to have possessed a vigorous and comprehensive mind, and to have been a person of considerable research and information.

The early editions of Arnobius were printed from faulty manuscripts, and are consequently very incorrect. The Plantin edition, printed at Antwerp in 1582, is much superior to all preceding, and the editor (Canter) has appended a number of useful notes. A good Variorum edition was published at Leyden, in 1652, by Le Maire, under the superintendence of Thysius, and reprinted in 1657. A copious analysis of the Work, together with many judicious remarks on its merits and defects, is inserted in Le Nourry's Apparatus ad Bibliothecam Maximam Patrum, tom. ii. dissertat. ii. p. 257. et seq. Consult, also, Tillemont, Mémoires Ecclési. vol. iv. art. Arnobius; Dupin, Biblioth. vol. i. cent. iii.; and Fabricius, Bibl. Lat. lib. iv. c. 3. p. 728.

There is a short commentary on the Psalms bearing the name of Arnobius, which is evidently a production of the Vth or VIth century.

Ecclesiastical Writers of the IVth Century.

Editors

Commentary on I Psalms.

LACTANTIUS.

A. D. 303—320.

Lucius Cælius Firmianus Lactantius was, it is said, a native of Italy, but the exact place of his birth is unknown. He studied under Arnobius, at Sicca Venera, where his talents displayed themselves to so much Adversus Gentes.

* Hieron. Chron. ad an. 327.

History.

advantage that he was invited to open a School of Rhetoric at Nicomedia, in Bithynia, which, in the time of Diocletian, was one of the most flourishing cities of the Empire. Not meeting with the success which he expected, he commenced author by profession, and during Diocletian's Persecution laudably exerted his talents in behalf of his fellow-Christians, in vindication of whom he wrote several spirited Treatises. Upon the accession of Constantine, he went into Gaul, and received the honourable appointment of tutor to Crispus, Constantine's eldest son. Notwithstanding his fame as an author, and his credit with the Emperor, Eusebius and Jerome assure us that he was so poor as frequently to want the common necessities of life.* He died at an advanced age, probably a short time before the Nicene Council.

De Divinis Institutionibus.

The most considerable Work of Lactantius is the Treatise De Divinis Institutionibus, which professes to be a complete exposition of the errors of Heathenism, and of the truth and excellence of Christianity. It is divided into VII Books, the first two of which are entitled, De Falsâ Religione, and De Origine Erroris. In these, he undertakes to demonstrate the unity of the Godhead, to explode the fabulous Deities of the Heathens, and to expose the absurdity of the idolatrous worship paid to them by their deluded votaries. In the III Book, De Falsâ Sapientiâ, he attacks the whole system of Pagan Philosophy as vain and futile; and from his demonstration of its utter worthlessness, concludes that the knowledge and worship of God is the only true wisdom. In the IVth Book, De Verâ Sapentiâ, he delivers a succinct account of the principal doctrines of the Gospel, occasionally vindicating them from the objections of the Heathens. The chief object of the Vth Book, De Justitiâ, is to claim a toleration for the professors of Christianity, and to show the cruelty and injustice of the severities inflicted on them by their persecutors. In the VIth Book, De Vero Cultu Dei, he shows that the true worship of God consists in the inward purity and devout dispositions of the heart, and in the active discharge of moral duties, dilating at considerable length on the necessity and excellence of the latter. The last Book, De Vitâ Beatâ, is a discourse on the immortality of the soul, the reality and nature of a future state, and the certainty and awfulness of the last judgment. The whole concludes with an eloquent and solemn exhortation to mankind to be converted, and embrace the salvation offered by the Gospel while they have the opportunity. The epitome of this Work, executed by Lactantius himself, is lost, with the exception of the last III Books.

Other Works.

We have, moreover, a short Treatise by Lactantius, De Irâ Dei; and another, De Opificio Hominis, in which he undertakes to prove the reality of a Divine Providence by a review of the bodily powers and mental faculties of man, the most excellent of God's works. The small Work, De Mortibus Persecutorum, though known to have existed in the time of Jerome, was long supposed to be lost, till it was rescued from oblivion by Baluze, who published it from an ancient manuscript in the III volume of his Miscellanea. It is written with spirit and elegance, and is of value, from containing several Historical facts not to be met with elsewhere. But the general tone of it is too acrimonious and uncharitable, and the author falls into the same error of which the Christians of that period justly accused their Pagan adversaries—of being too ready to interpret every signal calamity as a token of divine vengeance on the sufferers.

The following Works of this author are no longer extant: Symposium, (a juvenile production); Ἐκλογικὸν, a Poem in which he described his journey from Africa to Nicomedia; Ad Actepiadem, lib. ii.; VIII Books of Epistles.*

In classical elegance of style, Lactantius far excels Style, all his contemporaries; indeed, it may be doubted whether he does not surpass every Latin prose-writer since the time of Augustus. His language is at once clear, copious, flowing, and energetic; and of all imitators of Cicero, he is, undoubtedly, the most successful. With respect to his matter, his Ethics are generally sufficiently pure and rational, but his Theology is too often erroneous and unsound. Like his master Arnobius, he was less versed in the doctrines of the Gospel, than in the Religion and Philosophy of the Heathens, whose errors and superstitions he attacked while he was as yet but imperfectly emancipated from them. Hence he is to be read with some degree of caution, and must be regarded as a very indifferent authority on Religious subjects, particularly on points of dogmatic Theology. Many editions of Lactantius have been printed: the Geneva edition of 1613, and the Leyden one of 1660, are esteemed for their accuracy; they want, however, the Treatise De Mortibus Persecutorum, as do all editions published before the end of the XVIIth century. This defect is supplied in the Oxford edition of 1684, and in all subsequent to it.

Editions.

Vide Tillemont, Mém. Ecclés. tom. vi. Art. Lactance; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iii.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. sec. 4. p. 161, c. seq.; Nourry, Apparat. tom. ii. Dissert. 3. c. 1, art. 2.

COMMODIANUS.

DATE UNCERTAIN.

The Country and the personal history of Commodianus are equally unknown; nor is it, perhaps, certain that he ought to be classed among the Ecclesiastical writers of the IVth century.† From the peculiarities of his diction, it is conjectured that he was a native of Africa; and he represents himself as a convert from Paganism to Christianity. His only Work, entitled Instructionum Opus adversus Paganos, is one of the most singular monuments of antiquity. It is divided into eighty Strophes or sections, each of which is an Acrostick, the initial letters of the lines being so arranged as to compose the title or subject of the Section. It is, strictly speaking, neither verse nor prose. A sort of rhythmical modulation is observed, and the lines have generally something approaching to the cadence of the hexameter, but without the smallest regard being paid to the laws of prosody or metre. We have now no means of ascertaining whether this uncouth versification, if it deserves the name, was invented by Commodianus; or whether he imitated the Poetry of some Instruct.iones.

* There are a few Poems still extant bearing the name of Lactantius, but undoubtedly spurious.

† Rigaltius supposes him to have flourished about the year 326, on the ground of a fancied allusion to Pope Sylvester. Cave and Dodwell think that he flourished in the latter part of the IIIrd century being contemporary, or nearly so, with Cyrillus. This latter opinion seems most probable, and best supported by internal evidence.

* Euseb. Chron. An. 318. Hieron. Ep. ad Paulinum, p. 104. VOL. XI.

History.

Barbarous nation, constructed, like that of most modern languages, according to certain rules of rhythm and accent, without any regard to syllabic quantity.

The Instructions of Commodianus are partly of a polemical and partly of a didactic nature. In the first division of the Work, he demonstrates the absurdity of Paganism, and the superior purity and excellence of Christianity. In the second part he shows the Jews that the Law was only a shadow of better things to come, and that it is superseded by the Gospel. The third part consists of a series of Moral and Religious Instructions, addressed to professors of Christianity, strongly enforcing the necessity of strict holiness of life, and the duty of bearing all the calamities inflicted on them by their Pagan persecutors with fortitude, rather than renounce the Faith.

The style of Commodianus is harsh, his diction barbarous and impure, nor does his Work display much originality or elevation of thought. His theology is infected with the prevalent errors of the period in which he wrote; and his morality, though pure, is of a rigorous and ascetic cast. Upon the whole, he appears to have been a man of excellent intentions, and by no means destitute of information, but of little genius, of still less taste, and of more zeal than judgment. They who can overlook these defects will, however, find in his Work a good deal of curious and valuable information respecting the manners and opinions of the Age in which he flourished.

Editions.

This Work was long unknown to the moderns, except through the slight mention made of the author by Gennadius.* It was first published by Pigault, from a manuscript in the possession of Sirmond, (Toul. 1650, in 4to.) afterwards, together with Cyprinus, Paris, 1666, and separately by Heischius, Wittenberg, 1705. This last edition contains the notes of Rigault, and Dodwell's Dissertation on the Age of Commodianus.

Vide Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 136—138; Fabricius, Bibl. Med. et Inf. Lat. lib. iii. p. 1139.

EUSEBIUS OF CESAREA.

CIRCITER A. D. 264 TO CIRCITER A. D. 338.

Eusebius was a native of Palestine, most probably of Cesarea. The precise date of his birth is unknown; but, from his describing various transactions of the reign of Gallienus as having occurred in his time, it is supposed to have taken place about A. D. 264. Nothing is known of his parentage, and very little of his early life. It is thought, but without sufficient evidence, that he studied at Antioch, under a Priest named Dorotheus, and that he was ordained Priest by Agapius, Bishop of Cesarea. Early in the IVth century he became intimately attached to Pamphilus of Cesarea, whose name he adopted, and in whose company he indefatigably prosecuted his studies in sacred and profane literature. During the Persecution under Galerius and Maximin, Pamphilus was thrown into prison, where Eusebius courageously continued to visit him, and to pay him every friendly attention in his power, until the time of his martyrdom. He himself did not escape Persecution, being imprisoned, as it is commonly supposed, in Egypt; at least, we know that Potamon, an Egyptian Bishop, was his companion in captivity. Some time after his release, he was appointed to succeed Agapius in the See of Cesarea, which he governed till his death. After taking an active and prominent part in the affairs of the Christian Church, especially in the Arian controversy, he finished his laborious and useful career about the year 338.

In extent and variety of learning, Eusebius far excelled all his Christian contemporaries; and his talents as a writer, a theologian, and a man of business, were of a very high order. Though his influence with the Emperor Constantine was almost unbounded, he never availed himself of it to enrich or aggrandize himself; and he gave a signal proof of disinterestedness, by refusing to accept the Patriarchate of Antioch, when vacant by the deposition of Eustathius. The moderation and forbearance which he showed towards Arius and his followers caused his Orthodoxy to be suspected; and though the charge of Arianism, so confidently made against him both by ancient and modern writers,* has never been substantiated, it must be confessed that some expressions in his Works, and his conduct towards the latter end of his life, gave some sort of countenance to it.

Of the multifarious writings of Eusebius, some have come down to us in a mutilated state; others are only known to us through the medium of Latin translations, and by far the greater number have entirely perished. Those, however, which we have the good fortune to possess, are highly creditable monuments of his talents and industry. We have already treated copiously of the merits and defects of the Ecclesiastical History, which may be regarded as his principal Work. Next to this may be placed the Præparatio Evangelica, the avowed object of which, as the title implies, is to dispose men's minds to think favourably of Christianity. This Work, which is perhaps the ablest, the most methodical, and the best argued Treatise on Natural and Revealed Religion of which Christian antiquity can boast, is divided into XV Books, and is addressed to one Theodorus, who, it is supposed, was Bishop of Laodicea. The leading propositions which the author undertakes to establish are, that Paganism is a pernicious system, totally repugnant to right Reason, and that Christianity is not only agreeable to Reason, but suitable to the wants and conducive to the happiness of mankind. The Demonstratio Evangelica is an elaborate Treatise on the direct and positive evidences of Christianity. It consisted originally of XX Books, the last X of which are unfortunately lost. In those which are still extant, Eusebius chiefly combats the prejudices of the Jews, to whom he shows at great length, from the evidence of their own Scriptures, that Christ must be the true Messiah. This latter Work, though written with considerable ability, is inferior to the Præparatio in originality of matter and variety and copiousness of learning. In the V Books Against Marcellus of Ancyra, Eusebius appears to have departed a little from his usual temperance and moderation. His object is to convict his opponent of Sabellianism; in labouring to effect which, he affords some ground for questioning his own Orthodoxy, as, though he explicitly asserts the divinity of the Son, he appears to deny his perfect

Ecclesiastical Writers of the IVth Century.

Historia Ecclesiastica.

Præparatio Evangelica.

Demonstratio Evangelica.

Adversus Marcellum.

* Particularly by Jerome, Baronius, and Le Clerc. Those who are desirous of investigating the matter more fully, may consult Le Clerc's Byssius Ecclesiasticus, et Ori. sp. 2, and Cave's Epistole Apostolicæ, the latter of which is a formal and elaborate vindication of Eusebius from the accusations of Le Clerc.

† HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, vol. xi. c. xxxviii. p. 81.

* De Scriptis. Euseb. c. 15.

History. equality with the Father. The Treatise against Hierocles is a short, but spirited production, in which Eusebius effectually chastises the audacity of that Philosopher in presuming to compare the life and miracles of Apollonius of Tyana with those of Christ. His life of Constantine, in IV Books, is written in a more florid and elaborate style than the generality of his compositions; and may be regarded more as a panegyric than an impartial narrative of facts. This, together with an Oration in praise of the same Emperor, and a concise account of the Martyrs of Palestine, is usually appended to his Ecclesiastical History. The original text of his Chronology, a Work of immense research and erudition, is unfortunately lost.* A Latin version of the III Part of it is still extant, but greatly altered and interpolated by the Translator, Jerome, and by subsequent compilers. His Treatise De Locis Hebraicis, is a short topographical index of the places mentioned in Scripture. His Commentary on the Psalms, and on Isaiah, which were long supposed to be lost, were published, though in a defective state, by Montfaucon in his Collectio Nova Græcorum Patrum, tom. i. and ii. Paris, 1706. The Apology for Origen, written in conjunction with his friend Pamphilus, consisted originally of VI Books. The Latin version of the I Book by Rufinus is still extant, but there is reason to believe that the translator, according to his usual practice, has taken great liberties with his original. For an account of the Works of Eusebius which are entirely lost, the titles of which alone would occupy a considerable space, the reader is referred to Cave, Tillemont, and Dupin. His great Work against Porphyry, is, perhaps, the one which we have most cause to regret. It would be interesting to see the learning of that formidable opponent of Christianity encountered by the equal or superior learning and talent of Eusebius.

It is evident that this illustrious and learned writer never studied the graces of composition, nor took much pains in polishing and revising his Works. His style is harsh, dry, and repulsive, and his periods are embarrassed and obscure. These defects are, however, amply compensated by his good sense, and the general interest of his subjects, and excellence of his matter.

A complete edition of the Works of Eusebius, similar to those editions of the other Greek and Latin fathers published by the Benedictines of St. Maur, is still a desideratum in Literature. The best editions of the Ecclesiastical History are that of Valesius, including also the Histories of Socrates, Sozomenes, &c., Paris, 1659, 3 vols. folio, and that of Reading, Cambridge, 1720, 3 vols. folio, which is little more than a reprint of the former, with a few additional notes. The Preparatio et Demonstratio Evangelicæ were published by Robert Stephens, Paris, 1544, 1545, folio, and by Vigerus, Paris, 1628, 2 vols. folio. The latter edition contains also the Treatises against Hierocles, and Marcellus of Ancyra. The Book De Locis Hebraicis was published by Bonfrerius, Paris, 1811. Jerome's version of the Chronicle has been frequently printed: the best edition is that contained in Scaliger's Theophrastus Temporum, Amsterdam, 1658, who published at the same time all the fragments of the original Greek which could be recovered.

Vide Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 175—183; Dupin, Biblioth. vol. ii. Cent. iv. p. 1—11; Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. tom. ii. p. 39—76.

Ecclesiastical Writers of the IVth Century.

ATHANASIUS.

DIED CIRCA A. D. 371.

The life and character of this illustrious Prelate belong rather to the entire Ecclesiastical History of the period in which he flourished than to a mere Literary notice. He was born at Alexandria towards the close of the IIIrd century. At an early age, his talents and virtues attracted the notice of Alexander, Bishop of that important see, who appointed him his secretary. It is said that he accompanied Alexander to the Nicene Council, and that the zeal and ability which he there manifested against the Arians, laid the foundation of the rancour and animosity with which that Sect afterwards pursued him. In the year 326, he was chosen by the unanimous suffrage of the Catholics to succeed his patron, to the great mortification of the Arians, who, from that time, used every exertion to compass his disgrace and downfall. After various unsuccessful attempts to prejudice the Emperor Constantine against him, they contrived, by laying a number of fictitious crimes to his charge, to obtain his deposition by the Council of Tyre,* and the year following, Constantine was prevailed upon to banish him into Gaul. Soon after the death of that Emperor, he was recalled by Constantine the younger; but the intrigues of his restless adversaries again prevailing, he was a second time deposed by the Synod of Antioch, and one Gregory, a mere creature of the Arian faction, appointed in his stead. On this occasion, Athanasius took refuge at Rome, where his cause was warmly espoused by Pope Julius, and the majority of the Western Bishops, who used all their influence to obtain his restoration, but without success; even the decision of the Council of Sardica in his favour was disregarded by the adverse faction. The Emperors were, however, favourably disposed towards him; and on the death of Gregory,† Constantius restored him to his Archbishopric, which he governed peaceably for several years. This calm was but the precursor of a more violent storm. A powerful party was formed, which being openly supported by the Imperial officers,§ forcibly ejected him, and introduced one George, a Cappadocian of low birth and disreputable character, as his successor. These tumultuous and irregular proceedings received the sanction of Constantius, who had entirely surrendered himself to the guidance of the Arians, and was then exerting himself to the utmost to depress, and if possible to extirpate Catholicism. Athanasius was compelled to seek safety from the violence of his enemies in the deserts of the Thebaid, where he remained concealed till the death of Constantius. He was once more exiled during the reign of Julian, after whose death, with the exception of some slight molestation under Valens, he was allowed to enjoy his Bishopric

* An Armenian version of Eusebius's Chronicle has been recently published by Archer, Venice, 1818. If it may be relied on as a faithful representation of the original, (and there seems no reason for doubting that it is substantially so,) it is undoubtedly an important accession to Literature.

† The beginning of the Ist Book of the Demonstratio, and the conclusion of the Xth, which are wanting in both those editions, were first published by Fabricius, De Veris. Christ. Reliq. p. 1.

* A. D. 335.
† A. D. 348.

† A. D. 341.
§ A. D. 356.

History. peaceably till the end of his days. According to So- crates, his death took place in the year 371, other authorities place it two years later.

Among all those members of the Church who distinguished themselves during this eventful period, no one acted a more honourably conspicuous part than Athanasius. His talents marked him out as the champion of Orthodoxy, and he sustained that character through evil and good report, with a zeal, integrity, consistency, and firmness, which proved that he was actuated by no unworthy or selfish motive, and which, while they excited the hatred of his enemies, commanded also their admiration. Perhaps it is not too much to say, that his writings and personal exertions did as much for the Trinitarian cause in the East, at a time when it seemed to be struggling for its very existence, as those of Luther did afterwards for the doctrines of the Reformation in Europe.

The writings of Athanasius are voluminous, and almost exclusively of a polemical nature. The Oratio adversus Gentes, and the Treatise De Incarnatione, supposed to be his earliest productions, are chiefly directed against the superstition of the Gentiles. In nearly all the others, he defends the doctrine of the Trinity, or refutes the errors of the Arians. Most of his productions are in the form of Orations or Epistles; and, though generally written on the spur of the moment, and under most unfavourable circumstances, they are calculated to give the reader a high opinion of the skill and talents of the author. The Apology addressed to the Emperor Constantius, which is an eloquent and spirited vindication of his own conduct against the calumnies of his adversaries, may be regarded as his most finished composition. The Life of St. Antony, the famous Egyptian solitary, is the production which reflects the least credit on his taste and judgment: indeed several critics, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, suspect that it has been interpolated by some later author.

Athanasius, though not to be compared to Eusebius in depth and variety of learning, greatly excels him in the graces of composition. His style is elegant, perspicuous, and flowing; eloquent and forcible, and at the same time free from tumour and affectation. As a controversialist he was eminently calculated to excel; his manner is insinuating and persuasive, and his arguments are commonly well chosen, judiciously arranged, and happily and forcibly expressed. Sometimes his reasonings are more plausible than solid, and not unfrequently he lays a good deal of stress on interpretations of Scripture which a little more skill in Biblical Criticism would have shown him to be utterly untenable. The occasional vehemence of his invective may be pardoned, when we consider that it is directed against persons who had not scrupled to employ every sort of fraud and violence to effect his ruin.

Editions. The early editions of Athanasius are both defective and inaccurate; indeed all published in the XVth and XVIth centuries, are merely Latin versions of a few of his principal Treatises. The Greek text was first printed by Comelinius, Heidelberg, 1601, 2 vols. folio. It was published again at Paris, 1627, 2 vols. folio, and at Cologne, 1686, fol. The only critical edition is the Benedictine, Paris, 1698, 3 vols. folio, Gr. Lat. The first two volumes contain the genuine Works of Athanasius; those which are regarded as doubtful or spurious are inserted in the third. The Preface, apparently by the learned Montfaucon, contains a mass of valuable information respecting the life and writings of Athanasius.

Vide Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 169—198; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 28—34. Tillemont, Mémoires, tom. viii. Art. Athanas. and Histoire des Ariens, passim.

See also the Life of St. Antony, by the 17th Century.

JUVENCUS.

UNDER CONSTANTINE.

Caius Vectius Aquilinus Juvencus was a Spaniard of noble birth, and, as St. Jerome informs us, a Presbyter. This is all that we know of his personal history. He flourished in the time of Constantine, and wrote a number of Poems, all of which are lost, except his Historia Evangelica. This is an account of our Saviour's Life and actions, in IV Books; it is written in hexameters, and closely adheres to the narrative of the Evangelists. The flow of his verse is not inharmonious, but, as might be expected from the Age in which he lived, his diction is occasionally inelegant and unclassical, nor does he display much poetical genius or elevation of sentiment. He is, however, entitled to the credit of having embodied the facts related by the four Evangelists in one clear, faithful, and not unpleasant narrative.

This Poem has been frequently printed: the principal editions are those of Basle, 1541, 1564; Lyons, 1588; Paris, 1543, 1575, 1581, 1624; Frankfurt, 1710. It is also to be found in the Collections of the Christian Poets published by Fabricius and Aldus, and in most editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum.

Vide Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 200; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 20, 21; Hieron. de Script. Ecclesiast. c. 84; and Chron. ad ann. 330.

JULIUS FIRMICUS MATERNUS.

UNDER CONSTANS AND CONSTANTIUS.

Though this writer is supposed to have been a person of rank and consideration, he is not mentioned by any of the Ancients, and is only known as the author of a Book against Paganism, entitled De Errore profanarum Religionum. This Work, which is undoubtedly a genuine production of the IVth century, is addressed to Constans and Constantius, the sons and successors of Constantine. It is written with some degree of force and elegance, and a good deal of learned research is displayed in the author's Historical development of the origin of the different Heathen systems. His reasonings are, however, occasionally weak and superficial, and his zeal against idolatry frequently amounts to intolerance.

This Treatise was first printed at Venice, 1469; afterwards at Basle, 1533; Strasburg, 1562; Paris, 1575, 1589, 1610; Leyden, 1632; also in the Paris edition of Cyprian 1666, and the Bibliotheca Patrum.

A Treatise on Astronomy, bearing the name of Julius Firmicus Maternus, is extant; it is supposed by several critics to have been written by the same author before his conversion to Christianity.

Vide Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 204; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iii. p. 170, 171; Baronii, Annales ad ann. 337.

Dr. Errore profanarum Religionum.

Style.

Editions.

Treatise on Astronomy.

CYRILLUS OF JERUSALEM.

DIED A. D. 386.

Cyril was probably a native of Jerusalem, or of its immediate vicinity. He was ordained Deacon by Macarius, Bishop of Jerusalem, and Priest by his successor Maximus, during whose Episcopacy he held the office of Catechist, or Theological lecturer. On the death of Maximus he was appointed to the vacant See, chiefly through the influence of Acacius, Bishop of Caesarea. Not long after, however, a violent dissension broke out between these two Prelates, occasioned by Cyril's attempting to exercise an independent jurisdiction within his Diocese of Jerusalem. This encroachment on the prerogatives of the Metropolitan Church of Caesarea was warmly resented by Acacius, who contrived, soon after, to procure the deposition of Cyril by a Synod of the Bishops of Palestine. He appealed from their sentence to the Emperor Constantius, and the contest was carried on for many years with various success. The Synod of Seleucia gave a Decree in Cyril's favour; but Acacius had sufficient interest to obtain his condemnation and deposition once more by a Council assembled at Constantinople. He returned to Jerusalem upon the accession of Julian, but he was not formally restored to his See till the reign of Theodosius, when his cause was espoused by the II^d General Council, and the sentence of deposition reversed. After this, he retained undisturbed possession of his dignity till the time of his death, which took place A. D. 386.

Cyril appears to have been a man of moderate abilities, who acquired a certain degree of notoriety by happening to make himself obnoxious to a Prelate at the head of a numerous party. His early connection with Acacius, and the intercourse which he held with the Semi-Arian Bishops at the Council of Seleucia, caused his Orthodoxy to be suspected; in fact, Jerome and others accuse him of Arianism in direct terms. No traces, however, of this heresy appear in his writings; and it is not unlikely that his greatest crime, in Jerome's eyes, consisted in espousing the cause of Meletius of Antioch, in opposition to Damasus and the Western Bishops.

Twenty-three of Cyril's Catechetical Discourses are still extant. They are divided into two classes; the first eighteen, addressed to the competentes, or catechumens deemed worthy of Baptism, are brief expositions of the general doctrines of Christianity; the remaining five, addressed to persons already baptized, and distinguished by the name of Mytagogical Lectures, are chiefly devoted to an explanation of the nature of the Sacraments. They are written throughout in a plain, familiar, and unadorned style, and, generally speaking, are well calculated to answer the purpose for which they were intended. It is, however, easy to perceive that a superstitious spirit, and a disposition to find mysteries where none were intended by the sacred writers, had already made great progress in the Christian church.

There is also extant an Epistle to Constantius respecting an apparition of a luminous cross at Jerusalem, an Oration on the Presentation of our Lord, and an Epistle to St. Augustine, have been published under his name, but they are evidently spurious.

The principal editions of Cyril are those of Petavius, Paris, 1622, folio, and again Paris, 1631, folio, along with Synesius; Miller, Oxford, 1703, folio; and the Benedictine edition superintended by Tontée, Paris, 1720, folio.

Vide Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 211—213; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 107—115; Tillemont Mém. Ecclés. tom. viii. Art. 8. Cyrille.

Ecce-nastical Writers of the IVth Century.

HILARIUS.

DIED A. D. 367.

Hilary was born at Poitiers early in the IVth century, and was educated in the principles of Heathenism. His own reflections first made him dissatisfied with the inconsistency and absurdity of that system; and his inquiries after Truth, together with a diligent perusal of the Scriptures, induced him to become a Christian. After his elevation to the Bishopric of Poitiers, which is supposed to have taken place about A. D. 354, he quickly began to distinguish himself by his zeal in the discharge of his pastoral duties, and also by his activity in opposing the progress of Arianism. His warmth in defending Athanasius at the Synod of Beziers against his persecutors Ursacius and Valens, excited the displeasure of the Emperor Constantius, who banished him into Phrygia. Nevertheless he continued to uphold the Catholic cause, both by his writings and his personal influence. His character and conduct appear to have gained the respect of the public authorities, as he met with more indulgent treatment than the generality of his brethren. He was permitted to attend the Synod of Seleucia, and was also allowed to accompany the deputies of the Council to the Imperial Court. Here, according to Sulpicius Severus, he presented several Memorials to Constantius on behalf of the oppressed Catholic Church, and even ventured to challenge the Arians to a public disputation. The leaders of that Sect declined the proposal; and, fearful of the ascendancy which Hilary's zeal and talents might gain over the mind of the Emperor, they contrived that he should be sent back to Gaul. The death of Constantius, which happened shortly after Hilary's return to his Diocese, leaving him at liberty to act with vigour, he exerted himself with diligence and success in checking the further spread of Arianism, and in reorganizing the Catholic Church in Gaul and in the North of Italy. He assembled a number of Provincial Synods, in which the Acts of the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia were disavowed and reprobated, and the principal Arian Prelates condemned. The Historians of that period, indeed, do not scruple to say, that the suppression of Arianism in Gaul was almost entirely the work of Hilary. He continued actively engaged in these and similar occupations till the time of his death, in the year 367.

The writings of Hilary are all controversial, except Works. his Commentaries on the Psalms and on the Gospel of St. Matthew. They consist of a Treatise on the Trinity in XII Books; three Addresses to Constantius; a Book on Synods, addressed to the Western Bishops when the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia were pending, and a Tract against Auxentius, Bishop of Milan. The II Books of Fragments are a series of extracts from Hilary's History of the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia, which is no longer extant in a complete state. These Fragments furnish a number of facts and documents not to be found elsewhere, and throw considerable light on the Ecclesiastical History

History. of that period. His Commentaries on the Psalms are chiefly borrowed from Origen, and are, consequently, a good deal infected with the spirit of allegory and mysticism. The Commentaries on St. Matthew are of a more plain and practical nature, but they are neither wholly free from fanciful interpretations nor from erroneous opinions.

Style. Hilary is not a writer of first-rate eminence, but he deserves a respectable rank among those of the second class. His learning and talents were considerable, and his style, though not always pure or perspicuous, is spirited, eloquent, and forcible. He indulges too much in the turgid declamation characteristic of the Gallie School of Rhetoricians, but he uniformly writes in a tone of honest warmth and sincerity, like a person fully persuaded of the truth and importance of what he says. If he appears occasionally too violent and acrimonious, we must consider that he believed the vital interests of Religion to be at stake, and that his adversaries did not use the power placed in their hands in such a manner as to be entitled to expect much forbearance from a man of Hilary's warm temperament.

Editions. Many editions of Hilary's Works were published during the XVth and XVIth centuries. The best and only complete one is the Benedictine, Paris, 1693, principally superintended by Father Constant. It was reprinted at Verona, 1730, 2 vols. folio.

Vide Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 213—215; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 64—79; Hieron. De Scriptor. Eccl. c. 100; Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. tom. vii. Art. S. Hilair.

VICTORINUS.

DIED CIRCA A. D. 370.

Fabius Marius Victorinus, an African by birth, was an eminent Professor of Rhetoric at Rome, during the reign of Constantius. He was a great admirer of Plato, many of whose writings he translated into Latin. Being accidentally led to compare the doctrines of that Philosopher with the Holy Scriptures, he was convinced of the superior excellence and truth of Christianity, and became a convert in his old age. He kept the change of his sentiments secret for a time, but at last, by the persuasion of his friend Simplicianus, he was induced to be baptized, and to make open profession of his faith. In the year 362, when Julian published an Edict forbidding the Christians to teach Oratory, or any of the Liberal Sciences, Victorinus magnanimously chose rather to forego the emoluments of his profession, than to renounce or dissemble his principles. It is supposed that he died about A. D. 370.

Works. The only claim which Victorinus has to be ranked among Ecclesiastical writers, rests on a few controversial Tracts against the Arians and Manichæans, and some Poems on sacred subjects. None of these possess any great merit. His style is harsh, affected, and involved, and his fondness for the Dialectical subtleties of the School in which he was brought up, gives an air of studied obscurity to every thing that he says. It requires close and painful attention to comprehend his meaning, which is seldom of sufficient value to repay the reader for his trouble. His Poetry is of a very ordinary description, inferior even to his Prose.

Editions. Several of the Philosophical and Grammatical Works of Victorinus are still extant: his Theological Tracts are inserted in the IVth volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum. He wrote Commentaries on some of St. Paul's Epistles, which existed in manuscript in the XVIIth century. The disparaging terms in which Jerome speaks of them give us no cause to regret that they have never been printed.

Vide Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 228, 229; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 80, 81; Hieron. De Scriptor. Eccl. c. 101.

LUCIFER.

DIED CIRCA A. D. 371.

Lucifer was Bishop of Cagliari in Sardinia, about the middle of the IVth century. Having distinguished himself by his zeal in the Trinitarian cause, he was deputed by Liberius, Bishop of Rome, to attend the Synod of Milan. He there defended the person and cause of Athanasius with great zeal and vehemence, and received the usual reward of the champions of Orthodoxy in those days, namely, banishment into Asia. The harsh treatment which he experienced during his exile, together with the natural violence of his temper, drew from him several polemical Tracts, still extant. They are chiefly directed against Constantius, and are written throughout with such virulence and want of decency, that we know not whether to wonder more at his audacity in addressing his Sovereign in such a strain, or at the forbearance of the latter in not subjecting him to the penalties of Treason. It appears that he was removed from Palestine into Upper Egypt, and the writers of that period speak of some other place of banishment which they do not specify. After the death of Constantius, he visited Antioch, and finding the rigid Catholics dissatisfied with the appointment of Meletius to that See on account of his supposed connection with the Arians, he took upon himself to ordain Paulinus, with the express view of setting Meletius aside. This hasty and ill-judged measure not only gave great offence to the more moderate Catholics, but caused a serious division between the Eastern and Western Bishops, and finally led to Lucifer's own separation from the Church. Irritated by the disapprobation which his conduct excited, and also by a Decree passed by the Synod of Alexandria readmitting those Bishops into the Church who had communicated with the Arians during the Persecution, he returned to Sardinia, and during the remainder of his life, obstinately refused to hold any intercourse with those who had ever shown any condescension or favour to the Heretics. He thus became the head of a small and obscure Sect of schismatics, who limited the true Church to their own narrow pale, and stigmatized the great Body of the Catholics as apostates from the Faith. He died about the year 371, and the Sect of Luciferians did not long survive him.

Lucifer was one of those sincere, wrong-headed men, whose zeal and courage would be respectable were they tempered with a little more charity and judgment. As a writer, he is entitled to little praise. His compositions are destitute of argument, method, and elegance, and are remarkable only for their violence and acrimony. He is indeed chiefly memorable for the mischief and dissension which he caused in the Church.

The Works of Lucifer were first collected and published by John Du Tillet, Bishop of Meaux, Paris, 1568, 8vo. They were afterwards inserted in the IVth volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum.

History. Vide Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 216; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 79, 80; Tillemont, Mém. Ecclés. tom. vii. Art. Lucifer; Baronii Annales ad ann. 336

Tillet, Paris, 1539, 4to. Another edition was printed by Paulus Manutius, Rome, 1564, folio. They are also to be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum, and in D'Aguirre's Collectio Conciliorum Hispanorum. Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 234, 235; Dupin, Cent. iv. p. 81—85; Hieron. De Scriptor. Eccles. c. 106.

Ecclesiastical Writers of the IVth Century.

PHCEBADIUS.

LATTER HALF OF IVTH CENTURY.

Phœbadius was a native of Aquitania, and became Bishop of Agen about the middle of the IVth century. In common with his Ecclesiastical brethren, he was involved in the all-absorbing vortex of the Arian controversy. He first entered the lists by writing an elaborate Refutation of the second Creed of Sirmium, which is still extant. In the year 359, he attended the Council of Rimini, where he exerted himself with great zeal and energy on behalf of the Nicene doctrines. When all the other Catholic Bishops had been prevailed upon by threats or artifice to assent to the Arian declaration of Faith, Phœbadius and Serratio, Bishop of Tongres, alone refused to comply. They at last, however, agreed to sign it, provided an explanatory clause were added; but finding that this clause had been nullified by a subsequent alteration, they disavowed their concurrence, as obtained by fraud and treachery. Jerome speaks of Phœbadius as living when he wrote his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical authors, about A. D. 392; little, however, is known of his personal history during the latter part of his life.

The Tract against the Creed of Sirmium is the only Work of Phœbadius which has reached our times. It is written with some elegance and force, but does not display much genius or originality. Jerome professes his inability to give an account of this author's other Works, because he never read them. It is, therefore, most probable that they never attracted much attention.

This Treatise of Phœbadius was published by Beza, 1570; and by Pithou, Paris, 1666. It was afterwards inserted in the IVth volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 217, 218; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 85—87; Hieron. De Scriptor. Eccles. c. 106.

PACIANUS.

DIED CIRCA A. D. 390.

Pacianus was a Spaniard, and Bishop of Barcelona, about the time of Valentinian, or, as some authors think, towards the latter end of the reign of Gratian. Scarcely any thing is known of his public or private life, except that he had a son named Flavius Dexter, commander of the Prætorian cohorts in the time of Jerome, and on terms of intimacy with that Father. Pacian died at an advanced age, a little before the year 390, leaving behind him a high reputation for eloquence and sanctity.

Many of the Works of this author are lost; those which remain consist of an Exhortation to Repentance, a short Treatise on Baptism for the use of catechumens, and three Epistles against the Errors of the Novatians. These compositions give a favourable idea of the talents of the writer, and make us regret the loss of his other Works. His manner is animated, his arguments are well chosen and pointedly expressed, and he writes with a terseness and elegance seldom found in the Latin authors of the period in which he lived.

Pacian's Works were first collected and edited by Du

EPIPHANIUS.

DIED A. D. 403.

Epiphanius was a native of Palestine, and, as it is supposed, of Jewish extraction. In his early youth he narrowly escaped being seduced by some Egyptian Gnostics, but, having extricated himself from their snares, he adopted an ascetic course of life. This he pursued for a number of years, partly under the auspices of the celebrated Hilarion, and partly as the superintendent of a considerable Monastery near Eleuthropolis in Palestine. About the thirty-sixth year of his age, he was ordained Bishop of Salamis in the Isle of Cyprus, the duties of which office he appears to have discharged in a diligent and conscientious manner. The concluding years of his life were embittered by a series of unfortunate disputes, first with John, Bishop of Jerusalem, and afterwards with the illustrious Chrysostom, respecting the disciples of Origen, against whom Epiphanius had conceived a violent prejudice, so that he pursued them with a virulence and acrimony highly discreditably to his charity and his judgment. He died in the year 402 or 403, on his return from Constantinople to Cyprus, being about seventy years of age.

Credulous in the extreme, and rash in controversy, Style. he exposed himself to the attacks of his adversaries, and to the censure of sober-minded and impartial men. Violent in his temper, weak in style, and inconclusive in his reasoning, he did more injury than good to the Truths which he espoused. Nevertheless, much curious information may be obtained from his Work on Heresies, by a discriminating reader.

The best edition of Epiphanius is that published by the Jesuit Petavius, Paris, 1622, 2 vols. folio. It was reprinted at Cologne, 1692, 2 vols. fol.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 231—234; Dupin, Cent. iv. p. 234—240; Tillemont, Mém. Ecclés. tom. x. Art. S. Epiphane; Hieron. De Scriptor. Eccles. c. 114.

OPTATUS.

DIED UNDER VALENTINIAN.

Nothing whatever is recorded of the personal history of Optatus, except that he was Bishop of Milevi in Numidia, and that he died under the reign of the Emperor Valentinian. As an author, he is advantageously known by a Work against the schism of the Donatists, Addressed to Parmenianus, the Donatist Bishop of Carthage. It is divided into VII Books,* and furnishes the most elaborate and authentic account which we possess of the origin, progress, and opinions of that turbulent Sect. The author writes, indeed, like a partisan, and indulges too freely in declamation and invective;

* Jerome describes it as consisting only of VI Books; indeed, the VIth Book differs so materially from the others, both in style and sentiment, that there is strong reason to believe it has been added by some later writer.

Against the Donatists.

History. but, while he censures the violence and insubordination of his opponents, he does not dissemble that many arbitrary and unjustifiable severities were exercised upon them by the Civil authorities. His style is deficient in elegance, purity, and terseness, and he abounds in strained allegorical interpretations of Scripture, nor is his reasoning always of the most cogent and conclusive kind. But he writes with vivacity and force, and his Work abounds with valuable information respecting the state of the African Church and of Religion in general.

The best edition of Opatius is that superintended by Dupin, Doctor of the Sorbonne, Paris, 1700, folio. The reprint of 1702, though bearing the name of Paris on the title-page, was in reality executed at Amsterdam.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 234; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 87—97; Hieron. De Scriptor. Eccles. c. 120.

EPHREM SYRUS.

DIED CIRCA A. D. 378.

Ephrem was a native of Nisibis, but, as he passed the greatest part of his life at Edessa, the Metropolis of Osroëne, he is frequently called Ephrem of Edessa. His youth was spent in Monastic exercises and abstruse studies, in the latter of which he is said to have acquired great proficiency, without the aid of a teacher. He became, in process of time, Deacon of the Church of Edessa, but, that he might have more leisure for devout meditation and literary pursuits, he would never take any higher function. After maintaining, during many years, the highest reputation throughout the East for piety and genius, he died about A. D. 378.

Ephrem was the most laborious and voluminous writer of his time. Besides a copious Commentary on all the Books of the Old and New Testament, and a multitude of Homilies and Sermons, he is said to have written twelve thousand metrical compositions. Many of his Works are still extant in the original Syriac, and a considerable number in Greek and Arabic versions. The most valuable and important of his productions which we possess, is his Commentary on the Books of the Old Testament. He had, indeed, no pretensions to the varied erudition and critical skill of Jerome, but he is in general a judicious and rational expositor, with clear views of the literal sense of the sacred text. He was also well acquainted with the Geography, History, and Antiquities of Eastern Nations. The remainder of his Syriac compositions are chiefly metrical, i. a division into lines of a certain number of syllables, without attention to rhythm, may be allowed to constitute metre. Some of those pieces are devotional Hymns, others are controversial, written to counteract the prevailing Heresies of the time. They contain some valuable and curious matter; but though they raised his fame very high among his Countrymen, they seem to us more creditable to his diligence and piety than to his poetical genius. Indeed, if his talent for Poetry had been of a higher description, it would have been difficult to display it to advantage in the prosaic and unpoetical language in which he wrote.

Many Greek Homilies and Tracts bearing the name of Ephrem are still extant. Some are written in a strain of simple and fervent piety, by no means unworthy of the author to whom they are attributed. There is reason to suspect that the greater part of them have been interpolated by Translators, and that some are altogether spurious.

The only good edition of the Works of Ephrem is that published at Rome 1743, by Stephen Enodius Assemani, 6 vols. fol. Its greatest defect is, (and it is indeed a very great one,) that the Latin version of the Syriac text is so unfaithful as to be almost useless.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 235—235, and vol. ii. Appen. il. p. 19—24; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 115—120; Assemani, Biblioth. Orientalis, vol. i. p. 25, et seq.

BASIL OF CESAREA.

BORN CIRCA A. D. 328. DIED A. D. 378.

Basil, a native of Cappadocia, or as some authors think of Pontus, was born about A. D. 328, of highly respectable Christian parents, who spared no pains in his instruction in every elegant and useful branch of learning. He studied successively under the best masters of Antioch, Cesarea, Constantinople, and Athens, where he acquired a proficiency both in Sacred and Profane Literature unrivalled by any of his contemporaries, except his friend Gregory Nazianzen. The afflicted state of the Church during the Arian Persecution induced him to retire, shortly after his ordination, to a solitary spot in his native Province. The fame of his piety and austerities attracting a number of devout persons to the place, he drew up a body of laws for the regulation of the Society so formed, and thus became the founder of Monasticism in Pontus and the neighbouring Provinces. Towards the end of the year 369, he was appointed Bishop of Cesarea in Cappadocia, where he speedily showed that his talents for business of the most arduous kind were not inferior to his other qualifications. After governing his Diocese in the most able and exemplary manner eight years, he died A. D. 378.

Basil was unquestionably one of the most eminent men of his time. To a capacious and powerful mind, richly stored with original conceptions and acquired knowledge, he united great activity, presence of mind, and moral courage, and he was neither disheartened by difficulties, nor intimidated by dangers. In a variety of arduous contests, and most trying circumstances, he universally acquitted himself with dignity and firmness, and even when unsuccessful, he maintained the respectability of his character and station.

As a writer, Basil is distinguished by a noble and majestic gravity, and by striking and original thoughts expressed in pure and elevated language. If he does not equal Gregory Nazianzen in his occasional bursts of sublimity and pathos, he has the taste and discretion to avoid his faults: he is copious without redundancy, and eloquent without being declamatory. His expository, his homiletical, and his moral Works are all excellent in their way; and we have, moreover, upwards of four hundred of his Letters, which are models of epistolary style, and replete with valuable information respecting the History of the eventful times in which he lived.

The best edition of the Works of Basil is the Benedictine, superintended by Garnier, Paris, 1721, 1730, 3 vols. fol. All those which preceded are incomplete and badly arranged.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 233—243; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 122—159; Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. tom. ix. Art. S. Basil.

Commentary on the Scriptures.

Metrical compositions.

Works a Style.

Edition

GREGORIUS NAZIANZENSUS.

DIED A. D. 389.

An insignificant village in Cappadocia, Nazianzum, or Diocæsarea, had the honour of being the birthplace of this preeminent Divine of the IVth century, preeminent alike in every branch of Learning and in every Christian excellence.

The date of his birth has been the subject of much controversy, but is now important only as it involves the question of Episcopal celibacy in the early Ages. It is clear from a passage in his own Works,* that his father had entered on Episcopal functions prior to A. D. 326, the best attested date of the birth of this celebrated son. Yet Suidas and some Romish Writers have so antedated it as to save a Christian Bishop, what they considered, the disgrace of having produced the most exemplary Christian of the Age. Tillemont, with candour worthy of imitation, has refuted the error and exposed the motive.

From Gregory's own account it appears that his parents were orthodox and pious; though his father, in early life, had been tainted with the Hypsistarian heresy. From their tuition, he departed first for Cæsarea in Cappadocia, then for Palestine, afterwards for Alexandria, and subsequently for Athens; where he perfected himself in scholastic accomplishments, and entered into the closest friendship with Basil, the future Archbishop of Cæsarea: a friendship the pleasures and pains of which he has exquisitely described in his Letters, and in his Poem on his own life.

Gregory Nazianzen would have quitted Athens with his friend in 355, had he not been detained by the solicitations of the scholars to remain there as Teacher of Rhetoric. In the following year, however, his ardour for literary fame yielding to filial affection, he returned to his father, and assisted him in the management of his patrimony. Some writers defer his reception into the Church by Baptism to this period; none place it later.

An interval of five or six years having been spent in domestic duties, or in studious retirement with Basil, he was ordained Priest by his father in 361 or 362. His notions, however, of the importance of the Priestly office and of his own inadequacy, led him to a second retirement from society—a retirement again passed in the company of Basil, whom he then assisted in drawing up his Ascetic Rules. But the commands of his father, backed by the voice of his Countrymen, soon recalled him to Nazianzum, and enlisted him in the active discharge of his Ministerial functions.

His first effort as a Minister was as successful as it was important. His father, in obedience to the general edict of Constantius, but in opposition to his own pure doctrine, as was afterwards allowed by his opponents, had signed the Arian formulæ of Ariminum.† A Schism in his Church followed; which was healed by his son, before, in accordance with the practice of the Age, it became a subject of dispute and disgrace to Christianity in general. The succeeding six or seven years were spent by Gregory unobtrusively in assisting his father in his pastoral duties; a mode of life most congenial to his disposition, but eventually disturbed by his dearest friend about 370.

Basil, at that time Bishop of Cæsarea, had to contend for the integrity of his Metropolitan jurisdiction over Cappadocia, against Anthemius, Bishop of Tyana, who asserted that, as a Civil division of that Province had taken place, an Ecclesiastical one ought to follow. In order to bring the matter to issue, Basil created a See within the disputed district. The place selected was Sasima; than which, if Gregory Nazianzen's description of it be correct,* a more inhospitable spot cannot be conceived: and here Basil resolved that his friend Gregory should be Bishop. The latter, urged by his father, reluctantly consented to be consecrated, and the ceremony was performed at Cæsarea; but the forcible seizure of his new Church by Anthemius afforded him a pretext for deserting it, which he eagerly embraced; and in so doing he was justified by the XVIIIth Canon of the Council of Antioch.

This affair so offended Gregory, that his friendship with Basil was all but finally extinguished. A reconciliation, however, must have taken place within two years, as, at the end of that interval, we find Basil his sympathetic visitor in affliction. Yet many years afterwards, the wound to his feelings, ἡνερξέντος ὡσαύτι νεοῦ, "festered as though it were new;" and he complains of it in his Poem on his own life, in a style of sarcasm and invective, not less foreign from, than unbecoming to, his character. This is the more inexplicable, as in his Funeral Oration over Basil he not only alludes to it without bitterness, but ascribes this breach of friendship (as he still terms it) to Basil's preference of "things heavenly" to "things destructible," ἀσθενέων; and in one of his Epitaphs he lavishes the most unqualified and affectionate praise on him.†

After a few months' solitude, being now a Bishop, he undertook the subordinate charge of his father's See at Nazianzum, in which capacity he distinguished himself by calming the inhabitants in a revolt, and by averting their punishment. On his father's death, in 374, he continued, for a short time, in the charge of that Church; but he denies any regular appointment to it, although such appointment is supported by the authority of Sozomen, Socrates, Theodoretus, and Hieronymus. It is certain, however, that he was subsequently expelled from Constantiople on the plea of his being Bishop of the former See. He now withdrew to Seleucia, where he remained till invited to Constantinople, for the purpose of defending pure Christianity against the predominant influence of the Arians.

Here, in a private room, known by the name of Anastasia, which was shortly to be changed into a magnificent Temple, and before a small and persecuted assembly, which was rapidly to increase to a dominant Ecclesiastical Writers of the IVth Century.

A. D. 378.

* In his Poem de Vita sua, Gregory introduces his father speaking to him thus:

Ὁρῶν πατρὸς λαμπροτάτης βίης, Ὁρῶ βέλτε ἑστίον ἡμῶν.

† The Rimmi of Tillemont and other writers.

VOL. XI.

*Στασίς τις ἔστω ἡ πλεοναχία τῶν κατωτέρων, ἡ ἐχθρὸς εἰς ἡμῶν ἡδὴ Ἀνδρῶν, ἄλλων, ἀλλῶν λαμπρῶν, ἀσθενῶν, ἀσθενῶν, καὶ ἐν τούτῳ, καὶ ἐν τούτῳ κίον ἐν ἑστίῳ, καὶ φίλῳ, ἐν ἀμείνῳ, θεῷ, ἀσθενῶν, ἀσθενῶν, ἐν τούτῳ, ὡς ἐν, καὶ τὸ ἑνὸς ἐν καὶ ἐν τούτῳ,
ἄλλα ταῦτα ἐν τούτῳ λαμπρῶν.*

Greg. Naz. Carmen de vita sua.

† Gibbon has employed this complaint of Gregory as a charge of pride and base envy against Basil. The facts do not bear him out. The whole affair is utterly inexplicable.

History.

Church, he advocated the cause of the true Christian Faith with Athenian eloquence,* and with Christian fortitude and meekness.

The plan pursued by him in his difficult task, remains a brilliant example to all those who may at any time be called on to confirm, Truth and dissipate Error. He exhorted true believers to beware of bewildering themselves with reasonings on things incomprehensible to Human nature, lest they should be lost in heretical fancies; he insisted on the absurdity of attempting to reduce to a "trade and an art," the great and invisible mysteries of God; and while he taught that God should ever be in their hearts, he deprecated unreasonable disquisitions on His nature, observing that such discussions are not appropriate before all companies, or in all places, nor within the province of all understandings. On the other hand, he abstained from violent and contumelious language, and especially from personalities towards his adversaries; contending, that to imitate the gentleness and meekness of Christ, is among the surest tokens of a defender of the true Christian Faith. Yet did he not by any means compromise Truth; on the contrary, he possessed himself of the errors of the Heretics by occasionally listening to their preachers, in order that he might the more effectually refute them; laying down for his rule—neither to repel them by harshness nor elate them by concession.

Yet in spite of this moderation, the more attractive on account of its singularity in those times, and supported by the most conciliatory personal bearing, Gregory Nazianzen, or rather the cause which he defended, was not to triumph without a fearful struggle nor without the contaminating aid of the secular arm.

Instigated by a report that Gregory Nazianzen was a Tritheist, animated also by a partiality for the Arian Bishop Demophilus, the rabble of Constantinople, of each sex and of every sect, headed by some furious Monks, attacked Gregory and his congregation while celebrating our Saviour's Baptism in the Anastasia. The weapons usual to a mob were abundantly employed, many of the Catholics were dreadfully beaten, some nearly stoned to death, and one, who appears to have been Theodorus, afterwards Bishop of Tyana, was left for dead in the streets. Gregory himself, after a narrow escape, was thrown into prison, but speedily released. Drunkenness and obscene dances closed the disgusting spectacle.

The subsequent conduct of Gregory in relation to this affair is too exemplary to be passed over in silence. Theodorus, incensed at the outrage and his own sufferings, resolved to demand justice on the perpetrators at the hands of Theodosius, a demand not likely to be refused by that Anti-Arian Prince. But Gregory, hearing of his intention, wrote to him to the following effect: that it was not surprising that Theodorus should demand justice, considering the enormity of the offence, and that punishment indeed might prevent its recurrence; but that it was better to give an example of long suffering which might make bad men really good, while punishment would only restrain them, through fear, from crime. "Let us," says this genuine Christian, "let us overcome them by gentleness and win them by piety; let their punishment be found in their own consciences, not in our resentment. Dry not up the fig-tree that may yet bear fruit; condemn it not as useless, since an able husbandman may yet restore it to vigour; let us not ruin a glorious and important work on account of a circumstance that may have been a device of the Devil."

His infant Church was soon to be troubled by internal disorders, more dangerous and infinitely more difficult of remedy than external violence. A dispute at Antioch concerning Paulinus and Meletius, rival claimants to that See, extended to Constantinople, and was warmly taken up with opposite views by Gregory Nazianzen's congregation. His XIVth Oration, in which he applies himself to the cure of this Schism, contains some ever-to-be-remembered rules of toleration. He even contends that minor points of doctrine should be sunk in peace, if unanimity prevails in those more important. In this spirit he condemned the error of the Apollinarians, yet did not withhold from communicating with them.

This danger avoided, another and more important one followed. Maximus, by birth an Egyptian, a Cynic Philosopher by profession, an Apollinarian in doctrine, and in practice infamous, came to Constantinople under the pretence of a pious desire for Gregory's instruction, but, in fact, with the purpose of defeating his claims to the Metropolitan Chair. Having deceived Gregory, and being assisted by seven Egyptian Bishops* in the first place, and subsequently by others sent by Peter of Alexandria, Maximus was clandestinely consecrated in the Church of Sophia; the ceremony took place in the night, and was further disgraced by the hired attendance of rude Egyptian sailors. This measure provoked general disgust, even among the Heretics, most of whom admired the eloquence and loved the character of Gregory Nazianzen, though they might not admit the validity of his arguments.

A proposal on his part to retire from Constantinople, was effectually opposed for a time, and his refusal to be placed in the Metropolitan chair was followed by complaints almost amounting to invectives. Ill health, however, or agitation of mind, compelled a temporary retirement and suspension of his duties. The term of his absence must have been short, as we find him again preaching in Constantinople before the entrance of Theodosius. In the mean time, his adversary Maximus, driven from Constantinople, and rejected by the Italian Bishops and by Theodosius, returned to Egypt.

Shortly afterwards, the Arian Bishop Demophilus was deposed, and Gregory placed in his stead, at the command and with the personal assistance of the same Prince. This event, the death blow to Arian ascendancy, took place amidst the execrations of one party, and the joyful acclamations of the other; public security was ensured by the presence of the military, and the judicious interference of Gregory.†

In the following year his appointment was confirmed

* Ammon, Apammon, Harpocrus, Stippas, Rhodon, Anubis, and Hermaphrodite. A question whether these persons were Bishops has been mooted. Bollandus and Hermant assert that they were so. Vallade is of the contrary opinion. Tillemont doubts. The first two writers contend that one mission only came over from Egypt on this occasion; an opinion refuted by a passage in Gregory Nazianzen's Poem on his life.

† The offensive features of this scene are highly finished by the hand of Gibbon, while those of a gratifying cast are totally overlooked.

* On this subject we have a singular proof of the tendency to inaccuracy induced by the love of the marvellous. Tillemont, the great admirer of Gregory Nazianzen's eloquence, tries to enhance the miraculous effect of his discourses against the Arians, by describing him in this instance, and this only, as a man d'un parler rude et champestre.

Eccl.
hist.
Writers of the IVth Century.

A. D.
381.

History. by a Council of 150 Bishops, convened by Theodosius at Constantinople; yet this very Council, a few weeks afterwards, urged his deposition, and accepted his resignation.

Of the causes of this anomalous transaction, or the motives of the agents, it is difficult to give a satisfactory account. That Gregory Nazianzen, careless of worldly honour and riches, harassed by infirmity of body and excessive mental exertion, disappointed in his hope of allaying Schism in the Eastern Churches, finding himself in his Metropolitan character a subject of further dispute, and estimating Christian unity above all things—that he should sacrifice Ecclesiastical dignity, influence, and wealth, to what he considered the peace of the Church, is not to be wondered at.* But that those who summoned him from retirement to defend the pure Faith, and those who, in establishing him in the Chair of Constantinople, acknowledged him as the successful champion of that Faith, should rejoice at his resignation, or seek to depose him, must be laid to the account of levity, jealousy, or envy.

The only facts transmitted to us are these. A Schism, likely to affect the whole Church, (as has been mentioned), had arisen on the relative claims of Meletius and Paulinus to the See of Antioch. It had been checked, not healed, by an understanding that the rivals should be equally received, and that the survivor should be sole Bishop. Meletius died while President of the Council of which we are speaking. Gregory Nazianzen succeeded him in the Council, and wished to enforce the stipulation that Paulinus should be unmolested at Antioch. He failed; the Schism increased: and Gregory finding himself unequal to check it, offered to resign the situation, the healing influence of which he had overrated. Immediately on this, followed the accession to the Council of some Macedonian and Egyptian Bishops. These persons impugned the validity of Gregory's Metropolitan appointment, on the ground, that he was already Bishop of Nazianzum, and that translation was forbidden by the decrees of the Council of Antioch. This motive has been generally ascribed, even by Gregory himself, to jealousy in the Egyptian Church of the Eastern Bishops who had principally promoted his elevation. A more natural cause may be found in the intrigues of Maximus, whose return in discomfiture to Alexandria has been already mentioned. Be this as it may, Gregory's resignation was received with pleasure by the Council, and accepted by Theodosius.

He returned to Nazianzum, and in the following year undertook the Episcopal duties there, having previously visited Cæsarea for the purpose of delivering his celebrated Funeral Oration over Basil. In 383 he resigned them to Eulalius, whose appointment he had himself procured. The six remaining years of his life were occupied in literary and devotional pursuits. In 389 he sank beneath the complication of bodily disease and mental anxiety. Of his death we have no particulars; but we learn that his corpse was laid by the side of his father's. Many centuries afterwards the tomb was opened, and his supposed remains removed to Constantinople by order of Constantine Porphyrogenitus.

As a writer, Gregory Nazianzen, though sometimes diffuse, was always eloquent, and often sublime. Hieronymus terms his style τὸ ἱερὸπαιδικόν, while others compare it to Polemon's; and one of his admirers observes, "that the epithet μεγαλοψήφιος, applied by Gregory Nazianzen to the Prophet Isaiah, is not inapplicable to himself." As a Divine he so far outstripped his Age, that he was entitled δὲ θεολόγος καὶ θεόφιλος; and a difference from his doctrine was identified with Heresy. A dutiful son, a faithful friend, and universally beneficent, he would have been a model for society, had he not been too sensitive, and, perhaps, too ascetic. Humble, though full of energy; despising worldly advantages unless he could apply them to the advancement of Religion; untainted by immorality, forgiving injuries,* and indefatigable in his Ministry, he may be accounted the most exemplary, as well as the most able, Christian, on record, in the IVth century.

The genuine Works of Gregory Nazianzen are his Editions. Orations, in number about 47, Epistles 240, and a vast number of Poems. Nineteen of his Poems were first discovered in 1690 by Jacob Tollius, a German, who published them in 1696 in his Insignia Itinerarii Italici. One hundred and forty Epitaphs were afterwards discovered by Muratori, and were published by him, in 1709, in his Anecdota Græca. The first edition, a very bad and a very rare one, of the great body of his Works is that of Basle, 1550. The next in time, and the first in merit, (as a whole,) appeared at Paris in 1609, under the care of Jacobus Billius; but even in this there are many typographical errors. This was republished in 1630, with all the old, and some additional errors. In 1690, the Editio Princeps was reprinted verbatim in beautiful type at Cologne. An edition was prepared by the Benedictines; but the 1st Volume only has appeared. It contains his Orations and Letters, and is unrivalled as far as it goes. The MS. of the 11d Volume is in existence, and for sale. The purchase and publication of it would be worthy of either of our Universities. In England, R. Montagu, the friend of Sir Henry Saville, editor of St. Chrysostom, published two of Gregory's Orations, entitled In Julianum Invectivæ Duæ, Etowæ in Collegio Regali, 1610; and a copy of his Apologetics was edited by E. S. Thirlby, and published at Cambridge in 1712.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 246—249; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 159—176; Tillemont, vol. ix. Art. Grégoire de Nazianze; Fabricius, Biblioth. Græc. vol. vii. p. 508, & seq.

GREGORIUS, NYSSENUS.

BORN A. D. 330.

Gregory, Bishop of Nyssa, and brother of Basil of Cæsarea, was born in 330 or 331. He was educated in all the refined learning of his Age, and pursued the Science of Rhetoric so eagerly, that he brought on himself, after he had been appointed Reader, a strong remonstrance on the subject from Nazianzen.

He married a lady named Theodosia, as much distinguished as himself for birth and piety. As this marriage cannot be disputed, some Romish writers affirm that

* A striking instance of his forgiving disposition occurred during his short Episcopate at Constantinople. The Arians, in their rage at his appointment, proposed his assassination, and a young man was found to undertake the crime. On entering Gregory's apartment he repented, confessed, and was not only forgiven by Gregory, but received into his intimate friendship.

History. after Gregorius Nyssenus had been promoted to the Episcopate it was virtually nullified, by total absence of conjugal intimacy. In support of this fable, Tillemont cites a passage from Nazianzen, where Theodosia is called Nyssenus's sister instead of his wife. But this passage is almost immediately succeeded by the following one. Applying the word ἄνηρ to Theodosia, Nazianzen thus explains himself: *ἐμὴν γὰρ ἀνῆρα τὴν κατὰ θεοῦ ἡρώσαν· ἐκείνη κρίτων ἢ πνευματικῆς συγγενείας τῆς σαρκινῆς. This casuistry in Tillemont is the more remarkable, as we have seen his candour, on the same point of celibacy, in the life of Nazianzen.

In 372, Gregory was consecrated Bishop of Nyssa in Cappadocia, and as such became the victim of the Arian Persecution under Valens. An Imperial Edict banished him in 376: but on the death of Valens, and the accession of Gratian, in 378, he was restored to his Church. In the same year, being deputed by the Council of Antioch to visit the Eastern Churches, which were sorely afflicted by the Arians, he travelled through Arabia to Jerusalem. His opinion of the state of these Churches appears, from his own writings, to have been most unfavourable. Of his success in reforming any of them we have not any knowledge; but that he totally failed at Jerusalem he himself informs us. The most important result of his journey was his consequent declaration of the inutility and disadvantage of pilgrimages, a declaration decisive on the erroneous practice, in that respect, of the Romish Church. In 381, he attended the great Council at Constantinople, where he first produced his celebrated Work against the Arian Eunomius. He is also supposed to have been the author of the Creed then drawn up, but known under the name of the Nicene Creed. The remainder of his life was distinguished only by a quarrel with Helladius, his Metropolitan, a person of no learning and little piety, who grossly insulted him: the issue of the dispute is not known. The date of his death may be placed towards the end of the IVth century.

Style. As the text of this Father's Works is supposed to have been much interpolated by the Heretics, no decided opinion can be formed on his style. Dupin has denounced it as affected, declamatory, allegorical, and Philosophical rather than Theological. But he says, at the same time, that it resembles Aristotle's, and therefore he is clearly wrong. Other critics have admired it as inferior only to those of Basil, Nazianzen, and Chrysostom. Photius, speaking of his Work against Eunomius, thus describes it: τὴν μὲν ῥῆσιν, οἱ τὴν ἄλλων ῥήτορων, λαμπροί, καὶ ἥτονός ὡς αὐτοσχεῖον.

Gregory of Nyssa appears in his youth to have been more attached to the world than was the custom with the great Divines of those times. As a Bishop he was a zealous defender of the true Faith. His ability is proved by his being chosen to reform the Arabian Churches, as is his piety by the patient firmness with which he endured persecution.

The Works of Gregory of Nyssa do not admit of exact classification; yet they may be generally divided into Homilies, Orations, and Letters. His XII Books against Eunomius are his best Work. Some critics have made XIII, either by dividing one into two or by adding a spurious one. His spurious Works are, two Orations on the Creation of Man; a Letter on the Trinity; another on the difference between the Substance and the Hypostasis; and VIII Books on Philosophy. These last were written by Nemesius.

The earlier editions of this Father's Works are extremely defective, no individual one containing more than a few detached Treatises. The edition published by Morel, with the notes of Fronton le Duc, Paris, 1699, 2 vols. fol., though much fuller than any preceding one, wants the 1st Book against Eunomius, and the Greek text of several of the moral Orations, which were first published by Gretsen, in 1618, as an appendix to the Paris-edition of St. Basil. The edition of 1638, though more complete than that of 1602, is carelessly executed, and abounds with typographical errors.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 244—246; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 176—183; Fabricius, Biblioth. Græc. vol. viii. p. 144, et seq.

AMBROSIIUS.

BORN A. D. 340. DIED A. D. 397.

The three ancient Cities of Arles, Treves, and Lyons dispute the honour of having given birth to this bold defender of the Faith. The date also of his birth is uncertain. Dupin and Tillemont place it in 340.* Baronius and Cave in 333.

His father, Prefect of Gaul, having died while Ambrose was yet a child, he was removed by his mother to Rome, where his education was highly finished.† As a Pleader in the Prætorian Court he attracted the attention of Anicius Probus, Prefect of Italy, and was appointed by him, first a Member of his Council, and then Governor, with Consular powers, of Insubria, Æmylia, and Liguria. He performed the duties of this office for five years, residing always at Milan. But at the end of that period, A. D. 374, he was unanimously called on to succeed Auxentius in the Episcopal chair of that city. Vain was every attempt in his power to avoid the unexpected honour: he was baptized, (for as yet he was only a Catechumen,) and consecrated amidst the acclamations of the people, and with the sanction, if not in the presence, of the Emperor Valentinian I.

That this abrupt transition from secular to holy office, from an imperfect state of outward Christianity to the highest dignity of the Christian Church, was contrary both to the custom and Canons of the Church, cannot be denied. But the assent of all parties, especially of the Bishops, proves beyond doubt the fitness, if not the necessity of the election: Οὐδ' ἔργον and Οὐκ ἄνθος are the terms applied to it by Sozomen and Theodoretus.‡

To supply his deficiency in Theological learning, he took to himself a learned Presbyter of Rome, by name

* 340 is the most probable date. For Ambrose appears to have been quite young when appointed to govern a Province, which government he retained only for five years, yet it was not till A. D. 374 that he resigned it.

† A remarkable anecdote, partaking of true legendary spirit, and paralleled, as every reader will call to mind, in Profane Literature, is related of him by all writers of his life. A swarm of bees, it is said, settled on his face while he was sleeping in a cradle, and crept in and out of his mouth without hurting him.

* Nax. Ep. 95. This Letter was written by Nazianzen to Gregory of Nyssa to comfort him on the death of Theodosia.

Very. Simplicianus,* as his instructor. To remove the interfering burden of worldly cares, he gave his money to the poor, his estates to his sister and to the Church, and the management of his household to his brother Satyrus. He immediately undertook the duty of preaching, confessing that he taught others what he himself had scarcely learned; and within two years from his consecration he commenced his written labours by a Treatise on Paradise†.

In A. D. 377 he fled into Illyricum, from fear of the invading Goths, and thence visited Rome; but soon returned to his Diocese on the defeat of the Barbarians by Frigeridus. On this occasion, preferring practical charity to Ecclesiastical pomp, he sold the Church plate and employed the proceeds in the ransom of prisoners. In the mean time, the arts of the Arians, aided by the power of Justina, widow of Valentinian, threatened all the Italian Churches. But Ambrose having first suppressed them at Milan, defeated them at Sirmium by consecrating a true Catholic Bishop there, in open opposition to the Empress, and completed his victory (though not a decisive one) by the deposition from their respective Sees, of Secundianus and Paulinus;‡ the principal leaders of the Arians in Italy.

A. D. 353. The political talent, so early evinced by Ambrose, was now to be exercised in the preservation of public peace, and the defence of youth and justice. Maximus had been proclaimed Emperor in Britain, had compassed the death of Gratian, overrun Gaul, and with a powerful host was separated from Italy only by the Alps. Justina, alarmed for the Italian dominions and the safety of her child Valentinian II., implored Ambrose to undertake an embassy to Maximus, and to avert his design on Italy. He did so. As his success is a proof of his Political skill, so his regard for the dignity of his sacred office is shown by his refusal to admit to communion the unrepenting murderer of Gratian, though he himself was in the grasp of the Tyrant. On his return, his eloquence and wisdom were as necessary as they were effectual in suppressing an attempt, by Symmachus, to reestablish Heathenism at Milan, at that time the seat of the young Emperor's Court.

A. D. 353. But neither eloquence nor wisdom unsupported by Truth and personal courage, would have boric him through his approaching trial. Justina, still devoted to Arianism, and provoked by the boldness of Ambrose, had recourse to every intrigue and all the violence that despotism could command, in favour of her favourite Heresy. Plans were laid for the abduction of Ambrose, and even for his assassination; some Churches were forcibly seized by the military—heavy fines were levied on the refractory—and the Emperor's authority was exhausted in denunciations against all who called in question the decrees of the Arian Council of Ariminum. But Ambrose, always alert and firm, and supported by popular feeling, resisted every attempt; and, after two years' unremitted persecution, obtained a complete triumph; though, according to some writers, not without the interposition of miracles, §

* Simplicianus, though older than himself, succeeded him in his Diocese.

† Cave says de Virginibus. This Work, however, appears not to have been written till A. D. 378, and to have been preceded by those on Paradise, Cris and Abel, and Tobias. Tillemont.

‡ At a Council held in Aquileia.

§ St. Ambrose, St. Augustin, Paulinus, A less wonderful, but not less effectual interposition, may be found in a Letter from Maximus to Valentinian, threatening him with invasion if he continued to

In the following year he undertook a second embassy to Maximus. His object was, as before, to prevent an invasion of Italy: but the issue was far different; for he not only utterly failed, but was received with haughty coldness, and dismissed with insult. On his return he visited Aquileia, but his object in doing so is not known.

His unbending spirit next led him into a hazardous conflict with Theodosius, then master of the Western Provinces, and resident at Milan. Some Monks, provoked by the Jews, burned a Synagogue at Leontopolis, and Theodosius ordered that it should be rebuilt at the expense of the offending party. Ambrose, indignant that Christian funds should be employed on the erection of an unchristian Temple, remonstrated against the Emperor's order. The Emperor, however, thinking that destroyers were liable to the cost of their destruction, and that all persons, of whatever Religion, had claim to Civil protection of their property, was not willing to rescind the offensive order. Ambrose preached against Theodosius in his presence, and publicly refused communion to him unless he altogether countermanded the measure—an alternative immediately agreed to by Theodosius. About the same time he endeavoured to procure for the Clergy immunity from the Imperial impost, but it does not appear that he succeeded.

In 389, a frightful and unjust massacre having been committed at Thessalonica by the orders of Theodosius, Ambrose wrote to him, and informed him that he would not be admitted to the communion of any of the divine offices until he would sincerely and publicly repent. Theodosius, on his return to Milan, presented himself at the Church, but Ambrose refused him entrance, and rebuked him with great boldness and severity. For eight months the Emperor submitted with grief to the humiliating ban; nor did Ambrose then remove it without wresting from him a law, that all warrants affecting life or forfeiture of estates, should be kept back thirty days after they were signed, in order for their deliberate reconsideration. This done, Ambrose absolved his Imperial penitent, but kept in reserve a finishing stroke of humiliation: for when Theodosius went within the rails protecting the altar, as was the custom with the Emperors, to receive the communion, the stern Prelate sent a Deacon to order him to stand without, among the people, "for though the Purple made men Emperors, it did not make them Priests." Theodosius apologized and obeyed!

In 392, Valentinian, being at Vienne, sent for Ambrose to baptize him; but secretly had the Bishop crossed the Alps, when he found that his journey was useless, for Valentinian had been murdered. Having returned to Milan, he visited Bononia, Faventia, and Florence; or, perhaps, he fled to those places on account of the approach of Eugenius. On the defeat and death of that usurper, he returned to Milan, having passed through Aquileia for the purpose of interceding with Theodosius in favour of the conquered rebels. On the accession of Honorius, his zeal for the privileges of the Church was again roused in defence of some culprits who had sought refuge in the sanctuary. His remaining years were undisturbed, excepting by his vigilant inspection of all the Churches under his jurisdiction. In 397 he died, and such was the admiration

Ecclesiastical Writers of the IVth Century.

A. D. 388.

A. D. 389.

A. D. 397.

persecute the Catholics. Tillemont has in vain attempted to invalidate the authenticity of this Letter, in opposition to Theodoritus and Sozomen.

History.

in which he was held, that his funeral was attended by Jews and Gentiles, as well as by Christians; many of whom sought to touch his corpse as a preservative against the assaults of the Evil One. His posthumous reappearance is also stoutly contended for: and the following example of it is the most extraordinary on record. On the removal of the remains of two saints to Milan, Ambrose, some months after his death, appeared to a blind man of Dalmatia; and predicting the day on which the Saints' remains would arrive, desired him to be present at their coming, in which case he would recover his sight. Baronius and Tillemont relate the circumstance, and add that the blind man recovered.

The true character of Ambrose cannot be drawn without offence either to custom or to Truth; all Ecclesiastical Historians, Ancient or Modern, Romish or Protestant, having, without any exception known to us,* agreed in unqualified praise of it. That he was, rigidly virtuous, exemplary in all Spiritual functions, orthodox in doctrine, and sincerely pious, cannot be denied. Neither does it admit of doubt that he was in his own time, the main prop, and was so considered by his contemporaries, of the true Catholic Faith in the Western Church. But that his boldness in defence of the Faith verged upon arrogance, and his preservation of discipline on ostentation, has been sufficiently shown by his treatment of Theodosius, in the affairs of the Jewish Synagogue, and the massacre at Thessalonica. His interference, too, with Civil concerns, and his excitement of the Secular authority to suppress Heathenism, may, in conjunction with his haughty bearing to the Emperor and his assumption of miraculous power, be considered by some persons as the first sparks of that Italian fire, the fatal effects of which are not within our present range as Historians.

In passing this judgment, we should not conceal that the violence of the times, the fury of the Arians, and the insolence of the Heathen military, was such as could not have been surmounted by a spirit less bold and haughty than that of Ambrose. Nor should it be forgotten, that his Equestrian birth and early habits of Consular command, were bad teachers of the meekness and humility, which we are too apt to expect as mere matter of course in Bishops, who lived in times and nations incapable of estimating these virtues.

Style.

As a writer, Ambrose was more indefatigable than learned; yet more learned than original. Suddenly and unexpectedly called from Civil to Ecclesiastical office, he preferred the matured maxims of the Greek Fathers to his own crude lucubrations; and in this he showed good sense and modesty. His style, though incorrect, is pleasing, and, though not always clear, abounds with point. He was a composer of Hymns, and is understood to have been the first who introduced regular choral music into the Christian Church.

Editions.

The Works of Ambrose have been frequently printed, but the earlier editions are very incomplete, and most of them carelessly and inaccurately executed. Coster's edition, (Basle, 1555,) and Gillo's, (Paris, 1568,) are esteemed the most correct of those published in the XVIIth century. A magnificent edition was printed at Rome in six volumes, folio, 1579—1587, under the auspices of Gregory XIII. and Sixtus V.; but it is of little value in a critical point of view, the editors having taken many unwarrantable liberties with the text. The Benedictine edition (Paris, 1686—1690, 2 vols. fol.) is much superior to all which precede, being, in fact, the only complete and faithful one which has hitherto appeared.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 261—265; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 198—234; Tillemont, vol. x. Art. S. Ambroise.

HILARIUS THE DEACON.

FLOURISHED A. D. 354—384.

Hilary was a native of Sardinia, and a Deacon of the Roman Church, during the Pontificate of Liberius. After enduring persecution and exile for the orthodox Faith with great constancy, he became a Luciferian. He carried the exclusive system of his master so far as to insist upon rebaptizing all who had received Heretical baptism; whence he was sarcastically called by St. Jerome, Deuotionis Orbis. It is now generally agreed that the Questions in Vetus et Novum Testamentum, usually published together with St. Augustine's Works, and the Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, commonly attributed to St. Ambrose, are in reality the productions of Hilary. The Questions are of little value; the Commentary, without being remarkable for erudition or acumen, is a plain, literal, and tolerably faithful exposition of St. Paul's meaning.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 217; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 189.

DAMASUS.

A. D. 366—384.

We have already treated of the character of Damasus,* and of the extraordinary circumstances attending his elevation to the Pontificate. As a writer he is only known by a few Epistles and some short Poems on Religious subjects. They show him not to have been destitute of ability, but display no great depth of erudition or Theological knowledge. An edition of his Works was published by Ubaldini, Rome, 1638, 4to., and reprinted at Paris, 1652, 8vo.

The Liber Pontificalis, or Biographical account of the earlier Popes of Rome, attributed to Damasus, is now universally admitted to be spurious. It was, nevertheless, long looked upon as an authentic document, and thus it became the means of introducing much confusion and error into the History of the Church.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 230; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 121; Hieron. De Script. Eccl. c. 103.

DIDYMUS.

A. D. 370—392.

Didymus was a native of Alexandria, where he long exercised the office of a public teacher, with the highest reputation. Jerome and Rufinus were among the number of his pupils. Though blind almost from his infancy, he made an extraordinary proficiency in nearly every department of Literature, sacred and profane. He was a zealous Trinitarian, and at the same time a

* The strictures of Hieronymus on his style and plagiarism do not form an exception; as they were incidental, and form no part of a history of Ambrose's life.

Ecclesiastical Writers of the IVth Century.

History. warm admirer of Origen, with some of whose errors he is said to have been infected. He wrote an infinite number of books, particularly Commentaries on the Old and New Testament; but none of them have reached us, except a short Treatise on the Holy Spirit, another against the Manicheans, and some brief Annotations on the Canonical Epistles, of which the Latin versions are still extant. The first Treatise was translated by Jerome, and is usually printed together with his Works; the latter two are in Canisius's Lectiones Antiquæ, and the Bibliotheca Patrum. They are clearly and methodically written, and show that the author was an able and dexterous reasoner, and by no means deficient in penetration.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 253; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 103; Hieron. De Script. Eccles. c. 109.

MACARIUS.

There were at least two eminent Egyptian solitaries of this name, who lived during the latter part of the IVth century, and concerning whose austerities and miracles many strange and incredible stories are related. A number of Greek Homilies and Discourses are extant, bearing the name of Macarius; but it is not easy to ascertain with precision by whom they were written. They are certainly ancient, and have every appearance of being the productions of some ascetic author of the IVth or Vth century. They contain many devout sentiments, simply and beautifully expressed, but blended with many unscriptural notions, and a great deal of allegory and mysticism.

The Works attributed to Macarius were collected and published by Pritius, Leipsic, 1698, 8vo. A second edition was printed at the same place, 1714.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 256; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 55—58; Tillemont, vol. viii. Art. Macaire.

Ecclesiastical Writers of the IVth Century.

PHILASTRIUS.

A. D. 386.

Philastrius, Bishop of Brescia, was the contemporary and friend of Ambrose, whom he actively assisted in opposing and suppressing Arianism in the West. He wrote a Work on Heresies, still extant, which does not give a favourable idea either of his talents or his acquirements. His knowledge of his subject is extremely limited, his reasonings are contemptible, and he betrays throughout an unwarrantable eagerness to magnify errors of the most harmless description into dangerous Heresies; he is a writer of no authority, and only calculated to mislead those who rely on his statements.

The best edition of the Work of Philastrius is that published by Fabricius, Hamburg, 1721, 8vo.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 276; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv. p. 193.

GREEK WRITERS.

EUSEBIUS.
ATHANASIUS.
CYRIL OF JERUSALEM.
EPIPHANIUS.
BASIL.
GREGORY NAZIANZEN.
GREGORY OF NYSSA.
MACARIUS.

SYRIAC WRITER.

EPHREM.

LATIN WRITERS

ARNOBIVS.
LACTANTIUS.
COMMODIANUS.
JUVENCUS.
JULIUS FIRMICUS MATERNUS.
HILARY.
LUCIFER.
PHEBADIUS.
VICTORINUS.
OPTATUS.
PACIAN.
AMBROSE.
HILARY.
DAMASUS.
PHILASTRIUS.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LIV.

OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

HERESIES OF THE FOURTH CENTURY.

History.

Many of the Sects of earlier birth continued to retain their vigour during the IVth century, and others arose which, unhappily, struck yet more permanent roots than their predecessors. The severe laws enacted against the Manicheans, compelled them to assume other names, by which they concealed themselves for a time, but could not ultimately escape the vigilance of their enemies. Of the chief Heresies which date their origin in this century, the first which demands notice is that of

Two important reasons were urged by the Numidian Prelates to justify this violent measure; first, that Felix of Aptungus, the chief of the Bishops who assisted at the consecration, was a traditor, or one who in the time of Persecution had apostatized from the Christian Faith; secondly, that Cæcilian, in the subordinate office of a Deacon, had displayed harshness, and even cruelty, towards the Christian Confessors and Martyrs in the time of Persecution.

Heresies of the IVth Century.

THE DONATISTS.

Origin.
A. D.
315.

Persecution had scarcely ceased in the Western Church, and it still raged in the East, when this new and dangerous faction arose in Africa. On the death of Mensurius, Bishop of Carthage, a Council of neighbouring Clergy and Laity was convoked, for the appointment of a successor. The assembly was less numerously attended than usual, through the management of Botrus and Cæsius, two Presbyters, who aspired to the vacant dignity. Both these competitors, however, were disappointed, and the election fell on Cæcilian the Deacon. All the forms essential to the canonical appointment of a Bishop were observed, and Cæcilian had confessedly the suffrage of the whole Church. Nevertheless the two defeated candidates protested against the validity of the election, on the ground that the subsequent consecration of Cæcilian was performed without the concurrence of the Numidian Bishops. They were joined in their opposition by Lucilla, a rich and powerful lady, who had been reprimanded formerly by Cæcilian for her superstitious practices, but who was too haughty to submit to Ecclesiastical censures.* Animated by the representations of Botrus and Cæsius, and swayed, it is said, by the bribery of Lucilla, the Bishops of Numidia, assembling at Carthage, summoned Cæcilian before them. Secundus, Bishop of Tigisis, and the Numidian Primate presided in the assembly, and Cæcilian refusing to submit to its judgment, was declared unworthy of the Episcopal office, and formally deposed. Seventy Prelates concurred in the deposition, and with the same unanimity they elected, in the place of the degraded Prelate, Majorinus, a domestic of Lucilla.

Cæcilian chosen Bishop of Carthage.

Cæcilian deposed.

If, however, Cæcilian had been consecrated by a traditor, it is equally certain that a number of the Bishops who undertook to depose him, were liable to the same imputation. No one was more active in the affair than Donatus, Bishop of Casa Nigra, who had always been known as a schismatic, and a man of vehement and unruly temper. From him, according to the best authorities, the faction of the Donatists derived its name; for this disgrace has been divided between Donatus, Bishop of Casa Nigra, and Donatus, the successor of Majorinus in the See of Carthage. Of a question of such trivial importance, the probable solution may be offered, that the Donatists were so called from both.*

Name of Donatists where derived.

The deposition of Cæcilian was far from obtaining general acquiescence. He had a considerable number of adherents, and the sentence of the Numidian Bishops was brought before Constantine the Great, with a view to its revision and reversal. No sooner had that Emperor professed Christianity, than he exercised a supreme power in Ecclesiastical matters, and the appeal of Cæcilian was accepted by Constantine. He referred the decision of the question to Melchades, Bishop of Rome, assisted by Retiens, Maternus, and Marinus, three Bishops of Gaul. Three days were consumed in the investigation, and the result was favourable to Cæcilian. He was entirely and honourably acquitted of the crimes laid to his charge, and the Synod decreed that he should be reinstated in the dignity of which he had been unjustly deprived.

A. D. 313. Cæcilian reinstated in a Synod at Rome.

Such a decree, it may be supposed, was received with disgust and indignation by the Donatists with the Bishop of Casa Nigra at their head. The small number of Bishops associated with Melchades, excited in a particular manner their reproaches, and even their contempt. They looked upon the decision of seventy

* Schisma ipsius illo tempore confusa mulieris tranquillitas peperit; ambigua nutriti; avaritia roborevit. Optat. Hist. lib. i. c. 19.

* See Valesius, de Schismate Donatistarum, commonly appended to Euseb. Eccles. Hist. This Tract relates the progress of the Heresy till the Council of Nice, A. D. 325.

History.

Nomidian Prelates as infinitely more weighty than that pronounced by the Bishops at Rome, who, besides their inferiority in point of numbers, were unacquainted with African affairs. Constantine, willing to remove these complaints, ordered a second and a far more numerous Council to meet at Arles, composed of Bishops from various Provinces, from Italy, Gaul, Germany, and Spain.

A. D.
314.
The decrees confirmed by a Synod at Arles.
A. D.
316.
And by the Emperor Constantine at Milan.

While the Council was sitting at Arles, an inquiry was instituted in Africa, under Ælian the Proconsul, concerning the accusations brought against Aptungus, the Prelate by whom Cæcilian had been consecrated, and these were decided to be without foundation. At Arles, likewise, the Donatists were defeated, but they renewed their efforts by appealing to the personal decision of the Emperor. Constantine examined the whole affair at Milan in the presence of the contending parties, and confirmed the decrees which the two preceding Councils had pronounced.

Nothing remained to the discomfited Donatists but to load the Emperor with the bitterest reproaches, and the most unfounded accusations of interested partiality towards Cæcilian. Constantine, incensed at their conduct, deprived them of their Churches, and sent their factious Bishops into banishment. He carried his resentment so far as to put some of them to death; a proceeding which aggravated their discontent into actual rebellion.

The Circumcellions.

The consequent commotions gave rise to a formidable confederacy of ruffians, distinguished as a branch of the Donatist faction, and known by the name of Circumcellions. They were a mere banditti, who valued their own lives as little as those of their neighbours, and were remarkable for committing suicide in their frenzy. This sanguinary and fearless Sect filled Africa with slaughter and rapine, and perpetrated the most wanton acts of cruelty against the followers of Cæcilian. It daily acquired strength, and seemed to threaten a Civil war, till Constantine, having tried every mode of accommodation, abolished the laws which had been enacted against the Donatists, and allowed the people a full liberty of adhering to that party which they preferred.

But the flame of discord burst forth with renewed fury after the death of Constantine; and his son Constans, to whom Africa was allotted in the division of the Empire, found it necessary to have recourse to arms. Donatus, the successor of Majorinus, surnamed most inappropriately the Great, opposed all attempts at reconciliation, and the Circumcellions continued to extend their power by assassinations and massacres, executed with the most unrelenting fury. Their lawless and bloody career was at length stopped by Macarius, a General of Constans. A battle took place at Baguina, in which the Donatists were defeated; a great number saved themselves by flight, and, except a few who submitted, the remainder were slaughtered or made prisoners. The captives were punished with the utmost severity, numbers were sent into banishment, and among the exiles was Donatus himself, the chief author of the schismatical rebellion.

It is impossible to vindicate the rigorous treatment shown towards the Donatists under the Government of Constans, however atrocious might have been their conduct. Optatus, the Catholic Historian, and a firm defender of Orthodoxy, though he imputes the sufferings of the Sect principally to its own malignancy, confesses that the proceedings against it were too severe to admit of excuse.

During thirteen years the Donatists remained under persecution, but with the accession of Julian a more favourable prospect was opened to their view. The exiles were permitted to return to their Country, and the Sect exercised its worship without molestation. This lenity infused vigour into the expiring faction, and in a short time the larger part of the Province of Africa submitted to its discipline, or rather to its despotism. In Numidia its predominance was decided, and four hundred Bishops acknowledged the superiority of the Donatist Primate.

Before we speak of the tenets of the Donatists, it is necessary to premise that there were several divisions of the Sect. The Circumcellions have been already mentioned, and they ought to be considered as the military force of the faction, which by its practices demonstrated the erroneous opinions of the speculative Donatists. The Circumcellions strengthened the cause, but there were other intestine dissensions which weakened it. A fourth part of the Donatist Prelates followed the standard of Maximian, and a large Body was distinguished by the name of Rogatians.

The tenets of the Donatists were conformable to those of the Catholic Church, according to the acknowledgment of their adversaries, and the testimony of their most active and able opponent, Augustin, afterwards the celebrated Bishop of Hippo.* They differed from the Church only concerning a matter of fact, namely, whether Cæcilian had been legally consecrated. But the denial of this legality led them into many practical errors. They asserted that the Apostolical succession throughout Christendom was interrupted; that all the Bishops of Europe and Asia were infected by the contagion of guilt or schism; and that the privileges of the Christian Church were confined exclusively to themselves. This erroneous and rigid theory was supported by a correspondent conduct. They pronounced the sacred rites and institutions of all other Christians to be devoid of virtue and efficacy. They not only rebaptized their proselytes, but obliged those who had been already ordained Ministers of the Gospel, to be ordained a second time. Bishops and infants were alike submitted to the disgrace of a public penance before admission into their communion. If they obtained possession of a Church which had been used by their Catholic adversaries, they purified the unhallowed Temple with jealous care. They burned the altar, melted the consecrated plate, and cast the Holy Eucharist to the dogs, with all possible ignominy.

Among the other public and private labours of Augustin, his opposition to the Donatists cannot be passed over in silence. It is notorious that they had a peculiar malice against the pastors of the Catholic Church, and that this malice vented itself in open violence. Augustin himself was several times waylaid by these miserable men, and on one occasion escaped an ambush which they had placed for him, only through the mistake of his guide, by whom he was led into a different road from that which he had intended to travel. An excuse, though not a justification, may be offered for the measures of severity against these

* See his Letters to the Donatists, especially Letts. 48, 50, 61, 127.

Heresies of the IVth Century.

A. D.
362.

Divisions of the Donatists

Their tenets.

Conduct of Augustin towards the Donatists.

History. factious Heretics, of which he was the advocate and the adviser. On account of their enormities, the Imperial Court issued several edicts for the imposition of fines on the Donatists, and the infliction of banishment on their Bishops. These edicts Augustin vindicated in his writings, and strenuously urged the justice and expediency of repressing the Donatists by the Civil sword. But candour requires the Historian to state, that Donatism received its death-blow rather from the charitable persuasions and powerful arguments of Augustin, than from the penal laws of the Imperial Court. The Sect gradually dwindled into insignificance, and as its extension was partial, its duration was not permanent.*

THE ARIANS.

Branches.

SEMI-ARIANS—ACACIANS—EUNOMIANS—EXOCON-TIANI—BULIANI—SPHATHYRIANS.

Arian.

Whether we consider the number, learning, and influence of its adherents, or the speciousness and subtlety of its tenets, the Arian Heresy claims a more distinguished rank than any other in the History of Heterodoxy. It began to disturb and divide the Church soon after the conversion of Constantine, and who, even in the present Age, can assign the period of its suppression?

Account of Arian.

Its author Arius was first a Deacon, and afterwards a Presbyter in the Church of Alexandria, and Libya was the Province of his birth, as it was the birth-place of Sabellius.† He was first known as a partisan of Meletius, an Egyptian Bishop, who had created a schism in the Church but without any corruption of doctrine. His adherence to the Meletian party was of short continuance, for he was reconciled to Peter, the Bishop of Alexandria, and was by that Prelate ordained a Deacon. But his pertinacity in allowing the validity of Meletian Baptism drew on him the censure of Peter, and he was again expelled from the communion of the Catholic Church.‡

Peter, soon after the expulsion of Arius, suffered martyrdom in the Dioclesian Persecution, and was succeeded in the See of Alexandria by Achillas. To the new Bishop, Arius offered such a satisfactory explanation of his conduct, that he was advanced to the rank of a Presbyter. The Episcopate of Achillas was of short duration, and soon after the conversion of Constantine, Alexander was promoted to the important station, contrary, it is alleged, to the expectation of Arius, who aspired to the dignity.§

The erudition, the eloquence, and the morals of Arius have commanded the reluctant acknowledgment of his powerful and implacable adversaries. But Historians have differed as to his motives, whether his Heresy originated in a sincere conviction of the truth of his opinions, or in personal resentment against his Bishop. It is equally undecided, whether the beginning of the controversy should be attributed to Arius or to Alexander. Yet all accounts agree that the temper of Alexander was cool and cautious; and therefore it may be presumed, that unless Arius had given some provocation by the boldness and activity with which he disseminated his peculiar tenets, the Bishop of Alexandria would not have formally and authoritatively condemned them, neither would he have dogmatically promulgated his own opinions on a subject so abstruse as that of the Blessed Trinity.*

In an Assembly of the Presbyters, Alexander maintained, among other things, that the Son was not only of the same eminence and dignity, but of the same essence with the Father.† This assertion was censured by Arius as being an approximation to Sabellianism. He eagerly espoused the opposite extreme, and said, "If the Father begot the Son, the begotten had a beginning of existence; hence it is evident, that there was a time when he was not."‡ Many of the assembled Clergy sided with the Presbyter in opposition to the Bishop; and no sooner were the opinions of Arius divulged than they found in Egypt and the neighbouring Provinces a multitude of converts.

But Alexander, seated in the chair of authority, instituted a solemn and public investigation of the controversy. Having already exhibited himself as a disputant, he now assumed the office of a judge. He convened a Synod at Alexandria, in which the doctrines of Arius were condemned, and the Heretic himself, with nine of his adherents, were expelled from the communion of the Church.§

The sentence of the Alexandrian Synod was received by Arius with an unshaken mind. He retired into Palestine, and from this retreat wrote letters to the most eminent men of his times, in defence of his conduct. So great was his success, that he could reckon among his immediate followers, two Bishops of Egypt, seven Presbyters, and twelve Deacons. A majority of Asiatic Bishops soon declared in his favour, and among these Eusebius of Nicomedia, a man distinguished for his influence.¶ On the other hand, Alexander, in repeated Epistles and public appeals, maintained the justice of the proceedings against his refractory and contumacious Presbyter.¶

The Emperor Constantine at first regarded this controversy as a matter of no Political or Religious importance, and contented himself with an attempt to suppress it, by recommending to both parties mutual concession. He wrote to both Alexander and Arius, and after censuring each, advised a reconciliation. He also employed the mediation of Hosius, Bishop of Corduba, who ineffectually laboured to promote peace between the disputants.

When the Emperor saw that his admonitions and remonstrances were unavailing, and that the commotions too frequently the consequence of Theological disputes were spreading throughout the Empire, he adopted other methods, and the famous Council of Nice

* The principal writers on the Heresy of the Donatists are Optatus, Bishop of Milevi, whose copious History was written against Parmenian, one of their Bishops; Hen. Valeius, Disert. de Schism. Donatistarum; and Long, in a curious Tract, Hist. of the Donatists, 1677.

† A description of the figure and manners of Arius is given by Epiphanius, Heret. 69.

‡ Socrat. lib. i. c. 6.

§ According to the principal Arian Historian, he declined the Episcopal throne. Philostorgius, lib. i. c. 3.

* Socrum, lib. i. c. 15. Socrat. lib. i. c. 5.

† Quicquid est Veritatis, non est alienum deum Verum. Theodoret, lib. i. c. 11.

‡ Socrat. lib. i. c. 5.

§ Socrum, lib. i. c. 15.

¶ The Epistle of Arius to Eusebius of Nicomedia, representing his own opinions and conduct, is preserved by Theodoret, lib. i. c. 3.

 Socrum, lib. i. c. 15.

•• Euseb. Vit. Constant. lib. ii. c. 64—72.

Heretic of the IVth Century.

A. D. 318.

to A. D. 324.

Character of Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria.

Is opposed by Arius.

Arius is condemned in a Synod at Alexandria.

Progress of Arianism.

Conduct of Constantine.

Council of Nice.

A. D. 325.

History. met in obedience to his command. The Bishops assembled from all parts of the Christian world at Nice, in Bithynia, and their number, according to the testimony of Athanasius, who was present, amounted to three hundred and eighteen. They were transported to the place of meeting in public conveyances, at the Emperor's expense, and were maintained at his cost; and to add dignity to the proceedings, Constantine himself was present.*

High, but not more than merited, praise has been bestowed on the temper of Constantine at this Council.† He exhorted the venerable Fathers to peace and unanimity; and a number of mutual accusations having been presented to him, he consigned them to the fire, protesting that he had not read one of them. After this magnanimous action, he gave permission for immediate deliberation. The doctrines of Arius were minutely canvassed, and the disputable propositions contained in his writings were argued with great warmth. Constantine acted as moderator, and endeavoured to bring the parties to some agreement, but his endeavours were vain. After several keen debates, the Orthodox party expressed its collective opinion on the controversy in the following manner. The different passages of Scripture which attest the Divinity of the Son of God having been selected, a conclusion was drawn, that these passages taken together amounted to a proof that the Son was of THE SAME SUBSTANCE with the Father; and the epithet ὁμοούσιος, derived from the Platonic School, was adopted into the Nicene Confession.‡

Eusebius of Nicomedia, the great patron of the Arians, wrote a Letter to the Council in which he censured the notion that the Son was uncreated; and the Arians drew up a written Confession of their Faith. Both these documents were pronounced by the Council to be Heretical. Hosius of Corduba was appointed to draw up a Creed, which in substance is the same as that which at this day is called the Nicene Creed. It soon received the sanction of the Council, and of Constantine himself, who declared that such as refused to comply with its decrees, must prepare themselves for immediate exile.

Arius was deposed, excommunicated, and forbidden from entering Alexandria. The minority who were attached to Arianism, at first refused to subscribe the Nicene Confession, but being persuaded by Constantia, the Emperor's sister, and a patroness of Arius, they at length consented. But by the insertion of a single letter,§ the Arians reserved to themselves their own sense, subscribing that the Son is ὁμοιούσιος, not of the same but of a similar essence with the Father.¶ There were two, however, out of twenty-two Arian Bishops who would not join in this act of duplicity. These were Secundus of Ptolemais, and Theonas of Marmarica, the former of whom bluntly reproved the courtly Eusebius of Nicomedia for his dishonesty. The Arian Prelate did not escape by his compliance; for three months after the dissolution of the Council, he was banished by the Imperial order, for secretly attempting to support the Arian cause.

The See of Alexandria was vacated by the death of Alexander, within a few months after his return from the Nicene Council, and the integrity as well as the abilities of the famous Athanasius, pointed him out as the proper successor. At that time he was not above twenty-eight years of age, and he sat forty-six years in the Episcopal chair of Alexandria. His whole Episcopate was a combat with Arianism, conducted with unremitting zeal, but with unequal success.

Three years had scarcely elapsed since the Council of Nice, before Constantine, prevailed upon by his favourite sister Constantia, discovered some sentiments of indulgence towards the Sect which he had proscribed. It was suggested to him that Arius and his friends were unjustly treated, and Constantia on her death-bed implored that their sentence might be mitigated or reversed. Constantine complied with a request thus solemnly preferred; he recalled Arius from exile, repealed the laws which had been enacted against his followers, and restored Eusebius of Nicomedia to the Episcopal throne from which he had been ignominiously degraded.*

An Epistle from Eusebius to Athanasius, demanded rather than solicited the readmission of Arius into the communion of the Church, and restoration to his former rank. But the Bishop of Alexandria, firm in his purpose, and deaf to the most powerful entreaties, perseveringly refused. The Arians, determined on the ruin of their opponents, procured the deposition and banishment of the three principal leaders of the Catholics, Eustathius of Antioch, Paul of Constantinople, and above all, Athanasius. A Synod was convened at Tyre, by the Emperor's command, not to examine the speculative principles, but the moral crimes of the Bishop of Alexandria. He was accused of rebellion, cruelty, unchastity, and even murder. Notwithstanding the most convincing proofs of his innocence, his enemies prevailed; he sought safety in flight, and by a judicial sentence he was degraded from his Bishopric. In vain did he appeal to Constantine, and solicit a fair trial; his inveterate enemy, Eusebius of Nicomedia, infused the most unfounded calumnies into the mind of the Emperor, and Athanasius was banished to Treves in Gaul.†

Elated with success, Arius returned to Alexandria; but the fidelity of the people to the principles and person of their exiled Bishop was shown by a refusal to receive the Heresiarch into his place among the Presbyters. Constantine commanded him to repair to Constantinople, but its Bishop, Alexander, hesitated to receive him as a sound member of the Catholic Church. Constantine again, previously to his admission, required him to prove his Orthodoxy by subscription to the Nicene Decrees, confirmed by an oath;‡ and Arius readily agreed to the requisition. In the mean time, Alexander, prostrate before the altar, and attended only by Macarius, a Presbyter belonging to Athanasius, Heresies of the IVth Century.

Athanasius Bishop of Alexandria.

Constantine relents in favour of the Arians.

A. D. 328.

Athanasius refuses to restore Arius.

Synod of Tyre.

A. D. 335.

First banishment of Athanasius. Return of Arius.

* No part of the History of the Church has been written with such negligence, or passed over with such rapidity as the Council of Nice—Mosheim. The History of this Council was written by Macarius the Syrian, but his Work is lost. The accounts which the Eastern writers give of this Council have been collected by Remondet, History of the Patriarchs of Alexandria, p. 69.

† Constantine is called the Political, Hosius of Corduba the Ecclesiastical, President of the Nicene Council. Spanheim, Hist. Sac. iv.

‡ Athanasius shows that this epithet is the discriminative mark of the Orthodox Faith, in contradistinction to Arianism, of which the grand tenet is, that the Son is εἰσέροπος τῷ πατρί. Epist. de Nicen. Synod. Decretis.

§ And that letter an Iota.

¶ This duplicity of the Arians is recorded by their own Historian, Philostorgius. See Cave, Life of Athanasius.

* Sozomen, lib. ii. c. 16. 27.

† Cave, Life of Athanasius.

‡ Secret, lib. i. c. 8.

History.

offered the most fervent supplications for guidance from Heaven in this difficult conjuncture. The Imperial mandate was delivered, commanding him to receive Arius into the Church on the next day; and the pious Bishop implored God, that if Arius was right, he himself might not live to see the day of contest, but that if his own Faith were true, Arius might suffer the just punishment of his profaneeness. The next day appeared to be a day of triumph for Arianism. Its chief partisans paraded the streets, with their leader in the midst, but when the procession approached the Forum of Constantine, a sudden terror, with a disorder of the intestines, seized Arius; he retired from the crowd, and expired in a manner which it has been disingenuously insinuated must be attributed either to poison or to a miracle.*

Death of Arius.

A. D. 336.

Death of Constantine.

A. D. 337.

Recall of Athanasius.

A. D. 338.

Synod of Antioch.

A. D. 341.

Athanasius withdraws to Rome.

A. D. 342.

What effect this awful event produced on the mind of Constantine does not appear, for he died shortly after. He was succeeded by his three sons, Constantine, Constantius, and Constans; the first of whom ruled in Spain and Gaul, the second in the East, and the third in Africa. Of the elder son little is known, but that little is laudable. He sent back Athanasius from his place of exile with every mark of respect, and declared that by so doing he only fulfilled the intentions of his father. Thus after a banishment of two years and four months,† the distinguished Bishop returned from Treves to Alexandria, where he was received with general acclamations.

The death of the younger Constantine exposed Athanasius to a second persecution; for Constantius, the Sovereign of the Eastern part of the Empire, provoked at the election of Paul to the See of Constantinople, took the Arian party under his protection.‡ Ninety Bishops of that Sect, instigated by the Nicomedian, Eusebius, and supported by the Emperor, assembled at Antioch, under the specious pretence of dedicating the Cathedral. They composed a Creed verging towards Arianism,§ and erected twenty-five Canons favourable to Orthodoxy. One of these Canons decided, with an appearance of equity, that any Bishop deprived by a Synod, should not resume his Episcopal functions till he had been absolved by the sentence of an equal Synod. The rule was immediately applied to the person against whom it was made; the degradation of Athanasius by a former Council of Tyre was confirmed; a stranger named Gregory was placed on the Episcopal throne of Alexandria; and Philagrius, the Egyptian Præfect, was instructed to support the usurper with the Civil and military powers of the Province.

Oppressed by this conspiracy of the Asiatic Prelates, Athanasius, though he wanted neither courage nor capacity to make a formidable resistance, withdrew from the place of contention to Rome. There he passed a considerable time,|| and assiduously devoted himself to * Athanasius has recorded the death of Arius, but without attempting to stigmatize his memory. His account is confirmed by Sozomen and Socrates. Might not the secondary cause of the death of Arius be ascribed to mental agitation? The spot in which Arius met his death was memorable to posterity, and shown in the times of Socrates, lib. i. c. 8.

† Ere dei sui pium corripit. Theodoret, lib. xi. c. 1. Valerius maintains that the banishment of Athanasius to Treves lasted not quite two years.

‡ Socrat. lib. c. 2. Sozomen, lib. iii. c. 18.

§ There were not less than four formulæ promulgated by this Council. Sozomen, lib. iii. c. 5.

|| There are insuperable chronological difficulties respecting the residence of Athanasius at Rome. They are stated by Valerius, Obvers. Oper. tom. ii. Hist. Eccles. lib. i. c. 1-5.

the study of the Latin Language. He was thus qualified to negotiate with the Western Clergy, and Julius, the Roman Pontiff, was induced to protect and espouse his cause. Fifty Italian Bishops declared the innocence and the Orthodoxy of the persecuted Athanasius. During this his second exile, he was frequently admitted into the Imperial presence, and he exhorted Constans to emulate the glory of his Father by repudiating the errors of his Brother.

Heretics of the 17th Century.

By the joint order of the two Brothers, a Council met at Sardica, in Illyria, a City seated on the borders of their respective dominions. Its object was to promote union, but in effect it placed the two parties at a greater distance from each other than before. The doctrine of the Trinity was treated as a matter of speculation, and each party therefore retired unconvinced and unconciled. Hosius of Corduba, the venerable President of the Council of Nice, presided here also, and the cause of Athanasius and of Orthodoxy was once more triumphant. Constans declared his resolution of supporting Orthodoxy by the arms and treasure of Europe, and signified in a concise and peremptory Epistle to his Brother Constantine, his demand that Athanasius should be re-instated in the See of Alexandria.

Council of Sardica. A. D. 347.

The timely compliance of Constantine averted an appeal to arms, and the Emperor of the East condescended to sue for a reconciliation with the exiled Primate. Athanasius waited till he had received three successive Epistles, full of gracious assurances; and he then quitted Rome, and travelled to Antioch, in which City Constantius was at that time resident. The Emperor observed, that as Athanasius was to be put in possession of all the Egyptian Churches, he ought to leave one at Alexandria for the Arians. The Primate confessed the proposal to be just, on condition that the same indulgence should be granted to his own party at Antioch and the other Cities of the Empire. The Arians, however, sensible of their superior popularity, forbore to press the proposition.*

A triumphal procession graced the return of Athanasius to his own City, in which absence and persecution had endeared him to its inhabitants, and a number of his enemies retracted, and gave an honourable testimony to his Christian virtues. His authority was more firmly established than ever, and his fame was diffused throughout the whole Christian world.

Return of Athanasius to Alexandria. A. D. 349.

Though the tragical death of Constans deprived Athanasius of a powerful friend, yet a Civil war between his assassin and his only surviving Brother secured an interval of repose to the Church. Both the contending aspirants to the vacant Throne courted the friendship of the Alexandrian Primate, but unhappily Athanasius embraced the cause of Magnentius, the murderer of Constans. Constantius, however, was the victor, and on the first winter after his victory he resolved to consummate the ruin of a man, whom he hated or feared more than the vanquished Tyrant of Gaul.†

Death of Constans. A. D. 350.

The customary mode of convening a Synod was adopted by the Emperor, and two successive Councils met at Arles and Milan. They were held in the presence of the Emperor, who proposed to the Assembly at Milan an Arian Creed, which he recommended by the Councils of Arles and Milan. A. D. 353.

* Socrat. lib. ii. c. 18. Sozomen, lib. iii. c. 19. Theodoret, lib. ii. c. 11, 12. Philostorgius, lib. iii. c. 12.

† Theodoret, lib. ii. c. 16. The Emperor declared that he was more desirous to subdue Athanasius, than he had been to vanquish Magnentius or Sylvanus.

History.
A. D.
355.

Second banishment of Athanasius.

Conciliation of Liberius and Hosius.

Death of Constantine.
A. D.
361.
Athanasius returns to his Bishopric.
A. D.
362.

argument, that God had declared in its favour, by the late victory conferred on himself. Several Bishops* had the courage to answer that the Nicene Faith had always been the Faith of the Church, and the People rejected the Creed which Constantius prescribed. But the condemnation of Athanasius was pressed with greater success; remonstrance was silenced by the alternative of obedience or exile; and the majority of the Bishops was compelled or seduced to subscribe an instrument deposing him from his Bishopric.

Again was Athanasius an outcast from Alexandria, and his expulsion was executed with a violence correspondent with its injustice. His place was usurped by the infamous George of Cappadocia; and the excellent Bishop, after exhibiting traits of heroism scarcely ever surpassed, found a retreat in the deserts of Thebais.† To enlarge on his dangerous and romantic adventures would far exceed the limits prescribed to us; but it is fit to mention, that even in his inaccessible retirement he carried on his opposition against the Arians. Adversity could neither change the Principles nor bend the spirit of Athanasius;‡

The persecution of Constantius was not confined to a single Prelate or a single Province; and some of its victims were destitute of the firmness of Athanasius. The resolution of Liberius and Hosius was subdued by the hardships of exile and imprisonment. The former purchased his release by some criminal compliances, for which he afterwards expressed a sincere contrition. The fall of the venerable Hosius is a remarkable instance of human infirmity, which awakens compassion rather than censure. He had suffered confinement for a year, joined with the infliction of corporal torture; he had reached the extraordinary age of 100 years, when both persuasion and violence were employed in extorting his reluctant signature to an Arian Confession of Faith: but neither menace nor entreaty could induce him to subscribe the condemnation of Athanasius.§

The fall of Liberius and Hosius reflected greater lustre on those Bishops whose fidelity remained unshaken, and the persecution of so many virtuous men excited the discontent of all Christians, except those who were blindly devoted to the Arian faction. On the death of Constantius, therefore, the strength and influence of the Arian party were considerably diminished. George of Alexandria, having been murdered by the Pagans of that City, Athanasius, in the following year, ventured to return openly to his Bishopric. The Arians were then obliged to hold their meetings in private houses, and the general voice of the People was in favour of the Athanasian and Nicene doctrine.

* Lucifer, Bishop of Cagliari in Sardinia, and Eusebius, Bishop of Vercelli in Italy. Dionysius, Bishop of Milan, refused to subscribe an Anti-nicene Confession. Hosius of Corduba was detained a year at Sirnium by the Emperor's command. Hilary of Poitiers mentions with indignation the bribes offered to seduce the Members of the Council. He said of Constantius, Nun dormi cordis, sed ventrem palpasti. Hilary, contra Constant. c. 5. Liberius, Bishop of Rome, defended the Nicene doctrine at this Council.

† Hinc jam toto orbe profugus Athanasius nec ullus ei tutus ad latendum supererat locus. Tribuni, Præfetti, Comites, exercitus quoque ad persequendum eum moventur Edictis Imperialibus; præmia delictibus proponuntur ei quia cum evasit, si id minus cepisset Athanasius delinqueret. Rufin. lib. i. c. 16.

‡ Cave, Life of Athanasius.

§ The life of Hosius is contained in the Works of Tillemont, tom. vii.

Not long, however, was the Primate allowed to enjoy security. He had already suffered from the Christian Heresy of Constantius, he was now to suffer from the Pagan infidelity of Julian.* He was obliged, therefore, to leave Alexandria a third time; but he had no sooner heard of the death of Julian, than he suddenly reappeared, equally to the surprise and joy of his flock. A Letter from Jovian confirmed him in his office,† and the new Emperor having declared in favour of the Nicene doctrine, all the Western, with a considerable part of the Eastern Provinces alighted the Arian system.

The scene once more changed during the life of Athanasius, when Valentinian and his brother Valens were raised to the Empire. Valentinian adhered to the decrees of the Nicene Council, and hence the whole Arian Sect, with the exception of a few Churches, was extirpated in the West. Valens, on the other hand, favoured the Arians, and the Nicenians were exposed to many severe trials in the Eastern Provinces. At the solicitation of Eudoxius, Bishop of Constantinople, this Emperor issued a mandate, commanding that all the Bishops who had been deposed in the reign of Constantius should be expelled from their Churches. By virtue of this order, Tatian, the Governor of Alexandria, vainly attempted to drive Athanasius from that city; but the Primate voluntarily withdrew himself a fourth time, and found a place of concealment in the sepulchre of his father.‡ His last banishment was short, for Valens, dreading popular discontent, commanded him to be recalled, and no persuasion of the Arian party could induce the Emperor to offer any further molestation. Athanasius died at Alexandria in honour and peace,§ and with his death the early History of Arianism will properly terminate.

The hostility of the Arians to the Catholic doctrine would have been more dangerous to the Church if the Members of their Sect had not formed divisions among themselves. Not less than eighteen modifications of the Arian Creed are in existence; but the divisions of Arianism itself are reducible to three classes: 1. the genuine or primitive Arians; 2. the Semi-arians; 3. the Acacians, who are known under other appellations.

1. The tenets of pure Arianism, according to the representations of Athanasius, Hilary, Basil, and Epiphanius, together with the Historians Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, are these: Christ is God, but inferior to the Father, in regard to His divinity, substance, properties, and dignity. Christ is a creature, whose existence had a beginning, but He was created out of nothing, before the foundation of the World. Christ, of consequence, is God, by the will of the Father, not by nature, but by adoption, yet made after the express likeness of the Creator: Christ is, therefore, of a different essence from the Father; He is not coeternal with the Father, because He is begotten; He is not coequal nor consubstantial with the Father. The Holy Ghost is not God,

* "I order Athanasius to leave the city on the receipt of my Letter." Jul. Epist. 26. "That such an intriguer should preside over the people is dangerous, one who deserves not the name of a man." Jul. Epist. 51.

† Opera, Athanasii v. l. Bletiere, Life of Jovian.

‡ Theodoret, lib. iv. c. 12. Cave, Life of Athanasius.

§ Gregory of Nazianzen has praised Athanasius in a single sentence more forcibly than he could have done in a long and laboured panegyric, Athenum laudem æquæ leuconia. Op. tom. I.

Heretics of the 14th Century.

Withdraws a third time.

Returns on the death of Julian.

A. D.
363.

Valentinian and Valens.

Athanasius withdraws from Alexandria a fourth time.
A. D.
367.

His death.
A. D.
373.

Arian Sects.

Arian tenets

History. but a creature of the Son, inferior to the Son as well as the Father, but cooperating with both in the work of Creation.

Semi-arian tenets. 2. The Semi-arians, it is said, maintained the Son to be ὁμοειδής, i. e. similar to the Father in essence, not by nature but by a peculiar privilege.

Acacian tenets. 3. There were some who took a middle course, and contented themselves with asserting simply, that the Son is like to the Father, without any specification of properties or substance. The head of this Sect was Acacius, the successor of Eusebius in the See of Caesarea, but Acacius is said to have retracted this opinion, and to have subscribed the Catholic doctrine at the Synod of Antioch.

Eunomians. The Eunomians and Exoentians may be comprehended under the first class. Eunomius was a disciple of Aetius, a Deacon of the Church of Antioch, expelled on account of his Heresy, and whose followers were called Aetians. Exoentian is a synonyme of Arias, because the Arians maintained that Christ was created ἐξ ἀκ' οὐρανό, i. e. before the beginning of things.

Eusebius. Eusebius also, Bishop of Nicomedia, has given his name to a branch of the Arian Sect. The Semi-arians were also called Dulanian, because they affirmed that the Son was ἐκ λου, the servant of the Father; and Theodoret* has Paathyrans noticed them under the denomination of Paathyrans. It is needless to enumerate more of these obscure modifications of the Arian and Semi-arian Heresy.

Nicene doctrine. The fundamental article of the opposite Nicene doctrine is the consubstantiality of the Father and the Son. The Son not only proceeds from the Father, He is not only in the similitude of the Father, but also of the same essence. He is not a creature, for He existed before the foundation of the World. The Holy Ghost is not of the Son only, but of the Father and of the Son together. Athanasius has both asserted the Nicene doctrine, and ably defended it against objections. He has also carefully discriminated it, not only from Arianism, but from Tritheism and Sabellianism.

THE APOLLINARIANS.

Account of Apollinarian. It is erroneous to consider this Sect as a ramification of Arianism, although the Arian Heresy gave rise to it. Its author was Apollinaris the Younger, Bishop of Laodicea, a man of distinguished merit, and whose early life had been signalized by his services to the Christian Religion.† He had combated the infidelity of Porphyry, and attacked the Heresy of Arius; but by indulging too freely in Philosophical distinctions and subtleties, he was led to deny, in some measure, the humanity of Christ. He maintained that the body with which Christ was endowed, or which Christ assumed, had a sensitive, but not a rational soul, and that the Divine Nature performed the functions of Reason, supplying the place of the Intellectual Principle. From this hypothesis it followed that the Divine Nature in Christ was blended with the Human, and suffered with it the pains of crucifixion and death. Other errors have been charged on Apollinaris, but from the accusation of Sabellianism he has been vindicated. His doctrines were received in many of the Eastern Provinces, but as they were capable of different explanations, his followers were subdivided into various ramifications. The Apollinarian Heresy, at least in name, did not maintain its ground long, but sank under the united force of authority and argument. Marcellus, Bishop of Ancyra, may be ranked in the same class with Apollinaris, or, at least, the difference between them is too trivial to be ascertained. Heresies of the IVth Century.

PHOTINIANS.

Photinus was Bishop of Sirmium, a man of learning, and possessed of considerable influence.* His opinions concerning the Deity were equally repugnant to the Catholic and Arian systems. He asserted that Christ was a mere man, that He derived his beginning at His birth; that then a certain emanation, or Divine ray, descended upon Him, styled the Word; that on account of the union of the Divine Word with His human Nature, Jesus was called the Son of God, or God himself; and that the Holy Ghost was not a distinct person, but a celestial virtue proceeding from the Divinity. The opinions of Photinus were condemned by the Councils of Antioch and Milan, and in consequence he was degraded from his Episcopal dignity, and died in exile. His tenets.

THE MACEDONIANS.

Macedonius was Bishop of Constantinople, and a celebrated Semi-arian teacher, but through the influence of the Eunomians, he was sent into exile, in which he formed the Sect of the Macedonians, or Pneumatomachians. He considered the Holy Ghost as a Divine energy diffused throughout the Universe, and not as a person distinct from the Father and the Son.† The opinions of Macedonius were condemned in a General Council at Constantinople, which completed that which the Council of Nice had left imperfect, and fixed in a full and determinate manner the doctrine of Three Persons in one God. Account of Macedonius.

THE PRISCILLIANISTS.

This Sect, which seems to have combined in one all the most pernicious Heresies of former times, first appeared in the reign of Gratian, and the Country in which it chiefly flourished was Spain. It had been transported thither by a person named Marc of Memphis in Egypt, but his converts were not numerous. In process of time they increased, and comprehended many persons of distinguished learning. Of these, Priscilian, a laic, a man endowed with great eloquence and erudition, was at the head, and ultimately gave his name to the whole Sect.‡ He was afterwards Bishop of Abila, but was accused by several Bishops of Spain of the most dangerous opinions. Idacius and Ithucius, the one an aged Presbyter, the other Bishop of Sessuba, in consequence of a sentence pronounced against Priscilian and some of his followers, at a Synod convened at Saragossa, obtained from the Emperor Gratian a rescript of banishment against the Priscillianists and their Chief. They were restored to their Country, however, some time after by an edict of the same Prince, though their tenets were too corrupt to procure them favour and popularity. Origin of the Priscillianists.

On the death of Gratian, Maximus, who had procured the assassination of that Emperor, and had usurped the Government of Gaul, was courted both by

* Theodoret, Heret. Fab. lib. iv. c. 4.

† Socrat. lib. xi. c. 46. Epiphani. Heret. 76.

• Socrat. lib. xi. c. 18. Epiphani. Heret. 71. Sozomen. lib. iv. c. 6.

† Epiphani. Heret. 74. Augustin. de Heret. c. 52.

‡ Sulp. Sever. Hist. lib. ii. c. 49.

History. the Priscillianists and their enemies. The usurper entered the City of Treves, where Ithacius earnestly solicited him to suppress the odious Heresy while the Heresiarch himself boldly appealed to his judgment and his feelings. Maximus willingly accepted the office of deciding the controversy.

The conduct of Ithacius was not approved by many of those who condemned the erroneous tenets of Priscillian. Martin, Bishop of Tours, strongly reprehended Ithacius for bringing the Priscillian Heretics as criminals before a Civil Tribunal, and earnestly implored Maximus not to imbrue his hands in the blood of these unhappy men. Martin persevered with such pious zeal in opposing the tenets of Priscillian, that his supplications for mercy towards the Heretics, had the effect which they deserved. The usurper promised that he would not take their lives.

It is to be lamented that a resolution founded on wisdom and humanity was not maintained. Two Bishops, Magnus and Rufus, prevailed on Maximus to summon Priscillian and some of his followers before a Court in which Euodius, the Prefect of Treves, presided. They were found guilty, but were remanded by Euodius to prison, and their final sentence was referred to Maximus. In the issue, Priscillian, with four other leaders of his Sect, were put to death, and some others, who escaped extreme punishment, were banished.*

The agents who procured the infliction of so sanguinary a punishment were regarded with the utmost abhorrence, and the Heresy of Priscillian was rather promoted than extinguished by it. Priscillian himself was honoured as a martyr, and Martin of Tours, though strongly opposed to his doctrines, testified equal abhorrence of the party of Ithacius who had procured his condemnation.

Their tenets. A fair statement of the Priscillian doctrines has not been given by Sulpitius Severus, who has minutely related the History of this Heresy. It appears, however, that the difference between the Priscillianists and the Manicheans was inconsiderable. The former denied the reality of Christ's birth and incarnation, maintained that the visible Universe was the production of some Evil Principle, and considered human bodies as prisons formed by the author of Evil to enslave celestial minds. Their rule of life was severe, and the accusations against them of lasciviousness and intemperance are destitute of evidence and authority. The charge of dissimulation has however some foundation, though exaggerated into an open vindication of a correspondent practice of perjury and falsehood.*

Heresies of the IVth Century.

OF THE INFERIOR SECTS OF THE IVth CENTURY.

ARDÆANS—MESSALIANS, OR EUCHITES—ANTIDICOMARIANITES—COLLYRIDIANIS.

A few minor Sects deserve to be enumerated, but a detail of their History or their doctrines is unnecessary. The ARDÆANS, so named from their founder Ardeus, were remarkable for celebrating Easter according to the practice of the Jews in contradiction to the Council of Nice,† and they are said to have attributed a human form to the Deity. The MESSALIANS, or EUCHITES, were a sort of Mystics, and derived their second name from their continual habit of prayer,‡ by which they imagined the Evil Demon, who dwelt in the Human Mind, was expelled, so that the pure Mind, returning to God, might be united to his Divine Essence. The ANTIDICOMARIANITES and the COLLYRIDIANIS maintained opposite doctrines concerning the Virgin Mary. The former asserted that the Virgin did not preserve her immaculate state after the birth of Christ; the latter worshipped her as a Goddess by libations and sacrifices. They derived their name from the oblations of cakes (collyridæ) which they made to the object of their adoration.§ and they enrolled numerous women among their adherents.

Ardeans.

Messalians or Euchites

Antidicomarianites and Collyridians.

* Modern authors who have written concerning the Priscillianists are Beausobre, in his History of the Manicheans; Simon de Vries, Dissert. de Priscillianistis; Girvelli Histor. Priscillianist. Chronologia.

† Epiphanius. Harres. 70.

‡ Ibid. 80.

§ Ibid. 78, 79.

* Sulp. Sever. Hist. Dial. 3. de Vitâ Martinij c. 15.

DONATISTS.
ARIANS.
APOLLINARIANS.
PHOTINIANS.
MACEDONIANS.
PRISCILLIANISTS.
ARDÆANS.
MESSALIANS, OR EUCHITES.
ANTIDICOMARIANITES.
COLLYRIDIANIS.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LV.

OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, FROM THE DEATH OF THEODOSIUS TO THE REIGN OF PHOCAS.

FROM A. D. 395 TO A. D. 610.

History. After the death of Theodosius, the Roman Empire, as we have before seen, was divided into two distinct sovereignties, of which the one comprehended the Eastern, the other the Western Provinces. Honorius, who governed the Western Empire, fixed the seat of his Government at Ravenna, while his brother Arcadius reigned at Constantinople.

From A. D. 395. to A. D. 610. Honorius, whose virtues would have graced a private station, consigned the reins of Government to his Ministers, who followed the policy of Theodosius in protecting the Church, in extirpating the remains of Idolatry, and in supporting Orthodoxy against the Donatists and all other Heretics. The benign influence of Christianity, even when it had declined from its primitive purity, was visible in a number of Imperial Edicts, abolishing the impure and savage rites of Paganism, and providing for the destitute and the miserable. One of these humane laws has been particularly eulogized, which directed the Judges to examine into the state of Prisons on every Lord's day, and to inquire into the wants of the criminals confined within them.*

A. D. 395.

Roman Empire divided.

A. D. 409.

The Christian Religion accused as the cause of the fall of the Roman Empire.

But the weakness of Honorius gave advantage to the Barbarians of the North, and the Goths, under the command of Alaric, laid waste the fairest Provinces of Italy, and carried their devastations to Rome itself. The plunder of the Imperial City, and the consequent miseries inflicted on the Empire, gave an occasion for calumniating Christianity. The Pagans accused the new Religion as the cause of the declension of the Empire; and this argument, which has been used speciously, though not successfully, in the present times, was originally employed with no little force. So weighty did it then appear, so eagerly was it received, that it called forth the indefatigable pen of Augustin, and occasioned his celebrated Treatise De Civitate Dei.

The Barbarian conquerors of the Western Empire pretended to acknowledge the supremacy of the Emperors who resided at Constantinople, but that supremacy was the mere shadow of power. In the Countries which they conquered, the invaders ruled with despotic authority, and particularly in Gaul, where the Franks established a Monarchy on the ruins of the Roman Empire. This warlike nation first passed the Rhine under the conduct of Pharamond, and his successors advanced gradually in their conquests, until Clovis completed them, and became the founder of the French Monarchy. That Prince, whose signal bravery was stained by cruelty, perfidy, and ambition, is said to have been converted to the Christian Faith partly through the influence of his Queen Clotilda, partly in consequence of a decisive triumph gained by him over the Alemanni, at a village called Tolbiacum. Finding himself in the greatest extremity, and his whole army in danger of destruction, he solemnly engaged himself by a vow, to worship Christ as his God if victory decided in his favour. The Alemanni were defeated, and Clovis, faithful to his vow, after having been instructed by Remigius, Bishop of Rheims, in the doctrines of the Gospel, received Baptism in that city. The conversion of Clovis forms an era in the History of the Franks, and was accompanied by an unusual number of not altogether veracious prodigies.*

The German nations, by whom the Western Empire was dismembered, in process of time were converted to Christianity, but at different periods. Some of them had embraced it before their incursion, others after having established their independent Kingdoms. The Goths, the Vandals, the Sueves, the Huns, and the Alemanni, all yielded to the established Religion of the Roman Empire.

Christianity in the Vth century extended itself even into the British Isles. Palladius, who had been ordained Bishop of Scotland, was sent by Celestine, the Roman Pontiff, into Ireland, to propagate the Christian Religion among its rude inhabitants.† Death soon terminated his labours, but Celestine found a successor, likewise of Scottish birth, whose name Ireland has gratefully acknowledged. Patric was born near Dunbarton. His first visit to Ireland was as a captive, his second as a missionary. His early labours among the Irish were so unsuccessful, that he returned to Gaul in disappointment, though not in despair. From Gaul he proceeded to Rome, where the authority and advice of Celestine confirmed his wavering resolution. Revisiting the Country which he quitted without hope, he renewed his missionary labours, and so complete was his success, that he is still regarded as the Apostle of the Irish nation. The number and importance of his pious

Of the Christian Church, &c.

From A. D. 395. to A. D. 610.

Of the German nations.

Of the Irish. A. D. 432.

A. D. 420.
Conversion of the Franks.

* Milner, History of the Church of Christ, vol. ii. ch. xi.

* They are related by Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franco. lib. xii. c. 30, 31.

† Archbishop Usher, in his Antiquities of the British Church, contends that Palladius was not the first Bishop of the Irish Church.

History. exploits, are undoubted proofs of his courage, of his perseverance, and of his dexterity. He is said to have taught the Irish the use of Letters, and after having brought over great numbers from barbarism and superstition to civilization and Christianity, he fixed a Metropolitan See at Armagh, which has ever since continued to be the seat of the Irish Primacy.*

The History of the Western Church during the Vth century is distinguished both by the extension and the persecution of the Christian Religion; but the History of the Eastern Church is remarkable for its persecutions only. During the reign of Theodosius the Younger, the son and successor of Arcadius, a grievous Persecution of the Christians took place in Persia. The calamity was occasioned by the indiscreet zeal of a Christian Bishop named Audas, who destroyed one of the native Temples.†

Isdegerdes, the Persian Monarch, on the complaint of the Magi, commanded Audas to repair the injury by rebuilding the edifice which he had wantonly demolished. Audas refused compliance with this reasonable command, and Isdegerdes, on a principle of retaliatory justice, ordered all the Christian Churches within his dominions to be razed. Thus the misconduct of one Christian Bishop laid the foundation of a Persecution against Christianity, which continued with little intermission during a period of thirty years. Isdegerdes began it, and his son and successor Varanes, inflamed by the Magi, pursued it with unrelenting cruelty.

The afflicted Christians implored the aid of Theodosius, and their entreaties were seconded by the humane interference of Atticus, Bishop of Constantinople. A war ensued, in which Theodosius had a decisive superiority, as far as the honour of Christianity is concerned. An action of Acacius, Bishop of Amida, in the course of this war, fully compensated the rash conduct of Audas. The Romans had taken seven thousand prisoners, whom they refused to release, though the wretched captives were perishing by famine. Acacius, touched with their distress, assembled his Clergy, and persuaded them to sell the consecrated vessels for the redemption of their captive enemies. The prisoners were ransomed, and the Persian King returned his grateful acknowledgments to the Christian Bishop.‡

The reign of Theodosius was of uncommon length, though he died at the age of forty-nine. The feebleness of his Government was strengthened by the wisdom of his sister Pulcheria, who maintained an ascendancy over the Emperor during his life, and at his death remained sole mistress of the Eastern Empire. For political reasons she gave herself in marriage to Marcian, whom she made Emperor, and who, like herself, was an example of Christian piety. The preservation of Orthodoxy, the encouragement of good morals, and the suppression of Idolatry, were the objects of his government.

During the Vth century, the external condition of the Eastern Church was on the whole prosperous; and in the century which succeeded, the zeal of the Bishops of Constantinople, seconded by the protection and influence of the Emperors, contributed greatly to the extension of Christianity. The Greek Historians have preserved the names of several obscure Tribes living on the borders of the Euxine Sea, which were brought at least to a nominal profession of their Faith in Christ. Under the reign of Justinian, the Heruli, and the Eruli who dwelt beyond the Danube, the Alani, the Lazi, and Zani, with other Barbarous nations, are said to have renounced the rites of Paganism, and to have submitted to Christian Baptism.* The people of Ethiopia and Arabia, whose names are more celebrated, but whose Geographical boundaries are undefined, were invited, by a solemn embassy from the Emperor Justin, to form a Political as well as a Religious union.†

In the Western Church, the conversion of Pagan nations was carried on with similar success. Remigius, Bishop of Rheims, was so distinguished by his zeal, that he has obtained the appellation of The Apostle of the Gauls. But the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, attempted by Augustin, merits a larger and more distinct account than is consistent with the present general view, and it will be inserted with more propriety in a Disquisition on the Anglo-Saxon Monarchy and Church.

In making a transition from the external to the internal History, the attention is called in the first place to the state of Literature. In almost all the great cities of the divided Empire, schools were erected, and schools are truly said to be the seminaries of the Church; Rome and Constantinople each boasted of institutions worthy of the two first Cities of the civilized world. But the incursion of the Barbarous nations, though it did not destroy, yet it materially injured, these excellent establishments. Wherever these hordes extended their conquests, ignorance and superstition followed their steps, so that towards the conclusion of the Vth century the Sciences were almost extinguished, and that system, which was generally called the Seven Liberal Arts,§ was calculated to perplex the memory rather than to improve the judgment. To the Monastic establishments alone we are indebted for the preservation of all the ancient authors, either sacred or profane, which escaped the savage fury of Gothic ignorance. The fate of Learning was less deplorable among the Greeks and Orientals than in the Provinces of the West; and in the Schools of Alexandria, Constantinople, and Edessa, Poetry, Philosophy, and the other Liberal Arts, occupied a place in the education of youth. Platonism was adopted by many of the Christian Doctors, and this circumstance diminished the credit of the Pagan Schools.

The doctrine of the Church during these two centuries must be collected from its established Formularies, from its Acts and Canons promulgated in its Councils, and from the writings of its Orthodox Fathers. Many points of Religion were more clearly explained, and many of its doctrines stated with greater accuracy, than they had been in the preceding Ages. Controversies were multiplied, and controversy brings with it this advantage, that disputants find it necessary to state their tenets with precision. The sum of Christian doctrine was the same in these Ages with that which is now professed in the purest of the Reformed Churches, the Church of England. The authority of the Holy Writings of Scriptures, as a sufficient rule in matters of controversy, Augustin in defence of the Scriptures set forth by Augustin, in his Treatises against the

Of the Christian Church, &c.

From A. D. 365. to A. D. 610.

State of learning.

Doctrine of the Church.

Writings of Scriptures, as a sufficient rule in matters of controversy, Augustin in defence of the Scriptures set forth by Augustin, in his Treatises against the

* Acta Sanctorum, tom. ii. lib. Wilkins, Conc. tom. i.

† The Pyrenea, a Temple dedicated to Iser. Theodoret, Ecc. lib. vi. c. 22. Bayle, Ibid. vol. i. Art. Abbas.

‡ Sacrat. Ecc. Hist. lib. vii. c. 22.

VOL. XI.

• Procopius, de Bello Gothico, lib. iv. c. 3.

† Procopius, de Bello Persico, lib. i. c. 20.

‡ Spanheim, Ecc. Hist. sec. v.

§ These seven liberal Arts were Grammar, Rhetoric, Logic, Arithmetic, Music, Geometry, and Astronomy.

History.

From
A. D.
365. to
A. D.
610.

Multiplication of spurious writings.

Arians, Pelagians, and Donatists.* Though in his enumeration of the Canonical Scriptures, he inserted those Books which are by Protestants styled Apocryphal, yet he did not assign to them an equal value or authority with the Inspired Writings.† Tradition he did not entirely reject, but he laid down sound criteria, by which Apostolical tradition might be distinguished from that which was novel and corrupt.‡

To the corruption of the Holy Scriptures and the multiplication of spurious writings in this Age, may be traced the departure from sound doctrine and Christian purity which fearfully increased. A rule borrowed from the Roman Law, which referred all matters of a doubtful nature to the decision of the aged lawyers, was adopted by Christian Councils. According to this procedure, Reason and Common Sense were excluded from the determination of every question, and that was approved and admitted as Truth which appeared such to the greatest number, or had been sanctioned by a majority of suffrages in preceding times. This absurd imitation of the Roman Law in matters of Religious controversy, was a fruitful source of spurious productions. Many audacious impostors were hence encouraged to publish their own pernicious writings under the names of the Apostles, and even of Christ himself, in order that they might have authorities to oppose to authorities in defence of their respective opinions. Such was the extent of this practice, that it is said to have engaged Gelasius, the Roman Pontiff, to convoke a Council composed of seventy Bishops of the Latin Church, in which Assembly a decree passed depriving a multitude of those apocryphal books of their pretended authority. The decree, attributed to Gelasius, labours under the same stigma with the books which it condemns; since learned men have not scrupled to assert that it was not a real enactment of the Pontiff, but of some impostor usurping his name.§

Decree of Gelasius.
A. D.
494.

Corruption of Christianity.

When the purity of the Sacred Oracles had once been polluted by the admixture of spurious and Heretical writings, the corruption of Christian doctrine advanced with a rapid pace. Abuses were multiplied, and in the place of practical piety was substituted a furious zeal for superstitious rites. The sum of Christian morality was made to consist in the worship of Images and Saints, and the adoration of Relics. Even those who enforced the duties of Christianity by exhibiting examples of piety and virtue in the lives of the Saints, executed their task in a manner calculated to mislead rather than to instruct. The models proposed for imitation were ignorant fanatics, who offered violence to Reason and Nature, and disgraced the Religion which their lives professed to follow and to recommend.

Controversy concerning the system of Origen.

Of the Heresies which arose at this time a separate account will be given, but under the present head of Christian doctrine, the controversy concerning the system of Origen will most properly find a place. Though the errors of that great man had been condemned by repeated Synods and Councils, yet they were regarded by many, and especially by the Monks, with the highest veneration. In the West, Bellarm translated the Works of Origen into the Latin Language; in the East, Theodore, of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, defended Origenism with more than common vehemence. The question was at length brought before Justinian, who in a verbose edict, addressed to Minnas, Patriarch of Constantinople, passed a severe condemnation on the doctrines of Origen, and commanded their suppression.*

But the effects of this edict were rendered nugatory by a controversy which shortly arose. The Emperor Justinian had a stronger animosity against a branch of the Monophysites, called Acephali, than against the disciples of Origen, and, strange to say, consulted about the means of accomplishing his design with Theodore, who was both a Monophysite and an Origenist. The artful Prelate considered this a favourable opportunity for indirectly promoting the opinions of Origen, without injuring the cause of the Acephali. He persuaded the Emperor that the latter would gladly return to the bosom of the Church on the following reasonable conditions: that the decision of the Council of Chalcedon, in which Theodore of Mopsustia, Theodoret of Cyrus, and Ibas of Edessa, had been pronounced Orthodox, should be expunged; and that the writings of those three Prelates, known by the appellation of the Three Chapters,† should be condemned and prohibited. As the writings now specified had a manifest tendency towards the errors of the Nestorians, the Emperor willingly listened to this advice, and issued an edict condemning the Chapters, yet without prejudice to the authority of the Council of Chalcedon. This edict was strongly opposed both by the African and the Western Bishops, and, above all, by Vigilius, the Roman Pontiff. But Vigilius, being summoned by Justinian to Constantinople, at last yielded, and joined in a condemnation of the Three Chapters. The Bishops of Africa and Illyricum resented this conduct, and obliged the vacillating Pontiff to retract a second time, and the retraction of Vigilius instigated Justinian to summon at Constantinople the Vth Ecumenical or General Council.

Of the Christian Church, &c.

From
A. D.
365. to
A. D.
610.

The Three Chapters.

Fifth General Council.

A. D.
553.
Condemnation of the Three Chapters.

The decisions of this Assembly were favourable to the wishes of the Emperor, for the Three Chapters were declared to be Heretical and impious. The decree was enacted chiefly by the Bishops of the East, but among the few Western Bishops, Vigilius was present, refused his assent, and, for his contumacy, was condemned to exile. He was not permitted to return till he had declared his approbation of the decree of the Council; and changing his side (for to call it his opinion would be absurd) a fourth time, he pronounced the Three Chapters to be execrable blasphemies. His successors in the Pontifical chair steadily maintained the last profession of assent to the decree of the Vth General Council, which Vigilius had been compelled to express. But the Western Bishops, unawed by the authority of the Roman Pontiffs, or the Emperors, persisted in their dissent from the Council of Constantinople.

Having taken this summary view of the doctrine, we proceed to consider the discipline of the Church, and during the period under consideration many important changes took place in its polity. The power of the superior Order of Bishops gradually increased, and the office and dignity of Patriarch was first acknowledged.

Polity of the Church

* Augustin, de Unitate Ecclesie, c. 3. l. 16.

† Augustin, de Doctr. Christ. lib. xi. c. 8.

‡ De Doctr. Christ. lib. xi. c. 10. Chrysostom, Cyril, Theodoret, and other Greek Writers, make a distinction between the và apocrypha, or the àv àpòφa, and the và pteripara, or the εξαρφα.

§ Pearson, Fundic. Inq. part i. c. 4.

* Harduin, Concilio, tom. iii. p. 243.

† For a copious and authentic account of the Three Chapters, the reader is referred to Harduin, Concil. tom. iii. p. 283—287. Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. c. 38. Barnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, liv. x. c. 6. Dupin, Biblioth. tom. v.

History. In the preceding century, the Council of Constantinople, in consideration of the privileges of the Imperial City, had conferred on its Bishops a preeminence among the rulers of the Christian Church, yet, at first, five Sees were acknowledged by the Eastern Christians to be Patriarchal. These were Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem.* In this century, the Bishops of Constantinople extended their views of supremacy, for, by a Canon of a Council holden at Chalcedon, it was resolved that the same rights and honours which had been conferred on the Bishops of Rome were due to the Bishops of Constantinople, because the two cities were alike Imperial. The same Council confirmed to the Bishop of Constantinople the government of the Provinces of Asia, Thrace, and Pontus.

Increasing power of the Bishops of Rome. Leo the Great, a vigorous assertor of the rights of the Roman See, opposed with vehemence these decrees, and was seconded in his opposition by several other Prelates. He was supported, though not by cooperation or concert, by the Bishops of those cities to which the Patriarchal dignity was annexed. Juvenal, Bishop of Jerusalem, or rather of Ælia, attempted to withdraw himself and his Church from the jurisdiction of the Bishops of Casarea, and aspired at a rank in Christendom, which the Mother of the Jewish Church demanded. Encouraged by the protection of Theodosius the Younger, this ambitious Prelate not only assumed the dignity of Patriarch of all Palestine, but invaded the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Antioch.

None of the Patriarchs gained so much by these contentions as did the Bishop of Rome. A variety of circumstances contributed to the augmentation of his power. The Bishops of Alexandria and Antioch frequently applied to the Roman Pontiff for succour against the aggressions of the Patriarch of Constantinople, and the inferior Bishops appealed in the same manner when oppressed by their superiors of Alexandria and Antioch. By accepting this mediation, and by protecting the appellants alternately, the Bishops of Rome imperceptibly established the Supremacy of the Roman See.

Content between the Bishops of Rome and of Constantinople. Between the Bishops of Rome and of Constantinople, who divided the spiritual Empire of Christendom, the contest for superiority was long, and the issue doubtful. The Bishop of Constantinople not only claimed an undisputed sovereignty over all the Bishops of the East, but maintained that his Church was in no way inferior to that of Rome. The Roman Pontiffs, on the other hand, strenuously resisted this pretension, and asserted their preeminence over the Church of Constantinople. Both the contending parties relied on the prerogatives of ancient and modern Rome; the spiritual Governor of the latter could not bear a superior, and the former would not tolerate an equal.

After many years of dissembled friendship, or of remitted hostility, the enmity of these two aspirants to spiritual dominion was brought to an open rupture. John, Bishop of Constantinople, surnamed the Faster, on account of his extraordinary abstinence and austerity, assembled, by his own authority, a Council in the Imperial city of the East, to inquire into an accusation preferred against Gregory, the Patriarch of Antioch. On that occasion, he assumed the title of Ecumenical, or Universal Bishop. Pelagius II., who at that time filled the See of Rome, sent forth a strong protest against the unwarrantable assumption, and his successor, Gregory the Great, resisted it with greater vehemence, though not with greater success. This celebrated Pontiff addressed Letters to the Emperor, and to such other persons as he judged likely to cooperate in his opposition; but his efforts were ineffectual, and the Constantinopolitan Patriarchs persisted in styling themselves Ecumenical.*

Gregory adhered to his purpose with a tenacity suitable to his character, and succeeded so far as to create a considerable party among the Clergy, who favoured his cause. In the West he gained a decisive triumph, but in the East, his arrogance and ambition were met by scorn, except by those who were at enmity with the Bishop of Constantinople. But in the plenitude of his indignation, he unwarily uttered sentiments which have been carefully recorded, and quoted against his successors in the Papal Chair, in their aim at universal spiritual sovereignty. "I speak it confidently," he says, "that whosoever calls himself Universal Priest, or desires to be so called, in the pride of his heart, he foreruns Antichrist."†

The disputes about preeminence between the two Patriarchs proceeded to such an extremity, that it laid the foundation of the Schism between the Greek and Latin Churches. It is generally agreed that the Tyrant Phocas, who ascended the Imperial Throne by the murder of the Emperor Mauritius, deprived the Bishop of Constantinople of his ancient title of Ecumenical, and bestowed it exclusively on Boniface III., the Roman Pontiff. The fact has been adopted by Ecclesiastical Historians, on the authority of Baronius alone, and has therefore been questioned by many modern writers. But it has been received without hesitation by most of the Protestant commentators on the Apocalypse, for the purpose of establishing a synchronism between the rise of the Papal and Mohammedan power.

Of the Christian Church, &c.

From A. D. 365. to A. D. 610.

A. D. 577.

A. D. 590. to A. D. 610.

Grant of the Emperor Phocas to Boniface III.

* Greg. Epist. lib. iv. c. 5. 7. Temp. Helvet. tom. iv.

† Egyp. Admonit. deo quod quisquis se Universalium Sacerdotem vocat, vel vocari desiderat, in schisma et Antichristum præcurrit. lib. vi. Epist. 30. See Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy Suppos. v. p. 123. Ed. 1693.

* The Oriental Historians mention a sixth, viz. the Bishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon. Mich. Le Quin, Orient Christianus, tom. ii. p. 110.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LVI.

OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS OF THE Vth AND Vith CENTURIES.

V. CENT.—CHRYSOSTOM.

AUGUSTIN.
JEROM.
CYRIL.
ISIDORE.
THEODORET.
SOCRATES.
SOZOMEN.
CASSIAN.
LEO I. THE GREAT.
HILARY.
PROSPER.
PRIMASIVS.
BASIL OF SELEUCIA.
THEODOTIS OF ANCYRA.
GELASIVS.
THEODONE OF MOPSUESTA.
PALLADIUS.

VI. CENT.—PROCOPIUS.

MAXENTIVS.
THEODORE OF BYZANTIUM.
JOHN OF CONSTANTINOPLE.
EULOGIVS.
LEONTIVS.
ANASTASIVS.
GREGORY I. THE GREAT.
GREGORY OF TOURS.
CESARIUS.
FULGENTIUS.
EUNODIVS.
BOETHIVS.
CASSIODORIS.

History.

Following the plan already adopted, of briefly noticing the Works of inconsiderable writers, and of giving Biographical notices only of the most eminent, the catalogue will begin with that ornament of the Greek Church

CHRYSOSTOM.*

A. D. 354—407.

Birth of Chrysostom

At Antioch, that city in which "the disciples were first called Christians," was this eloquent expositor of Christian doctrine born. His parents were persons of no mean rank, but having lost his father soon after his birth, the superintendence of his education devolved solely on his mother. Through her, he was instructed in the rudiments of Christianity, but having a natural inclination to the study of Oratory, he was placed under the tuition of that great master of the Art, Libanius of Antioch. Even at this period he gave indications of his peculiar talent, and of his future greatness; for Libanius being asked which of his disciples would be capable of succeeding him in his School, replied, "John, if the Christians had not stolen him from us."

His education.

Having pleaded in the Forum for a short time, he relinquished his secular pursuits, and devoted himself with undistracted assiduity to the study of the Holy Scriptures. Under the care of Diodorus, afterwards Bishop of Tarsus, he was taught to investigate the literal sense of the Sacred Writings, in opposition to the fanciful interpretations of the School of Origen. Notwithstanding the entreaties of his excellent mother, he lived for a long time in Monastic seclusion, but was at length promoted to the office of a Presbyter by Flavian, Bishop of Antioch. In a rebellion which broke out at Antioch, under the reign of the younger Theodosius, Chrysostom conspicuously showed his prudence and his piety. The populace had contemptuously thrown down the statues of Theodosius and his consort Flaccilla, but their audacity soon gave place to fear, and they deprecated in the most submissive manner the Imperial resentment. Flavian the Bishop, though oppressed by age and infirmities, undertook a journey to Constantinople, to plead with Theodosius in behalf of the deluded people, and Libanius the Sophist followed his example. Chrysostom continuing at Antioch, endeavoured to turn these temporal calamities to the spiritual edification of the people. From a consideration of the severe proceedings of the Imperial Tribunal, and the fruitless intercessions of relatives in behalf of their husbands and fathers, he took occasion to inculcate the awful solemnity of the great Day of Judgment, when no solicitation can arrest the arm of Divine Justice.

It was not until he had attained the middle age of life, and till his long tried abilities fully justified the promotion, that Chrysostom was appointed Bishop of Constantinople. The appointment was made by the Emperor Arcadius, in consequence of the recommendation of Eutropius, Chamberlain of the Imperial household. The newly elected Prelate immediately

Ecclesiastical Writers of the Vth and Vith Centuries.
He is considered a Presbyter of Antioch.

Appointed Bishop of Constantinople.

A. D.
357.

* This biographical account of Chrysostom is extracted chiefly from Cave's Life of that Father.

History. applied himself to the reformation of his Diocese. A visible improvement of manners, in a city which had long suffered by Religious contention, and in which relaxation of discipline was followed by corruption of morals, was the result of his labours. Those who had thronged the Public Shows, were attracted by the eloquence of Chrysostom to the Church. So great were the crowds, that the Preacher was obliged to abandon his usual station, on the steps of the altar, and to place himself in the middle of the Church, in the Reader's desk, in order that he might be more generally heard.

His dislike to the Novatians. "The common people heard him gladly," and Heretics were reclaimed by his preaching, but the Clergy, indolent and corrupt, felt reproved by his zeal, and the wealthy, offended at the plainness of his remonstrances against their vices, were not less incensed than the Clergy. Chrysostom, however, persevered, nor did he confine his labours to the Imperial City. He visited the neighbouring Provinces of Thrace, Asia, and Pontus, and prevailed on the Clergy under his authority to do the same, thus attempting to spread the Gospel among Barbarous nations.

It was on a point of discipline which Chrysostom endeavoured to restore in its primitive strictness, that his enemies were enabled to attack him with most prospect of success. During the negligent administration of his predecessor Nectarius, the Lord's Supper was indiscriminately administered even to the most profligate and profane, no other rules for their admission being prescribed than such as they voluntarily imposed on themselves. In times of greater purity, and more wholesome discipline, a Presbyter had been appointed whose special office it was to receive the confession of penitents, and by his authority they were admitted to the Holy Table. It was not in the power of Chrysostom to revive this office, but he supplied the defect by his exhortations. He energetically inculcated on his hearers the duty of repentance, and then recommended their attendance on the Lord's Supper. His expressions were wrested from their true meaning by two classes of men of opposite characters: the Novatians, who still maintained their favourite point of rejecting from the communion all whom they termed lapsed; and the dissolute, who accused him of giving a license to sin. Chrysostom incurred the censure of both; he was publicly accused by some profligate Bishops, and Sisinnius, a Novatian Prelate in Constantinople, attacked him in a Treatise with uncommon severity.

Is attacked by Sisinnius a Novatian Bishop. Various circumstances concurred to strengthen these accusations, and to occasion the temporal ruin of the Bishop of Constantinople. A Synod convened under the management of Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, a man who disgraced the Episcopal Order, but who was supported by the Empress Eudoxia, passed a sentence of condemnation on Chrysostom. Seeing the probable effect of the storm which was gathering around him, the injured Prelate called together a few Bishops who still adhered to him, and delivered to them an impressive address. He earnestly exhorted them not to desert their charge, on account of the danger which threatened himself. "I am ready," he said, "to be offered up like St. Paul, and the time of my departure is at hand. I am prepared to quit this troublesome life, but by your constancy, you will find mercy at the hand of God. Only remember me in your prayers." The Assembly being touched sensibly by this address, he besought his brethren to moderate their grief, and reminded them of the lessons which he had constantly inculcated in his Homilies. When Eulysius, Bishop of Apamia, suggested that if they kept their Churches, they should be compelled to communicate with Heretics. "Communicate you may," returned Chrysostom, "that you make not a schism in the Church, but subscribe not the decrees, for I am conscious that I have not deserved deposition."

Not satisfied with this solemn declaration of his innocence, Chrysostom refused to acknowledge the authority of the Tribunal which sat in judgment on him; but his enemies deposed him for contumacy, and in order to support their views, accused him before the Emperor Arcadius of Treason. The people of Constantinople, however, who entertained a high veneration for their Bishop, insisted that the cause should be heard before more impartial judges; and so strong was the popular feeling in his favour, that Chrysostom, fearing an insurrection, delivered himself up secretly to the officer who came to execute the Imperial warrant against him. He was conveyed immediately to a port in the Black Sea.

No sooner was the intelligence of the banishment of Chrysostom made public, than the whole city was filled with indignation. Public clamour was loud against the Emperor, who had thus weakly given up so bright an ornament of the Christian Church to the malice of Eudoxia and Theophilus. The tumult increased to such a degree of violence, that Eudoxia herself, terrified at the danger, implored the Emperor to revoke the sentence of banishment, and even wrote to Chrysostom a letter couched in terms of respect and expressive of contrition.

The people of Constantinople saw with the most lively emotions of joy the return of their beloved Pastor to his Bishopric, but the season of triumph was of short duration. Soon after his restoration, a silver statue of the Empress was erected in the street before the great Church of St. Sophia, and was solemnly dedicated with Pagan rites. Chrysostom, impatient of this act of profanation, reprehended it from the pulpit, and began his sermon as follows: "Now, again, Herodias reigns, and is vexed, again she daunces, again she desires John's head in a charger." Such imprudence could not fail of gratifying his enemies, and they turned it to their advantage. The resentment of Eudoxia was unbounded, and Arcadius, overcome by importunity, again commanded the Bishop's deposition. He was not only deposed, but committed to prison, and his friends and followers were scattered, and even put to death. Edicts were issued, commanding all persons to renounce communion with him, and three thousand of his catechumens, who had assembled in the fields to keep the Festival of Easter, were rudely dispersed by the Emperor himself at the head of a military force. At last Chrysostom received a mandate to leave the city, and he was obliged to relinquish the government of his Diocese to Arsacius, the brother of Nectarius. He had earnestly recommended his flock to communicate with the Bishop who might be chosen in his room, but the advice was disregarded. They refused to submit, formed separate assemblies, and were severely persecuted under the name of Joannites.

Chrysostom himself was conveyed to Cucusus in Armenia, an uncultivated Country, infested by robbers, and disgracefully known as the spot in which Paul, a Ecclesiastical Writers of the Vth and Vith Centuries.

He is deposed.

Is removed from Constantinople.

Is restored.

He provokes the resentment of the Empress Eudoxia.

A. D. 404. Leaves his See.

He is banished to Cucusus.

History. former Bishop of Constantinople, had been murdered. His journey to this desolate region was attended with many hardships, though his sufferings were alleviated by the sympathy and kind offices of his numerous friends. At Cucusus he experienced a treatment, which neither himself, his friends, nor his enemies, had reason to expect. He preached frequently to the people, who heard him with reverence; by the liberality of a female disciple, Olympias, who faithfully adhered to his fortunes, and who had been banished to Nicomedia for her devotedness to his cause, he was supplied with money, and wealth in the hands of Chrysostom was used only as an instrument of beneficence. He relieved the poor who were suffering under a grievous famine, and he redeemed many captives who had been taken by the Isaurian robbers. He projected a plan for converting the Pagans of Phœnicia, and he contributed large sums for the erection of churches, and the support of missionaries.

But the implacable enmity which had condemned him to banishment, pursued him even to the inhospitable climate of Isauria. His enemies, beholding with jealous malignity the respect shown to his virtues and his misfortunes, procured an order for his removal to Pityus, on the extreme shore of the Black Sea. In his way thither, he was brought to an Oratory of Basiliscus, who had suffered martyrdom in the Persecution of Dioclesian. Here he entreated to rest, but the indulgence was refused by his guards. Nature, however, was exhausted, he had not proceeded far before his conductors were compelled to return with him to the desired Oratory. Here he received the Lord's Supper, uttered his last prayer, and, having concluded with his usual doxology, "Glory be to God for all events," tranquilly expired.

His death.
A. D.
407.

His Works.

This great man, however, "though dead, yet speaketh" by his Works. As an expositor of Scripture, though he adopted the views of Origen, he is judicious and energetic. As a preacher he was eminently useful, because he was practical; and though his discourses were directed against the prevailing vices of his own Age, and of the city in which he presided, yet they may be read with advantage even in these later times. As a devotional writer he was not less excellent than as a preacher; and the beautiful Collect which concludes the daily service of the Church of England, is a proof that he was endowed in a peculiar manner with "the gift of prayer." In parennetic theology his rank is deservedly high, and his Treatise De Sacerdotio must excite in young minds a serious awe of the danger of misarrying in an office of so awful importance, and cannot fail to check the levity and presumption of any which would undertake it without due preparation.

The best edition of the complete Works of Chrysostom is that published by Montfaucon in eleven volumes folio. But it would be an unpardonable omission in an English Divine to pass over the edition projected by Sir Henry Savile, Warden of Merton College, Oxford, and superintended by the "ever memorable" John Hales, Greek Professor in that University.

Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i.; Dupin, Biblioth. Cent. iv.; Spaulding, Hist. Christ. sec. iv. and v.

AUGUSTIN.*

A. D. 354—430.

Ecclesiastical Writers of the Vth and Vith Centuries.

Birth of Augustin.

This great master of polemics was born in the city of Tagasta, in Numidia, of respectable parentage. His father, Patricius, continued a Pagan till nearly the time of his death; his mother, Monea, was renowned for Christian piety. Augustin in his Confessions accuses himself of a natural indolence, and says, that he improved in Learning only through necessity. He had an aversion from Greek Literature, though it is by no means to be inferred, that he never attained the knowledge of the Greek language. In the neighbouring city of Madaura, he received the first rudiments of education, and he devoted himself to the study of Oratory. His father, with a spirit above his circumstances, determined to send Augustin, then in his seventeenth year, to the famous School at Carthage. There he continued to cultivate his favourite study, till in the course of his reading he met with the Horatians of Cicero. This Treatise effected a remarkable change in his views, and renouncing the fantastic hope of gaining reputation by eloquence, he felt an ardent desire after wisdom. Though at this time unacquainted with the Apostolical admonition, "Take heed, lest any man spoil you through Philosophy and vain deceit," yet he resolved to seek wisdom, not by ranging himself under any particular Sect, but by making an impartial search wherever it might be found. In this investigation he did not overlook the Holy Scriptures, but at first he read them without delight. "My pride," he says, "was disgusted with their manner, and my penetration could not enter into their meaning."

His education.

In this situation he fell in with the Manichees, men who were always talking of Truth, and yet formed the most absurd opinions on the works of Nature and the dispensations of Providence. Augustin was seduced by these Heretics, partly through their subtle and captious questions concerning the Origin of Evil, partly through their blasphemies against the holy men recorded in the Old Testament. During the space of nine years, "deceived and deceiving," he lived, infatuated with the Manichean follies, and even a believer in the dotages of Astrology.

Embrace of Manichæism.

The loss of a beloved friend after his return from Carthage to his native city, first staggered his confidence in the opinions which he had embraced. In the violence of early sorrow, he quitted Tagasta, and again returned to Carthage. Here some circumstances connected with a Manichean Bishop named Faustus, who had come to that city, contributed to strengthen his doubts concerning the soundness of the whole system; but he still remained a Manichean, because he despaired of finding a better road to Truth.

From Carthage he was induced to go to Rome, still a disciple of Manichæism. The Manichees were divided into two classes, the hearers or novices, and the elect. Augustin belonged to the latter; but at Rome his attachment to his Sect was considerably weakened, and he began to entertain a secret predilection for the Academic Philosophy. Some unexpected disappointments at Rome, or some expected advantages at Milan in his capacity of Teacher of Rhetoric, led him thither.

He settles at Rome.

* This biographical account is extracted principally from his own Confessions.

History. His Bishop, Ambrose, received the new Professor with paternal affection, and Augustin was gradually brought to attend to his doctrine. The possibility of finding Truth in the Church of Christ appeared, and he began to consider how he might convict Manichæism of falsehood. In conclusion, he determined to remain a catechumen in the Church, till he saw his way more clearly.

The state of his mind was now somewhat altered, and, ashamed of his former delusions, he became exceedingly sceptical. His most intimate associates were Alypius and Nebridius, the former of whom had studied under him at Tagasta and at Carthage, and the latter had left a paternal estate in the vicinity of that city for the pleasure and instruction of Augustin's society. The arguments of Nebridius seem to have cleared his mind entirely of Manichæism and of Astrology, and he was prepared, by his renunciation of those pernicious errors, to approach the oracles of Divine Truth.

And notices them. With eagerness, tempered by awe, he took up the Inspired Volume, and particularly the writings of St. Paul. He read, and Truth flashed irresistibly on his mind. Deeply affected, he went to Simplician, the spiritual father of Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, and opened his Religious state. Simplician confirmed his resolution by relating a similar conversion in Victorinus, a Roman Rhetorician.

Augustin now resolved to relinquish his employment of teaching, not abruptly but gradually; and he wrote to Ambrose, with a request that the Bishop would point out those parts of the Sacred Writings which were the best preparation for Baptism. Ambrose called his attention to the Prophecies of Isaiah, but to Augustin the other and plainer parts of Scripture seemed preferable.

Receives Christian Baptism at Milan. Returns to Africa. At Milan, Augustin received the sacred rite of Baptism together with his friend Alypius and his son Adeodatus. In company with Eudodius, a Milanese citizen, and a Christian convert, Augustin with his son and friend determined to return to Africa. At the mouth of the Tiber, his mother, who had been the faithful companion of his travels, who had witnessed his spiritual conflicts, who had supported him in the hour of despair by her counsel and by her prayers, expired. Not long before her death she said, "Son, I have now no delight in life. One thing only, your conversion, was an object for which I wished to live. That is granted. What do I here?"

Returns to Hippo. Augustin, after his return to Africa, lived on his own estate for almost three years in a state of retirement, but at the solicitation of a person of some consequence in Hippo, who requested his instructions, he removed to that city. Valerius was its Bishop, a man of great piety, but on account of his slender acquaintance with the Latin tongue unfit for the situation in which he was placed. Augustin, through the urgent desires of the people, and in compliance with the earnest wishes of Valerius, was ordained a Presbyter. In this station his ministry was highly useful, in the edification of the Faithful, and the confutation of Heretics. Fortunatus, the great leader of the Manichæes, was obliged to leave Hippo in confusion, when he found himself, by the unanimous suffrage of the audience, vanquished in a conference with Augustin.

Valerius, solicitous to preserve so invaluable an accession to his Church, procured the election of Augustin as coadjutor to himself. Augustin, after having long resisted, at length accepted the Episcopal office, the duties of which he fulfilled alone, after the decease of Valerius. His activity increased with his elevation. To his indefatigable zeal in preaching, he added the laborious employment of hearing causes, and in their examination and decision he often spent the whole day. In attendance on Councils he was punctual, and in them he distinguished himself in the defence both of Christian doctrine and discipline. His dress, furniture, and diet were moderated between the extremes of luxury and penuriousness. He was "a lover of hospitality," and during meals encouraged reading or useful conversation; but he had a strong aversion to detraction and slander, and he caused a distich* to be inscribed on his Table, intimating that whoever attacked the characters of the absent should be excluded. He was conscientiously attentive to the wants of the Poor, and relieved them out of the revenues of the Church or the oblations of the Faithful.

A short time before his death, he was employed in the revision and correction of his Works, and the fruits of his labour were his Retractions, which were intended to give to the World his last and matured opinions. It pleased God, however, that he should not depart without passing through a cloud of temporal affliction, and thus his hope of immortality was quickened by a bitter taste of the evils of this life. Genseric, King of the Vandals, invaded Africa, and ravaged it with all the horrors of uncivilized warfare. Augustin was compelled to witness, in addition to the usual desolation, the destruction of the Christian Churches, and the persecution of their Pastors. Count Boniface, one of the greatest Roman heroes of those times, undertook the defence of Hippo against the Barbarians, and bravely protracted its capture for fourteen months, when, with the rest of Africa, it fell under the power of the Vandals.

But Augustin was taken away before the consummation of this calamity. While he mourned under the disasters of the times in company with Posidienus and several Bishops who had fled for shelter to Hippo, he told them that his earnest prayer had been offered to God, that his servants might be rescued from the siege, or that they might be endued with patience to bear the approaching evil, or that himself might be removed to another world. In the third month of the siege his last wish was granted; he was seized with a fever which ended in his dissolution, having lived seventy-six years, forty of which he had been a Presbyter or a Bishop. It was his common saying, that a Christian should never cease to repent even to the hour of his death, and he caused the Penitential Psalms of David to be inscribed on the wall in his last sickness. He left no Will, for he had neither money nor lands; his only earthly possession was his Library, which he bequeathed to the Church.

With the polemical life of Augustin the present His Works. Chapter has no concern, since it will be brought under consideration, in treating of the Heresies to which he was opposed. The same remark may be applied to his controversial writings. Of his practical writings, that volume which is best known to the English reader is his Meditations, though doubts have been entertained of its Ecclesiastical Writers of the Vth and Vith Centuries.

He is elected Bishop of Hippo. His conduct in his Bishopric.

Invasion of Genseric.

Death of Augustin. A. D. 430.

* *Quisquis amat dictis abstantium radere vitam
Hanc mentem vetitam, novetur erac ubi.*

Poind. Vit. August.

History. genuineness. His Sermons are far inferior to his other compositions in learning and eloquence; but they were addressed to the people, and not to the literati. They are plain and simple, but weighty and serious.

The editions of Augustin's detached Treatises are too numerous to be inserted here; but an accurate and splendid edition of his whole Works was published by the Benedictines.

Posidenus, Vita Augustini; Augustin, Confessiones; Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. iv. and v.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i.

JEROM.*

A. D. 331—420.

His birth and education.

This renowned Monk and celebrated Father of the Latin Church was born under the reign of the Emperor Constantine, at Stridon,† a town on the confines of Dalmatia and Pannonia. So obscure, however, was this place, that Geographers have not determined whether or not it ought to be considered as a part of Italy. From the care bestowed on his education, it is certain that he was born of an opulent family. He was sent to Rome, and there acquired the graces of the Latin Tongue, and he was in his infancy instructed in the rudiments of the Christian Faith. After his Baptism at Rome, he travelled into France in company with Bonosus, a fellow-student. He passed his time in study, or in conversation with learned men, and thence returning into Italy, he determined to follow the profession of a Monk, a term which at that time did not convey the modern idea of the word. It meant only the life of a private, recluse Christian, but unfettered by rules and vows. Such a life suited the contemplative temper of Jerom. He was, however, ordained a Presbyter, but would not accept any higher ecclesiastical dignity.

Embraces a monastic life.

Resides at Rome

Not less than four years were passed by him in the deserts of Syria, where his application to study was intense, and by the assistance of a Jew, who visited him clandestinely, he acquired a knowledge of the Hebrew Tongue, to which he added the dialects of Syria and Chalken. On his return to Rome, he cultivated the society of Paula, (an illustrious descendant of the Pauli, so famous in Roman story,) Marcella, and other opulent ladies. By the advice and assistance of Jerom, a Monastery was formed, and the conventual life became fashionable at Rome. But his temper being highly choleric and imperious, could not patiently bear the spleen and calumny by which he was attacked. Unjust aspersions against his character provoked him to an acrimonious and uncharitable recrimination. He retired again to the East, followed by several of his female admirers. Bethlehem was selected as the residence of his old age, where Paula erected four Monasteries, three for women, over which she presided, and one for men, in which Jerom passed the remainder of his life, occasionally enjoying the society of his learned friends. Paula died after having lived twenty years in the Monastery and Jerom after he had reached the unusual term of ninety-one years.

Retires from Rome and settles in Palestine.

His death.

His Works.

His writings are voluminous, but not particularly instructive; his learning was considerable, but ill-digested, and his piety was debased by superstition. His Commentaria on the Holy Scriptures and his Epistles are the most esteemed of his Works. The Benedictines have published an edition of the Works of this Father in five folio volumes. Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i.; Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. iv.

Eccelesiastical Writers of the Vth and VIth Centuries.

CYRIL.

A. D. 413—444.

The biography of Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, will be comprised under the Nestorian Heresy. His Works, in six folio volumes, were published by Aubert at Paris, in the year 1639. Dupin, Biblioth. vol. iv.; Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. v.

ISIDORE OF PELUSIUM.

DIED A. D. 431.

This writer was a Monk of Pelusium in Egypt, and he conferred honour on the monastic life. He lived in the practice of serious piety, and he appears to have known the world much better, and to have been more useful in the Church, than might have been expected from a Recluse. He was the disciple and the vindicator of Chrysostom. His Works consist of V Books of Epistles. They are admirably written, and are to be recommended equally for the solidity of the matter, and the elegance of the style. They have been published in a folio volume by the Jesuit Scott at Paris in 1638. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. v.

THEODORET.

FLOURISHED FROM A. D. 423 TO 451.

SOCRATES.—SOZOMEN.

These three contemporary writers continued the History of the Church from the point at which the Work of Eusebius ended. Socrates is a judicious writer, remarkable for his candour towards the Novatians, and for his general impartiality. Sozomen is inferior to Socrates in judgment, and is favourable to a monastic life. Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus, was an eloquent and a copious writer in other Works besides his History. In consequence of his supposed attachment to the Nestorian errors, he was condemned by the Synod of Ephesus, but was restored at the IVth General Council held at Chalcedon. The Works of Theodoret were edited by the Jesuit Sismond, in four folio volumes, and a fifth was added by Garnier. The Histories of Theodoret, Sozomen, and Socrates, added to that of Eusebius, form three folio volumes. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. v.

CASSIAN.

DIED CIRCA A. D. 410.

This writer, who has been styled the founder of the Semi-pelagian School, was a disciple of Chrysostom. He spent the latter part of his life at Marseilles, and probably quitted Constantinople at the time at which his master was banished from it. He asserted an inward Grace, subject to freedom of the will, and that the first conversion of the soul to God is merely an effect

* The life of Jerom has been written by Erasmus, and is prefixed to Jerom's Works.

† Or Strigona.

History. of its free choice. The followers of Augustin allowed that Semipelagianism found in Cassian a powerful defender, and that his learning and morals were unquestionable. The Works of Cassian were published at Frankfort in 1722, with a Commentary by Alardus Gazau. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. v.

OTHER WRITERS OF THE Vth CENTURY.

Leo I., surnamed the Great, is at the head of the writers in the Latin Church in this Century, but his talents were chiefly applied to the extension of the Pontifical authority. Hilary, Bishop of Arles, famous for his quarrel with Leo, was a man of eloquence and humble piety. Prosper, a layman, and Primasius, an African Bishop, are recorded as the disciples of Augustin. Among the Greek writers may be enumerated Basil of Seleucia, Theodotus of Ancyra, Gelasius of Cyzicum, Theodore of Mopsuesta, and Palladius, the Biographer of Chrysostom.

ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS OF THE VIth CENTURY.

The catalogue of this Century is rather numerous than interesting, and in vain shall we seek in it for a Chrysostom, an Augustin, or a Jerom. The most celebrated Greek and Oriental Writers were Procopius of Gaza, a Professor of Oratory, and a useful Commentator on Scripture; Maxentius, a Monk and a Presbyter of Antioch, an opponent of the Nestorians and Acephali; Theodorus of Byzantium, a writer on Ecclesiastical History; John, Patriarch of Constantinople, surnamed the Faster, remembered chiefly for his Penitential; Eulogius of Antioch, Leontius of Byzantium, and Anastasius of Sinai, all of them controversial writers.

The Latin writers are more worthy of a distinct notice; and among them, on account of his station, the precedence is due to

GREGORY I. THE GREAT.

A. D. 544—604.

Gregory was born in Rome of a Patrician Family, about the year 544. He early distinguished himself by his great powers of memory, and his acquirements in Grammar, Logic, Rhetoric, and Civil Law. In the Languages he was not equally versed, for he was wholly unacquainted even with Greek. Having filled the office of Prefect of Rome, he retired to a Monastery of his own foundation, but not long after was appointed by Pope Pelagius II. to many honourable public stations, especially that of Nuncio and Secretary. On the death of that Pontiff in 590, Gregory most reluctantly ascended the Papal Throne, which he filled with consummate ability. Among other points of Ecclesiastical Reform, his attention was much devoted to Church Music; and it is to him that we are indebted for simplifying the characters and language of that Art by introducing a notation by the first seven letters of the alphabet. The name of Gregory is celebrated in English History from his mission for the conversion of our Islands. Notwithstanding the great aversion from Letters with which he has been, perhaps unjustly, taxed, (for Brucker has accused him of burning the Palatine Library, which among other treasures contained the entire History of Livy,) no Pope has written so largely. His chief Works are Letters, of which there are more than 800. A Commentary on Job, a Pastoral, or Treatise on Pastoral Duties, Homilies, and Dialogues. The genuineness of the last-named Work is doubted; it is a storehouse of pseudo-miracles and marvels, and once enjoyed very great popularity. A splendid edition of his Works was published at Paris in 1705, in four volumes folio, by St. Marthe, a Benedictine Monk. Acta Sanct. tom. ii. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. vi.

Ecclesiastical Writers of the Vth and VIth Centuries.

GREGORY, BISHOP OF TOURS.

This Prelate is esteemed the father of Gallic History; his writings discover considerable diligence, but little judgment. Levity and credulity are the characteristics of his Annals of the Franks, his Miracles, or Lives of the Saints, and of his other writings. The best edition of his Works is by Don Ruinart, 1699, folio.

OTHER LATIN WRITERS.

It is sufficient to enumerate without comment, Cæsarius of Arles, a moral writer; Fulgentius, Bishop of Rusipina, a noted Polemic; Eunodius, Bishop of Pavia, an author both in prose and verse; and at the close of the list, Boethius and Cassiodorus, the former of whom is conspicuous as an Orator and Philosopher as well as a Divine.

HISTORY

CHAPTER LVII. OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

HERESIES OF THE Vth AND VIth CENTURIES.

NESTORIANS.
EUTYCHIANS, OR MONOPHYTES.
ACEPHALI.	} BRANCHES OF EUTYCHIANISM.
ANTHROPOMORPHITES.
BARSAMORPHITES.
ESSAIANISTS.
JACOBITES.
SEVERITES.
MARONITES.
AGNOITE.
ARMINIANS.
EGYPTIANS OR COPTS.
PELAGIANS.
SEMIPELAGIANS.
PREDESTINARIANS.

History. In the beginning of the Vth Century, the Donatists were defeated by the writings of Augustin, and the Arians, oppressed by the Imperial edicts, were compelled to seek refuge among those Barbarous nations who overturned the Western Empire. Under this depression of two dangerous Heresies, a new Sect, the cause of a fatal division in the Church, arose, known by the name of

NESTORIANS.

Account of Nestorius. Nestorius was a native of Germanicia, a Monk of Antioch, and a disciple of Theodore of Mopsuesta.* After the peaceable and mild usurpation of the Episcopal throne of Chrysostom by Atticus, and the short and turbulent Patriarchate of Sisinnius, the factions of the Clergy and People were appeased by the choice which the Emperor made of a successor. Theodosius selected a stranger, and Nestorius was indebted for his elevation to the austerity of his life, and the eloquence of his sermons. But the first Homily which he delivered before his Imperial patron, evinced that humility and charity were not among the number of his virtues. His accession to the See of Constantinople was marked by a fierce persecution of the Arians; he discovered one of their secret conventicles, attacked it by force, and burned it to the ground. Rigid was the commencement of his Episcopal career, fierce was his zeal against every kind and degree of Heresy, till the sword of persecution which he had so recklessly wielded against others was turned against himself.

Educated in the Syrian school, Nestorius had been early taught to repudiate the confusion of the Human with the Divine nature of Christ. The Heresy of Apollinaris had blended these two natures; for he maintained that the Man Christ was not endowed with a Human soul, but that the Divine spirit was substituted in its place. The Syrian Doctors, in order that they might avoid the errors of Apollinaris, were careful in establishing a distinction between the Divine and Human nature in the Son of God. Nestorius, who had adopted the sentiments of the teachers of his own Country, was a violent enemy of the Apollinarian Heresy, and the ruin of that Sect was the first object of his government. He therefore strenuously enforced the Syrian doctrine in his own discourses, and strictly enjoined his disciples to discriminate accurately between the actions and passions of the Son of God, and those of the Son of Man.

From the pulpit at Constantinople, the Presbyter His Here Anastasius, a friend of Nestorius, and his successor in the Patriarchate, repeatedly declaimed against the use of the title of Mother of God, bestowed on the Virgin Mary.* It was a term, he asserted, unknown to the Apostles, unauthorized by the Church, and adopted by the followers of Apollinaris in their controversy with the Arians. He, at the same time, proposed it as his opinion, that the Virgin Mary ought to be styled the Mother of Christ, rather than the Mother of God, since the Divinity can neither be born nor die. Nestorius applauded these sentiments, and reechoed them.

A vigorous opposition was soon begun against the Patriarch and his Presbyter, by some Monks of Con-

* For an account of Nestorius see Socrat, Hist. lib. vii. c. 29.
342.

* Basnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, tom. I. p. 505.

History. —stantinople, who maintained that the Son of Mary was God incarnate; they excited the populace against Nestorius, but without much effect. On the contrary, the Monks of Egypt, after having perused the Discourses of Nestorius, were converted to his opinions, and accordingly ceased to call the Virgin the Mother of God.

Cyrl, Bishop of Alexandria. —The individual who at this time presided in the See of Alexandria was Cyrl, a Prebte who had been trained in the Alexandrian School. Under this discipline, he inclined rather to the sentiments of Apollinaris, than to the opposite extremity, at which his antagonists had taken their position. His early life had been passed in Monastic austerity, and in an indefatigable application to Scholastic Theology; but his natural disposition fitted him for the tumults of Cities and Synods. By the voice of the people he had been seated on the Patriarchal throne of Alexandria, and the prize was not unworthy of his ambition. At a distance from the Court, and at the head of an immense Capital, he enjoyed the influence and authority of a Civil magistrate.*

His character. —Cyrl opened his Patriarchal reign in the same manner as Nestorius, by the persecution of Heresy; and he began by oppressing the Novatians. He interdicted their Religious worship, and confiscated their sacred vessels. But his wrath was directed not only against Christian Heretics, he expelled from Alexandria the Jews; and the inhuman murder of Hypatia, a Female Heathen Philosopher, who taught at Alexandria, will leave an indelible stain on his character,† if we admit the charge brought against him by Demasius, that he was privy to the intention, and stimulated the fury of the zealots, who tore her to pieces in the streets.

Cyrcus, Nestorian. —As soon as the opinions of Nestorius were known to Cyrl, his pride and ambition prompted him to interfere. The successor of Athanasius thought it suitable to his station and character to encounter a second Arius. After a short correspondence between the rival Patriarchs, and after having engaged on his side Celestine the Roman Pontiff, Cyrl assembled a Synod at Alexandria, and denounced the Heretical opinions of the Byzantine by not less than twelve anathemata. Celestine, meantime, at the head of an Italian Synod, condemned not only the opinions of Nestorius, but degraded the Heretic from his Episcopal dignity, and left the execution of the sentence to the Alexandrian Patriarch.

Nestorianis appointed by the Emperor. —Nestorius, undaunted by this rash proceeding, reported on his adversary the charge of Heresy, charged him with the Apollinarian errors, and loaded him with the same number of censures as had been levelled against himself. The Emperor Arcadius was equally indisposed with the Patriarch of Constantinople to obey the sentence of an Italian Bishop, and a Synod of the Catholic Church was unanimously demanded as the sole remedy which could decide this unintelligible controversy. Theodosius called a Council at Ephesus, which is known in the annals of the Church as the IIIrd General Council;‡

1st Council of Ephesus. —The Festival of Pentecost was chosen for the time of meeting. Both Nestorius and Cyrl were summoned in their capacity of Metropolitan, and though, contrary to fairness, Cyrl presided, yet Nestorius appeared not as a criminal, but as a judge. Impatient of delay, Cyrl proposed to examine and determine the matters in debate before the arrival of the Patriarch of Antioch and the Eastern Bishops; but Nestorius objected against this proceeding as irregular and unjust. The Trial, however, was begun; sixty-eight Bishops out of probably less than three hundred, defended the cause of Nestorius by a modest and temperate protest, but they were excluded from the deliberations of their brethren. Candidian, in the name of the Emperor, requested a delay of four days, but this Magistrate was expelled from the Assembly with insult and outrage. The whole of this important transaction was concluded in a single day. Nestorius was convicted of blasphemy against the Divine majesty, was degraded from his Episcopal dignity, and ultimately sent into exile.*

On the fifth day after the promulgation of this sentence, the triumph of Cyrl was clouded by the arrival of the Eastern Bishops. With equal haste and violence the Oriental Synod, composed of fifty Bishops, with John, Patriarch of Antioch, at their head, degraded the Patriarch of Alexandria, and his creature Memnon, Bishop of Ephesus, from their Episcopal honours, and described Cyrl as a monster born and educated for the destruction of the Church. They appointed without delay another Bishop of Ephesus, but by the vigilance of Memnon a strong garrison was stationed in the Cathedral; the troops under the command of Candidian vainly endeavoured to assault it, the place was impregnable, and the besiegers were repulsed with a severe loss.

The disputes between the Egyptian and Syrian Theologians reached the Imperial Court, and Theodosius tried every method to reconcile the controversialists. He summoned from each party eight deputies to a free conference in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, but he was compelled to dissolve the Assembly, and the deputies returned to their Provinces. After a long and equal contest, John of Antioch and Cyrl of Alexandria came to an agreement, and Cyrl was contented to receive from John certain Articles of Faith, in which particular phrases and expressions liable to misinterpretation were abandoned, and was brought to acknowledge, though with reluctance, a twofold nature in Christ.

The unfortunate Nestorius finding himself abandoned, thought it more honourable to abdicate his office than to be forcibly expelled from it, and his request that he might be allowed to withdraw to a life of privacy was granted. He was conducted from Ephesus to his old Monastery of Antioch, and after a short interval, the Patriarchate of Constantinople was filled successively by Maximian and Proclus. But in the retirement of a Monastery, Nestorius was not long permitted to find repose. After a residence of four years at Antioch, Theodosius signed an edict, proscribing his opinions, and consigning him to banishment; first at Tetra in Arabia, and at length in Oasis, one of the places metaphorically called Islands in the Libyan desert. While he was thus secluded, a wandering Tribe of the Blemmyes, or Nubians, invaded the place of his confinement; Nestorius fled from these Barbarians to the banks of the Nile, and this flight was punished as a new crime. Cyrl incited against him the Civil and Ecclesiastical powers of Egypt, by whom he was forcibly conveyed as far as the confines of Ethiopia. Yet his mind was unsubdued, he survived his implacable enemy, and his death alone prevented the Council of Chalcedon from restoring him to the communion of the Church, if not to his former honours.†

Heresies of the Vth and Vth Centuries.

Nestorius is condemned.

Opposition of the Orientals.

Compromise between Cyrl and John of Antioch.
A. D. 433.

Last days and death of Nestorius.

A. D. 451.

* Sozom. Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. c. 7.

† Suid. Lexicon. Art. Hypatia.

‡ Sozom. Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. Evagr. Hist. lib. i. c. 1, 2.

* Variorum Patrum Epistolæ ad Concil. Ephes. pertinentes Louvain, 1682. Tillemont, Ecclési. Mem. tom. xiv.

† Evagr. lib. ii. c. 2.

History.
Extension of Nestorianism.

The persecution of Nestorius was far from stopping the progress of his opinions. They spread with rapidity through all the Oriental Provinces, and separate congregations were formed in decided hostility to the Council of Ephesus. The Persians opposed Cyril in the most vigorous manner, and charged him with confounding the two natures of Christ. But nothing tended so much to perpetuate the Nestorian doctrines, as their reception in the School of Edessa. In this School was educated Barsumas, afterwards Bishop of Niblis. This Prelate laboured with incredible assiduity to procure for the Nestorians a settlement in Persia, and his efforts were seconded by Maanes, Bishop of Ardasira. Barsumas not only persuaded Peroz, the Persian Monarch, to expel from his dominions such Christians as had adopted the opinions of the Greeks, but also engaged him to put the Nestorians in possession of the See of Seleucia, the principal seat of Ecclesiastical authority in Persia.*

Nestorian tenets.

The tenets of the Nestorians, as they were determined in several Seleucian Councils, are in substance these: 1. That in the Saviour of the world, there were two hypostases, or persons, of which the one was Divine, or the Eternal Word, and the other Human, or the Man Christ Jesus. 2. That these two hypostases had only one outward appearance. 3. That the union between the Son of God and the Son of Man was formed in the moment of the Virgin's conception, and was never to be dissolved. 4. That this union was not of nature or person, but of will and affection. 5. That Christ was to be carefully distinguished from God who dwelt in him as in a Temple. 6. That Mary was to be called the Mother of Christ, (Χριστοτόκος), and not the Mother of God. (Θεοτόκος.)

EUTYCHIANS.

Account of Eutyches.

One Heresy begets another, and the Heresy of Eutyches probably had never been known, if that of Nestorius had not previously subsisted. Its author was the Abbot, or archimandrite of a Convent at Constantinople. In the Council of Ephesus, he had signified himself in disputation against the errors of Nestorius; but in his old age he was himself proscribed as a Heretic. In exerting himself with undue vehemence against the Nestorian hypothesis, he taught that in Christ there was but one nature, namely, the Incarnate Word. The Byzantine Pontiff, scandalized at this doctrine, assembled a Synod in which Eutyches was condemned; but he made his appeal to a General Council, and his cause was vigorously espoused by his godson Chrysaphius. By the special summons of the Emperor, a second Council was convened at Ephesus. It was composed of ten Metropolitans and ten Bishops from each of the six Dioceses of the Eastern Empire, but the entire number was afterwards increased to one hundred and thirty-five. The Syrian Barsumas,† as the chief and representative of the Monks, was invited to sit and vote in the Assembly.‡

Eutyches is pronounced Orthodox.

But the influence of the Alexandrian Patriarch predominated in the II^d Council of Ephesus as well as in the Ist. The Orthodoxy of Eutyches was acknowledged without hesitation. "May those who divide Christ be divided with the sword," was the charitable wish of the Ephesian Synod. The Patriarch of Constantinople was not without his adherents; but Dioscorus, the faithful imitator of the arrogance of Cyril, as well as his successor in the Patriarchate, triumphed on this occasion. Flavian, the Constantinopolitan Pontiff, by the decree of this Synod, was scourged in the most inhuman manner, and banished to Epipasa, a City of Lydia. Rightly did the Greeks denominate this Assembly Σύνεσις Ἀγροπαιῶν, a Synod of robbers.*

Hermies of the 1th and 2^d with Cos-turmes.

Constantinople.

At Ephesus, the Egyptian tenets prevailed, but the vanquished party engaged in their interest Leo the Great, Bishop of Rome. Flavian also had courage to remonstrate with the Emperor, and to demand that the decision of so important a matter should be referred to an Ecumenical Council. Leo seconded the request; but though Theodosius would not accede, his successor Marcian consented to the proposal. The Council of Chalcedon met, which is reckoned the IVth General Council.†

Council of Chalcedon.

A. D. 451.

Epistle of Leo.

Leo had already declared his creed in an Epistle, or rather volume, on the mystery of the Incarnation, but his condemnation of the Eutychian doctrine had been disregarded by the Council of Ephesus. But in the grand Council of Chalcedon Leo presided, and in consequence of his great influence, Dioscorus was condemned, deposed, and banished into Paphlagonia, the Acts of the Council of Ephesus were annulled, and the Epistle of Leo, having been subscribed by the Oriental Bishops, was received as a Rule of Faith. In the Western Churches this Letter was received with still more deference, for it was publicly read during the season of Advent. The Emperor Marcian supported the Roman Pontiff, and was prepared to enforce the edicts of the Chalcedonian Council by the sword.

Progress of the Eutychian doctrine.

Different were the sentiments of the Egyptian Theologians. Though they entertained contradictory opinions on many other questions, yet they concurred in opposing the Council of Chalcedon and the Epistle of Leo. On the death of the Emperor Marcian, the populace assembled tumultuously in Egypt, massacred Portierus, the successor of Dioscorus, and substituted in his place Timotheus Ælurus, a defender of the Monophysite or Eutychian doctrine. The triumph of the Chalcedonians was decided in the choice of a successor, but that triumph was of short duration. The See of Alexandria was finally filled by Mousus, a noted Eutychian.

Syria also and Armenia were theatres of Eutychian contention. The Abbot Barsumas, having been condemned by the Council of Chalcedon, chose Syria as the place of his residence, and diligently propagated his opinions. By the assistance of his disciple Samuel, he spread them among the Armenians.

The Patriarchal See of Antioch, as well as that of Theophasites. Alexandria, was filled by a Monophysite. Fullo, or, as he was more generally called, Peter the Fuller, having, after a violent opposition, been fixed there by the authority of the Emperor Zeno, excited a new discord, by attempting to form a Sect under the title of Theophasites. In the Hymn called Trisagium, after the words "O God most holy," he ordered the following phrase to be added, "who hast suffered for us on the cross;" and the addition was adopted by the Eastern Churches. His

* Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. v.

† This person must be distinguished from Barsumas, Bishop of Niblis.

‡ Concil. tom. iv. p. 1413.

* Niceph. Eccles. Hist. lib. xiv. c. 67.

† This Council, by the summons of the Emperor, first assembled at Nice in Bithynia, and afterwards removed to Chalcedon. Its Acts are contained in Concil. tom. iv. p. 761—2071.

History. design was to impress on the people the Monophysite doctrine; but his adversaries charged him with maintaining the passion of the Godhead, and opprobriously called his adherents Theopaschites.*

Heretics of the Vth and Vth Centuries.
Account of Pelagius and Celestius.
 To put an end to this controversy, which during the space of thirty years had occasioned great disorders in Church and State, the Emperor Zeno, by the advice of Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, published the famous Henoticon, or Decree of Union. This decree contained a solemn anathema against Nestorius, Eutyches, and all Heretics by whom Christ is either divided or confounded. The Councils of Nice, Constantinople, and Ephesus were confirmed, but the IVth Council was annulled by the censure of all doctrines contrary to its decrees. Thus the friends and enemies of the last Council of Chalcedon were invited to a reconciliation; and both Mongus and Fullo subscribed the decree of Union.†

Eutychian sect. The distinguishing tenet of the Eutychian or Monophysite Sect was, that in Christ there was but one nature, that of the Incarnate Word. This tenet was modified by Barsuma, and having rejected the Eutychian definition, that the Human nature of Christ was absorbed by the Divine, he framed the following proposition,—That in the Son of God there was one nature, which, notwithstanding its unity, was double and compounded. The definition of Leo, which is still esteemed to be the Orthodox doctrine, is to this effect: That in Christ two distinct natures were united in one person, without any change, mixture, or confusion.

MODIFICATIONS OF THE EUTYCHIAN HERESY.

I. The term Monophysites has been already mentioned as synonymous with Eutychians. II. The Acephali. Certain Eutychians looking on the conduct of Mongus, Patriarch of Alexandria, as highly criminal, because he had subscribed the Henoticon, formed themselves into a new faction, under the title of Acephali, or headless, since by the submission of Mongus they were deprived of their Chief. III. Subdivisions of this branch took place into Anthropomorphites, Barsanumorphites, and Essaianists. IV. The Jacobites, who derived their name from James Baradeus or Zanzalus;‡ although the Sect affect to derive their origin from James the Apostle. V. The Severites, called from one Severus of Antioch. VI. Maronites, from Maron the founder; and Monothelites, because they asserted a unity of will. VII. Agnoetes, because they maintained that Christ was ignorant of the day of judgment. VIII. Arminians, who, by the instigation of Euthanasius, rejected the Council of Chalcedon, and who have always maintained the Monophysite or Eutychian doctrine. IX. Egyptians, or Copts, who long maintained the same doctrine, till the theological labours of Eulogius, and the diffusive charity of John, successively Patriarchs of Alexandria, brought them to the Orthodox Faith.

PELAGIANS.

Pelagius§ was a native of Wales, and was in his own time called Brito. His associate Celestius, according to the testimony of Jerom, was an Irishman, or, according to the common phraseology, a Scot; though others assert that he was born in Campania in Italy. They were both laymen; the former by profession a Monk: the latter having in early life applied himself to the study of the Law, quitted it for a monastic life. Their morals and temperance, yet Augustin, more candid, bears testimony to the virtues of the Heresiarch. Augustin also frankly admits that the genius and capacity of Pelagius and Celestius were of the first order.

Pelagius had travelled from Monastery to Monastery through various parts of the Empire, and at length, with his companion, fixed his residence at Rome. Both of them enjoyed a high reputation, and not the least suspicion was attached to their Orthodoxy. According to the testimony of Isidore of Pelusium and Chrysostom, the Heretical opinions of Pelagius did not appear till he was far advanced in life. His peculiar notions were propagated at Rome, but under privacy and in disguise; for Augustin himself owned that his first works were so artfully composed as to deceive even his penetration. Pelagius was accustomed to insinuate his peculiar notions by proposing them under the modest form of queries, while Celestius, more open and daring, pursued a method which exposed him to detection.

On the approach of the Goths to Rome, the two friends were obliged to retire from that City, and went first into Sicily, whence they passed over to Africa. Pelagius was received at Hippo, in the absence of Augustin, but his stay was short; Augustin saw him once or twice at Carthage, but nothing material passed between them. Quitting Africa, Pelagius settled in Palestine, and there his writings attracted the notice and the censure of Jerom. Jerom wrote against him, calling on him to explain his doctrine of Grace more clearly, and not to conceal it under ambiguous expressions.*

In the mean time, Celestius, who remained in Africa, more openly discovered his sentiments, and made such undisguised attempts to propagate them in Carthage itself, that he was summoned to appear before a Synod, convened by Aurelius, Bishop of that City. He was accused of denying Original Sin, and when he was pressed with the practice of the Church in baptizing Infants before the commission of actual sin, he declared that Infants had no need of remission, and that their Baptism implied their sanctification in Christ, or admission into the Kingdom of Heaven. Celestius was condemned as a Heretic, and disappointed of his hope of rising in the Church, for he had obtained, or was about to obtain, the rank of Presbyter.

Under this censure, Celestius retired from Africa, and fixed himself once more in Sicily. Pelagius in the East had better success, since he enjoyed the friendship and protection of John, Bishop of Jerusalem. That Sicily. Prelate being attached to the doctrines of Origen, was naturally induced to countenance those of Pelagius, on account of the seeming conformity between the two systems. Under the favour of this powerful friend, Heretics of the Vth and Vth Centuries.

Account of Pelagius and Celestius.

They settle at Rome.

A. D. 410.

They retire from Rome. Pelagius resides in Palestine.

And Celestius in Africa.

He is condemned by a Synod at Carthage.

A. D. 412.

Leaves Africa and settles in Sicily.

Pelagius makes a public profession of his Creed.

* Norris, Lab. de uno ex Trinitate carne passu. Opera, tom. iii.

† Evangel. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. c. 14.

‡ Benedict, Hist. Patriarch. Alex. p. 133.

§ In the Welch language Meryn, i. e. born near the sea. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sec. v. vi. vii.

* It is impossible to obtain an impartial History of this Heresy, from the Works of Augustin and Jerom, the opponents of Pelagius himself, or those of Jansenius and Usher, the opponents of the Pelagian doctrines.

History.

Pelagius made a public profession of his Creed, and gained disciples in several places. Orosius, a Spanish Presbyter, scandalized at his conduct, was his public accuser, and he was summoned to answer the accusation before an Assembly of Bishops at Jerusalem, but was dismissed without censure. He was next cited before a Synod of fourteen Bishops of Palestine at Lydda, then called Diospolis. At this Synod, John of Jerusalem defended Pelagius with earnestness and eloquence, and the result was an acquittal of the accused Heretic.* He was pronounced uninfected with error, and received as a Christian brother. Pelagius wrote to Augustin an account of his acquittal, and more openly asserted his opinion against Original Sin.

A. D.
415.
Synod of Diospolis.
Pelagius is acquitted.

A. D.
416.
Council of Carthage.

Epistle to Innocent.

A Council having met at Carthage in the succeeding year, on various exigencies of the Church, Orosius brought the conduct of Pelagius before it. The Acts of the Synod of Diospolis were not formally produced, yet the information of Orosius was deemed a sufficient ground of proceeding. The Council transmitted to Innocent, the Roman Pontiff, its decision on the merits of the dispute. It was to this effect: that unless Pelagius and his followers explicitly rejected the opinions ascribed to them, they should be excommunicated. Another Synod, composed of Numidian Bishops, and assembled at Milevum, wrote also to Rome to the same purpose. Augustin and his two friends, Alypius, Bishop of Tagasta, and Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, wrote letters in their own names to Innocent, intimating that the Synod of Diospolis had probably been imposed on by the subtlety of Pelagius, and expressing a fear lest Rome itself, having been the place of his residence, should become the seat of his Heresy.

Innocent, in his answer, fully coincided in the views of the African Prelates, and in the same conditional manner condemned Pelagius and his adherents. But Innocent dying soon after, Zosimus succeeded to the Pontificate, and Cælestius, who had obtained the degree of Presbyter, visited Rome at the commencement of the new Pontiff's reign. Zosimus appears to have been gained over by the ambiguous and artful Confession of Faith which Cælestius had drawn up and presented. He was not less influenced by the letters and protestations of Pelagius. He therefore wrote to the African Prelates, declaring that unless he should hear more decisive proofs against Cælestius, he should receive him as a Christian brother.†

The Bishops of Africa, with Augustin at their head, were little affected by this declaration, and persevered in maintaining their former judgment. Zosimus at length yielded to the strength of their arguments, and Cælestius, fearing a trial, declined to submit to an examination. The Pontiff pronounced a severe condemnation against Pelagius and Cælestius, whom he had honoured by his approbation, and secured by his protection.

This public censure of Zosimus was succeeded by a number of edicts and anathemas. The Emperor Honorius passed a sentence of banishment on the followers of Pelagius in the same year in which Zosimus censured their doctrines. Cælestius retired to Constantinople, where his tenets were opposed by Atticus, the Bishop who denounced the Sect in Letters to Rome.

A. D.
418.
Pelagius and Cæles-tius censured by Zosimus.

* Daniel, Histoire de Concile de Diospolis.

† Wall, in his History of Infant Baptism, gives a good account of the Pelagian controversy.

Pelagius, who was still in Palestine, complained of the treatment which he had received, and being there interrogated concerning the disputed points, answered with such art and ambiguity that he again imposed on his examiners, who explained in writing the result to Augustin. The indefatigable Bishop of Hippo wrote his Treatise on Original Sin, and the Grace of Christ, in which he detected and exposed the Pelagian artifices.

Notwithstanding the decree of the Emperor, Cælestius ventured again to show himself in Rome, and again drew on himself an edict of expulsion. The two Heresies were afterwards reduced to a state the most humiliating to ardent and aspiring minds, a state of obscurity. The British Islands were, it is certain, afterwards disturbed by the Pelagian doctrines, which were overcome by the skill and authority of Germanus. Hence it is probable that Cælestius accompanied Pelagius to those Countries; but this is no more than a probable supposition, for their fate is involved in obscurity.

The tenets of Pelagius, as charged upon him by the Council of Carthage, are comprised in the following particulars. I. That Adam had mortality in his nature, and whether he had sinned or not would certainly have died. II. That the consequences of Adam's sin were confined to his own person, and the rest of mankind were not involved in it. III. That the Law qualified men for the Kingdom of Heaven, and was founded on equal promises with the Gospel. IV. That before the coming of our Saviour, there were some men who lived without sin. V. That newly born infants are in the same condition with Adam before his Fall. VI. That the death and disobedience of Adam is not the necessary cause of death to all mankind, neither does the general Resurrection of the dead follow in virtue of our Saviour's Resurrection. VII. That if Man exert himself to the utmost, he may keep the Divine commands without difficulty, and preserve himself in a state of innocence. VIII. That unless rich men parted with their whole estates, their virtues would be of no avail, notwithstanding the advantage of their Baptism, neither could they be qualified for the Kingdom of Heaven. IX. That the Grace and assistance of God are not granted for the performance of every moral act; the liberty of the will and information in the points of duty being sufficient for this purpose. X. That the Grace of God is given in proportion to human merit. XI. That none can be called the Sons of God unless they are perfectly free from Sin. XII. That our victory over temptation is not gained by God's assistance, but by the liberty of the Will. These were the tenets ascribed to Pelagius, which, it is said, he recanted or explained away at the Synod of Diospolis.

SEMIPELAGIANS.

A more palatable modification of the doctrines of Pelagius was given by Cassian, a Monk, who came from the East into France, and erected a Monastery near Marseilles. Vitatius of Carthage, however, has been thought by some to be its author, who taught that our obedience to the Gospel was no otherwise the effect of Grace than that men cannot believe unless the Word be preached to them. Yet to Cassian is generally attributed the honour or disgrace of founding the Semi-pelagian School. In Gaul, the doctrines of Cassian spread with great rapidity, but they were combated by Prosper and Hilary. The Sect arose in the latter days of

Heretics of the 4th and 5th Centuries.

A. D.
420.

Their end uncertain.

Cassian
Founder of the Semipelagian Heresy
A. D.
430.

History. Augustin, and in opposition to it, this celebrated Father wrote his last two Books on Predestination and the Gift of Perseverance.

Semipelagianism. Many Divines have attempted to fix on a middle way between the errors of Pelagius and the opinions of Augustin. The leading principles of the Semipelagians have been thus stated. I. That God did not dispense his Grace to one more than another, in consequence of an absolute and eternal decree, but was willing to save all men, if they complied with the terms of the Gospel. II. That Christ died for all mankind. III. That the Grace purchased by Christ and necessary to salvation was offered to all men. IV. That Man before he received this Grace was capable of Faith and holy desires. V. That Man was born free, and was consequently capable of resisting the influences of Grace, or of complying with its suggestions.*

PREDESTINARIANS.

As there were some who attempted to define a middle way between Augustin and Pelagius, there were others who went beyond them to either extremity. Among those who might be termed Ultra-Augustinians were the Predestinarians. In the course of his controversy with Pelagius, Augustin had delivered his opinion concerning the necessity of Divine Grace to Human salvation, and the decrees of God with respect to the future condition of Man, in a manner not always consistent with himself or intelligible to others. Hence certain Monks of Adrumetum and others were led into a notion that "God not only predestinated the wicked to eternal punishment, but also to the guilt and transgression for which they were punished." Hence it followed, that all the good and evil actions of Men were determined from eternity by a divine decree, and fixed by an invincible necessity.

Those who embraced this opinion were styled Predestinarians. Augustin exerted all his weight to prevent the dissemination of this doctrine, and in order to avoid the imputation of having favoured it, explained his sentiments with greater perspicuity. His efforts were seconded by the Councils of Arles and Lyons, in which the Predestinarian doctrine was publicly condemned. The existence of this Sect has been denied by many, and its invention regarded as an artifice of the Semipelagians.*

Heresies of the Vth and Vth Centuries.

Existence of this Sect denied.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Heresies of the Vth and Vth Centuries have been divided under two classes, those which regard the Incarnation, and those which relate to the extent of Divine Grace, and its interference with Human Liberty, and both continued to disturb the Peace of the Church during the Century which succeeded. In addition to the new Sects which arose within this period, it must be observed that many of those which had sprung up in the earlier Ages of the Church were far from being extirpated. The Manicheans were said to have gained such an influence in Persia, as to have corrupted the son of Cabades, the Monarch of that nation. The Arians were triumphant in several parts of Asia, Africa, and Europe. They were secretly favoured by many of the Asiatic Bishops, and their cause was openly espoused by the Vandals in Africa, the Goths in Italy, and the Suevi in Gaul. The state of Christian Heresies, as well as of the Catholic Church, was materially changed by an event which we now proceed to describe—The Rise and Progress of the Mohammedan Power.

* Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sec. v.

* Mosheim, Ecc. Hist. Cent. v. c. 5.

BIOGRAPHY.

CHAPTER LVIII.

MOHAMMED.—RISE OF THE SARACEN OR MOHAMMEDAN POWER.

FROM A. D. 569 TO A. D. 632.

History.

From
A. D.
569. to
A. D.
632.

From surveying the aspect of Europe at the settlement of the Barbarian Nations, and the gradual consolidation of those Kingdoms of the West which have given form to the modern polity of Christendom, our attention is naturally directed to observe, in the opposite quarter of the East, the sudden rise and tremendous growth of that astonishing power, which, at the distance of twelve centuries, is still reflected in the Civil and Religious Empire of Mohammedanism. For, the same controuling and permanent influence which has been impressed upon the History of Europe by the victorious immigrations of the Gothic Races, and their conversion to the Gospel of Truth, has been exercised on the fortunes of Asia by the overwhelming progress of the Saracens, and the fanatical impetuosity which they propagated with the sword. The overthrow of the Roman Empire proved not a more important vicissitude in the West than did the appearance of the Pseudo-prophet of the Moslems in the East; and since Christianity was already established before the Fall of the Empire, while Mohammedanism was entirely the birth and fruit of the occasion, the effects which were wrought on the Universe by the proselyting conquests of the Saracens were a far more stupendous Revolution in the Moral and Political State of Mankind, than the mere transition of Europe from the Roman to the Gothic constitution of Society. The one convulsion, so far from shaking, served only to strengthen the existing fabric of Christianity; the other swept equally before it the monuments and symbols both of Revelation and Idolatry, overthrow, wherever it penetrated, every earlier institution of human worship, and changed the religious as well as the social features of half the Countries of the known World. Nor is it the least singular circumstance in the spectacle of this mighty and enduring Revolution, that it originated in the daring imposture of one man; and the History of its creation and rise must be traced in the personal biography of Mohammed.*

The founder of that spurious Faith which has extended its dominion over so many of the fairest portions of the Globe, received his birth in an obscure region of Asia, in a dark Age, and among a fierce and barbarous People. The condition of ARABIA, a Country in several respects highly interesting by its association with the earliest scenes and events of Holy Writ, is for many centuries, both before and after the Christian Era, involved in the deepest obscurity. Of the annals of its People during the vast interval of Historical silence, little more is known than may be inferred from the permanence of that wild character among the roving Tribes of the Desert, which was first dimly traced by the finger of Prophecy, and is still stamped with the enduring impression of immemorial antiquity. In the Vth Century of Human Redemption, the sterile face of the great Peninsula, which on its Northern extremities is joined by Syria and Persia, and is bounded on other sides by the waters of the Euphrates, the Persian Gulf, the Indian Ocean, and the Red Sea,* was still, as in past and subsequent Ages, thinly overspread by a Pastoral People, dwelling by hordes and in tents, and restlessly wandering with their sheep, camels, and horses, in search of the scanty spots of herbage and water which relieve the arid expanse of the Desert.

In every Age this peculiar People have presented the same lineaments of freedom and barbarism, the same aspect of personal and national independence, the same contrast of generous hospitality with fierce spoliation; and, divested of certain romantic embellishments, the image of ancient character has been faithfully preserved in the modern Arab. The Bedouene, (or man of the Desert,) like his forefathers through countless generations, is still brave and imaginative, but vindictive and rapacious; proud of the dignity of manhood, and not perhaps incapable of elevated emotions, but a ferocious enemy and a habitual robber. His intellectual qualities are strongly reflected in his physiognomy and mien; his eye is full of fire and vivacity; his speech at once voluble

Rise of the Mohammedan Power.
From
A. D.
569. to
A. D.
632.
State of Arabia in the Vth Century.

Unchangeable character of its People.

Wandering Tribes of the Desert.

* In professing to offer a History of Mohammed, it is right to caution the reader that the original materials for the life of the false Prophet are few and most unsatisfactory. The earliest of his Muslim Biographers whose Work is extant, and the most judicious, is Ishmael Abulfeda, a Saracen Emir of Syria; but he lived so late as the XIVth Century, and he could do no more than collect those traditional particulars, which had been distorted and swollen by the superstitious exaggerations of seven hundred years. The Work of Abulfeda has been rendered accessible to the European reader by the Latin version of Gagnier. Al Jannabi, a Doctor of the Mosque, (an author also translated by Gagnier,) who lived still later, and has been too often implicitly quoted by our compilers, is the mere echo of fables, and totally unworthy of credit. Yet such are the principal sources from which the numerous modern Lives of Mohammed are composed; but the best illustrations of the character of the Impostor are to be gathered from the Koran, in the English version, and the invaluable introduction and notes of Sale. In the following pages, the conclusions of our latest Historians, Gibbon and Mills, (History of Mohammedanism;) have been carefully compared with their authorities, and freely used, though without being always adopted.

* D'Anville, Géographie Ancienne, vol. i. p. 208—230

Biography. and sententious; his countenance intelligent and penetrating; his deportment grave and manly; and his whole bearing expressive of that lofty spirit of freedom, which is the inheritance and generic attribute of his Race. The form of Government to which he submits is purely Patriarchal. The parent is the Chief of his family; and one family exercises the office of sovereignty over the whole Tribe. The order of lineal succession may be frequently violated by motives of partiality or the claims of merit; but the mutual bond of allegiance and protection between the Chieftain and his People is fixed and indissoluble.*

From A. D. 569. to A. D. 632.

Idolatrous divisions

The Tribes of Arabia, however, have not all been confined to the Pastoral condition. The Southern portion of the Peninsula, or Land of Yemen, which from its comparative fertility was distinguished, even so early as the Classical Ages, by the epithet of the Happy Arabia, has always invited its inhabitants to a life of agriculture and commerce. Its climate and soil are peculiarly adapted to the cultivation of the coffee-tree; its situation on the shores of the Indian Ocean promoted the importation of the gold, spices, and frankincense of the remoter East; and the belief of antiquity ascribed to the Arabia Felix, the native production of precious commodities, which were only poured through her bosom from the realms of India into the lap of Europe. The fixed occupations of its People, and the opulence of its trade, filled the maritime Province of the Happy Yemen with many more cities and towns than were found in the other parts of the Peninsula: but the coasts neither of the Sandy nor Stony regions which are comprised in its ancient triple division, were entirely destitute of permanent towns, which probably owed their origin to some temptation either of pasture or traffic; and in the midst of the Sandy Arabia, in particular, near the coast of the Red Sea, and at the distance from each other of about two hundred and fifty miles, arose the two principal cities of Mecca and Medina. Of these the former, which contained the CAABA, or most famous Temple of the ancient Arabian superstition, had been held in especial reverence by the Nation from a period even antecedent to the Christian Era, as the holiest seat of their idolatrous worship. While the position of Mecca on a sterile soil discouraged the occupations of agriculture, it was advantageously situated for purposes of trade; and its inhabitants were naturally attracted to commercial pursuits from the convenience with which they were enabled to interchange the commodities of Africa and India, by the transport of caravans across the desert Peninsula, from the neighbouring shore of the Red Sea to the coasts of the Persian Gulf. In like manner, their city intercepted midway the overland communication between the Indian Ocean and the Provinces of the Greek Empire; and, avoiding the dangerous navigation of the Red Sea, it was through Mecca that the rich imports of the Happy Arabia were exchanged at Damascus, for the manufactures and produce of Syria.†

Origins of the ancient laws.

These advantages added commercial wealth to the respect which the sacred city of Mecca commanded in the eyes of an idolatrous People. The Religion of the Arabs comprehended the adoration of the Sun, Moon, and fixed Stars: but the Caaba was filled with Idols; and the grosser worship of fantastic Images and emblems disfigured this natural superstition of a Race who, during their wanderings through vast Deserts, in the deep stillness of night and under the clear and lucid firmament, contemplated the mysterious splendour, of the heavenly bodies. Nor were an imaginative People without a gleam of that pure and more sublime principle of Religion, which is involved in the existence of a future state; and some fancies of the Arabs about the transmigration of souls, as well as the custom of leaving a camel to perish on the grave of the master who might require his service in another world, attested their belief of a general resurrection.*

The political features of Arabia, since no records define the wildness of its internal barbarism, can only be inferred from their connection with the affairs of the more civilized Countries which bordered on the Peninsula. During the VIth Century, we find the Tribes of the Desert, under the general name of Saraceni, (from some unknown etymology,) engaged alternately in capricious alliance and desultory hostilities with the Eastern and Persian Empires. In the two great Provinces of the Stony and Sandy Arabia, they maintained the perpetual independence of their Nation, which is equally secured by the fierce character of the roving People and the insuperable difficulties of their Country. The active Tribes of the Desert harass the advance and mock the pursuit of an invader; the secret springs elude his search; and, in the barren and scorching sands, a foreign army would perish from heat, fatigue, want of food, and ignorance of the situation of water. The general extent of Arabia has, in fact, never been subjugated; and even the victories of Trajan, though exaggerated by his flatterers into the boast of conquest, did not extend his Empire beyond the most Northern parts of the Peninsula. But the more sedentary and enervated inhabitants of the Southern, or Happy Arabia, have frequently been subdued; and towards the close of the Age under our review, the Country of Yemen had been invaded by the naval power of the Persians, and reduced to a Province of their Empire.†

In the general anarchy and common independence of Supremacy the Arabs, there are, however, traces of something like a recognised superiority of Mecca; and the petty Chieftains and Tribes both of the cultivated country and the deserts, seem to have looked up to that city as the Capital of their Nation as well as the chief seat of their Religion. In its political aspect, Mecca presented the rude shape of a Republic, in which commerce had created an opulent and powerful aristocracy; while the simplicity of Arabian manners still retained the Patriarchal gradations of government. The Koreish, a Tribe who enjoyed the greatest estimation and honour among all the Arabian communities, had acquired, whether by force or fraud, or the free choice of their Countrymen, the office of guarding the sacred Temple of the Caaba; and with the religious, they secured the temporal supremacy in the Metropolis of Arabia. It was they who established the caravans between Syria and Yemen; to the Koreish was Mecca chiefly indebted for the opulence which flowed into her streets; and the noblest youth of a fiery Race blended a passion for warfare and the Mohammed. From A. D. 569. to A. D. 632.

Their political condition.

governed by the Tribe of Koreish.

* Pocock, Specimen Historiæ Arabum, passim. Niebuhr, Description de l'Arabie, p. 328—344. Volney, Voyage en Syrie et en Egypte, p. 315—385, &c. Sale, Preliminary Discourse, sec. 1.

† Abulfeda, Descriptio Arabiæ, p. 10—40. Pocock, Specimen Hist. Arab. p. 125—128. Dillislelet, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 361—381.

* Pocock, p. 90—136, &c. Sale, Prelim. Discourse, sec. 1. † Sale, ubi supra. Pocock, p. 55—78, &c.

Biography. highest renown for warlike enterprise, with the itinerant occupations and substantial profits of a lucrative commerce.*

From
A. D.
569, to
A. D.
632.

As to the Koreish was tacitly resigned by the other Tribes the spiritual and temporal dominion of Mecca, so in that Tribe itself was obedience rendered to the sway of one family; and the House of Hascem had long supplied a hereditary line of Pontiffs to the Caaba, and of merchant Princes to the Commonwealth. They claimed with their Tribe a direct descent from Ishmael, the son of Abraham, the earlier links of which, the Arabs themselves confess, are involved in obscurity; but which, notwithstanding the scepticism of a certain class of Historians, must be readily admitted by every believer in Revelation, and is, indeed, incontrovertibly confirmed, among other proofs, by identity of peculiar habits, by the testimony of very early writers, and by unbroken tradition. Their genealogy presents a long succession of illustrious ancestors; and for many generations the race of Hascem were the noblest of their Tribe and Country.†

Descent
and birth of Mohammed.

A. D.
569.

It was from this Princely stock of Arabia, that the victorious Author of the widely extended Faith to which he has given his name, derived his parentage and birth. When he first saw the light, his grandfather Abdi-Motaleb still held the guardianship of the Caaba, and exercised the temporal sovereignty of Mecca. The power or influence of the family, however, was probably weakened by a division of its patrimony among the numerous sons of Abdi-Motaleb; the share of Abdallah the youngest was small, and had remained unimproved by the usual pursuit of commerce; and the general circumstances of their House seemed to forbode a declension in the fortunes of the Hascemites. MOHAMMED, the only son of Abdallah, and Amina, a daughter of the noble Tribe of the Zaries, was born at Mecca about the five hundred and sixty-ninth year of the Christian Era.‡ His life dawned adversely and heavily: he was early deprived by death, first of both his parents, and then of his grandfather; his uncles were numerous, strong, and rapacious; and in the partition of their father's inheritance, five camels and a single female slave comprised all the possessions which they spared to the helplessness of the orphan. The guardianship of Mohammed, however, together with the supreme office of the Religion and State, devolved on Abu-Taleb, the eldest and most respectable of his uncles, who reared him in his house with kindness and care, and instructed his youth in the national Arts of warfare and trade. Mohammed was thus suffered to attend his uncle in his journeys to the Fairs of Syria, and fought by his side in the usual feuds of the Arabian Tribes: but his early manhood was consumed without distinction, until, in his twenty-fifth year, he received the appointment of factor to Kadijah, the noble widow of a wealthy trader of Mecca, won her affections, and was shortly united to her in marriage.*

It is probable that this event, which had a sensible and immediate effect upon the temporal fortunes of Mohammed, was also remotely the cause which excited his spiritual pretensions. His marriage with Kadijah at once raised him to an equality with the most opulent merchants of Mecca, and enabled him to assert that hereditary consideration in his family and Tribe, which was due to his lineage, but had hitherto been denied to his poverty. In a lot of independence and leisure, he might nourish either the silent dreams of enthusiastic meditation, or the deep purposes of hypocritical ambition, which would have equally been dispelled and extinguished in a life of active and laborious penury. The conscious influence of his wealth and connections might encourage aspirations of fanaticism or fraud, which in neglect and indigence would never have been awakened. But ardent and expansive as was his imagination, bold and original as was his genius, the designs of the Fanatic or Impostor were slowly matured; and an interval of fifteen years† is reckoned between the date of his marriage and the first declaration of his pretended mission from Heaven.

The practices in which Mohammed is said to have consumed this long period, were such as may be ascribed indifferently to the dictates of a fervid enthusiasm, or a cool and calculating design of imposture. His deportment towards his fellow-citizens appeared to be regulated by a general spirit of courtesy and benevolence; his charities were extensive and bountiful; and his devotions to the idolatrous worship of the Caaba were performed with a regularity and strictness, which secured him the highest reputation for pious austerity. But at stated seasons he withdrew altogether from the world to fasting, meditation, and prayer, in the holy retreat of Mount Hara,‡ near Mecca; and these ascetic observances attracted the veneration of a rude and ignorant People, while they gradually sublimated his own mind into the exaltation of spiritual pride or of delusion. Some insight (which, however obtained, he unquestionably possessed) into the Sacred History of the Jews, and the text of a corrupted Christianity, led his acute intellect to discard the gross Idolatry of the Arabians; the influence which his apparent sanctity had acquired over his Countrymen was to be exercised in the inculcation of a purer Creed; and when he proclaimed himself a Prophet, the express object of his mission was to assert the Unity of the Godhead, and to restore the primitive Religion of Abraham and Ishmael.

The qualifications which he possessed for the promulgation of his doctrines, are best attested by the success of his audacious pretensions; and while we doubt the authenticity, we may admit the probable truth of the traditions,§ which attribute to him all those personal endowments, that were most likely to command the respect, and win the affections, of a barbarous but imaginative People—a handsome and noble figure, a dignified and engaging address, a fluent and persuasive eloquence. These advantages, the spontaneous gifts of Nature, were doubtless assisted by the accidents of birth and station: but it must greatly elevate the standard at

* Koran, c. 106, with Sale's notes on the Koreish. Abulfeda, De vita Mohammedi, c. 6. Pocock, p. 51. D'Herbelot, p. 361.

† Abulfeda, the first two chapters. Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet, traduite et complét de l'Alcoran, des traductions de la Somme, et des nouvelles sources Arabes, Introduction, &c.

‡ Abulfeda, c. 1. The research and calculation of the learned and laborious Benedictines (L'Art de vérifier les Dates, p. 15) have imagined the correct date of Mohammed's birth to be a year later: but the hypothesis is without foundation; and we may echo the suspicion of Gibbon (c. 50.) that "while we refine our chronology, it is possible that the illiterate Prophet was ignorant of his own age."

* Abulfeda, c. 3—6. Gagnier, c. 4.

† Abulfeda, c. 7.

‡ Ibid.

§ See those collected in Gagnier, vol. ii. p. 266, &c.

Moham-
med.
From
A. D.
569, to
A. D.
632.
And marriage.
A. D.
591, Probable growth of his fanaticism.

He assumed the title of a Prophet.
A. D.
619.

His personal apparent qualification.

Biography. which we are to estimate the prodigious force of his inherent genius, when we call to mind that he was totally unassisted by artificial culture; and we learn with astonishment, that this destined founder of a new, wide-spreading, and enduring system of Religion, in which gross imposture was blended with sublime conceptions and benevolent morality, was an unlettered and ignorant Barbarian: that he had not even been taught either to read or write,* was entirely destitute of the practical experience of civilized life, and had never remotely surveyed its aspect, save during the brief and busy commotion of a Syrian Fair.†

His first converts. When his determination to assume the Prophetic office was matured, Mohammed was accompanied by his wife and household to the usual place of his solitary meditations. It has been well observed, that the conquests of the Impostor over his family were the most arduous which he ever effected: since he presented himself as a Prophet to those, who were most conversant with his infirmities as a man.‡ Yet there is the less reason to doubt the sincerity of their belief. His first converts were his wife Kadijah; his youthful cousin Ali, the son of his uncle Abu-Taleb; his friend Abu-Beker, a respectable and wealthy citizen of Mecca of mature age; and his slave Zeid. The last of these four might be actuated by the hope of freedom or the spirit of servility: but the profession of the other three is chargeable with no motive more suspicious than the credulity of affection. When Mohammed affirmed, that the Angel Gabriel had appeared to him in a nocturnal vision, and pronounced him the Apostle of God, Kadijah was the first to credit the tale, and in the sacred office of the Prophet to honour the beloved person of a husband; young Ali accepted the pretensions of his friend and relative with the fiery spirit of juvenile fanaticism; and Abu-Beker was strangely excited to employ the influence of a calm and temperate character, in increasing the number of proselytes to the cause which he had embraced. Immediately by his reasoning or persuasion, five of the principal men of Mecca were induced privately to allure the National Idolatry, and to declare their belief in the divine mission and doctrines of Mohammed; and their example was soon followed by the voluntary conversion of five other citizens.§

He publicly preaches in new Religion at Mecca. During three years, Mohammed was sufficiently occupied in the silent conversion, or satisfied with the homage, of these fourteen disciples. But at the end of that period, either encouraged by his success or impatient at his narrow limits, he burst from the privacy in which he had hitherto withheld his pretensions, and publicly asserted both the Unity of God and his own Heavenly office. The occasion chosen was a banquet, according with the simple manners of the Arabs, to which all the males of the House of Hashem were invited; and there addressing his astonished kinsmen, about forty of whom were assembled, Mohammed informed them, that he, and he only, was empowered to dispense the most precious of gifts, the treasures both of this world and of the next. "God," he continued, "has commanded me to call you to his service. Who among you will share my burthen? who will be my companion, my fellow-labourer, my Veizir?" The appeal was received with silent astonishment, and perhaps with secret derision: until Ali, who had impatiently waited in expectation that some one of the elders of the House would have joyfully accepted the proposal, exclaimed in the phrenzy of enthusiasm—"O Apostle of the one God, I am the man! whosoever shall rise up against thee, I will dash out his teeth, pluck forth his eyes, break his legs, and tear open his bowels! O Prophet of God, I will be thy Veizir." Mohammed embraced his young proselyte with transport, and blessed him as his brother, his friend, and the chosen assistant of his sacred office. It was in vain that Abu-Taleb prohibited the wild folly of his son, and endeavoured to dissuade his nephew from the prosecution of his fanatical design. Mohammed replied only by the asseveration, that though the Sun should be set against his course on the right hand, and the Moon on his left, he would still persevere; the son of Abu-Taleb was equally immovable in his fidelity; and the venerable Chieftain, finding his influence unavailing to arrest the purpose of his relatives, exerted his power for their protection against the animosity which their departure from the Idolatrous Faith of their forefathers had provoked in their Tribe.*

The fundamental doctrines of the Religion which, under the general name of Islam,† Mohammed now began publicly to preach at Mecca, involved two primary articles of belief, and four positive duties of pious obligation.‡ The confession of Musulman Faith is comprised in the discordant and blasphemous union of Eternal Truth and audacious imposture: that there is only one God, and that Mohammed is the Apostle of God.§ To assert the Divine Unity, to reclaim the World from Idolatry and error, and to restore Religion to its pristine purity, was the peculiar office allotted to the Apostle, the last and greatest of the Prophets. The secondary object of his mission was to inculcate to mankind the great duties of practical piety in prayer, fasting, almsgiving, and pilgrimage to the holy Temple of Mecca. The first three of these cardinal duties are stamped with the original purpose of a new system, or the imitation of a purer Creed: but the fourth was evidently added in conformity to the immemorial prejudices of the Arabs in favour of the sanctity of the Caaba; and the injunction to worship in that Temple, was a compromise with the rites of ancient Idolatry, which the Impostor, perhaps, found it difficult to abolish, and could only divert to the honour of the one God.

In the progress of his imposture, Mohammed was taught the necessity of inventing an express Revelation of the Divine Will, both to assert the direct authority of his mission, and to methodize the doctrinal and moral code of his system. For these purposes he delivered to his proselytes from time to time such portions of the pretended Word of God as the enthusiasm, or passion, or policy of the moment suggested; and these Mohammed.

From A. D. 569. to A. D. 632.

His doctrines and precepts.

I. One God, and Mohammed his Prophet

II. Four cardinal duties: prayer, fasting, almsgiving, and pilgrimage.

The Koran.

* Abulfeda, c. 7. whose appeal to tradition corresponds with the Koran, c. 7. wherein Mohammed calls himself, or is called, expressly, the "Ultimate Prophet." (Sole's version;) and again, c. 29. "Thou couldst not read any book," &c. Also Sole, Primum Discoursus, sec. 2.
† Abulfeda, c. 7.
‡ Gibbon, c. 50. (vol. ix. p. 282. Edit. 1807.)
§ Abulfeda, c. 8.

* Abulfeda, c. 8.

† Islam, or Islamism, signifies the total resignation of body and soul to God. It also means the Mohammedan World, and is, therefore, of the same acceptation among the Mohammedans, as the words Christianity and Christendom among Christians. Mill, p. 27. Hence is derived Moslem, or Musulman, a professor of Islam.
‡ Vide the Koran, passim, with the Introductory discourse, and the notes of Sale.
§ Allah is Allah, Mohammed resal Allah.

Biography. accumulated dictations supplied the substance or groundwork for the volume which, under the Arabic term of AL-KORAN, or the Book fit to be read, or that which ought to be read,* defines and preserves the Faith and Ordinances of Islam. As these fragments were orally promulgated by the illiterate Prophet, they were eagerly committed to writing by his fanatic auditory, if we may credit the vulgar traditions, on the leaves of the palmtree, and the shoulder-bones of mutton, or more probably on the skins of animals.

Probable history of its composition.

We may suspect that the whole tale of the original composition of the Koran is enveloped in even greater uncertainty and fable than the actions of its reputed author. According to the common account, the materials on which its desultory portions had been inscribed, were thrown, without arrangement or connection, into a chest, which remained, during the life of Mohammed, in the custody of one of his favourite wives; and two years after his death, the writings were collected, set in due order, and copied into a volume, by his friend and successor, Abu-Beker.† On the other hand, it has been also traditionally asserted, that the original promulgation, though evidently delivered at intervals, to suit the convenience and obey the varying circumstances of the imposture, was more systematic and careful; that the Pseudo-prophet was assisted in its composition by a heretic Monk, or at least by some apostate Christian or Jew;‡ and that the appearance of the collected volume is coeval with the life-time of Mohammed himself. Still more to perplex the question of Historical contradiction, modern writers have variously imagined internal evidence equally positive, that the uniformity of the Work denotes the hand of a single artist,§ and that the Koran is indebted to several hands for its present contents.||

But it can only be authenticated with tolerable precision, that, soon after the death of Mohammed, a complete collection of the Koran was made by the labour or under the orders of Abu-Beker; that, about twenty years later, the Khalif Othman, under the plea of correcting the numerous errors which had already crept into the sacred text, promulgated a second and thorough revision of the Work; and that this version is the same which is still used by the Mohammedan World.¶ With how much fidelity either Abu-Beker or Othman performed or authorized the editorial office, it is now of course impossible to determine and useless to inquire: but it is highly probable that, in the hands of both, the progress of the Religion, and the circumstances of its temporal power, may have suggested many important interpolations and additions to the spurious revelations of its founder. This suspicion is strengthened by the traditionary acknowledgment that Abu-Beker received only the disjointed materials of his Work, and that Othman found it more easy or convenient to destroy the copies of the original volume and to publish a new Koran, than to correct the various readings of the old one; and we may altogether assent to the caution, that the existing text can scarcely be assumed to offer either a correct transcript from the original system of the reputed author, or a perfect image of his thoughts.*

But whatever doubt may be raised on the entire authenticity of the Koran, as wholly the Work of the pretended Prophet himself, there can be none on the sources from which its contents were derived. By whomever composed, it is, in the better portions of its thoughts and diction, a palpable imitation of the Holy Scriptures: though its system is but the base counterfeit of even the corrupted Christianity of the Eastern Churches; still further adulterated by admixture with the fictions of Rabbinical tradition, the dreams of the Persian Magi, and the gross Idolatry of the ancient Arabians. In the Vth Century, Arabia had afforded a common refuge to various Heretical Sects of Christians, to the Jews, and to the Disciples of Zoroaster. The Koran was heterogeneously compounded of the sacred truths, the false legends, and the wild fables, which were to be gathered from the incongruous doctrines and opinions of all these people. The assertion of the Unity of God, and the inculcation of His worship, in the purity of which the followers of the Koran make their chief boast, and in which, indeed, the real superiority of the Musulman over other false Creeds mainly consists, are obviously derived from the Pentateuch; and whatever just conceptions of the attributes of the one Almighty Creator, as a Being of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, are found in the Koran, may, in like manner, be traced to the divine original of the Christian Scriptures. Lest this should admit of any question, the Historical allusions of the pseudo-revelation expressly refer to the events and recognise the sacred character of the true one, even while they pervert its object and falsify its Word. The divine mission both of Moses and of Christ is studiously acknowledged: though almost every circumstance in the life of each is disfigured with the absurdities of the Rabbinical legends and spurious Gospels. The necessity of exalting the revelations of Islam above those of Christianity, guided the authors of the Koran in their abuse of the Scriptural materials; and the example of the Arian Heretics taught them impiously to degrade the Saviour of Mankind into a mere mortal,† greater indeed than all the preceding Prophets, but inferior to Mohammed, the last and most illustrious Apostle of God, the prefigured Paraclete, or Comforter of the Gospel. The Jews are condemned for having rejected the Messiah; the Christians for asserting His Divinity, and corrupting the text of His Gospel. The reality of His Crucifixion is denied; and it is asserted, that the substitution on the Cross of an undefined Being in His likeness, defeated the malice of His enemies, while the Messiah himself was caught up into the third Heaven.

While these circumstantial falsifications of Sacred History betray also the degree in which the compounders of the Koran were indebted to the Old and New Testaments for the juster and more elevated views of the Divine Attributes which are infused into their system; it is equally easy to trace the lower and grosser portions of the scheme to a very different original. Rejecting the rewards offered by the Gospel in an eternal state, of such blissful purity as sanctified souls may be expected to enjoy, it was from the imaginings of the Persian Magi that Mohammed borrowed his fanciful con-

Mohammed.
From A. D. 569. to A. D. 632. Its sources.

I. A corruption of the Holy Scriptures.

II. The Rabbinical legends, and spurious Gospels.

III. The fables of the Persian Magi;

* Sale, Preliminary Discourse, sec. 3.

† See Sale, ubi supra.

‡ Sale, note to Koran, c. 16. in which the Impostor himself has recorded the general suspicions of his unbelieving Countrymen.

§ Sale, Gibbon, (vol. ix. p. 259.) &c.

|| See particularly an Article in the Retrospective Review (vol. iii. p. 1-22) on the Koran.

¶ Sale, Prod. Dis. sec. 3. Mills, p. 278. Retrospective Review, vol. iii. p. 11.

* Retrospective Review; ubi supra.

† Koran, c. 3, 4. &c.

Mohammed.
From
A. D.
569. to
A. D.
632.

Biography.
From
A. D.
569. to
A. D.
632.

ceptions of the Spiritual World, his puerile machinery of Angels, Genii, and Devils, the local habitation of his Hell, and the voluptuous enjoyments of his Paradise. The Demonology of Mohammed is but a copy of that of Zoroaster or his followers; the Eblis, or Satan of the Muslims, is precisely the Ahriman, or Arimanus, of the Magi; the hair-breadth bridge, Al Sirat, that spans the gulf of torments to the threshold of the seventh Heaven, is evidently of Persian creation; and the Houris, or black-eyed virgins of Paradise, who are to minister to the delights of the virtuous believer, are but the Houri Behast, with whom the Magians had peopled their region of beatitude.* The ever verdant groves and gardens, the marble palaces and precious gems, and all the allurements, pomp, and circumstance, in which the Oriental imagination can embody and enhance the most exquisite creations of earthly luxury, belong in common to the Hindu, the Magian, and the Mohammedan abodes of eternal felicity.†

And IV.
The old Arabian idolatrie,

Amidst its distortions of Holy Scripture, and its spoiliations from the Magian system, the Koran, lastly, exhibits the traces of the old Arabian superstition; and notwithstanding its boasted denunciations against Idolatry, the positive injunction of the pilgrimage to Mecca identifies the Religion of Islam with the Pagan worship, which Mohammed declared it was one of the objects of his mission to extirpate. The inexplicable sanctity of the Caaba, and the adoration of its black stone, are revered and practised as senselessly by the devout Musulman as by the ancient Idolater; and the preservation of these unmeaning rites is a proof of the degree in which Mohammed, either actuated by his own early prejudices, or unable to overcome the influence of venerated customs in his followers, infused the gross Paganism of his own Country, as well as the more spiritual system of Zoroaster, into his pretended reformation of the true Faith.‡

Literary character of the Koran.

The Koran is written in the idiom which was used at Mecca by the Tribe of Koreish, confessedly the purest and most refined among the ancient dialects of Arabia; and from every motive of Religion and taste, the text of the sacred volume has naturally, therefore, been received by the Arabs as the general standard of their Language. But the modern variations of the Arabic are as numerous as the Countries of Islam in which it is still used; and Time, with its usual corruptions, has so changed the vulgar speech in the Peninsula itself that the Arabic of the Koran is now taught even at Mecca as a dead Language. All competent opinions are agreed that the style and diction of the volume in the original, though with many irregularities, are magnificent, harmonious, and elegant;§ and its composition is esteemed by the learned devotees of the Mosque to be both inimitable and miraculous. They, indeed, have been anticipated by the Pseudo-prophet himself, in challenging either Angels or Men to imitate the transcendent beauties of a single passage; and with an audacious confidence in the power of his imposture, or under a stranger delusion of enthusiasm, Mohammed appeals to the perfection of his revelations for a sufficient proof of their divine origin, and dares to assert that God alone could deliver a Work so incomparable.* It is not improbable that its harmony of expression had a great effect in captivating the untutored Asiatic mind, which is very susceptible of the music of sounds, and easily wrought by them to ecstasy.

The rhythmical melody, which is so much admired in the Language of the Koran by the learned Moslems, and attested by every Arabic scholar among the Christians, is lost in our translations; but in real elevation of thought and sentiment, its style will not sustain the remotest comparison with the Bible; and its most applauded periods fall immeasurably below the eloquence, the grandeur, the transcendent sublimity, of what may be termed parallel passages in those Books of the Old Testament from which the Impostor so largely borrowed. The Christian reader will be shocked by the admixture of Divine Truth with incoherent rhapsody and grovelling absurdity; he will wade with impatience through the endless mass of History and Fable, precept and declamation; and his reason will be perpetually disgusted with the contrast of benevolent morality and vindictive retaliation, of peaceful forbearance and intolerant fury. As the portions of the Koran were delivered at different periods and places, and adapted to the shifting emergencies of every occasion, however solemn or trifling, the whole compilation is full of disagreements; and throughout the Work the convenient doctrine of the Impostor that any text might be altogether or modified by a subsequent revelation, is required to reconcile a thousand contradictions. Thus the parts earliest promulgated, while the Prophet was powerless, speak the language of peace, mercy, and toleration; the later revelations, after the establishment of his authority, breathe nothing but fiery denunciations against his enemies and against unbelievers, and the fiercest spirit of religious persecution. Such inconsistencies, like the dispensing doctrine which can reconcile them only by offensively attributing their irresolute purpose to the immediate act of God, discover the grossness of the imposture, and detract from the merits of the Koran as a consistent and skilful performance. But it is these contradictions which serve also most strongly to confirm the traditional account of its delivery in portions; and which offer the least suspicious evidence for the authenticity of the Koran, or the agreement of the existing text with the desultory revelations of the original Impostor.

‡ The Koran is the basis of the Moral and Juridical system, as well as of the Theology of the Moslem World; and the necessary union of the highest Judicial with the Sacerdotal offices in every Mohammedan

Moral and Juridical system of the Koran.

* Hyde, Hist. Religiois Veterum Persarum, p. 244—402, passim.

† The common origin also of the Hindu and Magian pictures of Paradise, is rendered highly probable by their resemblance; and this internal evidence gives more weight than would otherwise attach to a curious passage in Ammianus Marcellinus, (lib. xxiii. 6.) which asserts that the Magi borrowed many of their doctrines from the Brahmins.

‡ Sale, Prod. Dis. sec. 4. and 5th.
§ Sale, sec. 3. Mills, p. 280.

* Koran, c. 2. 11. and (more expressly) c. 17.
† The Sonno, however, or traditional law, is also venerated and recognised by the Moslem World as an authority second only to the Koran itself. Under this term (which signifies custom or ordinance) are comprised all the records of the sayings and actions of the Prophet, which are supposed to have been derived from the oral testimony of his wives and contemporary disciples. Of these collections there are several highly esteemed by the Orthodox Sonites or Musulman Traditionists: but the most famous of all is the Sahuk (or Genuine Book) of Ali Bochari, which was compiled about two hundred years after the death of Mohammed. D'Hierbriet, Bib. Orient. Arts Sahuk and Bochari. And see also a note of Ganguier to the XIXth chapter of Abulfele.

Biography.

From
A. D.
569, to
A. D.
639.

Country, explains the direct application of the Religious and Moral Code of Islam, to the business of Criminal and Civil Jurisprudence. Mohammed constituted himself a Legislator as well as a Prophet; Legal enactments are loosely interspersed throughout his Work among Ethical doctrines and Moral precepts; and his revelation provides, though without any methodical arrangement, or apparent uniformity of design, for all the social exigencies of a rude and simple constitution of Society. The four primary obligations of prayer and ablation, fasting, alms-giving, and the pilgrimage to Mecca, are enforced by the hopes and the fears of reward and punishment in Eternity. The prohibition of gaming, usury, wine, and interdicted meats, is accompanied with the same threatenings of divine wrath; such vices as are least cognizable by spiritual laws, covetousness, prodigality, falsehood, slander, perjury, are more specially declared to be held in abhorrence by God; and general exhortations to the virtues of mutual charity, benevolence, justice, forgiveness of injuries, gratitude to benefactors, and reverence for parents and superiors, are strengthened with the promises of everlasting felicity. The ordinances of marriage and polygamy, of divorce, dowry, and inheritance, the relations of debtor and creditor, are specially defined; and the crimes of murder, adultery, theft, and personal injury, are severally visited with the gradations of judicial punishment. But a minute analysis of the religious doctrines, the moral precepts, and the social ordinances of the Koran is beyond the scope of our present subject; and it will be sufficient for the purpose if the general sketch which we have given of the evident sources and the principal characteristics of Islamism, shall illustrate the life of its extraordinary author, and the History of the spiritual and temporal Empire which he founded.*

Slow progress of the new Religion for ten years.

A. D.
612,
to
A. D.
622.

The progress of his Religion, even after he had formally assumed the Prophetic office at Mecca, was for ten years extremely laborious and slow. But he persevered through every discouragement and difficulty: dictating at intervals to his disciples in private the fragments of the Koran; preaching incessantly in public at the Caaba the doctrines and promises of his pretended revelations; exhorting his fellow-citizens and the pilgrim strangers to quit their gross Idolatry for the pure worship of the one God; summoning them to repentance, prayer, and good works; and endeavouring to allure their faith by glowing pictures, the most captivating to a People so prone to the indulgence of imagination and the senses, of a Paradise of eternal voluptuousness. But the inhabitants of Mecca were made obstinate either by prejudice or incredulity; the Koreish, especially, were indignant or alarmed at doctrines which denounced the established superstition, and endangered their own supremacy together with that of the idolatrous worship; and even the uncles of Mohammed, as well as the other elders of the City and Tribe, united in denouncing the presumption of the Reformer. When he dwelt, in his orations at the Caaba, on the sublime attributes of the Divine Unity, he was interrupted by the clamours of his own Tribe and relations, the privileged guardians of the Temple and its Idols, who exhorted the people and pilgrims to "hearken not to the deceiver or his impious innovations, to stand fast in the worship of Al Lât and Al Uzza;" when he appealed to the inimitable beauties of the Koran, to attest the truth of his divine mission, his opposers taunted him to produce visible signs from Heaven; and the people loudly echoed the demand for miracles. He could only reply through the Koran that, if they would not already believe in God's word as there promulgated, "though a revelation were given by which mountains should be removed, or the Earth cleaved in sunder, or the dead be caused to speak, it would be in vain;"† and that "nothing had hindered God from sending him (like former Prophets) with miracles, except that the former nations had charged them with imposture."‡ But these curious passages could scarcely convince or silence the unbelieving Koreish; and they have survived only to reveal to us the weakness of Mohammed, and the obstacles which he encountered.‡

Of the proximate circumstances which, notwithstanding the hostility of the Koreish, enabled him to triumph over these obstacles, few authentic particulars are preserved. It is probable that persecution wrought its ordinary effects in strengthening the numbers and energy of the converts to the new Faith: it is certain that, though Abu-Taleb violently condemned the new doctrines of his nephew, he exerted his temporal authority to protect the person of a relative whom he loved, against the assaults of his enemies; and the whole family of the Haschemites, when the rest of the Koreish began actually to menace one of their members, were naturally united to repel an assault, which originated as much in the jealousy felt by the rest of the Tribe at the long preponderance of their House, as in religious indignation against the individual Reformer. Nourished amidst this petty conflict of faction and the excitement which it produced, the new opinions, if they escaped a total proscription, were sure to gain ground; and the number of proselytes at Mecca, in the seventh year of the Prophet's preaching, may be inferred from the flight of eighty-three men and eighteen women, the least resolute or worst protected of the converts, who sought refuge in Ethiopia against the violence of the Koreish.§

That Tribe, finding that Mohammed was still supported by his family, solemnly engaged themselves to renounce all intercourse with the children of Haschem and to hold them at deadly feud, until they should deliver up the Impostor to condign punishment for his blasphemy against the Gods. At this juncture, the death of Abu-Taleb increased the imminent peril of Mohammed; and the loose administration of the State passing on this event, through some unexplained revolution, Mohammed.

From
A. D.
569, to
A. D.
632.

Probable causes of its subsequent success.

Mohammed persecuted by the Koreish.

* For a more elaborate view of the Koran, the inquisitive reader may be referred to several sources of information. The Preliminary Discourse and notes of Sale's translation form an admirable commentary on the text of the Work; the remarks of Gibbon (c. 50.) display as usual his extent of research and his malvolence against Christianity; the Paper in the Retrospective Review already quoted, though perhaps expressed in somewhat confident terms, is well written, and evinces considerable acquaintance with its subject; and the Vth chapter of Mill's History of Muhammedanism, presents an able digest. All these materials have been consulted and occasionally used. The Historical nature of our present rapid sketch has forbidden us from considering Mr. Forster's bold and most ingenious hypothesis in his Mohammedanism Unveiled, a Work which has, perhaps, concentrated more information respecting the doctrine of the Prophet than any other which can be named.

• Koran, c. 13.

† Ibid. c. 17.

‡ Abulfeda, c. 8—18.

§ Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet, lib. i. c. 10.

from the House of Haschem to the rival family of Omnia, the Prophet was left destitute of the only support which had hitherto protected him at Mecca. The loss at the same time of his faithful partner Kadijah completed the measure of his political and domestic calamities; his life was solemnly devoted by a secret conspiracy of the Koreish; and the discovery of the plot gave him the only alternative of death or immediate flight.*

Against this extremity, a refuge not only of safety but of triumph was already prepared for him. About the twelfth year of his ministry, during a pilgrimage to the Caaba, several of the most eminent men of Medina had been converted by his preaching; and on their return home, these noble proselytes had zealously diffused a knowledge of his revelation among their fellow-citizens. Through what means the public mind of Medina was peculiarly disposed for the reception of the Faith of Islam, we are not clearly informed: though it is vaguely conjectured that the settlement of two Jewish colonies in the place might have shaken the credit of the old Idolatry, and introduced a better spirit of religious inquiry. But, from whatever cause prepared, it is evident that the success of the new Religion among the people of Medina was rapid and general. In that city it appears to have encountered no opposition or jealousy through its progress, and to have left no seeds of dimension on its establishment. A first embassy of twelve persons, from the two rival Tribes which divided the sovereignty of Medina, was deputed to offer the profession of their faith to the Prophet of God; and secretly meeting him by night on a hill near Mecca, they engaged themselves by a solemn oath, in the name of their families and absent brethren, to renounce Idolatry and to obey him in all things reasonable.

When the increasing danger of the Prophet's position at Mecca suggested the necessity of temporal aid, this religious covenant was enlarged into a political association; and a second mission from Medina, consisting of seventy-three men and two women, who had embraced the Faith of Islam, arrived at Mecca, to establish the relations of mutual dependence and fidelity between their Apostle, his kindred, and his native disciples. On the same spot, and with the same secrecy as before, Mohammed, attended by some of his family and followers, joined the converts of Medina in a second nocturnal conference; and in the result of this interview has been traced the first germ of the mighty Empire of the Saracens.† The religious and political confederates pledged themselves, their property, and their lives, to each other in the common cause of Islam. In the name of the People of Medina, the new proselytes offered their city for an asylum to their Apostle, if he should be banished from Mecca; proposed to receive him as their leader; and vowed to obey and defend him in all things to the uttermost extremity. On his part, they required only that, if he should be recalled by his own city, he should not abandon them: he answered with consummate art, that henceforth all things would, equally by the ties of honour and interest, be in common between them. They anxiously desired to know their reward if they should be slain in his service: "Paradise," was the emphatic reply of the audacious Impostor.

The promise at once confirmed their faith, excited the flame of martial fanaticism, and stimulated the desires of their sensual in-aginations. They eagerly demanded and clasped the pledge of his outstretched hand, and reiterated their oath of obedience and fidelity: the People of Medina ratified the engagement; and their unanimous profession of Islam was the immediate and sufficient symbol of their sincerity.*

In default of any better authenticated records, the traditions of the Muslims have preserved some interesting particulars of their Prophet's memorable escape from the assassins of the Koreish.† After providing for the safety of his disciples, by directing them to retire to Medina, Mohammed himself remained at Mecca with only Abu-Beker and Ali for companions, when he discovered a plot for his murder. It was in the dead of night, and not until the conspirators were already besetting his door, that Mohammed silently quitted his house; while the heroic Ali, folding himself in the green mantle, and reclining on the couch of the Prophet, personated his figure, and calmly awaited the death which was intended for his friend. The murderers, who watched through the night to prevent the escape of the Prophet, and believed that it was he whom, through the crevice of the door, they discerned still sleeping, were not undeceived until they saw Ali arise from the bed in the morning. They forbore to punish the generous devotion of the youthful fanatic; but commenced an earnest pursuit of Mohammed, who, with his remaining friend, Abu-Beker, had already effected his escape from the city.

For three days the fugitives lurked concealed among the recesses of a cavern in the vicinity of Mecca; and as the diligence of their enemies explored every haunt in the neighbourhood, the orthodox Muslims believe that they were indebted to a series of miracles for their preservation: that the emissaries of the Koreish were suddenly stricken with blindness; that pigeons built their nests at the mouth of the cave of retreat after the Prophet went in, so that it should seem to the pursuers not to have been entered; and that spiders wove their webs across the inlet for the same providential design.‡ In this perilous sojourn, the pious confidence of the Fanatic, or the inflexible courage of the Impostor, did not desert him. The dread of discovery in the cave, and of an unequal contest with their numerous pursuers, drew a remark from the despairing Abu-Beker, that there were but two of them. "There is yet a third," was the rebuke, or the consolatory rejoinder of his companion: "there is yet a third, even God himself."|| As soon as the ardour of pursuit had subsided, Mohammed and Abu-Beker, emerging from the cavern, effected their escape to Medina; and the HIGRA,¶ or flight of the Bell-Hisra.

Mohammed.
From
A. D.
569, to
A. D.
632.
Plot of the Koreish to murder Mohammed.

His flight from Mecca.

A. D.
622.

* Abulfeda, ubi supra. Gagnier, lib. i. c. 16.
† Abulfeda, ibid. See also D'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. p. 445. Sale, Prod. Isa. vol. 3. 8c.

‡ Koran, c. 36. with Sale's fifth note.
§ D'Herbelot, ubi supra.

¶ Koran, c. 9.

|| On the precise date of the Hégira, the opinions of chronologists have been divided. But the most common and probable conclusion has fixed it on the 16th of July, a. s. 622. This solemn commemoration of the great religious and political epoch of Islam, was instituted by the Khalif Omar, in imitation of the Era of the Persecution of Dioclesian, from which the Christians were accustomed to reckon their time. About thirty-two of our solar years correspond to thirty-three of the Hégira. D'Herbelot, (Ant. Hégira, p. 144.) and Milla, p. 21

* Abulfeda, c. 18—23. Gagnier, lib. ii. c. 14.

† Gibbon, vol. ix. p. 290.

Biography.

From
A. D.
569. to
A. D.
632.

Entrance of Mohammed into Medina;

and establishment there of his twofold reign, as a Prince and a Prophet.

Altered tone of his pretended revolutions.

He declares the divine commission to propagate his Faith by the sword.

Prophet, has afforded the epoch from which the nations of Islam still commemorate the establishment of their Faith, and calculate the revolutions of their lunar years.

It was on the morning of the seventeenth day after his departure from Mecca, that Mohammed reached the gates of the city of refuge. Five hundred of its noblest inhabitants had advanced to meet him; a turban was unfurled before him for a standard; and mounted on a camel, under the shade of an umbrella of palm-leaves, the Pseudo-prophet made his triumphal entry into Medina, amidst the enthusiastic acclamations of a devoted multitude. Symbols of temporal as well as spiritual supremacy accompanied this procession, and Mohammed had no sooner established himself at Medina than he assumed the twofold office of a Prince and a Prophet. By the People of that city, his authority as a Sovereign was zealously accepted, and profoundly venerated; his disciples of Mecca, who had been dispersed by the persecution, gathered round his person, and swelled the number of his subjects; and the success with which he prevented the growth of discord and jealousy between his old and new proselytes, and united them in mutual love and common devotion to his cause, displays the extent of his power, and the wonderful ability with which it was exercised. As his subjects were divided into Mohagerians, or exiles from Mecca, and Ansars, or auxiliaries of Medina, he prevailed on the principal men of both parties solemnly to pledge themselves to each other, as brothers and comrades; and the bonds of this sacred fraternity cemented the domestic and martial union of the two classes in the generous contention of fidelity and valour. To command the unlimited obedience of his people, and to cherish their religious faith, the Sovereign of Medina constantly blended the exercise of his Apostolic and Political functions. A rude Mosque, which he built at Medina, together with a residence equally rude for himself, were the simple seats of his Court; and leaning against the trunk of a palm-tree, or supported in a rough pulpit of timber, he regularly prayed and preached and poured forth his inspiration to the assembly of the Faithful.*

But the language which he breathed was no longer that of forbearance and peace. Hitherto he had employed only the weapons of eloquence; and whatever success he had obtained at Mecca at the outset in disseminating his doctrines must be attributed to persuasion alone: he now began to adopt a far different method for the propagation of his Religion. Until his reception at Medina, he had constantly declared that he was commissioned only to preach and admonish; he had exhorted his disciples to patience against the injurious conduct and blindness of unbelievers; and he had disclaimed any authority from God to enforce the profession of Islam: he had no sooner acquired the power of facing his enemies, than he changed his strain into a tone of fierce and sanguinary intolerance, which shows that his earlier moderation was the effect of weakness alone. Intoxicated by his success, and elevated with spiritual pride or ambition, he proclaimed that the season of God's indulgence to infidels was past, and announced the divine commission to overthrow the emblems of Idolatry, to propagate the true Faith by the sword, and to fight against unbelievers to the death, until they should accept the alternative of conversion or tribute. The portions of the Koran which were first delivered at

Medina enjoin the Prophet to stir up his followers to war with unbelievers as a positive duty,* and hold out the most exquisite joys of Paradise to such of the Faithful as shall expend their blood and lives in the cause. Nor did Mohammed neglect to offer more immediate rewards of earthly possessions to the cupidity of his proselytes. A divine command was invented to regulate a just division of all warlike spoils. One-fifth of the booty was reserved to the Prophet for pious and charitable uses, and the remainder was to be equitably shared among the victorious warriors, and the widows and orphans of the slain; the female prisoners were declared a lawful prey to the sensuality of their captors; and the indulgence of avarice and lust was thus made both the temporal and eternal promise of Religion! The doctrine of predestination, which was strongly inculcated in the Koran, and has always continued so remarkable an article of the Musliman's creed, added its incentive of reckless confidence to a courageous race, whose susceptible imaginations were already enchanted, and whose devout enthusiasm was kindled, by the visions of Paradise, and the fancied commands of the Almighty. The first disciples of Mohammed—and their descendants even in latter Ages have frequently renewed their example—rushed upon battle, certainly without the fear, if not with the positive hope, of meeting death in the encounter: secure that their fate was already ordained; that if their hour was not come they were safe; and that if it had arrived, it was inevitable; and that the sword of the infidel was a sure passport to the realms of beatitude.†

With their native intrepidity doubly steeled by this mixture of enthusiasm and stoicism, we need feel no wonder that the fanatical proselytes of Mohammed were rapidly victorious over the rest of their Countrymen who wanted the same stimulus of passion. But the first warlike enterprises of the new sectaries, savoured more of the usual Arabian characteristics of robbery and feud, than of religious hostility. The position of Medina, in the direct route between Damascus and Mecca, seems to have tempted Mohammed and his followers to revenge the persecution which they had suffered, by intercepting and plundering the Syrian caravans of the Korish. The indignation of that powerful Tribe was roused by the insult against their fugitive rebel, his followers, and supporters; in order to protect their trade, they invaded the territory of Medina with the whole military force of Mecca; and the first regular war which the author of the Religion of the Koran was compelled to support, was one of defence against his native Tribe and city. The numbers of the Korish were one hundred horse and eight hundred and fifty foot: the force with which the new Ruler of Medina could oppose them amounted only in all to three hundred and thirteen, exiles and auxiliaries, of whom seventy were mounted on camels.

Notwithstanding this disparity, Mohammed boldly awaited the attack of his persecutors in the vale of Bedier, about thirty miles from Medina; and the circumstances of the encounter strikingly exhibit the influence either of his enthusiasm or his artifice. As the array of the Korish descended from the hills, he exclaimed aloud, "Oh God, if these thy servants be destroyed, by whom wilt Thou be worshipped on earth?—Courage, my children, close your ranks, shoot your arrows toge-

Mohammed.
From
A. D.
569. to
A. D.
632.

His war with the Korish and their allies.

Battle of Bedier.
A. D.
629.

* Abulfeda, c. 24—44. Gagnier, l. iii. c. 1. &c.

* Koran, c. 8, 9. &c.
† Ibid. c. 3, 4, 17. &c.

Biography. ther, and the victory is unto you." Then, at the first onset, he retired apart and in safety from the javelins of the enemy, with his friend Abu-Beker, to a throne or pulpit of wood, and prayed to God for the succour of Gabriel and a legion of Angels. But he no sooner perceived that the impetuous assault of the Koreish was bearing down the courage of his followers, than he sprang from his retreat, mounted his horse, and advancing at a gallop, threw a handful of sand into the air, and cried with a loud voice, "Let their faces be covered with confusion." The tremendous invocation struck the ears of the combatants on either side with very different effect: to the excited imagination of the Muslims it seemed that a host of Angels obeyed the call of their Prophet, and they immediately raised the cry of devotion and victory, "Allah Akbar!" The Koreish also, believing that the Powers of Heaven were arrayed against them, were as suddenly panic-stricken; they wavered, and fled, and were totally defeated.*

Victory of Mohammed.

His subsequent defeat at Uhud.

Defeat of the Bani, or of the Nations.

The battle of Beder, while it extended the renown and established the temporal fortunes of Mohammed, served also to inflame the revengeful hatred of his enemies and the presumptuous confidence of his proselytes. Abu Sofian, the Omniaden Ruler of Mecca, was stimulated to increased efforts both by the disgrace of this defeat, and the subsequent loss of a rich caravan which was intercepted in the Desert by the Muslims; and he took the field again at the head of a far more formidable force than before of the Koreish and their allies. To his array of three thousand men, well appointed with armour, and mounted on a train of as many camels and horses, Mohammed could still oppose only nine hundred and fifty soldiers. The disparity of numbers was not greater than at Beder; but on the field of Uhud, near Medina, the overweening rashness and disobedience of his disciples exposed the Pseudo-apostle to a signal defeat. He himself was wounded in the face, and seventy of his disciples were slain: but he retrieved a disaster, which threatened to impair his prophetic credit, by his admirable conduct in the field, and afterwards accounted for it as a punishment on the sins of his people.† Even after their victory, the progress of the Koreishites was arrested; and it was not until the following year that, with a confederate array of ten thousand men from the idolatrous Tribes of Arabia, Abu Sofian and the Koreish ventured to lay siege to Medina. But his Musliman defenders, only three thousand in number, were secured by an intrenchment; and this war of the Ditch, as it was thence called, or of the Nations, from the various Tribes who were engaged in it, ended without any decisive engagement, in the gradual dispersion of the confederates.‡

* Koran, c. 3. 8. with Sale's notes. Abulfeda, c. 27. Gagnier, l'ie de Mahomet, vol. ii. p. 30—33.
† Koran, c. 3.
‡ Abulfeda, c. 29—42. Gagnier, vol. ii. p. 34—138. passim.
VOL. XI

engaged against the Infidels. It is more important to confine our attention to a rapid survey of the course by which he finally effected his restoration to his native city, and completed the conquest of all Arabia.

Some of the latter portions of his career, indeed, present him to our observation much rather in the character of a wily politician than of a fanatical warrior. By every motive of passion and interest, he was urged to attempt the conquest of Mecca, the place of his birth, and the throne of his persecutors; the metropolis of Arabia, and the seat of his holiest Temple. Two years after the failure of the Koreish and their confederates in the attack upon Medina, the Prophet of Islam, with a rashness, the disgrace of which was only redeemed by his subsequent address, announced the divine assurance of protection in a pilgrimage or expedition to the City of the Caaba. He set out with a force of fourteen hundred men; but if he hoped either to force his way at the lance's point, or to enter Mecca unopposed and secure his possession by artifice, he was at first equally disappointed in both expectations. The Koreish opposed his march with superior numbers; the strength and firmness of their attitude rendered the issue of an encounter very doubtful; and the Impostor, in prudent oblivion of the Heavenly promise which he had proclaimed, at once sank his spiritual commission and title of Apostle, and condescended to treat with the Koreish only as a temporal Chieftain. He thus obtained by a truce with that Tribe, though at the expense of some credit as a Prophet, the ostensible purpose of his expedition, the license of visiting the Caaba with his friends, but only as brief sojourners and pilgrims; and by this temperate stipulation he probably also prepared the means of success for his ultimate designs. The Koreish withdrew by Treaty to the hills, while the Prophet and his disciples made their peaceful entry into Mecca, and performed their devotions at the Caaba; the people were awed by the spectacle of his piety and of the veneration with which he was regarded by his proselytes; and it may be inferred that, during the four days in which by his agreement he was suffered to remain in Mecca, Mohammed, by the arts of intrigue, had gained over a large party of his former opponents, both among the Chieftains and the People of his birth-place.

From that moment his power, which had just before been inadequate to break through the Koreish, appears completely in the ascendant. Amrou and Kaled, two of his fiercest and most formidable enemies, and the future Musliman conquerors of Egypt and Syria, suddenly became his proselytes; various Tribes successively declared their conversion to the Creed of Islam; and when he retired from Mecca, it was only to anticipate a second entry and a more triumphant inauguration.

In less than two years, Mohammed found a pretence for a renewal of hostilities with the Koreish. That Tribe were accused of having broken the subsisting truce by joining in an attack upon some of the allies of the Sovereign of Medina; and Abu Sofian, the haughty Ruler of Mecca, in vain endeavoured to deprecate the vengeance of the exiled Prophet by himself undertaking a mission to his throne. Mohammed refused even to admit the suppliant to an audience; and his preparations for war were as secret and rapid as his purpose was inexorable. Before the Koreish were aware of his approach, they were surprised by his sudden appearance at the gates of Mecca with ten thousand men, His Mohammed.

From A. D. 569. to A. D. 632.

Progressive fortunes of the Impostor.

Rash expedition to Mecca.
A. D. 627.

Retrieved by his wily policy.

Ascendancy of his power.

His final success.

Biography, fallen enemies were now for inferior to him in force, and totally unprepared for resistance; they were compelled therefore to surrender themselves to his mercy; and Abu Sofian delivered the keys of the city to the humble Preacher whom he had driven into banishment. It deserves to be recorded to the honour of the successful Impostor, that, in the intoxication of that hour of victory, he restrained his passions, and did not abuse his triumph. His vindictive followers only awaited the signal for a general massacre; but though twenty-eight persons were murdered by a party under the ferocious Kaled, the Prophet arrested the further effusion of blood by his displeasure; and calmly demanded of the Chiefs of the Koreish, as they knelt before him, "What mercy they were entitled to claim from the man whom they had so wronged?" They answered, "that they confided in the magnanimity of their kinsman." "Nor shall ye confide in vain," was the generous reply: "begone, ye are safe, ye are free!" Perhaps their pardon was clogged with the penalty of conversion; for we are also informed that Abu Sofian and his party saved their lives by embracing the profession of Islam. All the inhabitants of Mecca were compelled to subscribe to the same Creed; and four or five persons only, who after a former conversion had committed the inextinguishable crime of apostasy, were finally exempted from the general amnesty, and put to death by the command of the Prophet. But the Idols of the Caaba and in the vicinity of the Holy City were overthrown and utterly destroyed; their worship was proscribed under pain of death; and religious uniformity in the doctrines of the Koran was sternly enforced.*

The success of Mohammed at Mecca, and the moderation or policy with which he used it, were quickly rewarded by the submission of all Arabia to his spiritual and temporal dominion. The possession of the principal City and holiest Temple of the nation stamped the seal of divine favour and authority on his mission, and prepared the Tribes of the Desert for the recognition of his Apostolical office; the ambassadors who thronged to Mecca and Medina, the bearers of their submission and devotion, are declared, in the figurative language of their Country, to have "outnumbered the dates which fall from the maturity of the palm tree;" and though the Hawazanites and the people of Tayef, a City sixty miles from Mecca, at first refused to renounce their Idols, and sustained an obstinate struggle for their independence, they also were finally reduced to acknowledge the Religion and sceptre of Mohammed.† The details of this singular revolution which, in the course of three years, and for the first and last time in the History of the World, seemingly converted all Arabia into one Kingdom, have not descended to us with authentic particularity; but together with the Law of the Koran, the Regal and Apostolical authority of Mohammed was acknowledged by the People, and administered by his officers from the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf to the Red Sea, and from the Indian Ocean to the confines of Syria. The same ardent spirit of enthusiasm was rapidly infused through the whole of a wild and roving population; and their union under a common Faith and a single Chief tended to prepare them for the conquest of half the World.‡

Gradual subjugation of all Arabia to his dominion.

A. D.
629.
A. D.
632.

"Mohammed was not fated, during his own life, to extend the doctrines of his Religion either by persuasion or conquest out of the pale of his own nation. At what epoch he had formed the design of propagating the doctrines of the Koran beyond the limits of Arabia, it is immaterial to inquire: but even before his re-establishment at Mecca, he had invited the neighbouring nations by solemn embassies to embrace the Faith of Islam; and these exhortations had been already preceded by a signal display of his cruel intolerance against the peaceable Jews of Arabia. Their rejection of his divine mission was the only crime of that unhappy people; but his ambition, or vanity, or fanaticism, made even this an unpardonable offence. His authority was no sooner recognised in Medina than he peremptorily offered the Jewish Tribe of Kainoka, whom he found settled in that City under the protection of the State, the sharp alternative of conversion or war. It was in vain that they pleaded their attachment to the rites of their forefathers, confessed their weakness, and implored their oppressor not to drive them to the extremity of resistance. Their supplication and their unequal struggle against his power were alike unsuccessful; and though he unwillingly spared their lives at the intercession of his allies, he divided all their wealth among his followers, and drove the remnant of the Tribe, seven hundred men, with their women and infants, destitute and miserable, into exile beyond the Syrian frontiers.

The Jews of Koraidha and Chaibar successively attempted a more obstinate defence and provoked a more bloody revenge. Their towns and castles were captured and sacked; their Chiefs were mercilessly tortured in the presence of Mohammed himself to extort a confession of their hidden treasure; and the pretended Apostle of God inhumanly glutted his vengeance by the wholesale butchery of a race which he detested. In their rejection of his Religion, the Jews seem to have raised his hatred far more than the unbelieving Christians and Idolaters; and his hostility towards them was perhaps aggravated by disappointed expectations that the People of Israel would be the first to recognise his pretensions, and to welcome in his person their hope of a temporal Prince and Messiah. Against the Jewish Tribes of Kainoka, Chaibar, and Koraidha, he perpetrated cruelties, which, it should in justice be acknowledged, were foreign to the usual tenour of his disposition or policy. Of the last People, he consigned hundreds to a cold-blooded massacre and a common grave; and even this exception to his general conduct proves that his nature, when stimulated by fanaticism or revenge, was capable of the blackest atrocities. Against the boasted humanity of Mohammed's temper, which is said to have been frequently displayed in his social relations, and is certainly sometimes reflected in the precepts of the Koran, this remorseless persecution of the Jews must be weighed heavily in the balance of his moral qualities; and it deeply aggravates upon his memory the reproach of his religious imposture.

In his persecution of the Jews of Arabia, the Pseudo-prophet gave the first impulse to his followers of that fierce and sanguinary spirit of intolerance, which was afterwards to be exhibited on a wider theatre. The pacific tone of his earliest overtures to the neighbouring nations was the effect, not of moderation, but of weakness; and the indifference or contempt with which the envoys of Mohammed.

From A. D. 569. to A. D. 632. Wars of Mohammed with the Jews and Christians.

His atrocious persecution of the Jewish Tribes of Arabia.
A. D. 633. to A. D. 637.

Expedition against the Eastern Empire.

* Abulfeda, c. 43—52, &c. Gagnier, vol. ii. ad fin. and iii. ad p. 58.

† Ibid. ad c. 56. Gagnier, vol. iii. ad p. 110.

‡ Sale, Pref. Dis. end of sect. 2.

* Abulfeda and Gagnier, ubi supra.

Biography. the Koran were received by Heraclius, the reigning Emperor of the East, and by the Persian Monarch, Chosroes Parviz, was only suffered to pass unresented, until the submission of all Arabia to the new Faith had consolidated the power of the Impostor, and swelled the numbers and fanaticism of his disciples. In the same year with his re-establishment at Mecca, the murder of one of his envoys by an Arabian or Syrian Chieftain, tributary to Heraclius, offered him a plausible pretext* for invading the Greek Province of Syria; and at the command of their Prophet, a mere handful of the disciples of Islam rushed upon that encounter with the power of the Eastern Empire which, unequal as it might in the outset appear, was to terminate, at the distance of eight centuries, in not less than the triumphant establishment of their Faith within the City of Constantine.

First invasion of Syria. The army with which the Moslems commenced this memorable struggle, consisted of no more than three thousand men; and the inadequacy of such a force for the invasion of a great Empire attests the enthusiastic confidence of success, with which Mohammed had already inspired his fanatical followers. The holy banner of the Apostle and the chief command were intrusted to the hands of Zeid; and this appointment, it has been well observed,† is a curious proof how perfect was the discipline, and how ardent the enthusiasm of the new sect, when the noblest and haughtiest Chiefs of Arabia were contented to serve under the manumitted slave of their Prophet.

Battle of Muta. It was near the village of Muta, Southward from Damascus, that the Musulmans made the first essay of their native courage and recent fanaticism against a foreign enemy. The regular troops and auxiliaries of the Eastern Empire, who were collected for the defence of Syria, amounted, if we might credit the exaggerations of the Arabian Chroniclers, to one hundred thousand men;‡ it is at least natural to believe that they far outnumbered the handful of invaders; and notwithstanding the fierce onset of the Moslems, the disparity of force long held the event of battle in suspense. Zeid and two other Chiefs, Jauffer and Abdallah, who, in the event of his death, had been named by the Prophet in succession for the command, all fell heroically in the thickest of the fight; but the fierce Kaled, one of the latest converts of Mecca, caught the sinking standard of the Prophet from their dying hands; at the moment when the Musulmans were giving way before the overwhelming numbers of the Imperialists, his desperate valour still withstood their assaults; his example animated his companions and restored the fortune of the battle; and it was not until day had closed upon the combatants, that the Saracens retired without dishonour from a sanguinary field. During the night, Kaled was raised by the suffrages of his brother-soldiers to the chief command, which he had so well merited by his intrepidity and conduct; and these qualities were still more conspicuously displayed on the morrow. The skilful movements of the little band of Saracens under his directions threw the Imperial army into disorder, which was soon followed by a general panic; and in that state they were attacked and routed with merciless slaughter. A profusion of rich spoils fell into the hands of the Musulmans, who returned to Medina with all the honours, and some of the fruits of victory; and their Prophet, in his exultation at this earnest of future conquest, crowned the glory of Kaled with the fanatical title of the Sword of God.*

Mohammed soon displayed his resolution to follow up this desultory enterprise with the whole force of his temporal and spiritual power. The wealthy and fertile Province of Syria might tempt his cupidity, and the extension of his Empire and doctrines was equally the grand object of his ambition. His views were variously shared by the enthusiasm and the rapacity of his followers. His friend, Abu-Beker, devoted the whole of his possessions to the purposes of the sacred war; Omar and Othman, who like him also were destined to inherit the pulpit and the throne of the Prophet, offered their treasures, their warlike equipments, and their camels, for the uses of the holy expedition; a crowd of inferior disciples imitated their example; and the very women of Islam cheerfully sacrificed their jewels to the objects of a religious warfare. The collection at Medina of an army of ten thousand horse and twenty thousand foot, with a train of twelve thousand camels, enables us to estimate the gigantic strides with which the power of the Preacher of Mecca had rapidly increased; and when Mohammed took the field at the head of this host, formidable alike by their numbers, their valour, and their fanaticism, his march exhibited the state of a mighty Monarch. The Prophet, mounted on his white mule, and distinguished by his vesture of green, commanded in person; Abu-Beker claimed the honour of bearing his sacred standard; and the fiery Kaled assumed his appropriate station at the head of the vanguard.

If the advance of this formidable array had commenced in the temperate season, and from the frontiers instead of the Capital of Arabia, the Prophet might have anticipated the glory reserved for his successors, of achieving the conquest of Syria, and shaking the Eastern Empire to its foundations. But the spirit of his followers, which was capable of surmounting all human opposition, sank under a struggle with the difficulties of Nature. The summer heats of the Arabian Desert are unsupportable even by a native army; the scorching winds raised the moving sand into mountain-billows which overwhelmed and destroyed whole squadrons of the Musulmans; the springs were dried up and refused their usual refreshment; and the rage of thirst drove the soldiery to rip open the bellies of their camels for the sake of obtaining a scanty supply of water, from the store with which those animals have the singular capacity of sustaining the droughts of a march through the Desert. The constancy and even the faith of the exhausted Moslems sank under these dreadful privations; the tremendous threat of their Prophet that hell-fire would prove hotter than the Sun of the Desert; was less alarming to their senses than the prospect immediately before them; and notwithstanding his indignant reproaches, they shrank from the sufferings of the holy war, and deserted his standard in great numbers.

* Abulfeda, c. 48, 49, with Gagnier's notes.

† Burckhardt, in his Notes on the Bedouins, expresses his disbelief that such a process is ever resorted to. He states that after two days' drought no sufficient supply would be afforded by a camel's stomach, and that in the extremity of thirst, the main object of the sufficiency would be to preserve the animal upon whose existence depends his own sole chance of escape.

‡ Koran, c. 9.

* Abulfeda, c. 48.

† Gibbon, vol. ix. p. 313.

‡ Sale, ubi supra.

Biography. Mohammed, himself inflexible in courage and patience, with difficulty sustained the fainting spirits of his remaining followers by the assurance that, if the deserters had possessed a grain of faith, they would have nobly encountered their destiny in the service of God: but when the weary army reached the confines of Syria and reposed at the fountain and grove of Tabue, he acknowledged that the strength of his faithful bands was unequal to the farther prosecution of the war, confessed that it had been undertaken without the advice of his guardian Angel Gabriel, and consented to its abandonment. He retraced his march with the main Body of his forces to Medina: but the indefatigable Kaled, with the most active squadrons of the Muslims, still persevered in a desultory warfare, and extended the terror of his master's name beyond the frontiers of Arabia, from the banks of the Euphrates to the shores of the Mediterranean.*

Last years This expedition against the Syrian territory of the Eastern Empire was the last military enterprise of Mohammed; and he survived its conclusion only about two years. The short residue of his life was spent in consolidating the establishment of his Religion and Empire in Arabia itself. The close of his domestic reign was not wholly undisturbed: for rival imposture threatened the interests of the new Religion with the evils of schism and dissent, even during the life of its founder; and Mohammed vainly issued his denunciations against the false Revelations of Muscilaia, a powerful Chieftain of the Province of Yemannah, (between Mecca and the Persian Gulf,) who had proclaimed himself also a Prophet from Heaven, and whose pretensions were subsequently suppressed only in the Khalifate of Abu-Beker. But notwithstanding the conflicting claims to divine inspiration which his own example had provoked, Mohammed to his latest hours had reason for triumph in the progress of his doctrines. He continued to preach his Religion at Medina with undiminished energy and increasing effect; and his last pilgrimage to the Caaba was attended by a devout multitude of one hundred and fourteen thousand of his converts.† and death of Muham- It was in the sixty-third year of his age and the twenty-third of his pretended mission, that Mohammed, whose health had long been visibly declining,‡ was seized with a bilious fever which carried him in fourteen days to his grave. The story of his death-bed has of course descended to us only in the traditions preserved by his disciples. But if to these the slightest credit may be given, the Impostor displayed at the slow approach, and in the awful moment itself, of dissolution, all the undismayed confidence of sincere faith, or rather of unaffected delusion. His last public acts, when he was sensible of his extremity, were those of pious resignation, of humility, and of justice. From the pulpit, he invited the accusations, offered the atonement, and implored the forgiveness of any offences which he might have inflicted upon his brethren and subjects. "Is there any Musul-man whom I have unjustly scourged? I submit my own back to his retaliation. Is there any one whom I have slandered? Let him proclaim my shame before the congregation. Have I despoiled or defrauded any man? Of the little that I possess let him take principal and interest for the injury." A voice from the crowd charged him with a debt of three silver drachms: he paid the demand with interest, and thanked his creditor that he had accused him in this world rather than hereafter before the judgment seat of God. According to the custom of the Chieftains of his Country, he enfranchised all his slaves; and bestowing his solemn benediction on his weeping friends, he endeavoured to moderate their grief, and exhorted them to be steadfast and constant in their moral and religious duties. Until the last three days of his life, he continued regularly to perform the offices of public prayer in the Mosque; and even when his weakness compelled him to resign the pulpit to his friend Abu-Beker, he still repaired to the place of worship, supporting his feeble steps on the arms of his attendants.

During the last paroxysms of his mortal disorder, which deprived him at intervals of reason, it is acknowledged that he wished to have dictated a new Revelation: but the more discreet or bigoted among his disciples loudly protested against his being suffered to supersede the divine authority of the Koran; and the ears of their dying Prophet were disturbed by the clamour with which the question was disputed in his chamber. He rebuked the indecent heat of the wranglers; commanded them to withdraw from his presence; and tranquilly awaited his end. To his family he repeated the conversations with which the Angel Gabriel continued to favour him; and having once asserted his possession of a peculiar prerogative from Heaven that Azrael, the Minister of death, could not take his soul without asking his permission, he now declared that the request had been made and granted. Shortly after, he fell into the strong convulsions of death; and stretched upon a carpet which had been laid for him on the floor of his house, his head reclining on the lap of his favourite wife, he at first fainted from excess of pain; but recovering for an instant, he raised his eyes intently towards the roof, ejaculated in faltering but articulate accents, "Oh God, pardon my sins! Ah, my companion, I attend thee to the realms above!" and calmly expired.*

From love and veneration for his person, many of his friends and disciples would not believe that their fancied intercessor with Heaven, the chosen Prophet and Apostle of God, had shared the common lot of humanity: they swore by their trust in the Almighty that he was not dead, but only wrapped in a holy trance; the violence of their sorrow sought consolation in the wildest hopes of fanaticism; and Omar, drawing his scimitar, threatened to strike off the head of the first Infidel who should dare to affirm that the Prophet was no more. The temperate sense and authority of Abu-Beker restored the multitude to reason: he rebuked the impiety which placed the attributes of Mohammed on an equality with those of Him who liveth for ever; reminded them that the Prophet was a mortal like themselves; and appealed to his own prediction of his death and to the progress of corruption in his beloved remains. The grief of his people for his loss and their reverence for his assumed office

* Koran, c. 9. with Sale's notes. Abulfeda, c. 56. Gagnier, vol. iii. p. 147—162.

† Abulfeda, c. 58. Gagnier, vol. iii. ad p. 218.

‡ The idle story that Mohammed was afflicted with epileptic fits, which appears to have been an invention of the Byzantine writers, has long been exploded. See Sale's second note to c. 73. of the Koran. But the Mohammedan writers believe that his health had suffered from poison, administered to him in revenge by a Jewish woman. Gagnier (note to Abulfeda, p. 9, and Life of Mohamed, vol. ii. p. 287.)

* Abulfeda, c. 61—64. Gagnier, vol. iii. p. 221—271.

Mahomed.
From
A. D.
569. to
A. D.
632.

and personal character, were displayed in the pious honours of his interment, and have been perpetuated in the rites of their Religion. He was buried at Medina on the spot where he breathed his last; the City which contains his ashes rivals Mecca itself in sanctity; and the pilgrimage to the simple Tomb of the Prophet is still numbered among the most meritorious duties of the devout Musulman.*

From the mass of apocryphal tradition and discordant absurdity,† of which even our earliest materials for the life of Mohammed are composed, it is no easy task to deduce and reconcile any satisfactory relation: it is still more difficult, in the uncertainty which envelopes not only the motives, but many of the actions themselves of this extraordinary man, to discern and estimate the real merits of his character. The conflicting prejudices and falsehoods of his disciples and enemies have been adopted and exaggerated by successive biographers; and in modern times the most authentic features of his portrait have been still further disguised by the insidious arts of Infidel writers, and the better intentioned, but passionate zeal of some Christian advocates. The former have laboured to elevate the Impostor into a virtuous Enthusiast or a Philosophical Hero; the latter have stigmatized him as a Demon of fraud and a Monster of unmitigated iniquity.

If we would discriminate accurately between these opposite conclusions, it is perhaps necessary that we should contemplate the visionary enthusiast, the crafty impostor, and the ambitious conqueror, under the various circumstances of fortune, which lent their shifting hues to his moral and intellectual qualities. That his religious practices, his periodical retirements to solitude, his self-inflicted austerities, and his devotional fervour, commenced in sincerity, we need feel little difficulty in believing: that these observances should end in imposture, is the ordinary course of fanaticism. It is evident from all the recorded tenour of his life between his marriage and his assumption of the Prophetic office, that religious enthusiasm was the original master-spring of his actions.‡ Endowed by nature with an excitable imagination and a contemplative spirit, his reason became obscured by the clouds of mystical devotion; and the chimeras of his fancy might be mistaken, even by his own mind, for the inspiration of Heaven. But there seems to be a period in the career of every successful Fanatic, in which the subsiding fervour of enthusiasm is replenished and kept alive by the involuntary growth of a hypocritical excitement; and the mind may need first to employ the same stimulus of delusion upon itself, which is afterwards exercised in intentional fraud and craftiness upon others.

Such a transitional state of fanaticism may be suspected in the life of Mohammed, when the persecutions which he suffered at Mecca had exasperated his passions, and his reception at Medina had awakened within him the ambition of temporal power; and the altered tone of the portions of the Koran which were promulgated after his establishment in the latter City, marks the completion of that change in his character, which converted a peaceful visionary into a fierce and intolerant leader of religious warfare. When we observe the art with which his pretended revelations were subsequently adapted to his own interests, and to the passions and prejudices of his Countrymen, it is impossible to doubt that, whatever might have been the strength of his original delusion, its sincerity had been corrupted by success, and had given place in his mind to the mere worldly pursuit of political aggrandizement. In this view of his case, it is perfectly reconcilable with the constitution of the human mind, and analogous with all experience of its history, to conclude that the imposture of Mohammed originated in a disordered imagination; that his ruling passion of fanaticism naturally engendered spiritual pride and self-exaltation; that these feelings were irritated by opposition, and still further nourished by success; that under the influence of time, the dictates of Reason and the course of events at once dissipated the illusions of religious fancy, and awakened the cravings of vulgar ambition; and that the growth of fraud and perfidy in his designs, was simultaneous with the decay of his enthusiasm and the expansion of his power.

Among those who have been disposed to regard the character of Mohammed with the greatest indulgence,* it is a favourite hypothesis that he was actuated in the outset by a virtuous indignation at the prevailing superstition of both Jew and Christian, as well as the degrading Idolatry of the Heathen; and that his preaching was really founded upon the disinterested desire of inculcating a purer system both of Morals and Theology among his unenlightened Countrymen. The means of imposture which cannot be denied, are palliated for the sake of the end to which it is imagined that they were directed; and we are required to believe that the worst motives of the Impostor went no further than the harmless, and even laudable design, of creating an honourable name for himself by restoring the worship of the one God among the outcast children of Ishmael. But if we might admit that the founder of Islamism was animated by rational zeal for the purity of Religion, and by a patriotic or philosophical desire for the moral improvement of his fellow-beings, we should immediately be met by the difficulty of reconciling the corruptions of his system with the piety and benevolence of his purpose. His conduct was consistent enough with the probable views of a Fanatic or an Impostor: it was utterly incompatible with the enlightened principles of an Ethical Moralist. Since the Jewish and Christian Dispensations were the evident origin of all his knowledge of the Divine Unity, he was too well informed of the Truth, however corrupted the sources from which he derived it, to be excusable for his preference of falsehood: since he erred not in total ignorance, even his earliest assumption of divine authority is obnoxious to the suspicion either of fanaticism or fraud; and whatever praise is bestowed on the soundness of his intellect, and the moral excellence of his design, serves in fact but to deepen the premeditated guilt of his imposture.

Still less, if we view the actions of Mohammed only in Mohammed.

From
A. D.
596.
to
A. D.
632.

Growth of his ambition and hypocrisy.

Hypothesis of his virtuous and enlightened purposes of religious reform;

disproved by the corruptions of his system.

Guilt of his imposture.

* Abulfeda, c. 61—64. Gagnier, vol. iii. p. 221—271. Gibbon, c. 50.

† For example, the Work of Al Jannabi, which next to that of Abulfeda constitutes our principal Arabic authority for the biography of Mohammed, and has afforded the chief foundation for his life by Gagnier, is a mere farrago of wild legends.

‡ Such especially is the portrait which the Count De Boulainvilliers has imagined in his Vie de Mahomet; and Gibbon has betrayed a kindred partiality for the triumphant corrupter of Christianity, even while he rejects the absurd eulogies of his French biographer.

§ Mülls, p. 86.

* Retrospective Review, vol. iii. p. 7.

Biography.

From
A. D.
596.
to
A. D.
632.

Intolerance, cruelty, and licentious-ness of his later years.

his latter years, when fanaticism had been smothered by ambition, and prosperity had steeled his heart in intolerance, cruelty, and licentiousness, shall we find any thing to justify the favour of his eulogists, or to palliate the crime of his hypocrisy. The spirit of fierce persecution which breathes through the last revelations of the Koran is opposed to all the better feelings of humanity; and his cold-blooded massacres of the unoffending Jews, prove that he was really capable of inflicting, without compunction, the worst cruelties which his interests could dictate, or his Creed inculcate. His vengeance seems to have been restrained only by weakness or prudence; and his assassination of individual enemies entitles us to suspect, that his boasted magnanimity in pardoning the Koreish was rather an effort of policy than of mercy. If Mohammed had regulated his own life by the doctrines which he preached, the errors of his personal conduct ought in candour to be measured by the standard of morality among his Countrymen, and the practice of the Age and clime in which he was born. Thus, his general permission of polygamy was no more than a natural compliance with the previous manners of Arabia; and since he restricted a privilege, which was before unlimited, by commanding every man to confine himself to the society of four women,* he cannot be justly accused of having encouraged incontinence among his followers. But when he forged a special revelation from Heaven to exempt himself from the restraints which he enforced on his disciples, he must have been consciously guilty of immoral indulgence; to gratify the licentiousness of his appetites, he both violated the precepts of his own Law, and audaciously betrayed the extent of his reliance on the credulity of his disciples. The Koran expressly declares,† that the Prophet is allowed to take as many women as he pleases; and his appropriation to himself of the wife of his freedman;‡ as well as many other circumstances of his domestic life,§ betray the fact, that the pretended Reformer of Religion and morals was himself an example of unbounded sensuality.

Contrast of his amiable qualities.

Yet it has been admitted, in contrast to his vices, that Mohammed was endowed with many virtues and endearing qualities, which attracted among his friends and followers as much affection for the man, as veneration was entertained for the Prophet. It is the remark of one of his Historians,|| that we may best imagine the general nature of his character from the fact, that the traditions of the Musulmans have assigned to him not so much the exalted, as the amiable attributes of humanity. They delight¶ to eulogize his courtesy to the noble, his affability to the humble, and his dignified deportment to the presumptuous. They dwell on his personal graces of form, countenance, and intellect: on the majesty and mildness which were tempered in his address, his expressive and benignant features, his persuasive and powerful eloquence. They record the simplicity of his habits, his contempt for the idle pomp and

His personal endowments.

state of Royalty, and the kind and generous feelings which overflowed in his breast towards his family, his servants, and his friends. Even while he was Lord of Arabia, he disdained not to perform the most menial offices of his family: he continued to kindle his own fire, to sweep the floor with his own hands, to milk his ewes, and to mend his own shoes and coarse woollen garments. He set the example of religiously observing the interdiction from wine. Without the affectation of austerity, he was contented with the abstemious fare of an Arab and a warrior: honey and milk were the articles of food in which he most delighted; but his ordinary diet was restricted to dates, barley-bread, and water. Nevertheless his hospitality was generous; his charities were bounded only by his possessions; and, at his death, the sincerity of his exhortations to benevolence was proved by the emptiness of his coffers.

As a friend and a parent he exhibited the softest feelings of our nature. After the death of Zeid, he was surprised weeping in his chamber over the daughter of his faithful servant and convert. "What do I see?" exclaimed the intruder, astonished that the Apostle of God should be accessible to the weakness of human sorrow. "You see," replied Mohammed, "but one who is deploring the loss of a beloved and devoted friend." His affection for Fatima, his daughter by Kadijah, and the only one of the progeny of a numerous Harem who survived him, was of unbounded tenderness; and when he followed his other children to their untimely graves,—that severest visitation of Providence which seems to reverse the order of our being,—he wept in all the agony which can rend the fond heart of a parent.* Before successful fanaticism had corrupted his virtue, his respectful constancy to the faded matron who was the author of his fortunes, is a beautiful trait in his character. While Kadijah lived, she was never insulted by a rival; and his gratitude to her memory survived her to his latest hour. The tenderness of his recollection roused the reproachful and insolent jealousy of Ayesha, the most youthful and blooming of the wives who had replaced her: "Was she not old, and has not Heaven given you a better in her place?" "No, before God," cried Mohammed, in a burst of generous emotion, "there never can be a better or a kinder: she believed in me when men despised and mocked me, she relieved my wants when I was poor, and lowly, and persecuted by the world."†

These facts and anecdotes, which are as well authenticated as any other circumstances in the life and character of the Arch-impostor of Arabia, may in some degree serve to moderate the detestation for his name, with which the results of his first delusion, the atrocities, frauds, and cruelties, the licentiousness and tyranny of his latter years, must justly inspire every Christian and moral mind. The conjectural study of his character might form a curious chapter in the History of the Human mind, not without its parallel in a modern Age and a Christian actor; and, however widely different in effect upon the great cause of Religion, the example of either Mohammed or of Cromwell may almost equally demonstrate the danger and the guilt of that self-delusion, which commences in fanaticism only to terminate in ambition and imposture.

Moham-
med.
From
A. D.
596.
to
A. D.
632.
Simplicity of his habits.

Instances of his kindly affections.

Conclusion on his extrardinary disposition.

* Koran, c. 4.

† Ibid. c. 33. 66.

‡ Ibid. c. 33. with Sale's notes.

§ For one of these, see especially Sale's first note to c. 66. of the Koran. Throughout his praisest description of the private life of Mohammed, Gibbon riots in the indulgence of a depraved imagination.

|| Mills, p. 39.

¶ For the following details, see Abulfeda, with the traditions collected in Gagnier, passim; and, indeed, repeated by Gibbon and all the modern biographers of Mohammed.

* Abulfeda, c. 67.

† Ibid. p. 12, &c.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LIX.

PROGRESS OF THE SARACEN OR MOHAMMEDAN POWER. THE SINGLE KHALIFATE.

FROM A. D. 632 TO A. D. 755.

History. The death of Mohammed seemed for an instant to threaten the extinction both of his religious imposture and of the temporal power which it had established. After his followers had indulged their first burst of grief for his loss, the necessity of appointing a successor to his Sacerdotal and Regal office immediately revived that fierce and habitual spirit of discord among the Arabian Tribes, which had been subdued only by the reverence entertained for his spiritual authority, by the success of his arms, and by the consummate arts of his policy.

From A. D. 632. to A. D. 755. Dissensions among the Saracens on the death of Mohammed. It might have been imagined that the fanatical attachment of his companions and disciples to his person would have descended upon his family. But all the male offspring of Mohammed had perished in infancy; and the claims of his beloved and only surviving daughter Fatima, who was married to her cousin Ali, were set aside by political animosity and domestic intrigue. The children of Fatima were the natural heirs of Mohammed; and he had often exhibited his two infant grandsons to the people as the pride of his House, and the future hope of Islam. The birth, the alliance, and the personal merits of their father Ali, marked him therefore for the destined successor of the Prophet. He was, in his own right, the Chief of the House of Haschem, and the representative of the ancient Princes of Mecca and guardians of the Temple; he was both the cousin and the son-in-law of Mohammed, and the earliest and most devoted champion of his mission; he had been declared his brother in affection and his chosen Vezir, and he was at once the most noble, heroic, and accomplished of his proselytes. But he had incurred the implacable hatred of Ayesha, the favourite wife of Mohammed and daughter of Abu-Beker, by exposing to her husband (as it is said by the Arabian writers) some act of her infidelity; and natural views for her father's aggrandizement might probably be superadded to motives of revenge. During the last hours of Mohammed, the arts of Ayesha prevented all intercourse between him and his son-in-law; and, although the Prophet abstained from any more explicit nomination, the choice of Abu-Beker to fill his pulpit in his mortal illness, appeared finally to point rather to him than to Ali, as his successor.

Gifted with precocious talents in the right of election. The hereditary and personal title of Ali, thus left without recognition by the silence of his dying father-in-law, was more decidedly rejected by the Korish, who abhorred the proud supremacy of the House of Haschem. The exclusive right of that Aristocracy itself to nominate the Sovereign of Arabia, was fiercely opposed by the other Tribes; the pretensions of Mecca rekindled the ancient rivalry between that Capital and Medina; and, so soon as a public Assembly was convened for the election of a successor to the Prophet, the most illustrious among his original disciples—the Ansars, or Auxiliaries of the latter city, and the Mohagerians, or Fugitives of his birth-place—urged their contending claims to the honour of appointing the spiritual and temporal Chief of Islam, with all the vehemence of Arabian eloquence and passion. The schism became so violent, that to prevent an appeal to arms, the pacific Abu-Beker would imprudently have adopted the rash suggestion of nominating two persons with equal power, as representatives of the Prophet. He accordingly proposed Omar and Abu-Obeidah for this divided sovereignty; and, if the proposal had been accepted, the same hour might have dissolved the rising Empire of the Saracens, and prevented the extension of their arms and Religion.

From A. D. 632. to A. D. 755. At this crisis, the modest or patriotic self-denial of Abu-Beker Omar saved the fortunes of the Mohammedan cause. Declaring his own unfitness to share so weighty a charge, he proposed that the venerable Abu-Beker should himself be appointed to the sole guidance of the Faithful; and stretching forth his hand as the accustomed pledge of fealty, he proclaimed himself the subject of the first KHALIF, vicar, or successor of the Prophet. The involuntary acclamations of the Assembly recognised the wisdom of this choice; and Abu-Beker was immediately saluted as the supreme Lord and Judge of Islam. But lest so precipitate a nomination, which was only excused by the urgency of the occasion, should be drawn into an illegal and dangerous precedent, Omar himself proclaimed from the pulpit, that if any man should again presume, on the recurrence of a vacancy, to anticipate the regular suffrages of the electors, he would plunge his sword into the hearts both of the proposer and the object of the choice. The authority of Abu-Beker was at once recognised in Mecca and Medina, and throughout the Provinces of Arabia. The adherents of the House of Haschem alone continued to maintain the superior title of Ali, and refused to yield their allegiance to the Khalif; but their resistance to the public voice was rather indirectly countenanced by the haughty silence of their hereditary Chief, than encouraged by any open assertion of his rights. The threats of the fierce Omar that he would burn the house of Ali to the ground, excited only the contempt of the indignant hero: but his spirit was after a time more

The Single Khalifate.

From A. D. 632. to A. D. 755.

Abu-Beker chosen the first Khalif, or successor of the Prophet.

History. subdued by the death of Fatima, by the visible decline of his party, and by the mild expostulations of Abu-Beker. He at length listened to the flattering appeal to his patriotism by which the aged Khalif besought him not to renew through his opposition the dissensions that were happily subsiding; and his submission finally restored unity to the religious and political Government of Islam.*

His relig. The great Body of the Arabian nation, however, was still far from being animated by the same religious enthusiasm and sincerity, and the same fiery zeal for propagating the doctrines of the Koran, which were entertained by the immediate proselytes of Mohammed. The Barbarous Tribes in general had either been overawed by the arms of the Impostor, or dazzled by the splendour of his success; they had received the new Faith with indifference; and after the death of its founder, they were quickly relapsing into their ancient Idolatry. The inconstancy even of the Koreish was only checked by the stern and seasonable rebuke of Abu-Beker. "Ye men of Mecca, will ye be the last to embrace, and the first to abandon, the Religion of Islam?" but the sharper argument of the sword was necessary to arrest the infidelity which was contaminating the inhabitants of the Desert; and at the head of a congenial band of fanatics, the sanguinary Kaled attacked the apostates with irresistible fury, defeated them with merciless slaughter, and, by the terror of this example, reclaimed the fickle and disunited Tribes to the belief or the profession of Islam.

Defeat of the impostor Mosilima.

It required a more numerous host and a more obstinate contest to overcome the rival imposture which asserted similar divine authority to the mission of Mohammed. The pretensions of Mosilima, which had disturbed the last years of the Prophet of Islam, were now openly asserted in arms; and the progress of his doctrines and power excited alarm in the Khalif, and indignation in the disciples of the Koran. With an army of forty thousand men, Kaled was again appointed by Abu-Beker to conduct the sacred war; in the first action, Mosilima was strong enough to inflict a severe defeat on the Moslems; and it was not until their enthusiasm had risen with the danger of their Faith, that the skill and energy of their leader triumphed over the rash confidence of their adversaries. In a general engagement, Mosilima was opportunely slain by the thrust of a lance; his followers, dismayed by his fall, were instantly routed and put to flight; and the previous losses of the Muslims were revenged by the slaughter of ten thousand of their enemies. The restless and rebellious Tribes of the Peninsula, left without a leader or a common motive of resistance, were rapidly compressed within the strong bonds of religious enthusiasm and discipline, which gave union and strength to the rising Empire of Islam; and the whole of Arabia was more securely subjected than before, and firmly converted to the Religion of Mohammed and the authority of his successors.

Invasion of Syria by the Saracens. The effectual establishment of the new Monarchy and Faith, immediately kindled the ardour of proselytism and conquest, which was incited by the Creed and adapted to the temperament of a fierce and enthusiastic People; and the Khalif, though he reserved his personal care for the more suitable duties of domestic and religious government, was not slow to animate the martial and fanatical fervour of his subjects by urging the commands of their Prophet for the propagation of their Faith. His Circular Letter to the Arabian Tribes describes more forcibly than any narrative the spirit of his Nation and his Faith, and the causes of their common success: "I praise the most High God, and I pray for his Prophet Mohammed: This is to acquaint you that I purpose to send the True Believers into Syria to take it out of the hands of the Infidels. And I would have you to know that fighting for Religion is an act of obedience to God." The riches of Syria were familiar to the Arabs, and the neighbourhood of the spoil might tempt the cupidity of a warlike and rapacious people, even if they had been inaccessible to the call of fanaticism. The summons of the Khalif was answered by a formidable host from the Desert; and Yazid Ebu Abi Sofian received from Abu-Beker the chief command of the numerous army which assembled around Medina for the Syrian invasion. The Khalif accompanied the first day's march on foot: but when his Chieftains also, in imitation of this humility, would have dismounted, he prevented their purpose by his assurance that, in the cause of Religion, they who rode and they who walked were equally meritorious. At the close of evening, the host were solemnly dismissed with his blessing on their way to the holy war; and his parting exhortations to his Lieutenant, which exhibited a strange mixture of ferocity and mercy, of violence and justice, may be said to have embodied the future precepts of Musliman war. After bidding Yazid remember that he was ever in the presence of God, that the certainty of impending death and judgment, and the hopes of Paradise, were alike set before him, he added, "Be sure that you shun injustice and oppression towards your own people; lay not needless burdens upon them, comfort, cherish, and consult them: but see that you neither do evil yourself, nor suffer its commission in others. When you fight the battles of Heaven, turn not your backs on the foe, but acquit yourselves as men: in your victory slay neither infancy, nor age, nor woman. Neither destroy cattle needlessly, nor cut down the fruit trees, nor burn the fields of corn. When you make any covenant, depart not from your word. When you meet with Religious persons who dwell apart in Monasteries, harm them not, neither injure their habitations; but you shall find another set of people, who are of the Synagogue of Satan, who shave their crowns; fail not to cleave their skulls, nor at least show them mercy unless they become Muslims or render tribute."*

Such were the brief and pithy injunctions which succeeded to direct, and may serve to illustrate, the subjugation of half the World: such was the tremendous prelude to that irresistible career of martial fanaticism, which bore its votaries, without check, or stay, or retrogression, from the sands of Arabia to the waters of the Indus, the Caspian, the Bosphorus, and the Garonne. And the whole History of the Saracen conquests forms but a long practical commentary on the precepts of the first Khalif, and a long continuation of his first expedition. From the hour at which the Saracen deluge burst the bounds of the sterile Peninsula, until it finally receded from the fertile plains of France, its advance was perpetual and its fury unmitigated. The Eastern Empire, * Abulfeda, Annales Moslemici, (Latine apud Reiske,) ad init. Ockley, Hist. of the Saracens, vol. i. p. 1—11. D'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. ad v. Ala, Abouker. Gibbon, c. 50. Mills, c. 2, &c.

* Ockley, History of Saracens, vol. i. p. 21—28.

The Second Khalifate.

From A. D. 632. to A. D. 755.

History. the feeblest barrier that ever opposed the torrent of enthusiasm, was at the period before us in the lowest stage of imbecility and disorder. Heraklius, the reigning Emperor, whose youth had been crowned with the last glories of the Persian war, had sunk into an old age of degeneracy and impotence, which but too faithfully typified the weakness and vices of his Empire.

A feeble and slothful Government, and an enervated and pusillanimous People, were utterly incapable of effectual resistance to the valiant enthusiasm and martial devotion of the Saracen bands; and the total conquest of Syria, though defended by numerous armies and fortresses, was the successive work of only seven campaigns. The war at the outset proceeded not with the rapidity required by Abu-Beker, and Yezid was superseded by Abu-Obeidah: yet even then the result did not equal the expectations of the Khalif, and the impetuosity of Kaled was added to stimulate the energies of the General and of his troops. The first exploit of the Moslem army was the reduction of Bosra, on the confines of Syria and Arabia, whose position had rendered it an opulent mart for the caravans of the Desert, and whose importance and strength were denoted by its title, the Tower of Safety. In an encounter before its walls, four thousand of the Saracen vanguard, under the guidance of the aged Serjabil, who had dared to attack the Imperial army, were repulsed and overpowered by the immense superiority of their numbers: but the seasonable arrival of Kaled with a reinforcement of only fifteen hundred horse sufficed to restore the battle. The Saracens returned to the charge with shouts of Allah Akbar! (God is mighty!) Al-hamleh! Al-hamleh! Al-jannah! Al-jannah! (Fight, fight, Paradise, Paradise;) the panic-stricken Syrians wavered and fled; and the refuge of their fortress alone saved them from destruction. The work of treason completed the consequences of their pusillanimous flight. The Governor of Bosra had been justly punished for his cowardice by deposition from his command; and he was prompted by revenge to betray the place to the assailants. He secretly introduced a chosen band of Saracens into the city through a subterraneous passage; and their intrepid enterprise secured an easy admission to the whole army. The inhabitants were compelled to purchase their lives and the exercise of their Religion by a heavy tribute; and the traitorous Governor, publicly renouncing the Christian profession and embracing the Faith of the conquerors, gave the first ominous example of an apostacy, which, throughout the course of the Saracen conquests, continued to swell their ranks and extend the joint empire of the sword and the Koran.

A march of four days conducted the Saracen army from Bosra to the gates of the ancient Capital of Syria. The strength of Damascus resisted the assaults of a People who were unused to the tedious operations of a siege. For the relief of the city an army of seventy thousand men, the flower of the Syrian Province, was collected by the Imperial Generals. But this host was boldly encountered and totally defeated by forty-five thousand Muslims under Abu-Obeidah, Kaled, and Amrou, in a great battle on the plain of Azazadin. In the estimate of the conquerors, at the close of a furious and bloody conflict, they had slaughtered fifty thousand of their enemies; and the wretched remains of the Imperial host spread horror and consternation in their flight through the luxurious cities of Syria. The spoil of the conquerors was immense; and, what they valued above the jewels and treasure of the Greeks, they acquired, by the capture of innumerable arms and warlike equipments, the ready means and incentives of fresh victories. Their success increased the emulation of their Countrymen in Arabia; and the Deserts of the Peninsula poured forth new hordes to share in the glories and spoils of a sacred and profitable warfare.

After the battle of Azazadin, the Saracen army resumed the siege or blockade of Damascus. Their close investment of the city and the consequent want of provisions soon compelled the Christians to attempt several sallies; and under the guidance of Thomas, a brave and noble Greek, they for some time made a defence not unworthy of the better days of the Empire. But all their assaults on the besiegers were repulsed; their spirit was subdued by time and hunger; and they had already begun to treat for a surrender with the humane and venerable Abu-Obeidah, when, from an opposite quarter of the city, the impetuous Kaled burst by surprise through the defences of the place. The merciless slaughter which that sanguinary Chief had commenced, was with difficulty arrested by the mild but firm resolution of Abu-Obeidah; the capitulation was completed; and such of the Christians, with Thomas their heroic leader, as preferred exile to tribute, were permitted an interval of three days to retire from the city. On the morning of the fourth, the truce expired; the wretched band of fugitives were pursued by Kaled and his cavalry; and already exhausted by grief, fatigue, and suffering, they were finally overtaken and put to the sword.*

The fall of Damascus may be declared with sufficient accuracy to have achieved the subjugation of Syria: for the Greek power in that extensive and wealthy Province never recovered the first shock of the Saracen invasion; and the decisive Battle of Yermouk and the sieges of Heliopolis, Emesa, Aleppo, and Antioch, which occupied the next five years, were but a terrific repetition of the catastrophes of Azazadin and Damascus. But the aged Abu-Beker, under whose reign the conquest of Syria had been successfully undertaken, did not live to triumph in its conclusion. He expired before intelligence of the capture of Damascus could reach his ears. Both by the last expression of his will, and with the tacit approbation of his people, he bequeathed the succession of the Prophet to the inflexible virtues of Omar. The modesty of his friend would have declined the choice, with the declaration that he had no occasion for the office. "But the office," was the unanswerable argument of Abu-Beker, "has occasion for you;" and the last prayer of the dying Khalif invoked the blessing of Heaven on his election.†

The elevation of Omar was unopposed even by the claims of Ali, who, in a life of domestic retirement and religious austerity, now professed to revere the superior virtues of his rival, and was repaid by the most assiduous indications of his deference and esteem. Omar, except that he removed Kaled from the Syrian command, made no change in the administration of Abu-Beker. The courage and martial enthusiasm of the new Khalif, as well as of his predecessor, had been exercised and displayed in their common exile and service under the standard of their Prophet: but Omar, like Abu-Beker, deemed the Civil

The Single Khalifate.

From A. D. 632. to A. D. 755.

Siege of Damascus.

Its capture. A. D. 634.

Death of Abu-Beker.

Reign of Omar. A. D. 634.

to A. D. 644.

* Ockley, vol. i. p. 28. ad p. 116. Abulfeda, Annales Moslemici, ad p. 66.

† The reign of Abu-Beker is contained in Abulfeda, (Annales.) p. 60—66. See also D'Hierbelot, Bib. Orient. Art. Aboubekere.

History.

From

A. D.

632.

to

A. D.

755.

Prosecution of the Saracens conquests.

Siege of Jerusalem.

A. D.

637.

Journey of Omar to the camp.

and Religious functions of Government the most befitting occupation for his declining years; and, on his accession, he assumed the guidance of the Musliman conquests only from the distant seat of Medina. In the third year of his reign, the decisive victory of Yermouk opened the cities of Palestine, as well as of Syria, to the assaults of the Saracen Generals; and the Khalif directed their first efforts to the possession of Jerusalem, as a place which, having been sanctified by repeated revelations, was to be held in reverence inferior only to Mecca and Medina. The Holy City was immediately invested by the Saracen army; and after an obstinate defence, and a severe winter siege of four months, the constancy of the inhabitants yielded to the perseverance of the assailants. In the name of his Clergy and People, the Patriarch Sophronius offered to capitulate: but insisted that the articles of surrender should be ratified by the presence and personal subscription of the Khalif.

In the Mosque at Medina this strange proposition was solemnly debated; and Omar was persuaded, out of respect for the sacred dignity of Jerusalem, and the desire of gratifying his army, to accede to the condition. His journey, it has been well observed, was so characteristic of the spirit of the times, of a mixture of simplicity and fanaticism, of a contempt for pomp and parade, even while pursuing the great objects of earthly ambition,* that its circumstances well deserve to arrest the attention of the Philosophical observer. When the Khalif—to borrow the simple but expressive narrative from the earliest of our English Historians of the Saracens—had said his prayers in the Mosque, and paid his respects to Mohammed's Tomb, he substituted Ali in his place, and set forward with some attendants; the greatest part of whom, having kept him company a little way, returned to Medina. He rode upon a red camel with a couple of sacks, in one of which he carried that sort of provision, which the Arabs call sawik, which is either barley, rice, or wheat, sodden and unhusked; the other was full of fruits. Before him he carried a great leathern bottle, (very necessary in those desert countries to put water in,) behind him a large wooden dish. Thus furnished and equipped, the Khalif travelled; and when he came to any place where he was to rest all night, he never went from it until he had said the morning prayer. After which, turning himself about to those who were with him, he said, "Praise be to God, who has strengthened us with the true Religion, and given us his Prophet, and led us out of error, and united us (who were at variance) in the confession of Truth, and given us the victory over our enemies, and the possession of his Country. O ye servants of God! praise Him for these abundant favours; for God gives increase to those that ask it and are desirous of those things that are with Him, and fulfils his grace upon them that are thankful." Then filling his platter with the sawik, he very liberally entertained his fellow-travellers, who did, without any distinction, eat with him out of the same dish.† On this journey he exercised his temporal and spiritual authority by punishing an Arab for an incestuous marriage, chastising some of the stragglers of the Moslem army for their oppression of a Syrian tributary, and mortifying their luxury and pride by stripping from their backs the costly silks which they had won at Yermouk, and dragging them on their faces through the mire. When he drew within sight of Jerusalem, he exclaimed aloud, "Allah Akbar, and God give us an easy victory;" and spreading his tent, which was of coarse hair, calmly reposed himself on the earth.

The terms of capitulation were readily adjusted and subscribed by the Khalif. The lives of the Christians and permission for the exercise of their Faith were purchased by a heavy and perpetual tribute; and it was stipulated that many humiliating distinctions of dress, appellation, and customs, should for ever preserve a line of ignominious separation between the conquered and their masters. In company with the Patriarch, Omar visited the sacred places of the city, and courteously discussed its religious antiquities. With that strict and honourable observance of the faith of Treaties, which certainly appears to have distinguished the primitive manners of the Moslems, he refused to perform his devotions in the Church of the Resurrection, lest his example, as he told the Patriarch, should be used as a pretext by his followers for depriving the Christians of the edifice: but he directed that the site of the Temple of Solomon should be cleared for the foundation of a Mosque, which soon became the most splendid seat of the Moslem worship in the East. Having regulated the administration of the city, he retraced his steps in a few days into Arabia to occupy again his simple residence at the Tomb of his Prophet; and Jerusalem sank under that grievous bondage to an infidel yoke, in which, with the exception of an interval of less than a century during the Crusades, she has remained to the present hour.*

During the continued successes of the Saracens, the Emperor Heraclius, who, in a slothful old age, could be roused, neither by the memory of his past fame, nor the sense of present dishonour, had hitherto remained in Antioch; only to discourage his subjects by withholding his person from the dangers and toils of war. But at length terrified by the rapid progress of the Saracen arms, he bade an eternal farewell to Syria, and embarking for Constantinople finally abandoned the richest Province of his Empire to the Musliman conquerors. His pusillanimous flight, which was followed by that of his son Constantine, became a signal for the universal submission of Syria and Palestine; the rovers of the Arabian Deserts were left in triumphant possession of one of the fairest regions of the East; and the settlement of their victorious bands in the conquered Provinces, prepared Damascus to become in the next generation, the chosen seat of the Musliman Empire.†

The conquest of Syria had been bequeathed to Omar by the enterprise of his predecessor: but two acquisitions of not inferior splendour were the undivided glory of his own Khalifate. These were Persia and Egypt. In the same year, indeed,—the first of his reign—in which Abu-Beker despatched the Moslems into Syria, he had attempted the invasion of Persia; and the simultaneous assault of the mighty Empires of both the Cæsars and of Chosroes was not too gigantic a project for the ambition of the Citizen of Mecca. When the principal army of the Moslems crossed the Syrian frontier, a second force under Kaled was directed to the banks of the Euphrates; and the first tribute which enriched the Treasury at Medina, as the fruit of foreign conquest, was extorted by his sword from some of the Christian

The Single Khalifate.

From

A. D.

632.

to

A. D.

755.

Fall of Jerusalem.

Triple conquest of the Khalifate of Omar.

I. The subjugation of Syria completed.

A. D.

639.

II. Conquest of Persia.

First invasion of Persia.

A. D.

632.

* Mills, p. 62.

† Ockley, vol. i. p. 250.

• Ockley, p. 258.

† For the close of the Syrian war see Abulfeda, p. 63. Ockley, vol. i. p. 314.

History.
From
A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.
The repulsion of the invasion.

Battle of Cadesia.
A. D.
636.

Sick of Coush.
A. D.
637.

Defeat Battle of Nehavend.
A. D.
640.
Fall of the Persian Monarchy.

Persia, a barren Province.

III. Conquest of Egypt.

Invasion by the Saracens under Amrou.
A. D.
639.

subjects of the Persian Monarchy. But the services of Kaled were soon diverted to the Syrian war; the invasion of Persia was confided to less able commanders; and the repulse of the Moslems in the passage of the Euphrates suspended the designs of Abu-Beker in that quarter. In the third year of Omar's reign, when the successes of their brethren in Syria had attracted the fanatical or rapacious ardour of new myriads from the Arabian Deserts, Omar devoted a formidable army to the renewal of the Persian invasion. The Monarchy of the Sassanides was at that epoch in an equal state of degeneracy and disorder with the Empire of Constantine; and the enthusiastic valour of thirty thousand Arab warriors was vainly opposed by a feeble multitude, rather than an army, of one hundred and twenty thousand Persians. Yet it was not without an obstinate and doubtful conflict of four days on the plains of Cadesia, two journeys from Cufa, that the Moslems finally triumphed. The General of the Persians was slain; and the Great Standard of their Monarchy was captured; and the remains of their routed host were pursued across the Tigris. The whole Province of Irak or Assyria submitted to the sceptre of the Khalif; and the sack of Ctesiphon loaded the Moslems with incredible wealth.

The spoils of Barbaric splendour the obscure extinction of an Oriental dynasty, and the uninteresting revolutions of Oriental servitude, are little worthy of arresting our attention. It may suffice to notice that the last of the descendants of Chosroes, in his flight to the hills of Media, gathered around him a new host of his subjects, and turned to face his pursuers, only to encounter a second and more disastrous defeat; that, after he had sought a miserable refuge for his remaining days among the Scythian shepherds, his People, though abandoned by their ruler, hazarded a third encounter for the independence of their Monarchy, and the preservation of their Religion; and that the crowning carnage of the battle of Nehavend, styled by the Arabs "the victory of victories," finally subjected them to the Empire of the Khalifs. The ancient Government and institutions of Persia were overthrown; the Religion of Zoroaster was proscribed; the alternative of death or conversion was offered to an Idolatrous People; and the Body of the nation, under the scimitars of their conquerors, embraced the profession of Islam. The Empire of Persia was reduced to the rank of a Saracen Province; and Omar, transferring the seat of its Government to the Western bank of the Euphrates, and founding a new Capital at Cufa,* there established his Lieutenant and a numerous colony of the victorious Arabs.

While the Saracen leaders were extending the Eastern limits of the Khalifate to the waters of the Caspian and the Oxus, their brethren were rapidly spreading the dominion of their arms in the opposite quarter of the West. After the conquest of Syria, Amrou, one of the most illustrious Commanders of that war, extracted a dastard permission from the Khalif to attempt the invasion of Egypt; and, at the head of only four thousand men, the intrepid Lieutenant anticipated the irresolution of his master, or the envious opposition of the Council at Medina, by a rapid advance to the frontier. In at first sanctioning the bold design of Amrou, Omar had consulted only the kindred impulse of his own magnanimous and enthusiastic spirit: but worked upon either by the more timid opinions or the interested intrigues of his counsellors, he began to weigh the magnitude of the enterprise against the scanty force of his Syrian army, and to repent the hasty approbation into which he had been surprised. A messenger was despatched after the army with a Letter of instructions, which betrayed the anxious indecision of the Khalif's mind. "If this Epistle reaches you," he wrote to Amrou, "while you are yet in Syria, return: but if you have already entered Egypt, advance with confidence, rely upon the succour of your brethren, and may the blessing of God be upon you." The messenger of the Khalif overtook the army ere it had cleared the Syrian confines: but Amrou, whether he suspected the malice of his enemies, or, as is more probable, was indebted to his friends for some secret intelligence of the contents of the Letter, pursued his march across the frontier, and would not admit the messenger until the audience could clearly be given on the Egyptian soil. The Letter was then opened; and the pursuit of the expedition became an act of obedience to its contents.

This singular, though often repeated anecdote, was the prelude to the easy conquest of Egypt, and the long Musliman dominion of twelve centuries. The approach of the Saracen invaders was welcomed by the Coptic heretics, or native Christian inhabitants of the Country, who had long groaned under the Civil tyranny and religious persecution of the Eastern Emperors. They received the fierce disciples of the Koran with thoughtless joy as the deliverers of their National Church; their ready submission and secret aid favoured the progress of the Musliman arms; and, by a voluntary Treaty, a Christian People purchased toleration for their Religion at the price of perpetual allegiance and tribute to the successors of Mohammed. The fortress of Pelusium, the key of Egypt from the East, and its Greek garrison were easily reduced; and Memphis, after a more obstinate siege of seven months, shared a similar fate. The Greek rulers and colonists of Egypt, who formed not a tenth part of the population, fled from the Provinces down the Nile; the zeal of the Egyptians cut off the escape of distant garrisons, supplied the wants of the Saracens with provisions, and assisted their pursuit with all the facilities of transport; and the remains of the Greek power in Egypt were soon confined to the walls of Alexandria.

Favoured by its maritime position and wealth, the strength of its fortifications, its abundant means of defence, and the spirit of its Greek population, that city—the second of the Eastern Empire in political importance, and the first commercial emporium of the World—might easily have resisted the arms of the Saracens, if the Emperor Heraclius had not been insensible alike to the sufferings and interests of his subjects and the safety and honour of his throne. Though the sea was possessed by the Greek navy, and the port of Alexandria was uninterruptedly open for the introduction of reinforcements and provisions, the inhabitants were abandoned by the Imperial neglect to the unassisted efforts of their own despair. Their defence was, notwithstanding, resolute and protracted; and in the Annals of Saracen conquest, the siege of Alexandria has been marked as the most important and arduous of its enterprises. The efforts of the Khalif were adequate to the necessity and the magnitude of the occasion; and they were enthusiastically answered by the zeal of his People. Roused by his appeal, and tempted by the splendour of the prize, both the veterans of the Syrian war, and new

The Single Khalifate.
From
A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.
Irresolution of Omar.

Perser-vance of Amrou.

Hated of the inhabitants against the Greek Government.

Their ready submission to, and alliance with, the Sara-
cens.

Flight of the Greeks.

Siege of Alexandria.
A. D.
639.

Obstinate defence of the city.

* D'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. Art. Confah.

History.

From
A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.
Triumph of the Sara-cens, and completion of the conquest of Egypt.^{*}
A. D.
640.
The Khalifate of Omar, the Heroic Age of Saracen History.

The first generation of Musul-man conquerors.

Contrast of their descendants.

hordes from the Tribes of the Desert, crowded to the Camp of Amrou; fresh numbers supplied the waste of fourteen months of perpetual combats under the walls of the besieged city; and after a loss of twenty-three thousand Moslems, the banner of the Prophet was at length planted on the ramparts of Alexandria. The Greeks embarked their dispirited and diminished numbers, and Amrou announced to his master 'that the sub- mission of Egypt was complete.'

Crowned with the glories of its triple conquest—of Syria, of Persia, and of Egypt—the Khalifate of Omar deserves to be distinguished as the Heroic Age of Saracen History. For nearly a century, indeed, after its termination, the Arabian arms were still impelled through their triumphant career, with no apparent diminution of energy; but the gigantic foundations of the Saracen power were perfected in this short period of less than ten years. The subsequent extension of the Arabian Empire only hastened the catastrophe of its dismemberment; and entailed the quick and chequered vicissitudes of revolution and conquest. But the Khalifate of Omar is the era of the secure and permanent establishment of the Saracen Empire and Faith; and throughout the extensive regions of Asia and Africa, which were com- pressed under his sceptre, the false Religion of Moham- med has been permitted to this hour, by the inscrutable dispensations of Providence, to maintain its peculiar and unbroken dominion.

In the conquest of Syria, Persia, and Egypt, the fresh and vigorous enthusiasm of the personal compa- nions and proselytes of Mohammed was exercised and expended; and the generation of warriors, whose simple fanaticism had been inflamed by the preaching of the Pseudo-prophet, was in a great measure consumed in the sanguinary combats and perpetual toils of ten ardu- ous campaigns. In one season alone, at the close of the Syrian war, which is mournfully celebrated in their Annals as "the year of destruction," no less than twenty-five thousand Moslems were swept away by Pestilence. Among its victims were some of the most distinguished companions of the Prophet himself; and in particular Abu-Obeidah, Serjabil, and Yezid. Kaled, who, with the presumption of a true fanatic, believed that he had borne a charmed life through the dangers of a hundred battles, was spared from this visitation only to fall a prey, three years later, to the exhaustion of disease and the corroding passions of a wounded spirit. The injustice of Omar to the merits of this fiery cham- pion of the Saracen cause, is the only stain upon the character of that great Khalif. He was prompted by some unexplained cause of hatred, to encourage a base charge of peculation against the hero of the Syrian war; and Kaled was treated with gross indignity, and sen- tenced to a heavy fine. He endured his injuries with exemplary forbearance; and the honorable proof of his poverty exposed the malice of his enemies. But he died broken-hearted; and the tears which the repentant Khalif shed over his tomb, were too late an atonement for the persecution which had bowed the hero to his grave.†

In the Moslem ranks, a new generation of their sons,

* Abulfeda, (Annals Moslem.) p. 73. Ockley, vol. I. ed. p. 362.

† These touching circumstances relative to the wrongs which broke the stern heart of the fiercest champion of the Koran, re- mained undiscovered either by Ockley or Gibbon, and they have been interwoven into the thread of Saracen story by Mr. Mills, (p. 72,) from the researches of Pries.

Countrymen, and proselytes, quickly replaced the first conquerors of Asia and Africa: but the national and religious character of the primitive converts of Mo- hammed was as rapidly modified in their descendants by the fruits of their success. The original disciples of the Koran had been animated by the genuine spirit of fanaticism; and the simple self-denial and voluntary poverty which marked the lives of Abu-Beker and Omar, Abu-Obeidah and Kaled, are traits which they shared in common with the general body of their devout and abstemious brethren. Though the duty of extend- ing their Religion by the sword had a ready incentive in the spirit of predatory warfare which they brought from their Deserts, their ambition and rapacity were passions, artfully encouraged indeed by the doctrines of their Faith, but still subordinate to the all-absorbing enthu- siasm with which they were inspired. They fought for dominion and wealth: but they were equally ready to exchange sublimary objects for the crown of martyrdom and the rewards of Paradise. The hordes of the Desert might be tempted by the wealth of Syria and Persia; but their ranks were unquestionably thronged with fanatics also, who had learned to despise the fading delights of this World, and to devote their lives to the imaginary cause of Heaven. The new luxuries and riches of the Imperial Provinces, the voluptuous pleasures of opulent cities, the possession of fertile lands, and the enjoyments of a delicious climate, wrought their natural effects upon the rude and hungry wanderers of the Arabian sands: the cultivation of the arts of policy, which was rendered necessary by their conquests, ex- tinguished the simplicity of their fanaticism; and the thirst of wealth, which was inspired by the wants of in- creasing luxury, corrupted the sincerity and single- minded devotion of their religious and patriotic profes- sion. Among the Saracen conquerors of Damascus, Ctesiphon, and Alexandria, there abounded examples of the most fiery valour, coupled with the most heroic sacrifice of fortune and person and life, the most com- plete abandonment of self, to the fancied will of Heaven, and the common cause of fellow-countrymen and be- lievers: among the leaders of the Moslem armies but a generation later, in place of this stern rivalry of fanati- cal but generous virtue, there are visible only the darkest and most grovelling passions which are engendered in the perfidious intrigues and slothful despotism of Oriental Courts. Domestic treason, and intestine discord, the dagger of the assassin and the sword of Civil war, alternately decided the fortunes of the Moslem World. The religious and political unity of the disciples of Islam, was most strikingly preserved in the inviolable sanctity with which the office of the Prophet and his first two successors was regarded; but the charm was for ever broken from the hour in which the venerated Omar fell, in the tenth year of his reign, by the stroke of an assassin. The motive of the murderer could scarcely be either religious or political: his crime was the first act of treason which defiled the Khalifate; but it was the signal and the precedent for a thousand bloody tragedies, of regicide and tyranny, conspiracy and massacre. It is the event which offers a marked termination to the first epoch of the Saracen fortunes, the epoch of pure fanaticism, or the Heroic Age of Saracen virtue and achievement; it introduced the first germ of anarchy into the annals of the Khalif- ate; and it is the point from which we shall begin to move with accelerated rapidity through the disorderly

The Single Khalifate.

From
A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.

Pure fanaticism of the original disciples of the Koran.

Its rapid corruption.

Growth of luxury.

and crime.

Assassin-tion of Omar.

A. D.
644.

History.

From
A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.
Reign of Othman.
A. D.
644. to
A. D.
655.

Intensity of his character and conduct.

Extension of the Saracen conquests in Asia.

reigns and the troubled series of the Commanders of the Faithful.*

On his death-bed, Omar refused to charge his soul with the responsibility of selecting a successor. With equal impartiality he rejected the names of Ali and of his own son; and committed the election of a new Khalif to six of the most respected of his counsellors. Ali was of the number; and he might easily have secured the suffrages of the other five, if his proud spirit could have submitted to the restrictions which they desired to impose. These, indeed, it is probable, were more nominal than real; since it seems only to have been required that he should swear to govern according to the Koran, tradition, and the example of his two predecessors. Under these limitations, the ambitious and less scrupulous Othman, the Secretary of Mohammed, accepted the office of Commander of the Faithful; and his accession ushered in a reign, distinguished by the successful prosecution of foreign conquest, and the ominous growth of domestic anarchy.

The personal character of the new Khalif encouraged the increasing licentiousness of faction: his old age was feeble and imprudent; his temper was confiding and lavish; and his administration was at once rash and imbecile, irresolute and partial. His doating fondness for his family was disgracefully contrasted with the self-denial of his predecessors; and one of the first acts of his reign exhibited a mixture of injustice and favouritism, which had nearly entailed the loss of Egypt, and was sufficient to alienate the affection of the Musulmans. He recalled the victorious Amrou from the Government of a Country, in which his politic talents, his firm justice, and his generous clemency had won the love of the People, without forfeiting the attachment of his soldiery. After his departure, the Byzantine Court was roused to attempt the recovery of Egypt; a Grecian fleet and army made a descent at Alexandria, and occupied the harbour and fortifications; and the Egyptians, dreading to fall again under the yoke and vengeance of their former oppressors, implored the Khalif to restore Amrou to his command. Othman was compelled to sacrifice his wishes to the public necessity; and Amrou drove the Greeks a second time into the sea. Another descent of the Imperial forces summoned the heroic Saracen from the prosecution of his conquests in Western Africa; and the obstinate resistance, which he encountered in a third siege of Alexandria, provoked him to swear, that if God again permitted him to expel the Greek Infidels from a post, which it had been so easy for them to reoccupy and defend, he would make the city as accessible on all sides as the house of a courtesan. On the last successful assault, he redeemed his pledge by demolishing the wall; but he arrested the indiscriminate slaughter of Greeks and Egyptians; and the foundation of the Monque of Mercy marked to future Ages the spot on which the Saracen conqueror stayed the avenging fury of his troops.

While Amrou was consolidating the dominion of his weak and ungrateful master in Egypt, the Generals of Othman in the East were widely enlarging the bounds of the Khalifate. On the one side, repassing the Tigris at the bridge of Mosul, and turning Westward, the Moslem armies severed large tracts of Armenia and Mesopotamia from the Greek Empire, and connected their conquests with the great Saracen Province of Syria. On the opposite frontier of Persia, at the extreme East, the successful invasion of Khorasan carried the Saracen arms into the region of independent Tartary; and a short and triumphant war extended the frontiers of their Empire to the banks of the Oxus.

The secure establishment of the Musulman dominion in Egypt, opened the road for the conquest of Western Africa. The ambitious and pious desire of carrying the sword and the Koran through its unexplored regions was approved by the counsellors of Othman and the Chiefs of the Arabian Tribes; and twenty thousand warriors marched from their native Deserts to reinforce the Musulman army in Egypt for the expedition. Its command was bestowed by the partiality of the Khalif upon his foster-brother Abdallah, who had supplanted the superior merit of Amrou; and the new Lieutenant led an army of forty thousand men to the siege of Tripoli. The Prefect Gregory, who governed the vast African Provinces as the representative of the Eastern Emperor, collected an army of a hundred and twenty thousand Greeks and Moorish or Barbarian auxiliaries to oppose the invaders; and a furious and sanguinary battle of several days' continuance terminated as usual in the triumph of the Saracen valour and fanaticism. The Prefect Gregory was slain by the hand of Zobeir*—the new Kaled of this war—whose impetuous courage and skilful conduct supplied the deficiencies of Alkallah, and mainly achieved the victory. Its fruits were lost for a time by the ravages of an epidemical disease, and the exhaustion produced by the climate in the Moslem ranks; and though the African Provincials submitted on all sides to the conquerors, their diminished army withdrew, after a campaign of fifteen months, to the Egyptian frontier, laden with wealth and captives. The booty was so immense that, in the division, each foot-soldier received one thousand, and each horseman two thousand pieces of gold; but no permanent establishment in the ravaged Province was for the present attempted; and, during nearly twenty years afterwards, the African conquests were suspended by the intestine disorders into which the Khalifate was now plunged.

In the appropriation of the African spoil, the Khalif, under the colour of a nominal sale, granted the fifth, which belonged to the State, to a rapacious favourite; and this act of absurd and fraudulent prodigality completed the measure of public discontent, which had been already provoked by his partiality for his own family. The presumption of the dotard in occupying the highest seat of his Prophet's pulpit, though his two predecessors had displayed their humility in never ascending above the first or second step, had shocked the prejudices of the fanatics of Medina; and the cry of religious indignation was raised to exasperate the passions of the multitude. On all sides, from Egypt and Persia and Syria, as well as from the Tribes of the Arabian Deserts, the disaffected Musulmans gathered in arms; and approaching Medina, the rebels sent an insolent message to their Sovereign either to execute justice or to descend from his throne. The feeble

The Single
Khalifate.

A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.
And in Africa.

A. D.
647.

Disaffection to Othman.

General revolt of the Moslems
against him.

* The authorities for the Khalifate of Omar are, Abulfeda, (Annals Moslemens), p. 67—73. Ockley, Hist. of the Saracens, vol. i. p. 117, ed. 6a. &c. D'Herbelot, Bib. Orientale, Art. Omar. Gibbon, c. 51. Mills, c. 2

* The Romantic tale of the prowess and beauty of the daughter of Gregory, and the fate of the Amazon, whose hand was the promised prize of valour to both armies, has been implicitly copied, and may be read in all the more voluminous narratives of this African war—but it is too long, unless it had been more important, for our present purpose.

History.

From
A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.

Othman, appalled at the extent of the revolt, endeavoured by a prompt acknowledgment of his errors to appease the resentment of the insurgents and persuade their separation. But their subsiding irritation was rekindled by the malignant and ambitious instigation of Ayesha, the widow of Mohammed, who desired to seat one of her friends on the throne of the Khalifate. By her machinations, and the perfidy of the Khalif's own Secretary, a forged order for the assassination of the Lieutenant, whom Othman had been compelled to name for the command in Egypt, was secretly thrown into the hands of the delegates from the insurgent army of that Province. This atrocious artifice succeeded in exciting the rebels again to the highest degree of fury; and they besieged the Khalif even in the sanctuary of his Palace. Othman, together with the respect and reverence of the Moslems, had lost the only defence of his person; his helplessness was unassured by the favourites who had preyed on his facile disposition; and he was abandoned by their desertion to the popular vengeance which they had provoked against him. For some time, though his food and water were intercepted, the religious scruples of the rebels recoiled from the last act of violence against the sacred person of a legitimate successor of the Prophet. But at length the arts of his mortal enemies prevailed; and after a generous but ineffectual effort on the part of Hassan and Hossein, the sons of Ali, to protect him, the gates of the Palace were burst open, the principal conspirators entered the chamber where the aged Khalif sat patiently expecting the signal of death, and with the Koran in his lap, Othman fell, pierced by innumerable wounds.

His murder,

A. D.
655.

Reign of Ali.

A. D.
655. to
A. D.
660.

The murder of Othman was followed at Medina by an anarchy of five days, terminated by the elevation of Ali to the throne of the Prophet. The proud Chief of the House of Haschem is declared to have acceded with reluctance to the irregular voices of a tumultuary Assembly: but his positive refusal to comply with the wish of the conspirators from Egypt would have provoked a general massacre; and Ali, while he indignantly protested against the presumptuous interference of strangers, consented to receive the throne from the formal suffrages of the legitimate electors—the Chieftains of the Arabian Tribes. Their proffered allegiance appeared to confirm the proposal of the insurgents: but anticipating the calumnious misrepresentations of Ayesha, his personal and deadly enemy, and of the family of Ommia, the hereditary rivals of his House, the new Khalif declined to receive the homage of the Chiefs in private; and proceeding to the Mosque in the ordinary simplicity of his attire—in his coarse turban and cotton gown—bearing his slippers in one hand and his bow, which served for a staff, in the other, he there accepted the right hand of each Chieftain as the public token of his fealty.

Treachery
from his person.

But the same deficiency in the arts of worldly policy, which had probably so long retarded the elevation of Ali to the throne of Mohammed, involved his reign in disquiet and calamity. At the outset, with equal imprudence, he neglected either to conciliate the adherence or to secure the persons of Zobeir and Telha, two of the most powerful among the Saracen Commanders. He provoked their vindictive enmity by refusing them the government of Cufa and Bassora; and he suffered them to escape from Medina accompanied by Ayesha for the purpose of raising the standard of rebellion. From various causes, most of the Lieutenants in the Provinces were disaffected from the person of the new Khalif; and his indirect violence in recalling them to Medina provoked their resistance. The hereditary influence and enmity of Moawiyah, the son of Abu Sofian, and the representative of the Family of Ommia, who commanded in Syria, rendered him the most dangerous of the malecontents; Amrou, the conqueror of Egypt, was his zealous confederate; and under the pretence of requiring justice for the murder of the late Khalif, the Syrian army was seduced from its allegiance to his successor. The sons of Ali had endeavoured to save the life of Othman, while Ayesha and her party had instigated his assassination: yet that abandoned woman, who hated the new Khalif even more than she had done his feeble predecessor, declared herself, in concert with Moawiyah, the avenger of the blood which she had assisted in shedding, and pretended to identify the cause of Ali with that of the murderers. The bloody shirt of Othman was suspended over the pulpit of Damascus; and, inflamed by the spectacle, eighty thousand Moslems in Syria were persuaded by the example of Amrou to swear vengeance against Ali, and to proclaim Moawiyah as the legitimate Khalif in his stead.

The Siege of the Khalifate
From
A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.

Rebellion
against him.

The first storm of Civil war, however, gathered on the confines of Persia, whither Ayesha had fled with Zobeir and Telha. These confederates soon assembled in arms; and though it shocked the reverential feelings of the more scrupulous among the Moslems that the widow of the Prophet should expose her person in the indecent publicity of a Camp, yet her presence was esteemed by the popular superstition as a proof of the sanctity of the cause, and an infallible earnest of its success. The ranks of her party were rapidly swollen into a formidable army; and by the surprise and defeat of his Lieutenant, the Khalif was admonished of the necessity of his personal appearance in the field. Age had not chilled the martial activity of Ali; and passing from Medina into Persia at the head of twenty thousand loyal Arabs, who were reinforced by ten thousand of the men of Cufa, he encountered and totally defeated the insurgents under the walls of Bassora. Both Telha and Zobeir were slain in the conflict; and the widow of Mohammed was led a captive into the presence of Ali. She had fearlessly assumed her station, to animate her followers, in the thickest of the fight; above three-score men who successively led her camel by the bridle were killed or disabled; and her very litter had been pierced by countless showers of arrows. Around her person, her followers continually rallied; and it was not until the animal on which she was mounted had been slain, that the victory—which is hence known in Arabian History as the Day of the Camel—was decided. She was received by the conqueror with the respect which was still due to the widow of the Prophet and the mother of the Faithful: but Ali firmly though gently constrained an immediate return to her becoming retirement at the Tomb of Mohammed; and she was escorted by his own sons to her former residence at Medina.

First Civil war of the Moslems.

Battle of Bassora.

or "Day of the Camel."

After this success, the Khalif advanced to encounter a more formidable antagonist in the person of Moawiyah; and on the great plain of Siffin, near the Euphrates, on the confines of Persia and Syria, the contending forces of Islam drew out to decide in Civil warfare the first among a thousand contests for the throne of their Prophet. The event was held in suspense during a

Contest of Ali and Moawiyah.

* Abulfeda, p. 75—82. D'Herbelot, Art. Othman. Ockley, Gibbon, Milla, supra.

History. desultory but sanguinary field of above a hundred days; but in every skirmish the cause of the legitimate Khalif promised to triumph; in every charge the tremendous prowess of his youth revived with the occasion, and scattered death and dismay through the ranks of the rebels. The generous humanity of Ali shone in the contest as conspicuously as his valour; his followers were strictly commanded to await the attack of their Moslem brethren, and to spare the lives of the fugitives; to respect the bodies of the slain and the honour of the female captives. To prevent the effusion of Musulman blood, he nobly proposed to his rival to decide their title by the issue of a single combat. "How long," was the indignant message of the hero, "how long shall the people waste their lives in our controversy? I challenge thee to appeal to the decision of God and the sword between us." But Moawiya declined this fearful trial of his merits against the proverbial valour of the Khalif; and the increasing slaughter of his followers prepared him for the alternative of flight. Of his army the immense number of forty-five thousand had already fallen, while Ali had sustained an inferior loss of twenty-five thousand; and after a last nocturnal encounter, the victory of the Khalif seemed no longer doubtful: when its fruits were suddenly lost to him by an artful stratagem of Amrou. That Chieftain caused his troops to hoist the Koran on the points of their lances; his cry that the sacred volume ought to decide all differences was caught up by the enthusiasm of both armies; and Ali, after vainly representing to his Arabs the insidiousness of the appeal, was compelled to yield to a hollow truce and a disgraceful compromise. He drew off his army in sorrow and indignation to Cufa; his partisans were discouraged; his authority declined from day to day; and an open revolt rapidly spread through every Province of the Khalifate. By the intrigues of his crafty rival, not only Syria, but Egypt and Arabia were already completely reduced from their allegiance, when the stroke of fanaticism anticipated the last triumph of rebellion. In the Temple of Mecca, three devotees agreed that the peace of Religion could only be secured by the common death of Moawiya, of his friend Amrou, again the Vicerey of Egypt, and of Ali. Each fanatic chose his victim and poisoned his dagger: but the only fatal blow reached the heart of Ali. The first assassin mistaking the person of Amrou stabbed a Secretary in his place; the second, at Damascus, inflicted only a dangerous wound on Moawiya; but, in the Mosque of Cufa, the third, with an unerring aim, plunged his dagger into the breast of the Khalif, who expired mercifully exhorting his children not to prolong the death of his murderer by needless torture.*

Minor of Ali.
A. D.
660.
Pile of his body.

The death of Ali left the rich prize of the Mohammedan Empire to the undisputed grasp of his rival. Moawiya was already recognised as Khalif in Arabia, Syria, and Egypt; and though the people of Cufa saluted Hassan, the eldest son of Ali, as Commander of the Faithful, the unambitious grandson of Mohammed, in the consciousness of weakness, soon withdrew to a life of retirement and devotion at Medina. But he could not escape the jealousy of the family of Omnia; and Yazid, the son of Moawiya, is accused, by professing a passion for the wife of Hassan, of having induced her to administer poison to her husband. The fate of the other son of Ali was still more unhappy. On the death of Moawiya, Hossein was invited from Medina by the Cufians to assert his pretensions to the Khalifate: he imprudently listened to the overture, was betrayed by the perfidy of the same race whose inconstancy had deserted his father, and was surrounded and slain by his enemies, under circumstances of the most touching interest.* But the lives of his captive family were spared by the generosity or the piety of the second Omniaden Khalif; they were restored to liberty, and allotted a residence in the sacred seat of Medina; and from this source the descendants of Mohammed and Ali have overspread the Musulman World. Though excluded by the triumph of the House of Omnia from the throne of the Khalifate, they have in every Age of Mohammedanism enjoyed the veneration of the Faithful; and in every Musulman Country they have been distinguished by a hereditary or family appellation, and by the peculiar privilege of wearing the turban of green. The ease of the imposture has, of course, perpetually multiplied the number of claimants to the honour of this pedigree; and, with more or less probability, the Fatimite and Almohaden Khalifs in Egypt and Syria, in Western Africa and Spain, and the reigning dynasty in Persia, have been the most illustrious pretenders to a pure descent from Ali and the daughter of Mohammed.†

By a singular fortune, the political dispute between the Family of Ali and their enemies has been perpetuated into a religious and national schism; and the distinction between the orthodox Musulmans and the votaries of Ali is preserved in the inveterate hatred of the Turks and Persians. The former, who certainly follow the Religion of Mohammed in its original purity—if the term may with propriety be lent to an imposture—are entitled to the appellation, which they claim, of Sunnites, or orthodox traditionalists; and the latter, whom they stigmatize with the epithet of Shiites, or sectaries, have corrupted the Faith of Islam with the heresy, that as Mohammed was the Apostle, so Ali was the Vicar of God. The origin of the schism may obviously be ascribed to the political quarrel between the Houses of Haschem and Omnia; but its religious progress is more difficult to be traced: though, as the partisans of Ali were originally most numerous in Cufa and the Persian Provinces, it is probable that the sect of Shiites arose in the same regions from the local perpetuation of a reverence for his memory.‡

The death of Ali consummated the grandeur of the House of Omnia; and that event ensured its establishment on the throne of the Prophet for nearly one

* Ockley's well-known and pathetic relation of the death of Hossein, (vol. ii. p. 170—231,) which all succeeding writers have copied, is too long to be compressed into our rapid survey; and the beautiful and affecting simplicity of its details, which no narrative has ever surpassed, would be lost in an abridgement. Nor can we refuse to assent to Mr. Hallam's shrewd objection, that the very minuteness of Ockley's circumstantial tale, in which its pathos chiefly consists, is far from tending to render it historically the more deserving of confidence.

† So late as the middle of the last century, the celebrated Danish traveller Niebuhr, (Voyages en Arabie, &c.) found the custody of the Casba, and the government of Mecca and Medina still in the hands of the undoubted literal descendants of Hassan, the eldest son of Ali, a family then numbering about three hundred members.

‡ The conjecture here hazarded has not been proposed, that we are aware, by any former writer: but in the obscurity of an inquiry—in itself of little moment perhaps—the presumption is natural.

The Single Khalifate.
From
A. D.
682. to
A. D.
755.

His posterity.

Origin of the great religious schism of Mohammedanism.

Dynasty of the Omniades.

A. D.
660. to
A. D.
750.

* Abulfeda, Annales Moslemes, p. 63—102. D'Herbelot, Bib. Orientale, Art. Ali. Ockley, Gibbon, Mallet, et supra.

History.

From
A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.

hundred years. The conflict between Ali and Moawiya is to be regarded only as the continuance of a feud, which had commenced before, or at least during, the life of Mohammed himself. The rival Families of Haschem and Omnia were the most illustrious of the Korish; and the alternate preponderance of their influence in their own Tribe had gradually been extended to the sovereignty of Mecca, of Arabia, and of the whole Moslem world. The elevation of Abu Sofian, the Chieftain of the Omniaden Family, had been the signal for the proscription of Mohammed: the religious and political victory of the Impostor had restored the government of Mecca to the race of Haschem. The submission of Abu Sofian had been followed by the conversion, whether real or feigned, of his whole House; and his son, Moawiya, the representative of the Line, had been intrusted by successive Khalifs with the most important commands, and had served with distinction in the wars of Islam. According to every rule of hereditary right, the injured descendants of Mohammed and Ali had the first title to the throne; and, if the law of primogeniture were extended through the Tribe of Korish, even the children of Abbas, the uncle of the Prophet, had the prior claim of the House of Haschem.

Reign of Moawiya,
the first Omniaden Khalif.

A. D.
660. to
A. D.
680.

But the command of the Syrian Province, the factious excitement of the times, and the support of Amrou, had favoured the ambition of Moawiya; and after the fall of Ali, he was recognised throughout the Moslem World as Commander of the Faithful. The politic qualities of the new Khalif enabled him not only to consolidate his own power, but to achieve the more difficult enterprise of perpetuating it in his family, and of converting an elective into a hereditary sovereignty. His own tumultuary elevation to the Khalifate by the voices of his Syrian soldiery at Damascus, had broken the charm which restricted the scene and the right of election to the holy precincts of Medina, and the free suffrages of the Arabian Chieftains and elders. Moawiya, by fixing his residence at Damascus, and thus transferring the seat of the Khalifate from the Arabian to the Syrian Capital, prepared the way for a still more important innovation; and, notwithstanding some feeble opposition from the patriots or fanatics of Arabia, he succeeded in peaceably transmitting the sceptre of Islam to his son Yezid, and in establishing his own dynasty, by their questionable title of lineal descent, on the undisputed throne of the Khalifate.*

Prosecution
of the Saracen conquests.

In Western Africa.

A. D.
665.
to
A. D.
675.

The able and vigorous administration of Moawiya quelled or diverted the violence of Saracen faction; and during his reign the course of the Musulman conquests was again progressive. The Provincials of Western Africa, oppressed by the tyranny and extortion of the Byzantine Government, themselves besought a new invasion of the Saracens, and tempted the ready ambition of the Khalif. The first Lieutenant and army whom Moawiya despatched for their deliverance, obtained some important successes over the Greek troops; but the glory of carrying the Saracen arms across the whole breadth of Africa, even to the shores of the Atlantic, was reserved for Akbah, the second Commander to whom Moawiya intrusted the prosecution of the war. Penetrating through the wilderness in which his Countrymen afterwards erected the magnificent cities of Fez and Morocco, his career was arrested only by the waters of the Western Ocean; and spurring his horse into the waves, he exclaimed, as he raised his eyes to Heaven in a transport of fanaticism, "Great God! if my course were not stopped by this sea, I would still go on to the unknown regions of the West, preaching the unity of Thy holy name, and putting to the sword the rebellious nations who worship any other Gods than Thee!"

Notwithstanding this aspiration, the triumphal ardour of Akbah was checked in the sequel by the mere ordinary obstacles of human resistance; and he was finally overpowered and slain in a universal defection of the African Greeks and Barbarians. It required the painful exertions of successive Generals and armies to consolidate the Saracen dominion over the restless Province of Africa; and the struggle was continued with various success during a desultory warfare of twenty years after the death of Akbah, before the sea-coast and some interior parts of the Country, from the Nile to the shores of the Atlantic, were finally reduced under the Empire of the Khalifs. The curiosity of the reader would be little excited, and his attention would be worthlessly occupied, by the obscure details of a contest, of which the uninteresting scene lay chiefly among the barbarous regions, and the still more barbarous People of the African Deserts; and anticipating the exact order of time, we may pass at once to the event which is alone worthy of record. The civilized but inconstant population of the maritime Provinces, inclined alternately to the cause of their Greek masters or their Saracen invaders: but the fall of Carthage, the Capital of the Byzantine Province, to the arms of Hassan, the General of Abdalmalek, the fourth Omniaden Khalif, was followed by the submission or reduction of all the Greek settlements on the coast; and before the close of the VIIIth century, the forces of the Byzantine Empire were finally expelled from their last possession in Africa.*

The task of subjugating the inhabitants of the Deserts of Africa was somewhat longer retarded, but was as effectually completed by their conversion to the Faith of the Koran. This race were the wild Moors, or native People of Mauritania, who had been branded by the Imperial Provincials with the reproach of Barbarism, and whose corrupted appellation of Barbars or Berebers, was naturally transferred to their Country, and has become justly indigenous to the whole Northern coast of Africa or Barbary. Between the Bedouens of Arabia, and the wandering Moors or Berebers of Africa, there was a striking resemblance in the accidents of climate and condition, and the consequent peculiarities of customs and character. The African rovers as readily adopted the language and name, as the Religion of their conquerors; by the dispersion of fifty thousand Saracen fanatics of genuine descent through the Moorish Deserts, the blood of both races was rapidly commingled; and, from the Euphrates to the Atlantic, the same nation might seem to be diffused over the sandy plains of Asia, and Africa. When, after the change of but a single generation, the Saracen invaders crossed over the Straits of Gibraltar into Europe, the distinction of their origin

The Single Khalifate.

From
A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.

Vicinity
of the war.

Last trial
of the Greeks.

A. D.
692. to
A. D.
698.

Final conquest of Western Africa by the Saracens.

A. D.
709.

Amalgam
of the Arabian and Moorish races.

* For the reign of Moawiya, see Abulfeda, Annales Moslemicæ, p. 101—111. D'Hervé, Bibl. Orientale, Art. Moawiya, and the continuation of the modern writers before cited.

* For the details of the Saracen conquest of Africa, besides the text of Abulfeda and Ockley, (vol. ii.) see Cardonne, Histoire de l'Afrique et de l'Espagne sous la Domination des Arabes, vol. ii, p. 30—55.

History. was already in some manner confounded under their common appellations; and the Musulman conquerors of Spain have been in all subsequent Ages indifferently termed either Arabians or Moors.*

The African war had only partially engaged the attention of Moawiyah; and the most splendid and gigantic effort of his reign—though, contrary to the usual fortune of the Saracen arms, it failed of success—was directed against the Capital itself of the Eastern Empire. Only thirty-six years after the death of Mohammed, his Countrymen and disciples, already masters of Arabia, Syria, Persia, Egypt, and parts of the further Africa, landed for the first time on the shores of Europe to undertake the siege of Constantinople. The preparations of Moawiyah by sea and land were commensurate with the grandeur of an enterprise, to which the warlike rotaries of the Koran were influenced by the strongest excitement of avarice and fanaticism: by the report that the wealth of the Universe was collected in the Capital of the East, and by the tradition that the promises of Paradise were peculiarly reserved by their Prophet for the first Moslem army which should besiege the metropolis of the Christian Infidels. The guidance of the holy expedition was committed to Sofian, a veteran Commander in the wars of Islam; and the presence of Yezid, the son of Moawiyah, and the acknowledged heir of the Khalifate, was a pledge of the importance and hopes of its success. The immense naval armament of the Saracens, which had been collected in the ports of Syria and Egypt, entered the Hellespont without opposition from the forces of the Emperor, Constantine V., the feeble grandson of Heraclius; and the fleet casting anchor in the strait, the troops were disembarked under the walls of the Capital.

But in the ardour of their enthusiasm, the Saracen leaders had miscalculated their own strength and the difficulties of the expedition. In the extremity of danger which threatened their property, their Empire, and their Faith, the People of Constantinople were roused to desperation. Some sparks of the Roman spirit were rekindled in the degenerate race who still arrogated the Roman name; and their defence of the Capital was not unworthy of the best days of the Empire. Guarded by numbers, courage, and discipline, the strength of its massive and lofty ramparts mocked every assault of the Saracens; the approach of their naval armament was destructively repelled by the tremendous effects of that unknown chemical compound, so celebrated under the name of the Greek fire;† and the astonished and ignorant Moslems were dismayed and panic-stricken by the success of an invention, which appears to have been tried for the first time upon this memorable occasion. After vainly expending their fury against the walls of the Capital, the Saracen leaders were compelled to divert their arms to the ravage of the adjacent coasts. On the approach of winter, they withdrew to the chosen station of Cyzicus: but, during the following six years, they each Summer persisted in renewing their operations with diminished hopes but enduring obstinacy. Nor did they, after encountering every vicissitude of bloodshed, conflagration, shipwreck, and pestilence, abandon their enterprise, until thirty thousand of their number had perished in the contest. They fell with the fanatical confidence that, in so meritorious and sacred a warfare, they were exchanging their lives for the joys of Paradise: but the surviving remnant of their host withdrew in discouragement and weakness from the long and desultory siege.*

Its failure cast a transient cloud over the glories of the Khalifate; the pale star of the Cæsars rose dimly for an instant in the ascendant; and for once in the meridian grandeur of the Saracen power, we are presented with the strange spectacle of its submission to the dismembered Empire of the East. After the repulse of the Saracens from Constantinople, the ambassadors of the Greek Emperor appeared at the Court of Damascus as the representatives of a victorious Potentate: and Moawiyah accepted a Peace which was burdened with the ignominious condition, that he should render an annual tribute of money, horses, and slaves to the throne of the Cæsars. The solution of this disgraceful submission must be sought in the domestic state of the Khalifate during the same period. The hostilities which the Maronite subjects or confederates of the Empire had carried to the gates of Damascus, disturbed the last years of Moawiyah. While his name was dreaded in the distant and opposite regions of Asia and Africa, the incursions of these bands threatened his security in the very precincts of his Palace; and in the natural desire of ending his days in repose, the Khalif was contented to sacrifice the ambition and glory of his reign. The internal distractions of the Khalifate completed the temporary depression of its foreign power; and during a domestic revolt of some of the Provinces from the House of Omnia, the Byzantine Emperors were allowed to increase their exaction of tribute.†

Under Abdalmalek, the fourth Khalif of the Omniaden dynasty, peace and union were restored in the Provinces of Islam; and his arms and policy had no sooner triumphed over internal rebellion, than he indignantly renounced the condition of foreign tribute. Pursuing his designs, his son Walid—whose reign of personal inactivity was rendered illustrious through the total subjugation of Africa and Spain by his Lieutenants—mediated the completion of its glories by the conquest of the Greek Empire. The enterprise was suspended by his death: but it was renewed by his brother Soliman, the sixth Khalif of his House: who, with a more martial spirit, announced his intention of personally leading his subjects to the siege of Constantinople; and summoned the Moslem World to the standard of their Prophet for this sacred expedition. The solemn call was enthusiastically obeyed; and the advanced guard of the Musulman host, which alone is said to have amounted to above one hundred thousand men of Persia and Arabia, mounted for the greater part on camels and horses,

The Single Khalifate.
From
A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.

The Khalifate tributary to the Greek Empire.
A. D.
677. to
A. D.
684.

Until the accession of Abdalmalek
A. D.
684.

Second siege of Constantinople.
A. D.
716. to
A. D.
718.

* Abulfeda, Annals Moslem. p. 107, 108. Nicephori Constantinopolitani, Revisio Historiarum, p. 21, 22. Theophrasti Chronographia, p. 294. Ockley, Hist. of the Saracens, vol. ii. p. 127, &c.
† Theophrasti Chronographia, p. 295—300. Ockley, vol. ii. p. 254—368.

History.

From
A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.

traversed Asia Minor under Moslemah, the brother of the Khalif, and having, after the reduction of the intervening cities, effected the passage of the Hellespont at Abydos, appeared before the walls of Constantinople. Their operations were supported by the approach of the navy of Egypt and Syria, an immense armada of eighteen hundred vessels of various size; and the Khalif himself, from his camp in Syria, hastened to conduct the remaining forces of his Eastern dominions to the same theatre of action.

Its failure.

These gigantic preparations were frustrated by the death of Soliman himself, and by a repetition of the same disasters which had overwhelmed the armament of Moawiyah. When the Saracen navy crowded the entrance of the Bosphorus, the fire-ships of the Greeks were suddenly launched upon them from the harbour of Constantinople; the inextinguishable fury of the maritime fire spread through the vast moving forest; and the Saracen crews were destroyed in the same tremendous conflagration which consumed their vessels. The fate of the land-forces was scarcely less dreadful. The siege was obstinately protracted through the winter; and by the sword, by the extraordinary rigour of the season, by famine, and by disease, thousands perished before the walls of the city. The Khalif Omar II., the successor of Soliman, abstracted in fanatical devotion, either neglected their distresses, or passively left the continuance of the siege to the decision of Heaven. On the return of Spring, he was roused to some efforts for the succour and reinforcement of his troops; but the renewal of the enterprise was attended only by an aggravation of the calamities which had befallen it in the preceding year. A new naval armament was again thrown into flames by the dreaded Greek fire; the army was harassed and its detachments were cut to pieces by the Bulgarian hordes, which the gold and promises of the Emperor Leo attracted from the Danube upon the rear of the Saracen Camp; and after the enterprise had been prolonged during thirteen months of continual suffering and loss, the remains of the Moslem host were hopelessly withdrawn into the Provinces of Asia.*

Final retreat of the Saracens.

Greatest extension of the Saracen Empire under the Omniads.

Conquest of Spain.

A. D.
710. to
A. D.
713.

And of Tartary.

A. D.
710.

The second siege of Constantinople was undertaken and abandoned at the epoch when the Empire of the Saracens, under the sceptre of the Omniads, had acquired its greatest extension in Asia, in Africa, and in Europe. The details of the splendid conquest of Spain by the Moslems under Mousa, the Lieutenant of the Khalif Walid, have already been embodied, under a preceding division of our subject, in the annals of that Kingdom;† and it may here be sufficient to note that, on the opposite frontiers of their vast expanse of dominion, the arms of the Saracens were in the same year carried beyond the Straits of Gibraltar and the banks of the Oxus. The standard of the Koran was planted on the walls of Toledo and Samarcond; the subjugation of Spain and Tartary reflected the glory of a simultaneous triumph on the reign of Walid; and the horsemen of Yemen were encamped in the same hour on the confines of France and of China. The Countries of Arabia, Syria, Mesopotamia, Persia, and Tartary, the Isle of Cyprus, the whole of Egypt and the Northern coasts of Africa, the Peninsula of Spain, and part of Southern France, were all embraced under the sceptre of the Khalifs and the Law of the Koran; and, from the Indus to the Garonne, the precepts of Mohammed and the mandates of his successors were received and obeyed over an extent of above four thousand miles.*

In the ardour of fanaticism and victory, Mousa, the conqueror of Spain, had projected the extension of his enterprise into the total subjugation of Europe. He proclaimed his design of reducing the whole of France, from the foot of the Pyrenees to the Rhine, under the dominion of his master, and of afterwards penetrating through Germany, Hungary, and the East of Europe, to Constantinople.† By the recall and disgrace of its author, who fell a victim to the intrigues of the ungrateful Court of Damascus, this gigantic scheme of conquest was suspended for twenty years; and its revival was followed, and for ever terminated, by the total defeat of the Saracens at Tours. That event, succeeding the scarcely less disastrous result of the siege of Constantinople, at length effectually stemmed the impetuous torrent of Saracen invasion, which, for just one hundred years, had continued to sweep with irresistible violence over the fairest portion of the ancient World: and to this double repulse of the Saracens at the Western and Eastern extremities of Europe, the nations of Christendom were indebted for their preservation from the fate of Asia and Africa. In the progress of luxury which, after corrupting the energy and virtue of the hereditary Commanders of the Faithful, had extended the example of the dissolute Court of Damascus to the Lieutenants and Provinces of the Khalifate, it may be suspected that the force of Arabian fanaticism was already spent: but the immediate cause which arrested the conquests, and at the distance of another century prepared the decline and fall of the Saracen power, is to be sought in the change of the reigning dynasty, and the triple division of the Moslem Empire.

The fortunes of that Empire under the first four successors of Mohammed, were variously influenced by the personal qualities of each Khalif; and a detailed narrative of their reigns has been necessary to illustrate the series of events which established the grandeur, and affected the internal condition, of the Arabian Monarchy. But on the expiration of these four reigns—a period which is dignified by the Musliman Chroniclers with the title of the Perfect Khalifate—there is little to excite our interest or deserve our attention in the individual lives and characters of their successors; and after the elevation of Moawiyah, his removal of the seat of Empire to Damascus, and the submission of Islam to a hereditary line of Princes, the domestic Annals of the Khalifate reflect only the ordinary aspect of Oriental despotism. Amidst the idle pomp or the slothful luxury of the Palace of Damascus, the Omniaden Lords of Islam seldom aspired to emulate either the austere virtues or the martial heroism of Omar or Ali; of the eleven Princes of his race who successively occupied the throne of Moawiyah, the greater number were destitute alike of the qualities of warriors, statesmen, or religious enthusiasts; and the progress of the Saracen conquests under their dynasty is ascribable rather to the warlike and fanatical spirit of their People, than to any example of energy or talents in themselves. Meanwhile, except in * Abulfeda, p. 126. Nicephori Breviar. p. 32–36. Theophaus Chron. p. 324–333. Ockley, Gibbon, &c.

† Vol. xi. p. 293, 294.

* IP Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. Etienne.

† See the Arabic authorities for this project collected in Caradonne, Hist. de l'Afrique et de l'Espagne sous la Domination des Arabes, vol. i. p. 99, &c.

The Singl
Khalifat
From
A. D.
632. to
A. D.
755.
Saracens progress to the total subjugation of Europe. terminated by their great defeat at Tours.
A. D.
732.

Gradual decline of the Saracen energy.

Imperfect fall of the dynasty & the Omniads.

Its excess corrupts of their Court & Damascus

History.
From
A. D.
632,
to
A. D.
755.
And their unpopularity in Islam.

Rise of the Abbasides, a descendancy of Ali, the nephew of Muhammed.

Revolt of Islam from the Om-mades.
A. D.
716.

Universal Quality in the Moslem Empire.
A. D.
746. to
A. D.
750.

Syria, the House of Ommia had never succeeded in winning the popular love or veneration. By no considerable portion of the Moslem World, including all the most rigid followers of the Koran, the race of Mosaiyah had ever been abhorred as the murderers of the descendants of the Prophet, and the usurpers of the sacred inheritance. The early History of the Family of Ommia was stained with the original guilt of obstinate Idolatry, and of rancorous persecution against Mohammed and his disciples; the conversion of Abu Sofian and his House had been the effect of fear or political interest; and their subsequent elevation to the throne had been purchased at the expense of the holiest and noblest blood of Islam.*

The injured but spirit-broken progeny of Ali and Fatima wanted resolution or ability to assert their cause: but the descendants of Abbas, the uncle of Mohammed, had still preserved the memory of their prior title to the throne which was occupied by the usurping race of the Ommiaden Khalifs; and through successive generations they had proudly, though secretly, cherished the loftiest hopes with equal ambition and prudence. At length, after a possession of ninety years might have appeared to confer the strong sanction of time on the pristine usurpation of the Ommiades, the race of Abbas had the fortune to discover, and the courage to use, some favourable occasion of raising their standard. The Moslem Annals have imperfectly revealed the secret springs of the revolt: for we do not gather from them any immediate cause, or new and foreboding signs, of popular disaffection against the existing dynasty; and Marwan, the twelfth and last Khalif of his line, is acknowledged to have surpassed many of his predecessors in activity and martial virtue. The author of the revolution which precipitated his race from the throne was Abu Moslem, a man of mean extraction and obscure beginning, who had acquired sufficient power to seize the government of Khorassan. At his instigation, the People of that Province offered their allegiance to Mohammed, the great grandson of Abbas, and after his death, to his son Ilderim. As green had been the symbol of the Fatimite party, and white of the Ommiaden adherents, the partisans of the House of Abbas naturally distinguished their cause by the use of the colour most opposite to that of their enemies, both in their garments and standards; and the black banner of the Abbasides, under its literal title of Zel or Shade, was metaphorically construed to offer protection and succour to the oppressed and rightful cause of the sacred Family of Haschem.

The whole Moslem World was shortly convulsed by the struggle between the White and Black factions: but there is little temptation to dwell on the shifting vicissitudes of a contest, in which the cause of neither party may claim the preference of our sympathy, while the events were marked only by the usual horrors of Asiatic war. At first the Abbassidan insurgents were defeated in every quarter; and Ilderim, the original competitor of Marwan, was surprised on his pilgrimage to Mecca by the cavalry of the Ommiaden, and perished in a dungeon: but his brother Saffah was proclaimed Khalif at Cufa, and the partisans of his House having rallied under his standard, prepared, with more religious or martial confidence than numerical strength, to commit the final decision of their cause to the issue of a battle. Every advantage seemed to rest with their enemies: the force of long-established authority, the military talents of Marwan, his recent successes in the field, and the immense superiority of his army, which, consisting of one hundred and twenty thousand men, outnumbered the Abbassids by six to one. But the fortune of Empire might often seem to our finite comprehension to be the sport of accident, if we could mistake the mysterious agency of a superior intelligence for the blind operation of Chance. When the Moslem armies were about to engage, the horse of Marwan, who had dismounted for a moment, was suddenly startled and rushed without his rider into the Ommiaden ranks. The panic-stricken troops, believing that their Sovereign had been slain, broke and fled in every direction; the Abbassidan cavalry charged at this moment of dismay; and the host of Marwan was irretrievably routed. The unfortunate Khalif himself sought refuge in Damascus: but the citizens of that luxurious Capital were the first to abandon a fugitive Prince; Marwan found the fatal colours of his rival displayed from the walls of every Syrian fortress; and continuing his flight towards Egypt, he had only reached the banks of the Nile, when he was overtaken by his pursuers, and the lance of an Arab terminated his existence.*

The title of Saffah was immediately recognised throughout the Moslem Provinces: but he saw a dangerous rival in every member of the deposed dynasty; and his hatred or fear of the numerous House of Ommia suggested the atrocious project of exterminating their race. The poniards of his emissaries were dyed in the blood of thousands of the proscribed Family; and on one occasion, during a banquet at Damascus, the laws of hospitality were violated with fiendlike treachery by the massacre of eighty of the Ommiades, who had accepted the proffered protection of their enemy. These dreadful precautions might secure the establishment of the House of Abbas on the Asiatic throne of the Khalifate: but they ultimately failed of their effects in the distant Provinces of the Empire:—in Africa and in Spain. In the former, after some interval of submission to the Abbasides, nominal or real descendants of Ali and Fatima sprang up in quick succession, and finally established independent dynasties and thrones, whose fleeting History may form the brief subject of future notice. But in Spain, the elevation of the Abbasides to the Khalifate was almost immediately the signal of revolt. Into that Country, Abdalrahman, a Prince of Ommiaden race, escaping the general massacre of his House, after being hunted from the banks of the Euphrates to the Deserts of Mauritania, was invited by the Emirs of the White faction, and welcomed by the acclamations of the people, who were excited by the pride of national independence to abjure their allegiance to the distant throne of Syria. Abdalrahman became the first Ommiaden Khalif of Spain, or the West; and from his success is usually and appropriately dated, although it preceded the final separation of Africa by near half a century, the commencement of the Triple Division of the Khalifate.†

The Single Khalifate.

From
A. D.
632,
to
A. D.
755.

Destruction of the Om-mades.
A. D.
750.

Dynasty of the Abbassides.

Their secuestablisment in Asia.

Revolt of Spain and Africa.

Commencement of the triple division of the Khalifate.

A. D.
755.

* Abulfeda, p. 135—146. D'Herbelot, Art. Saffah, Ommiades, Abbasides, &c.

† For the revolt of Spain, see Roderic, Tot. Hist. Arahum, c. 18. and Casiri, Bib. Arabico Hisp. vol. ii. p. 21—260 before cited. Also Cardonne, vol. i. p. 204 ad 322 passim, &c.

* For the reigns of the Ommiaden dynasty, see Abulfeda, Annals Moslemicæ, passim, p. 101—141, and D'Herbelot, Art. Ommades.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LX.

BRITAIN, FROM THE DESCENT OF THE SAXONS TO THE END OF THE VIIIth CENTURY.

FROM A. D. 449 TO A. D. 800.

History.

From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
800.
Origin of
the Saxons.

In opening the first section of the Historical division of this Work, which is to treat exclusively of our own Country, we may appropriately revert* to some inquiries into the political origin of those Tribes of the great Gothic Race, from whom we derive our Language, our Laws, and the mass of our national Population. Before the II^d Century of the Christian Era, scarcely any distinct traces are discoverable of the People, whose descendants occupy the Circle of Westphalia, the Kingdom of Saxony, the British Islands, the United States of North America, and the British Colonies in the Two Indies.† The very name of the Saxons escaped the notice of Tacitus, and is only first discovered in the later Geography of Ptolemy the Alexandrian, by their occupation of three small islands, and a narrow neck of the continent, at the mouth and on the Northern shore of the Elbe. But, in less than two hundred years, this obscure Tribe of Barbarians had extended their supremacy, or their name, from the Baltic to the Rhine;‡ and the problem of so gigantic an expansion can only be solved by the conjecture, that the various Nations of kindred Gothic race, who previously overspread those regions, had gradually blended into one general though loose confederacy, under the common appellation of Saxons.§

Their primitive seats on the Elbe.

Extension, and Union with other Tribes.

Their Addition to the Frisians.

Their increasing Power;

The progress and results of this union in the interior of Germany belong to the Annals of Continental Europe; and the story of the long independence and final subjugation of the associated Saxons has already been introduced among the last vicissitudes of the Roman Empire, and concluded in the sanguinary victories of Charlemagne. The rise of the naval power of the Saxons is the only part of their History which elucidates our present subject. The portion of the original Tribe at the mouth of the Elbe, had early fostered that spirit of maritime adventure which, in a rude and fierce state of Society, is sure to be displayed in piratical enterprises; and the first successes of the Saxons in pillaging the commerce of the narrow seas between the Roman Provinces of Gaul and Britain, were sufficient to inflame the cupidity and excite the imitation of neighbouring Tribes. New swarms of Barbarians from the coasts and the interior eagerly embraced their predatory occupations, swelled their numbers, and assumed their name; and before the reign of Diocletian their piracies had become so formidable that a new Imperial officer, under the title of Count of the Saxon Shore, was established with a powerful squadron in the British Channel expressly to check their depredations.* The revolt of this Naval Commander, Carausius, has been described in the Annals of the Empire; and the treacherous encouragement which he gave to the Northern pirates may be numbered among the causes of their increasing audacity and strength.† In the subsequent decline of the Roman power, their expeditions became more frequent, their spoiliations on the seas more incessant, and their descents and ravages on the coasts of the Provinces more terribly destructive.‡

Britain.

From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
800.

and frightful ravages on the coasts of the Roman Empire.

Character of the Saxon.

The character of the maritime Saxons differed only from that of the other Gothic Tribes in the habits which were engendered by their nautical pursuits. Each free-born warrior, equally by land or by sea, attached himself to the fortunes of some favourite Chieftain; and in council and in action, the reputation of superior wisdom and valour formed the sole title to a voluntary obedience. The vessels in which these hardy Barbarians committed themselves to the storms of the German Ocean, were originally of most insignificant size and frail materials; but in the progress of their naval warfare, they had been taught to exchange their rude boats of a few planks and osier-work covered with hides, for war-ships of adequate bulk to contain one, or even two hundred warriors, and of a construction sufficiently solid and durable to brave the most tempestuous voyages. They usually, in fact, chose the stormy season for their expeditions, as the fittest for surprising their enemies; their valour was equally dauntless and sanguinary; and, after every successful expedition, the horrors of their merciless victory were increased by the sacrifice of a portion of their human captives on the altars of their Gods.§ Such, in its Pagan and uncivilized condition, was the race of which a portion was and cruelty of their spirit.

Intrepidity

* Fide p. 270 of this volume.
† Sharon Turner, History of the Anglo-Saxons, vol. i. p. 123. (8vo. Ed.) In this elaborate and excellent Work, Mr. Turner has exhausted all the learning which exists to illustrate his subject; and without multiplying citations from his pages, it may here suffice to acknowledge our general obligation to the labours of a writer, who deserves to be characterised as the highest of all modern authorities on Anglo-Saxon Antiquities and History.
‡ Eutropius, Breviarium Hist. Rom. lib. ix.
§ Gibbon, c. 25. Turner, vol. i. p. 167.

* Eutropius, (ubi supra)
† Turner, vol. i. p. 164.
‡ Svidanius Apollinaris, lib. viii. epist. 6.
§ Ibid. ubi supra.

History.
From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
600.
Condition of Britain after the separation from the Roman Empire.
A. D.
409. to
A. D.
449.

in the Vth Century to make its first permanent settlement in Britain, after having, during the last two hundred years of the Roman dominion, been the scourge and terror of its Southern shores.

In our preceding pages, we have slightly adverted to the separation of Britain from the falling Empire of Rome; and to the probable condition of the Island, during the period which elapsed between that event and the invasion of the Saxons.* But both the exact Era of the final separation itself, and its immediate effects upon the political state of Britain, are involved in obscurity. We possess no contemporary records by native British writers; and the fate of a revolted People and a dissevered Province naturally ceased to command further attention from the foreign Annalists of the Empire. The expiring ray of light which sets upon a Century of profound darkness is reflected from the distant pages of a Byzantine Chronicler; and the last authentic notice of the affairs of Roman Britain refers to Letters of the Emperor Honorius, wherein he authorized the independent establishment of a native Government, which he could neither prevent nor support, and commanded the cities of Britain "to provide for their own defence." The British Provincials, indeed, abandoned by the Imperial forces which the usurper Constantine had carried into Gaul, and harassed by the incursions of the barbarous Caledonians (or Picts) and Scots, had already assumed the care, and asserted the right of national independence. Depriving the Imperial Magistrates of their offices, they had taken up arms under leaders of their own choice, and in the awakened spirit of freedom had vigorously repulsed the Barbarians beyond the Northern limits of their territory.

It has been doubted whether Honorius designed formally to release the Britons from their allegiance, or merely to cover their present exertions with the decent sanction of a legitimate authority, in order that he might the more amicably at a future period reclaim their obedience. But the idleness of the dispute is attested by the result: the Imperial authority was never afterwards recovered in the Island; and the virtual separation of Britain from the Empire may with sufficient accuracy be dated from the acquiescence of the feeble Honorius.† From his Letters having been addressed to the cities of Britain, (of which there were then in the Island altogether thirty-three, invested, according to the Roman system, with superior privileges of various degrees above the ordinary towns,) there is reason to conclude that these Municipal Commonwealths had now, in the national revolt, been suffered to assume the supreme administration of the adjacent districts. It has also been plausibly conjectured, that the leaders of the military forces of these petty States gradually availed themselves of the disorders which must have followed the overthrow of the Imperial Government to usurp the sovereign power.‡ But all traces of these Municipal or Republican Governments end with the meagre records of their first independence; and we only know with tolerable certainty, that forty years later, the fragments of the Imperial dominion in the Island were shared among a great number of Kings, or more properly petty Chieftains, some probably of Roman, and the rest of native descent, who appear, by their perpetual dissensions and struggles for the ascendancy, to have plunged the whole of South Britain into total anarchy; and to have aggravated the miseries which now again afflicted their wretched People from the fierce incursions of the Caledonian and Irish Tribes. Before the middle of the Vth Century, those Barbarians, availing themselves of the intestine discords which, still more than the visitations of a famine and pestilence, delivered the Country an easy prey to their violence, had extended their ravages even into some of the most Southern parts of the Island; and the British Chieftains of those districts, incapable perhaps of any sincere union of their own strength, could discover no better expedient for repelling the common enemy, than to invite the fatal succour of foreign mercenaries.§

Division of South Britain among a number of petty Kings.

Incursions of the Caledonians and Scots promoted by their dissensions.

It was at this juncture that a small band of Saxon pirates, in three of their cuyles, or long ships, under the guidance of Hengist and Horsa, who are described as brothers of the race of Woden, chanced to be ranging along the Eastern coast of the British Channel in quest of adventure; and to these leaders Gwrtheyrn, or Vortigern, the principal among the petty British Kings of the South, addressed an overture to serve against the Northern invaders with the promise of an ample 449. to

Britain.
From
A. D.
A. D.
600.
Independence of its Cities or States.

Subsequent disorders.

* Vide p. 253 of this volume.

† The best authorities, however, seem to concur in dating the independence of Britain, and the Letters of Honorius, referred to below in the text, in a. d. 409. See Gibbon, c. 31. Turner, vol. i. p. 205, &c.

‡ Beke, who endeavours to develop the circumstances of the first Saxon settlement in Britain, it is proper to apprise the reader of the poverty of the only original materials, out of which it has been usual too confidently to build up the narrative of these transactions. 1. Our earliest authority is Gildas, (De Excidio Britanniae), a British Monk of the Vth Century, not contemporary, therefore, by nearly a hundred years, with the first events of the Saxon conquest. The ridiculous hyperboles of his declamatory style, the glaring exaggerations of his statements, and his splanetic abuse both of his own Countrymen and of their conquerors, render him a most unsafe and suspicious guide. 2. Next in the order of time, but at the distance of two centuries more, is the Venerable Bede, (Hist. Ecclesiastice Græciæ Anglorum), whose report of contemporary events bears the strongest impress of honesty and truth; but the earlier portions of whose Work are little more than a transcript from Gildas. 3. The Saxon Chronicle, though of still later date, may be presumed only to embody the best authenticated traditions, which the descendants of the conquerors had preserved of the circumstances of the first settlement. 4. The last writer who deserves mention—much less for any attention to which he is really entitled, than because parts of his narrative have sometimes been carelessly adopted—is Nennius, (Hist. Britonum), a Briton, or Welshman of the 13th Century. His narrative is so palpably disguised with fables, that it is surprising it should ever have obtained credit. On the larger romance to which Jeffrey of Monmouth expanded the fictions of Nennius—on the Welsh Triads—and on the later Chronicles compiled by writers of the same race—it is needless to comment; since all these remains seem now, by universal consent, to be equally rejected as Historical evidences.

§ Zozimus, lib. vi. p. 376—382.

¶ The origin and distinction of these Tribes have been vehemently disputed; but it is most probable that the Picts were the same general race who, in their earlier struggle against the Roman conquerors of Britain, were known under the name of Caledonians and Maeris; and it is beyond doubt that the Scots were a colony of the Celtic Irish. The grounds for these conclusions have been ably stated by Dr. Lingard. See his History of England, vol. i. p. 72—75, (8vo. Ed.) and the authorities there cited.

* It seems sufficiently proved by a passage in Procopius (De Bello Vandali, lib. i. c. 2. p. 181) to which Gibbon has pointed attentively, that the dependence of the Britons on the Empire was never afterwards restored; although there were some subsequent relations of friendly intercourse, and even interchanges of military aid, between the Provincials and the Imperial rulers in Gaul.

† Ricardus Corin. De Situ Britanniae, p. 36.
‡ Gibbon, c. 31. Lingard, History of England, vol. i. p. 82, &c.
§ Gildas, De Excidio Britanniae, c. 19—21. Bede, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. c. 12—14.

History.

From

A. D.

449.

to

A. D.

500.

Descent

of Hengist and Horsa.

A. D.

449.

Their victories over the Caledo-nians.

Permanent

Establishment of the

Saxons in Kent.

Their first

war with the Britons.

A. D.

455.

A. D.

457.

Fictions of the British

Writers regarding

these events.

reward. The proposal was too congenial to the habits of these martial rovers not to be eagerly embraced; and Hengist and Horsa landing with their followers at Ebbsfleet,* in the Isle of Thanet, were quartered in that fertile portion of Kent. Their force, from the number and size of the vessels which had brought them, could not have amounted to above five or six hundred men, and more probably did not exceed half that strength; but their intrepid valour rendered them powerful auxiliaries; and in concert with the native followers of the British Chieftains, they are said to have repelled the incursions of the Caledonians with signal success.† But for the permanent defence of the Country against the desultory inroads of those Tribes, more numerous forces were requisite; and Hengist was permitted to send to Germany for a second Body of his warlike Countrymen. The invitation was accepted by the fiery youth of Jutland; and a formidable reinforcement of five thousand warriors swelled the strength of Hengist, and established itself like the first comers in Thanet.‡

Yet during six years from his original debarkation, the Saxon leader performed the engagements of his service with fidelity and submission; for it was not until after that interval that, in the language of the only credible narration which we possess of the event, he is stated to have begun his Kingdom in Kent.§ The causes which converted such fierce auxiliaries into merciless enemies may be readily imagined: they were, the jealousy of the natives and the arrogance of the victorious strangers; the fears which were awakened in the British Prince at the encroachments of his mercenaries; and the ambition which was excited in the rude Saxon leader at the prospect of a permanent sovereignty. At length, both parties flew to arms; a dubious struggle on the banks of the Medway was attended by the death of the brother of Hengist and of a son of Vortigern;¶ and in a more decisive battle near the river Cray, the Britons were totally defeated. The whole of Kent was abandoned to the conquerors; and several subsequent victories confirmed their possession.

Such, when separated from the discordant fables which disfigure the narratives of obscure British Chroniclers, the earliest of them not contemporary with the events, but which the romantic credulity of later Writers has implicitly copied, would appear, in our real ignorance of minute details, to be the only consistent and probable account of the first Saxon settlement in Britain. The tales of the marriage of Vortigern with Rowena, the beautiful daughter of Hengist;†† of the infatuation which led the British Prince to bestow the Province of Kent on her father; of the revolt of his indignant subjects, his own deposition, the substitution of his son Guortemir, or Vortimer, on the throne, and the defeat and expulsion of the Saxons;‡‡ of the long wanderings of Hengist on the Ocean, his return after the death of Vortimer and the restoration of Vortigern, his treacherous seizure of that Prince, his massacre of three hundred British Chiefs during a conference, and his recovery of Kent as the ransom of the captive Sovereign;§—all these tales, the evident invention of British (or Welsh) fabulists of later Ages to account for the misfortunes of their ancestors without the admission of conquest, may without hesitation be rejected; as sometimes unsupported, and sometimes contradicted, by less suspicious evidence; and always, by their inconsistent and improbable details, in themselves equally unworthy of credence.

To not much more respect are entitled several vulgar errors of an opposite tendency, on the state of Britain and the qualities of the natives at the Era of the Saxon invasions, which some modern writers have been led to propagate and repeat, from bestowing too implicit a reliance, or too literal a construction, on the hyperbolic and vituperative declamations of a splenetic Monk. From this report, in which the author frequently contradicts himself, it had become fashionable, until a more accurate spirit of investigation in late years exposed the fallacy of such views;† to depict the Britons of the Age before us under circumstances of barbarism, little superior to that condition in which Cæsar discovered their naked ancestors five Centuries earlier; and still further to darken the features of their character with the reproach of degeneracy and cowardice. But both these representations are at utter variance with unquestionable facts. In the lapse of above three Centuries under the Imperial dominion, Britain had become the seat of Roman culture and luxury. It had been studded with numerous cities, which reflected the image of Roman jurisprudence and manners; it was adorned with many works of elegance, of which the remains are frequently discovered even at this day; its natives had attained the rank of Roman Citizens, and powerfully supported more than one candidate for the Imperial purple; and, above all, the light of the Gospel, the sure day-spring of civilization, had been so extensively disseminated throughout its territorial divisions, that—as we shall hereafter have occasion to observe—the British Church was governed by a numerous Hierarchy and represented in regular Synods. Though the vicious dissensions of its petty Chieftains had involved the Island, after its separation from the Empire, in mischievous disorders, the short period of forty years had not destroyed these foundations of civilization, and could not have sufficed to replunge the People into their pristine barbarism; and it is attested, even in the querulous pages of our only contemporary native Writer, that Britain in the VIth Century, notwithstanding the dreadful effect of the Caledonian and Saxon ravages, still contained twenty-eight cities, besides other fortresses of strength, and presented the aspect of cultivation and fertility;‡

That the imputation of a pusillanimous degeneracy in the Britons, the effect, as it has been imagined, of their long subjection to the Roman yoke, has no better foundation than the belief of their relapse into utter barbarism, is still more readily proved. Their assertion of national independence, and their vigorous repulse of Britain.

From

A. D.

449.

to

A. D.

500.

Vulgar

errors on the state of Britain at this epoch.

I. Imputed

barbarism

of the natives.

Progress of their civilization under the Roman Empire.

Introduction of

Christianity.

II. Supposed degeneracy

of the Britons.

* Gildas, c. 23.

† Turner, History of the Anglo-Saxons, vol. i. p. 234.‡ Bede, lib. i. c. 15. Chron. Saxonum, p. 12.§ Ibid. ubi supra.¶ Chron. Sax. p. 13. Ibid. ubi supra.†† Bede, lib. i. c. 15. Chron. Sax. p. 14.‡‡ Nennius, Hist. Britonum, c. 36.

§ Ibid. c. 45. Mr. Turner, (vol. i. p. 244.) by construing a passage in Gildas (c. 23.)—cum recessissent domum—too largely, has given more credit than it deserves to this statement. But Dr. Lingard has shown (Hist. vol. i. p. 94. note) that the expression of Gildas evidently refers only to the return of the Saxons into Kent; and that any other interpretation is not supported by the context.

* Nennius, c. 48.

† Gildas, c. 38.; and more especially Turner, vol. i. p. 223—225., have the merit of exposing the contradictory exaggerations of Gildas.
‡ Gildas, c. 1.

History.
From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
600.

Contributed by five valiant and presented resistance to the Saxons.

Common point of their warlike spirit (see period).

Excesses of Saxon Invaders.

the Caledonian Barbarians after the withdrawal of the Roman Legions, seem sufficient to show that effeminacy or cowardice formed no features of their character. It was manifestly only their subsequent state of anarchy which invited the ravages, and facilitated the incursions, of the same Barbarians; and the supplications for foreign aid, from which modern Writers have drawn the inference of pusillanimity,* must, if indeed such entreaties had any existence, be ascribed to the effects of their intestine disorders, and arose probably from the defenceless condition of particular districts. But the courageous spirit of the Britons is indubitably attested in the obstinacy and duration of their subsequent struggle against the most valiant Tribes of the Gothic race. While the Roman Provinces of Gaul, of Spain, and of Africa, abjectly yielded to the first shock of the Barbarian conquerors, the natives of Britain, unaided from the continent, and disunited among themselves, sustained for above one hundred years a vigorous, a bloody, and often a dubious contest with the numerous and formidable invaders who simultaneously assailed their Island along the whole extent of its Eastern and Southern coasts. Even the final and unsuccessful issue of the struggle still left the ancient race in independent possession of the mountains of Wales, and of the promontory of Cornwall. Thus slowly progressive as were the Saxon conquests, there is abundant reason to conclude that their ultimate success was as much attributable to the inveterate disunion, and want of all concert among the Britons, as to any inferiority of the natives in martial prowess. The establishment of the first Saxon Kingdom in Kent seems to have been invited and resisted only by the British Chieftains in that quarter of the Island; and the petty Princes of more distant parts were probably alike insensible to their own danger, and careless of the fate of their Countrymen. Of such blindness or indifference, as well as of the general spirit of warlike enterprise among the Britons at this period, there is curious and undoubted Historical evidence in the fact that, at the moment when the Saxons were establishing themselves by repeated and sanguinary victories in Kent, a British Chieftain, at the solicitation of the Emperor Anthemius, led an army of twelve thousand men from Cornwall to the mouth of the Loire, to assist the Roman forces against the Visigoths.†

Though the establishment of Hengist and his followers was the undoubted cause which excited the later Saxon descents upon the Island, there was as little concert in the assaults of the invaders as in the resistance of the natives. The bands of warlike adventurers who successively arrived on the British shores proceeded, each under its own Chieftain, to win an independent conquest and to found a separate Principality. The identity of their Language and manners attested their kindred race; as the contiguity of their original seats on the Northern coasts of Germany also explained the common inducement of their expeditions. But under the general Saxon name, they were composed principally of at least three distinct Nations or Tribes, the JUTES, I. The proper SAXONS, and the ANGLES,* with a promiscuous admixture of other Barbarians.† The Jutes, who led the way under Hengist, were spread over the Northern portions of Jutland; the Saxons still held the districts near the Elbe, which we have designated after Ptolemy as the primitive seat of their name and Tribe; and the Angles occupied the intermediate Country III. The which forms the modern Duchy of Sleswick;‡ The superior name of the Saxons, or at least of the collective term which described the earlier association of the piratical Tribes, afforded a common appellation for all the conquerors of Britain: but the People who formed the numerical majority among the three invading races, and who possessed themselves of the most ample portion of the Country, have naturally been permitted to perpetuate their title on the Nation and the Land;§ and from the Angles, or Engles, have been compounded the generic term of ANGLI-SAXONS, and the dearer and more familiar name of ENGLAND.¶

By the successive invasions and conquests of the Jutes, the Saxons, and the Angles, the portions of the Island wrested from the natives, were gradually formed into those distinct Principalities or petty Kingdoms, which from the kindred origin of their people, rather than from any union of government among their Princes, it has been customary with writers to describe under the general term, according to the shifting number of States, of an OCTARCHY or HEPTARCHY.¶ The little Kingdom of KENT, the first founded by Hengist and his Jutes, did not extend towards the North beyond the Thames, while the sea formed its Eastern and Southern boundaries. On the West, its expansion was prevented by the resistance of the Britons, until the arrival of the second body of invaders, whose settlement on its borders permanently confined its territory within the limits of the modern County to which it has given name. The 449. to

Britain.
From
A. D.
A. D.
600.

I. The JUTES.
II. The SAXONS.
III. The ANGLES.

Establishment of the Anglo Saxon OCTARCHY.
A. D.
455. to
A. D.
566.
The Kingdoms of:
I. KENT.
A. D.
455.

* Bede, lib. i. c. 15.

† Adam, lib. v. c. 9. for Frisians, Rugii, Dani, and even Huns are here also enumerated.

‡ Mr. Turner, (vol. i. p. 169.) after some authorities, places the Jutes in South Jutland; but the words of Bede, in deducing the Angles (lib. i. c. 15.) of illâ patriâ . . . inter provincias Jutarum et Saxonum, seem conclusive that this nation occupied the Southern districts of Jutland (or Sleswick) between the Elbe and the seat of the Jutes, who would, therefore, appear to have inhabited the Northern parts of the Peninsula. And, still more, the expressions of Alfred in Orosius, (Barrington, p. 20.) indicate that all the Southern parts of Jutland opposite to Zealand (as well as that and the other modern Danish Islands) were inhabited by Angles.

§ Gibbon, c. 35.

¶ So late as the Thirteenth century, the Duchy of Sleswick was called Old England. Turner, vol. i. p. 171.

¶ Until of late years, it was customary to describe the Anglo-Saxon division of States as a Heptarchy: but the original number of distinct and independent Kingdoms or Principalities, until the first intermittent union of Deira and Bernicia, was eight; and after those Provinces were finally blended into the single sovereignty of Northumbria, the other weaker States were so often subjected to the more powerful, that the title of a Pentarchy or Trisarchy would be quite as appropriate as that of the Heptarchy.

* The Letter in Gildas, to Ætius, the Imperial Commander in Gaul, "The groans of the Britons," &c.—"The Barbarians drive us into the sea, and the sea drives us back on the Barbarians," has been a hundred times quoted by the writers of our popular Histories, without any inquiry into the probabilities of its genuineness. But the antithetical style of the Letter, as Mr. Sharon Turner (vol. i. p. 206) has justly remarked, betrays the composition of Gildas; and if its purport had any foundation in a partial application from the people of some Southern district of the Island to Ætius for succor, the abject tone of the entreaty is probably only the invention of that querulous declaimer.

† Sidonius Apollinaris, lib. iii. epist. 9. Jornandes, de Rebus Geticis, c. 45. p. 678. Gregorius Turon, Hist. Franc. lib. ii. c. 18. Dr. Lingard (Hist. vol. i. p. 101) is, however, evidently mistaken in placing the epoch of this expedition "at the very time when the Barbarians (Saxons) were establishing Kingdoms in the South-West of the Island." The landing of Cerdic did not take place until A. D. 495, almost twenty years after the extinction of the Western Empire.

History.

From

A. D.

449.

to

A. D.

800.

successors of Hengist were compelled to submit to this narrow restriction; and with a single memorable exception, the Annals of their little Kingdom present no circumstances to arrest our attention. It was under the reign of Ethelbert, the fourth Sovereign of the House of Hengist, that his subjects were the earliest among the Anglo-Saxons to receive the blessings of the Gospel; and the example and exhortations of the Royal proselyte were instrumental in promoting the conversion of his People.*

SUSSEX.

A. D.

477.

It was not until after an interval of twenty-eight years from the first descent of Hengist, that his success produced the next independent invasion of Britain. The new invaders, who appear to have been of the primitive Saxon race, were led by a Chieftain named Ælla, or Ella, and his three sons; and landing in the Isle of Selsey,† they defeated the Britons with considerable loss, drove them for refuge into the neighbouring Forest of Andredswold, and succeeded in effecting an establishment, which expanded into the Kingdom of the South Saxons, or SUSSEX. As their original armament, like that of the Jutes, was composed but of three cydes, it has been inferred that their victorious settlement was opposed only by the petty British Chieftain of the immediate vicinity.‡ The defence of the natives, however, may have been obstinate; it is certain that the progress of the invaders was slow. Seven years after his arrival on the coast had elapsed, before Ælla ventured on his first attempt to penetrate into the interior of the Country; and his advance was checked by a dubious and sanguinary conflict on the river Mercread. It was five years later, before the arrival of reinforcements of his Countrymen from the continent enabled the Saxon Prince to prosecute his enterprise; and the traces of his operations are preserved in the siege and fate of the British city of Andredes Ceaster. This was a place of some importance on the Western verge of the great Forest tract, to which it gave name, and the vast extent of which has been imperfectly recorded, in the narrower boundaries of the modern "Weald of Kent."

Andredes Ceaster was so strongly fortified, according to the ancient principles of the military art, as to be deemed by the natives impregnable; and the tradition of its defence denotes their possession of some martial science as well as natural valour. While the Saxons besieged the place, they were themselves incessantly harassed by an army of Britons from without, who made a general attack upon their camp, as often as they assailed the walls, and retired into the Forest as soon as the diversion was successful. But Ælla having at length adopted the expedient of dividing his forces into two Bodies, of which one covered while the other prosecuted the siege, the efforts of the Britons from without were effectually repelled, and the walls were carried by assault. The barbarous conquerors, irritated by their losses, reduced the city to ashes, and put every soul within it to the sword.§ This horrible catastrophe appears to have disheartened the British, and secured to Ælla the possession of the territory which he had won: but his conquests were not much farther extended. Though he is mentioned as superior in dignity or power to the contemporary Princes of the Jutes,| he seems to have been either satisfied with the dominion of a small Province, or unable to enlarge its boundaries; and the surface of the petty Kingdom of Sussex, as of the Kentish Principality, may be nearly identified with that of the single modern County.

It was the next invader and his followers whose victories spread conquest through the South of Britain, and confirmed the previous intruders in the permanent possession of Kent and Sussex. Eighteen years after the arrival of Ælla, Cerdic, another Saxon Chieftain, who like Hengist is said to have deduced his origin from Woden,* appeared on the coast with a squadron of five cydes; and sailing past the prior conquests of his Countrymen, landed further Westward, at an uncertain spot, which was named from the event Cerdicesora, or the shore of Cerdic, and is supposed with most probability to have been either Yarmouth in the Isle of Wight, or Southampton.† For the numerous battles and extensive conquests which are attributed to these new invaders, the original strength of their armament must obviously have been inadequate; and it has been rationally concluded upon general evidence, that Cerdic must have received at different periods a large and frequent accumulation of force from his native Land. Six years after his first descent, one new band, at least, of his followers or confederate Jutes, under Porta, effected a landing, and perpetuated the name of their leader, at Portsmouth; and another body of adventurers arrived thirteen years later under the nephews of Cerdic. The progress of that celebrated Chieftain himself, however, was intrepidly resisted by Natanleod, the British Sovereign of the territory on which he had landed; and the warfare of these leaders now first assumed the character of a national struggle between the two contending races. Cerdic received some assistance from the Saxons of Kent and Sussex; and Natanleod assembled a larger army of Britons than had hitherto united in resisting the invaders. But in a general engagement, Natanleod, after routing one division of the invaders under the immediate command of Cerdic, was successfully attacked in the eagerness of pursuit by Cynric, the son of the Saxon Prince, and slain with five thousand Britons.‡

Yet even this important victory, which was not won till the thirteenth year after the first landing of Cerdic, did not decide the contest; and the remaining twenty-six years of his life were laboriously consumed in the conquest of Hampshire.§ The settlement of the invaders, however, was confirmed by progressive successes;

* Chron. Sax. p. 15. It is worthy of remark that to Hengist, Cerdic, and Ida, though of three different Tribes, is attributed a descent from Woden. Unless it had become a general point of vanity to deduce the origin of their leaders from the tutelary God of their race, this tradition of a common genealogy goes far to confirm the opinion of Mr. Turner, (vol. i. p. 170), that "Jutes, Saxons, and Angles were but coral twigs of the same Teutonic branch of the great Scythian or Gothic tree." The pedigree of Cerdic in the ninth generation from Woden was however expressly defined, and the account is highly probable in itself. This genealogy would assign an existence to the desired hero of his race, of whose real Era and actions we otherwise know nothing, in the beginning of the third Century.

† Chron. Sax. ubi suprà. Higden, Polychronicon, p. 234.

‡ Chron. Sax. p. 17, 18.

§ According to the British writers, he even sustained a signal defeat at Mount Hadon, which is loosely said to have arrested the progress of the West Saxons for forty years. But both the chronology and position of this battle are very uncertain. Gildas, c. 26. Nennius, c. 23. 61. 62.

• Bede, lib. i. c. 26.

† Chron. Sax. p. 14.

‡ Turner, vol. i. p. 251.

§ Chron. Sax. p. 15.

|| Ibid. p. 71.

Britain.

From

A. D.

449.

to

A. D.

800.

III. W.

Sax.

A. D.

495.

A. D.

505.

and from the epoch of a second great victory gained by Cerdic and his son at Cerdicesford, or Charford, on the Avon, in that County, in the twenty-fourth year of the invasion, is usually dated their establishment of the Kingdom of the West Saxons, or WESSEX. The Isle of Wight was added to its dominion by the nephews of the King, after a struggle, in which those remorseless Barbarians put every one of its British inhabitants to the sword; and Cerdic having bestowed upon them the subordinate sovereignty of this acquisition, and associated his son in the paramount government of his conquests, bequeathed their prosecution to that valiant Prince. During an active and fortunate reign, Cynric inflicted several further defeats upon the Britons, and extended his Kingdom over the modern Counties of Wilts, Berks, Oxford, and Buckingham; and his son Cealwin, after a memorable defeat of three Kings of the Britons, all of whom fell in the same battle, obtained possession of as many principal cities of the natives, Bath, Cirencester, and Gloucester, and enlarged the boundaries of Wessex to the banks of the Severn.*

Such was the gradual establishment of the power, which was ultimately to acquire the supremacy over all the other Anglo-Saxon States, and to give to England a long line of Princes of the race of Cerdic: but at the distance of eighty years from the first landing of that Chieftain in Britain, the Kingdom of Wessex under his victorious grandson formed only a small Southern portion of the Island. On the West it was still confined by British Principalities in Devon and Cornwall, and in Wales; on the East it was supported by the Saxon States of Sussex and Kent; and on the North its further enlargement was opposed by the British population, which still occupied the surface of the country from Gloucestershire to Scotland. The settlement of the Jutes and Saxons might therefore have been restricted to the colonization of our Southern shores; if at this juncture the third and most numerous People of the same race had not, by successive arrivals on the Eastern coasts, begun from them to overspread the whole central portions of the Island.†

But before the Angles established their permanent settlements in the Island, a fourth State had already been formed on its Eastern shores by the obscure union of several Bodies of Saxon adventurers, who, while Cerdic was yet prosecuting his enterprise against the Britons in the South, founded the little Kingdom of Essex, or of the East Saxons. In the Annals of this State, of which Erkenwin was the first Sovereign, there is nothing to demand our notice; except its subsequent extension into Middlesex, and its acquisition of London, then, though destined to be the future Metropolis of the Island, known only as a town of some trade.‡

When the Angles commenced their invasions of the Eastern shores of Britain, their descents, unlike those of the Jutes and Saxons, soon assumed the character of a whole national immigration.§ At first, many petty Chieftains and bands of this Tribe endeavoured to establish themselves on the coast immediately adjacent to the new Kingdom of Essex. But as they failed to succeed in forming any distinct State, their desultory efforts were soon eclipsed by the more formidable expedition of Ida; who arriving on the coast North of the Humber, with a fleet of forty cuydes, defeated the natives in several severe engagements, and was raised by the associated Chieftains of his armament to the sovereignty of their conquests. The country between the Humber and the Frith of Forth appears at this juncture to have been separated by the river Tees into two Provinces, loosely distinguished by the natives under the names of Bryneich and Deisyr, which became subsequently Latinized into BERNICA and DEIRA. Of the former, extending from the Tees to the Scottish stream Ida was the first Anglian King; and transmitted its sceptre to the eldest of his twelve sons. But on the death of the Prince of their original choice, a portion of his followers quitted the standard of his successor; assailed the adjoining and more Southern district; and there, overpowering the native population and raising a Chieftain named Elia, or Sella, to the supreme command, founded the second Anglian Kingdom of Deira. But a continued and obstinate struggle of thirty years with the Britons consumed the long reign of Elia; nor was the expulsion or subjugation of the native race completed until after the accession of his son. By a later union under a single Sovereign, Bernicia and Deira were consolidated into one State; when the British titles of its Provinces, as comprising the Anglian conquests North of the Humber, merged into that of the Kingdom of Northumbria.*

Meanwhile, from its obscure commencement, a new Anglian State had silently grown up and filled the whole intermediate parts of the Eastern coast between Essex and Deira. Of the formation of this Kingdom, which, from its position, acquired the name of EAST ANGLIA, and gradually embraced the modern Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge, little record is preserved: but Uffa, from whom his successors received the title of Uffingas, is mentioned as its first Monarch; and of its power a remarkable proof has been deduced from the fact that, even while pursuing their conquests over the Britons, its warriors were sufficiently numerous to afford a large detachment for a foreign expedition. To avenge an insult offered to one of their Princesses, by the King of the Varni, a People dwelling on the Rhine, a Body of the East Angles, sailing from England, ascended that river; ravaged the country and defeated the army of the Varni; and making their King captive, obliged him to wed the Princess, whose betrothed hand he had previously rejected.†

It was from Deira that a colony of the invaders first penetrated into the central parts of the Island, and by repeated conquests over the Britons laid the foundation of a fourth Anglian Kingdom: that of MERCA, which was gradually extended from the Humber to the Thames, and from the frontiers of East Anglia to the mountains of Wales. The Mercians, therefore, some of whom from their position acquired the name of Middle Angles, occupied Lincolnshire, Cheshire, and almost all the modern midland Counties, and formed the largest and most powerful of the Anglo-Saxon States except Wessex. But as the Kingdom of Mercia was commenced the latest of the whole number, so its final establishment was the longest delayed. The expeditions of the Angles into the interior of the Island were originally undertaken only by Chieftains of inferior power or rank

Britain.

From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
600.

VI. DEIRA.
A. D.
560.

These two last States afterwards united into the Kingdom of Northumbria.

VII. EAST ANGLIA.
A. D.
527.

VIII. MERCA.
A. D.
586.

* Chron. Sax. p. 18—22.

† Turner, vol. i. p. 269.

‡ Matthew of Westminster, p. 200.

§ Bede declares (p. 52) that in his time—two Centuries later—the original Country of the Angles still remained a desert.

* Bede, lib. iii. c. 6—20. Chron. Sax. p. 19, 20.

† Procopius, Hist. Goth. lib. iv. p. 460—471.

History.

From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
800.

Completion of the Octarchy.

Surviving British States :

(besides the Caledonians and Scots.)

I. Strat-clyde.
II. Cumbria.

III. North
and IV.
South Wales.
V. Cornwall.

Relapse of the free Brit-tons into Barbarism.

Establishment of a British Colony in Armorica, or Bretagne Courageous defence of the Britons.

to the War-Kings, who had conducted the fleets of the invaders to the British shores; and the resistance of the natives became probably the more obstinate as their numbers were compressed from all sides into the central Provinces. The original conquests of the Middle Angles were considered, therefore, only as appendages to the Kingdom of Deira; and although a Chieftain named Cridda, one of their earliest leaders, is usually recorded as the first King of Mercia, and was at least the founder of his line of Princes, it was not until the reign of his grandson, the fierce Penda, that this State was wholly emancipated from the dominion of the Northern Angles.*

By the formation of the Kingdom of Mercia, after the lapse of above a hundred and thirty years from the landing of Hengist and Horsa to the rise of Cridda, the establishment of an Anglo-Saxon Octarchy in Britain was laboriously completed. One Jutish, three proper Saxon, and four Anglian States,† divided the possession of the country, from the Frith of Forth to the Isle of Wight, and from the Eastern coast to the foot of the Welsh mountains and the neck of the Cornish peninsula. Yet, in the Western parts of the Island, five British States, or clusters of States, continued bravely to maintain an unyielding and vigorous independence; and in the extreme North the two wild and untamable nations of the Caledonians and Scots held secure possession of the Eastern plains between the Friths of Forth and Murray, and of the whole highland tract of Scotland. The territory still retained by the Britons has been distinguished into the Provinces of Strathclyde, or the region about the Clyde; of Cumbria; or Cumberland, shortly restricted to the modern Cumbrian, and which was afterwards incorporated with the Kingdom of Bernicia; of North and South Wales, from the former of which the district of Chester was torn by the Angles early in the VIIth century; and, finally, of Cornwall, which however included great part of Devon, and was not reduced to the modern limits of the former County until a period long posterior to the epoch before us.‡

In these last asylums of their rude freedom, the descendants of the Roman Provincials soon forgot the habits of an imperfect civilization; and especially among the barren mountains and secluded fastnesses of Wales, the Britons gradually relapsed into a condition of positive Barbarism. But besides the multitude of British warriors who, indignant of submission, had maintained their freedom without entirely abandoning their Country, a number of other fugitives from the Saxons preferred exile to servitude;§ and one portion of these, crossing the Channel, took possession of vacant tracts on the coast of Armorica, and by their successful settlement in that region of Gaul, bestowed on the Province its modern appellation of BRITAGNE¶

In the meagre Annals of the Saxon conquerors, the

* Bede, lib. iii. c. 20—24.

† In this enumeration, Bede (p. 52) attributes a settlement on the Isle of Wight and parts of the Hampshire coast, to bodies of Jutes, besides their general conquest of Kent.

‡ The whole of the British territory of Strathclyde seems also, however, to have derived the general name of Cumbria, from its continued possession by the Cymri or Britons. Turner, vol. i. p. 282.

§ Turner, vol. i. p. 311, &c. It was not until the reign of Athelstan that the Britons finally lost Exeter, which that monarch separated from the Cornish state.

¶ Gildas, c. 25.

¶ See Usher, Antiquitates, p. 224—227, Gibbon, c. 88, and the evidence collected by both.

slow and laborious progress of their arms is only obscurely delineated; but by the Chroniclers and Bards of the British race, the long and certainly valiant resistance of their Countrymen, has been pictured in the wildest colouring of romantic and poetical embellishment. From amidst the suspicious extravagance of such compositions, it is not easy to extract the materials of sober and authentic History; but, with due caution, some degree of belief may be safely conceded to the reality of the general circumstances which have formed the groundwork of these narrations. The traditional renown and fabled achievements of more than one British Chieftain may be received as evidence at least of his certain existence and distinguished share in the fierce struggle of the two races; and the chant of triumph or lamentation for the victorious or the fallen warrior, must be admitted in proof of the occurrence and general fortune of many a sanguinary encounter, of which we may be unable to ascertain either the exact locality or the date.

Among all the British heroes,* the romantic exaggeration, rather of later times than of his own, has assigned a brilliant preeminence to the name and actions of the famous ARTHUR. Yet neither the scenes of his dominion, nor the connection of his exploits, nor even the time at which he reigned and fell, can be explained with satisfactory precision. The most probable conjectures make him the opponent of the West Saxons under their first two Princes;† and there are grounds for believing that he was also engaged against the Angles in the North. He is stated to have been victorious in twelve battles;‡ but since these many triumphs failed of a more decisive success, than perhaps to retard the extension of the Kingdom of Wessex,§ they could scarcely have been all gained over the Anglo-Saxons; and some of his wars seem to have been prosecuted, not against the invaders, but the rival Princes of his own race. He is said finally to have perished in a Civil feud or rebellion raised by his nephew; and was interred in the Monastery of Glastonbury: where it is on good Historical record,|| that his remains, with an inscription, were discovered in the reign of Henry II.¶

The memory of Arthur is chiefly indebted for the shadowy glory in which it is invested to the fancy of the Welsh Bards and Norman Minstrels of subsequent Ages; and, as it has been elegantly remarked, the events of his life are less interesting than the singular

* The last British Chieftain whose name and lineage recall the association of the Roman dominion in the Island is termed by Gildas and others, Ambrosius Aurelianus. He is described as of Roman descent, and his parents are obscurely stated to have worn the Imperial purple. Gildas, c. 25. He seems to have fought against Hengist; but we know scarcely any thing of his actions; and he has sometimes been imagined the same person as Natalus. Unusually perplexed by the contradictions of Chroniclers and Antiquaries, Mr. Turner in one place (p. 253) opposes him (together with Arthur) ineffectually to Uerdic; and just afterwards (p. 255) declares that, when that Baron lauded, Ambrosius had long been dead.

† Compare Gildas, c. 26. and Nennius, c. 61—63.

‡ Nennius, ubi supra.

§ Gildas, ubi supra.

¶ Giraldis Cambrensis, (apud Langhorn,) p. 91. The unexceptional and circumstantial evidence of Giraldis, who was present at the execution, and saw the inscription, is confirmed by William of Malmabury and other contemporaries; and the probability of the whole account should dispel the unreasonable doubts which have sometimes been raised on the very existence of Arthur.

¶ Mr. Turner, vol. i. p. 261—278, has pursued an investigation into the authentic History of Arthur with equal learning and critical acumen.

 Gibbon, c. 38.

revolutions of his fame. Among an imaginative race, who in their mountainous retreats fondly cherished the memory of the champions of their independence, the real exploits of Arthur were gradually magnified into a thousand forms of Romance; and for five hundred years the traditions, on which every generation might raise some new superstructure of fiction, were carefully preserved and rudely adorned. From Wales and Cornwall, the tales of Arthur were readily communicated to the Britons of kindred descent in Armorica; and from the latter Province their popularity spread throughout Western France. At a still later epoch, the Norman Minstrels lent their attention with eager delight to the triumphs of the hero of their adopted Country over their common enemy, the Saxons; and with the Welsh legends were incongruously interwoven the fables of Classical Poetry, the spirit of Crusading enterprise, and the sentiments and manners of Chivalry. In the Romances of the Middle Ages, the British Chieftain became at once the descendant of Trojan Princes, the victorious champion of Christendom against the fierce Infidels, and the perfect exemplar of Knighthood. The fabulous deeds of Arthur and of his Knights of the Round Table were sung in every Language, and received with implicit credit by every People of Europe; and the universal belief which these tales once commanded, is strangely contrasted with the modern scepticism which, by the last caprice of Poetical fancy, has in the land of his birth denied to their hero even the claim of a Historical existence.

It is certain, however, that, in his own Age, the renown of Arthur was far eclipsed by Urien, another British Prince, who long and gallantly resisted the progress of the invaders. The territory of Urien and the scene of his exploits lay in the more Northern parts of the Island; and the Angles under Ida appear to have been his usual antagonists. It is the boast of his contemporary Bard Taliesin that he gained several victories over the destroyers; and the slow progress of Ida and his sons in the work of conquest attests the probability of this narration. But, like Arthur, Urien fell in a Civil contest with his own Countrymen; and the common evidence of these facts is another proof of those divisions of the natives which entailed ruin upon their cause.* At a somewhat later period, after the establishment of the Anglo-Saxon Overtachy, a third British Prince may be named as the last hero who vigorously sustained the sinking fortunes of his race, and held in suspense their final expatriation from the Western parts of the Island. This was Cadwallon, King of Gwynedd or North Wales, who availed himself of the dissensions of the Saxons to retaliate upon them some of the evils which had overtaken the Britons from their own feuds. In concert with Penda of Mercia, he invaded Northumbria; defeated and slaughtered the army of Edwin its Sovereign, who fell in the battle; and ravaged the whole territory with frightful cruelty.† So signal and continuous were the successes of the Welsh Prince that three Northumbrian Kings lost their lives successively in the contest; and he is declared by his Bard to have been triumphant in fourteen great battles and sixty skirmishes. But his course was at length arrested by a tremendous defeat, in which he perished with the majority of his followers.‡

With him expired the last rational hope of the restoration of the Britons to their pristine seats; and though they still fondly cherished for Ages the vain predictions of their Bards, that they should one day expel the hated Saxon invaders from the Island, the recovery of their ancient possessions never again became probable.

The long and valiant, though desultory and uncombined, resistance of the Britons, as it was unsuccessful, had only aggravated the horrors of conquest. Wherever the Saxon arms prevailed, their course was attended by the massacre and desolation. The stubborn defence of the natives, and the losses which they inflicted on their victors, often provoked an indiscriminate slaughter; and by the victorious and ruthless Barbarians, villages and cities were involved with their inhabitants in a common conflagration. As the original conquerors were Pagans, their ferocity spared the Ecclesiastical edifices and institutions still less than the Civil establishments of the natives. The Churches and Monasteries were destroyed, the Clergy were often murdered; and the Religion and Arts, the Laws and Language of the Britons were overwhelmed in a general destruction. The recorded traces of devastation which the Island long afterwards presented, once suggested the now exploded opinion that the great mass of the British population in the Provinces of the Overtachy had been entirely exterminated by the conquerors. But so soon as the first blind fury of their cruelty or vengeance had subsided, the obvious dictates of their own interest would induce them to preserve the cultivators of the land which they had won, as well as the cattle and habitations which were required for their own use; and by a proud and warlike race who, in the freshness of their spirit of roving adventure, disdained the patient occupations of industry, the labour of captives was indispensable for obtaining the produce of the soil. Wherever the obstinate resistance of the natives did not provoke the savage passions of the victors, their lives were spared; but it was only to convert them into the absolute property of their masters; and the Britons of both sexes and of every age and condition were divided like their lands, their herds, and their movables, among the Chieftains and warriors of the invading hosts.

In this state of bondage to the soil, notwithstanding some mere verbal disputes of modern writers on the proper acceptation of the terms by which the classes of the Anglo-Saxon peasantry were distinguished, it is evident that the descendants of the conquered population, at the distance of four centuries, still remained; and though it is indubitable that many of the indigent Saxons themselves were often reduced to sell themselves and their families into perpetual servitude, yet the distinction expressly made in some of the Saxon Codes between slaves of national and alien blood sufficiently attests the existence of a servile Order in both races. It is among the most pleasing proofs of the benign influence which Christianity, even in an imperfect and corrupted form, exercised over the ferocious spirit of the Barbarians, that, after their conversion, the liberation of the slaves was frequent, and the treatment of the subjugated Britons altogether much alleviated. The Saxon Laws gradually encouraged the practice of manumission, restricted the sale and at length prohibited the exportation of slaves;§ and, in the districts which were torn from the Britons, after the Kings of Wessex had become

Britain.

From

A. D.

449.

to

A. D.

500.

Desolation

of Britain

by the Saxon Conquest.

Fate of the subjugated

Population.

An universal condition of slavery:

It until ame-lied by the introduction of Christianity

among the

Saxons.

* Nennius, c. 64. But see the authorities for the actions of Urien, collected by Mr. Turner, vol. i. p. 284-287.

† The authentic details of these wars of Cadwallon are contained in Bede, lib. ii. c. 20. lib. iii. c. 1, 2. Chron. Sax. p. 29. &c.

• Leyes Sax. (Wilkins) p. 11, 29, 107, &c.

History.

From

A. D.

449.

to

A. D.

500.

Character

of the Anglo-

Saxon

Annals after the completion of the Oetarchy.

Confused

series of savage crimes and violent revolutions.

The BRE-

WALDAS; or predominant Saxereigns of the Oet-archy.

Christians, they extended to their Cornish, a large share of the Civil Rights which were enjoyed by their Saxon, subjects.*

The settlement and conquest of Britain by the Saxon race—the division of Provinces among various bands of the three principal invading Tribes—the gradual formation and localities of their independent States—the fate of the previous inhabitants whom they destroyed, expelled, or enslaved—and the progress of events through which the new population, Language, and social Constitution of our forefathers were permanently implanted in our Island—have presented objects of sufficient attraction to deserve and require a minute and circumstantial relation. But, after the secure establishment of the Anglo-Saxon Oetarchy, there is by no means the same temptation or necessity to pursue the confused and troubled Annals of those eight petty Kingdoms through their dark and bloody vicissitudes of disorder. Even before the invaders had perfected their successes over the Britons, they began to quarrel among themselves. The bonds of their common cause and national consanguinity were fiercely broken; and in their perpetual wars with each other, they shed their kindred blood as profusely and mercilessly as that of the general enemy. Their History thenceforward, until the union of their States under the hereditary supremacy of a single line of Monarchs, is little more than a quick succession of crimes the most sanguinary and cruel, the most violent and treacherous. In the partial and uncertain light which is afforded us to discern the obscure and intricate course of such events, we encounter a series of barbarous revolutions producing only a temporary ascendancy, now in one State or Tyrant, now in another; and exhibiting no better moral lesson than the dismal excesses of uncivilized Society under some of its worst aspects of ferocity.

It were therefore a task equally wearisome and revolting to follow out either the progress of the international Saxon wars, or the fate of the petty dynasties which rose and fell with the fluctuations of victory; and in a rapid and cursory survey of the state of the Island during the remainder of the period embraced in this division of our subject, we shall confine our attention to the general progress of those circumstances, which reduced the number of the Anglo-Saxon States, and prepared their distant consolidation into a single powerful Monarchy. The only relief which is afforded to the ferocious character of the Saxon Annals during these Ages, will be found in the gradual and successive introduction of Christianity into the several States of the Oetarchy; and in its slow but certain influence in mitigating the rudeness and cruelty of the Saxon manners, and ameliorating the political condition of their national Society. But the history of their conversion to the Religion of the Gospel, which, imperfectly as it was effected, is illustrated by many incidents pleasing in themselves and developing the better capacities of the rude Saxon mind, will form the distinct subject of the following chapter.

While we thus disclaim any intention of regularly pursuing the Annals of the dynasties of the Oetarchy, as both perplexing and unprofitable to the reader, some order may be thrown into our notice of the Anglo-Saxon affairs between the independent establishment and the consolidation of their Kingdoms, by tracing the reigns of a few among the most powerful of the Provincial Sovereigns. This course is obviously suggested by a circumstance, which has seemed to mark something like a principle of national confederation among the Saxon Princes themselves: there was frequently one among their number whose general authority, or at least whose superior power and dignity, was recognised by his contemporaries, under the title of BRETWALDA, the Ruler, or literally walder, of Britain. Of the exact nature of this pre-eminence, no particular intimation has descended to us. We know neither whether it was conceded by the voluntary suffrages of the other Powers and States, or arbitrarily assumed and enforced by the ambition of the predominant King; nor yet whether it was a mere title of honour, or more substantially attended by the prerogatives and duties of a paramount sovereignty.* But, in the supposition which most limits the attributes of the Bretwaldas, the progressive condition of the Oetarchy may be appropriately illustrated in the order, first of their ascendancy, and afterwards of that of other Princes who, without being distinguished by the same specific title, appear to have succeeded to the greatest measure of dominion over the Island.

The first Saxon Prince to whom we find the dignity of Bretwalda attributed was Ella, the founder of the Kingdom of Sussex.† As that State was the smallest and least powerful of the whole number, it has been conjectured, with great probability, that this superiority may have been conceded to some pre-eminence which Ella had enjoyed in his native Country, or to some exploits of which the memory has perished.‡ The second Prince who attained the same distinction was Ceawlin of Wessex, grandson of Cerdic. The victories over the Britons, by which, as we have seen, he extended the limits of his own Kingdom, were preceded by the first war among the Saxons themselves. The contest appears to have been provoked by the youthful ambition of Ethelbert, fourth King of Kent, who, prevented from enlarging his patrimonial State at the expense of the common enemy by the interposition of other Saxon territories, endeavoured to seize a portion of Wessex. But his presumptuous invasion of the dominions of Ceawlin was chastised by a severe defeat at Wimbeldon, in which two of his Ealdormen or Earls were slain, with the flower of his army; and the victory of the King of Wessex threatened the Kentish Jutes with the subjugation which they had endeavoured to impose on others.§ We are not informed whether it was the moderation or policy of Ceawlin which induced him to respect the weakness of Kent, and to divert his arms against the Britons; but, at a subsequent period in his triumphant reign, his ambition led him, on the death of the second King of Sussex, to add that little State to his conquests. The conclusion of his life was unfortunate. His nephew

* Our only illustration on the dignity and succession of the Bretwaldas is derived from Bede; and, after the Venerable Historian, from the Saxon Chronicle. But neither authority has much extended our knowledge beyond the mere verbal signification of the word. Gibbon (c. 38. note 131) considers the reign of the Bretwaldas the effect, not of Law, but of Conquest; and Dr. Lingard (vol. i. p. 106) thinks it "not rash to infer, from the strong expressions of Bede, that the inferior Kings acknowledged themselves their vassals." Yet Conquest at least cannot always be inferred from the possession of the dignity: since Ella, the first to whom it is assigned, is not declared to have subjugated Kent or Wessex; nor were later Bretwaldas always the conquerors of other Saxon Kingdoms.

† Bede, lib. ii. c. 5. Chron. Sax. p. 71.

‡ Lingard, supra.

§ Chron. Sax. p. 71.

* Leyes Sax. (Wilkins) p. 20, 71, &c.

Britain.

From

A. D.

449.

to

A. D.

500.

Series of Bretwaldas.

I. Ella of Sussex.

A. D.

450.

II. Ceawlin

of Wessex.

A. D.

565.

A. D.

584.

History. Ceolric having rebelliously allied himself with the Britons, defeated him in a great battle at Wodnesberg, or the mount of Woden, in Wiltshire; and this disastrous event was soon followed by the death of the Bretwalda, and the accession of his treacherous kinsman to the throne of Wessex.*

From A. D. 449. to A. D. 500. III. Ethelbert of Kent. A. D. 591. A. D. 597. A. D. 603. The intestine disorders of that State probably averted the subjugation of Kent, and enabled Ethelbert to redeem the disgrace of his early years. For, by some unexplained course of prudence or fortune, he so extended his influence or power, that, after the death of Ceawlin, he assumed the title of Bretwalda, and obtained a recognition of his pre-eminence among all the Saxon States South of the Humber. The happiness of his reign was protracted to the long term of fifty-six years; and his conversion to Christianity was followed by his promulgation of the earliest Code of Anglo-Saxon legislation. During the life of Ethelbert, the Kingdom of Bernicia was engaged in a furious warfare with the Strathclyde or Scottish Britons; and in a memorable battle, the Anglian Sovereign Ethelfrith defeated them with so great slaughter, that, during more than a whole Century afterwards, they never dared to approach the Northumbrian frontiers.†

IV. Redwald of East Anglia. A. D. 616. The death of Ethelbert terminated the ascendancy of his little Kingdom; and the supremacy among the Anglo-Saxon Estates was assumed by the most powerful and numerous of the three Nations. The throne of East Anglia was filled at this juncture by Redwald, the third Prince of the line of Uffa, who is styled the fourth of the Bretwaldas. A signal victory which he obtained over Ethelfrith of Bernicia, in the same year with the decease of Ethelbert, appears to have raised him to the pre-eminence denoted by that title. After his triumph over the Strathclyde Britons, the warlike Sovereign of Bernicia had been stimulated by successful ambition to seize the dominions of his young brother-in-law, Edwin of Deira; and the ejected Prince had found refuge at the Court of Redwald. The adventures of the fugitive, as they are told by the father of English History, form an episode which, amidst the gloomy scenes of the Saxon Annals, interests alike, by the simplicity and minuteness of the narrative, and its illustration of the manners and feelings of the Age. It was after having been driven from a first asylum in Gwynedd, or North Wales, where he had been generously educated by Cailvan, the British King, and after having wandered in secret through several of the Saxon States to escape the indefatigable pursuit of his usurping enemy, that Edwin, arriving at the East Anglian Court, avowed his rank, and implored the hospitality of Redwald. He was kindly received by that Monarch and his Queen, and cheered with assurances of protection; but Ethelfrith no sooner heard of his residence at the East Anglian Court, than he sent repeated messengers to Redwald, first tempting him to deliver up the person of the Royal youth, and afterwards menacing him with vengeance for his refusal.

Adventures of a Saxon Prince. Reflecting on the invariable successes, and dreading the power of the Bernician Tyrant, the East Anglian wavered between the duty of fulfilling his promise to the exile, and the danger of encountering the threatened hostility of his persecutor. At this crisis of his fate, Edwin was sitting alone, at the close of daylight, before the gate of the Palace, when his melancholy suspense was broken by the voice of a friend, which whispered in his ear that it was time to rise and be away, for that the King had yielded to the demands of his enemy. "And whither," said the young exile, "should I flee? I have already wandered, without finding a shelter, through all the Provinces of the Island: I have here received a pledge of safety; Redwald as yet has done me no evil; and I will not be the first to break the pledge of fidelity. I have long been too familiar with misery to be eager for life. If I am to perish, the shame of my death will not be mine, but my betrayer's; and no death can be more welcome, than that which is the work of Royal perfidy." He remained seated on the same spot, filled with the sadness of his condition, until the shades of night had fallen around him: when an unknown form seemed to rise up before him—in his troubled slumbers as we may believe—and promised him present deliverance and future greatness, if he would listen to that which should hereafter be taught him. The vision, laying a hand upon his head, bade him remember that sign, and disappeared; and Edwin, awaking with this gleam of hope, found his friend a second time by his side with an assurance of safety. The doubtful fidelity of Redwald had been confirmed by the noble sentiment of his Queen, that a King should not sell a distressed friend, nor violate his faith for gold; for that no wealth was so precious and royal as good faith. As soon as Redwald had imbibed courage to maintain the course of honour and humanity, he resolved at once to meet the inevitable consequences of resistance to the demands of the vindictive Ethelfrith; and assembling his forces, he led them towards the territory of Bernicia. On the banks of the little river Idel, in Nottinghamshire, he encountered his adversary, who was already on the march with a small Body of chosen troops to surprise him. Notwithstanding the disparity of numbers, the ancient fortune and experienced skill of Ethelfrith at first supported him; and the van-guard of the three divisions in which the East Anglian army had been arrayed, was entirely destroyed, and its leader, a son of Redwald, was slain. But the despair of the father, and the courageous conduct of Edwin himself, inspired firmness into the other East Anglian divisions, and retrieved the first disaster of the combat. In an impetuous onset, Ethelfrith was slain; his followers were easily destroyed or put to flight; and Redwald not only restored his young friend to the throne of Deira, but enabled him to subject Bernicia to his sceptre. The East Anglian King returned in triumph to his own dominions, and maintained until his death the prominent station of Bretwalda, to which his victory, notwithstanding his generous relinquishment of its fruits, had deservedly raised him.‡

On the death of his benefactor, Edwin, already Sovereign of the two Kingdoms North of the Humber, assumed the title of Bretwalda. The rise of the Northumbrian power may be dated from the previous reign of the warlike Ethelfrith; and it was still further advanced by the activity and talents of Edwin. In a series of successful wars, he established his superiority over the Saxons of Wessex and the Britons of North Wales; while he maintained the relations of an amicable supremacy with the successors of Redwald in East

Britain.
From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
800.

V. Edwin of Northumbria.
A. D.
623.

* Chron. Sax. p. 20—23.

† Bede, lib. i. c. 34. Chron. Sax. p. 24.

• The use which was made of this vision or dream, in the subsequent conversion of Edwin to Christianity, will be found noticed in the next Chapter.

‡ Bede, lib. ii. c. 12. See, also, Chron. Sax. p. 27.

History. Anglia. His attack upon the West Saxons was caused by a base attempt of their Sovereign Cwichelm, who was envious of his rising fortunes, to procure his assassination. The agent selected for this atrocity, who was invested by Cwichelm with the office of an ambassador, watched his opportunity during an audience to him a dagger at the heart of Edwin. Lilla, a faithful thegn or nobelman, with the quick glances of affection, saw the danger of the King only in time to throw himself before the person of his master, and to receive the blow which it was too late to avert. The stroke was so violent, that Edwin was himself slightly wounded through the body of his devoted attendant; but the murderer was immediately overpowered by numbers and killed, though not before, in the desperation of his struggle, he had slain a second Nobleman in the assembly with the same weapon which had pierced the heart of Lilla. Edwin took a signal vengeance for the foul treachery of Cwichelm by invading his dominions, and inflicting so severe a defeat upon the West Saxons, that five of their Chieftains were slain in the battle, and their Country was pillaged by the victors.

A. D.
626.

We are not clearly informed of the provocation which induced Edwin to undertake his subsequent wars against Cadwallon, King of North Wales: but the British Prince is said to have been the aggressor by the invasion of the Northumbrian dominions. As Cadwallon, however, was the son of that Cadfan who had given an asylum to the early youth of Edwin, the circumstances of the contest may suggest a suspicion, that the Bretwalda was less sensible to the impulse of gratitude than of ambition. After repelling the invasion of Cadwallon, Edwin became in turn the assailant, penetrated into the heart of North Wales, conquered great part of the Country, and obliged the British Prince to seek refuge in Ireland. Pursuing his advantage, he reduced the Islands of Anglesey and Man, and extended his sway far beyond that of any preceding Bretwalda, as well over the Saxon as the British States. As a symbol of his supremacy, he introduced a pageantry unknown to his rude Countrymen; and whenever he appeared in public, the Tufa, or Roman standard of empire, was always borne before him. It is a more honourable evidence of his power, and of the spirit in which it was administered, that the memory of his vigilant justice was long preserved; and the excellence of the internal police which he established in that Age of violence is pointedly attested by a current proverb of the succeeding generation, that, "in the days of Edwin, a woman with the babe at her breast, might walk from sea to sea without fear of injury or insult." He caused reservoirs of stone to be fixed at convenient distances on all the highways through his dominions to collect the waters of the nearest springs, and chained to them vessels of brass, for the refreshment of travellers. In a state of society, in which no places of entertainment were provided for wayfarers, this considerate provision—suggested to Edwin, perhaps, by his own early experience of fatigue and privations in his wanderings—was gratefully received by his People; and such were the lawless habits of the times as to make it thought worthy of note, that dread of the King's searching justice, or respect for his benevolence, restrained all men from the theft of these cups.*

Rise of Penda of Mercia.

Notwithstanding the greatness and virtuous reputation of Edwin, his reign terminated calamitously. Under the vigorous and able administration of Penda, the grandson of Cridda, a ferocious and warlike Chieftain, the extensive Province of Mercia, which until that period had remained subordinate to the dominion of the Northern Angles, attained sufficient strength for the assertion of independence. Penda, now advanced in years, had long endured with impatience the supremacy of the Northumbrian King, when his aid was besought by the British Sovereign of North Wales, in an attempt to throw off the same yoke. Notwithstanding the national hatred between Saxon and Briton, the similarity of their views formed a sufficient bond of alliance and revolt; and Penda and Cadwallon, uniting their forces, encountered those of Edwin in a great battle at Hatfield, in Yorkshire. The issue of that conflict proved fatal, as we have already seen, to the Empire and life of Edwin, and gave a decided superiority over all the Anglo-Saxon States to the cruel Penda, who appears now first to have assumed the Royal title in Mercia.*

Though this Prince is not numbered by the Saxon Writers among the Bretwaldas, the pre-eminence of his power renders him in effect the most conspicuous among the contemporary Sovereigns of the Island; and the circumstances of his reign will best illustrate the general Annals of all Britain. After the victory of Hatfield, the inoffensive tranquillity of East Anglia next tempted his spirit of cruel aggression. Sigebert, the King of that State, actuated by the mistaken piety of the times, which preferred the devotional retirement of the Cloister to the active duties of life, had assumed the tonsure, and resigned the throne to his cousin Ecgric: but his People, on the alarm of Penda's invasion, distrusting the abilities of his successor, drew him by entreaty or force from his Monastery, and insisted on his assuming the command of their army. Sigebert reluctantly yielded: but refusing to bear arms, as repugnant to his Religious profession, he would assume no other emblem of command than a wand. His military skill was exceeded by the veteran ability of Penda; and both the Royal Monk and the reigning Prince of the East Angles perished on the same disastrous field. A second Bretwalda, in the person of another Northumbrian King, was soon after adiled to the number of the victims whom Penda immolated to his fierce ambition. This was Oswald, the conqueror of Cadwallon, who, probably from his success against the Welsh Prince, had assumed the supreme title, and further justified his claim to it, no less by his pacific virtues than by his subsequent victories over the Scottish Britons, whom he rendered tributary to Northumbria. But, in the eighth year of his reign, he was attacked by Penda, and shared the fate of Edwin. The savage victor, after mutilating the dead body of his adversary, and spreading devastation through Northumbria, laid siege to its Capital Bebbanburgh, or Bamborough. But the strength of that place, situated on a rocky promontory of the German Ocean, defied his assaults, and he resolved to destroy it by fire. For that purpose, demolishing the villages in its neighbourhood, he piled all their combustible materials up near the walls of the city; and so soon as the wind set strongly towards the place, the whole mass was inflamed. The appalled inhabitants were already oppressed by volumes of smoke, and expecting the destruction of their walls from the progress of the fire: when the wind

British.
From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
800.

Great Battle
at Hatfield.
Defeat and
Death of Edwin.
A. D.
633.

Rise of Penda.

Series of his victories and atrocities.

His subjugation of East Anglia.
A. D.
634.

VI. Oswald of Northumbria, Bretwalda.
A. D.
634.

Defeated and slain by Penda.
A. D.
642.

* Bede, lib. ii. c. 5—16. Chron. Sax. p. 27.

* Bede, lib. ii. c. 20. Chron. Sax. p. 29.

History. suddenly shifting, turned the conflagration upon its authors; and the panic-stricken Mercians abandoned the siege.*

From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
800. who subduces Wes-
sax.
A. D.
643.

After the retreat of Penda from Bamborough, the subjugation of Wessex was the next enterprise which engaged his vindictive and insatiable ambition. Cenwalch, the Sovereign of that State, had incurred his resentment by repudiating his sister. The arms of Penda were as usual victorious; and the West Saxon King was expelled from his dominions. He sought an asylum in East Anglia; and the hospitality which he received from its Sovereign, afforded the ferocious Mercian a pretext for fresh aggression upon that Kingdom.

and again
oppresses East Anglia.

The Country of the East Angles was again invaded; their army was routed; and a third of their Monarchs perished by the sword of Penda. Though he had already reached the age of eighty years, the spirit of that ruler was still as active and sanguinary as ever; and nothing less than the total destruction of every opponent could now satisfy his pride and cupidity. The Northern Angles continued the peculiar objects of his fury. It was in vain that Oswy, the brother and successor of Oswald, strove, by the tender of submission and tribute, to deprecate his enmity. Penda had sworn to exterminate the whole Nation of the Northumbrians; and in his last invasion of their Country, no fewer than thirty vassal Kings and Chieftains of the Saxon and British race swelled, with their followers, the multitude of his forces. But Oswy and his People were urged but is himself finally defeated by Oswy of Northum-

beria.
and slain.
A. D.
651.

by despair to oppose the most vigorous resistance; and notwithstanding their inferiority in numbers and martial equipment, they so totally defeated the army of the hoary Tyrant, that only two of the thirty vassal Princes who fought under his standard escaped with life; and Penda himself, being hurried off the field in the general rout, was overtaken and put to death. The battle was fought at Winwidfield in Yorkshire; and the waters of the Aere, which had overflowed its banks, swept away a greater number of the Mercians in their flight, than had perished in the conflict. Though perpetrated in an Age so familiar with horrors, the surpassing crimes of Penda were deemed to have provoked the retributive justice of his fate; and the natural sentiment of the People was expressed and preserved in a proverbial saying, that in Winwid's stream were avenged the deaths of the three East Anglian and the two Northumbrian Kings, whose blood had been shed by the Pagan Tyrant.†

The fall of Penda, and the destruction of his army, opened a field for the elevation of Oswy to the dignity and power of Bretwalda. Both Mercia and East Anglia, whose strength had been exhausted in the struggle with Penda, lay prostrate before the victorious arms of the Northumbrian; and annexing the former Province to his own dominions, he established his superiority over all the other Saxon States. The Welsh and Scottish Princes also are said to have become his tributaries; and for a season he vigorously maintained the supremacy expressed by his title. Yet in the later years of his reign, his power was considerably diminished. Under Cenwalch, so soon as that Prince was relieved from the oppression of Penda, Wessex began to emerge into activity and vigour; and some Mercian Nobles, revolting against the Bretwalda, succeeded in recovering the independence of their Country, and placed on its throne Wulfhere, the youngest son of Penda: whom, amidst the ruin of his House, they had diligently concealed from the search of the conqueror. Under Wulfhere, the Kings of Sussex and Essex courted the friendship, and declared themselves the dependent allies of Mercia; and the recovering power both of that State and of Wessex began to contend with Northumbria for superiority. Oswy, however, died in peace; and with him expired the title and the supremacy of the Bretwaldas.‡

The successive assumption of that dignity by one South Saxon, one West Saxon, one Kentish, one East Anglian, and three Northumbrian Kings, may serve to illustrate the relative importance or influence which the States of the Octarchy had at different periods hitherto enjoyed. But if, upon this estimate, Northumbria had latterly acquired the decided predominance, the superiority had gradually been declining during the last years of Oswy; and after his death it was never recovered. The greater natural strength of Mercia, which had been developed under the energetic, though cruel sway of Penda, was matured by the prudent administration of his son; and Wessex, by the slow but certain progress of its arms against the Britons, had incorporated almost all the Southern and South Western parts of the Island into its territory. The remaining States, Sussex, Kent, Essex, and East Anglia, were each singly unequal to a contest with their more powerful neighbours, and figured only as the allies, or more generally as the subjects, of Wessex, Mercia, and Northumbria. From that time, therefore, the struggle for the supremacy lay among these latter Kingdoms; and when the Saxon Annals cease to be illustrated by a succession of Bretwaldas, we can discover no better order of narration than to pursue the reigns of Monarchs who, in view of the three larger States, predominated over their rival contemporaries.

On the death of Oswy, the Crown of Northumbria passed to his Son Egfrid, who, during his reign, but without the supreme title, endeavoured, on the whole not unsuccessfully, to maintain the predominance of his State over the other Saxon Kingdoms. His most powerful competitor was Wulfhere of Mercia; but he defeated that Monarch, and on his death, even took possession for a time of his dominions; which he, however, shortly restored to Ethelred, the surviving son of Penda, who had married his sister. Subsequently, notwithstanding this alliance, a war arose between Egfrid and Ethelred, which, after a bloody and dubious conflict on the Trent, was terminated by the mediation of Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury. But the principal triumphs, and the final disaster, of Egfrid's reign, were achieved and suffered in his wars against the Caledonian Britons. That People, soon after his accession, took advantage of his youth, to assert their independence: but he attacked them with vigour so unexpected, and routed their army with so great slaughter, that he compelled them to resume their submission to the Northumbrian Crown. At a later period, he carried his arms into Ireland, then distinguished for the peaceful character of its people, and even for the superior Learning and virtues of its Monastic teachers. Though the inoffensive natives do not appear to have given him any provocation, Egfrid, in the cruel wantonness of ambition, resolved upon their subjugation,

Britain.
From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
600.
Death of Oswy.

A. D.
670.
Cessation of the title of Bretwalda.

Subsequent rivalry of Northum-
beria, Mercia, and Wes-
sax.

Succession of predominant Princes.
Egfrid of Northum-
beria.
A. D.
670.

A. D.
679.

His invasion of Ireland.

A. D.
684.

* Bede, lib. iii. c. 1—16. Chron. Sax. p. 32.
† Ibid. lib. iii. c. 17—24. Ibid. p. 33.

* Bede, lib. iii. c. 25. ad fin. iv. ad c. 11. Chron. Sax. p. 34—40.

History.

From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
800.

A. D.
685.

and, under his General Beorht, despatched across the channel an army, which, though prevented by the brave resistance of the invaded from effecting the purpose of conquest, miserably ravaged their coasts, and burned many of their towns with the Churches and Monasteries. Their wrongs were speedily avenged in the fate of Egfrid; for, in the following year, impelled by the same restless spirit of aggression, he rashly led his followers into the territory of the Caledonians, and being inveigled into the fastnesses of their Northern mountains, he was cut off, with nearly all his army, in a bloody engagement at Drumnechtan. The body of Egfrid was found among the slain, and received an honourable interment from the victors in their Royal Cemetery, in the celebrated Isle of Icolmkill, or St. Columba. The disastrous issue of this expedition encouraged the Welsh, as well as the Scottish Britons, to throw off the yoke of Northumbria; and, under the reign of Aldfrid, the successor of Egfrid, a second defeat, in a similar invasion entrusted to Beorht, in which the Northumbrian leader also perished with his army, still further broke the power of that State. Aldfrid, a pacific Prince, distinguished among his contemporaries for his piety and Learning, did not attempt to preserve the supremacy among the Saxon Kingdoms, which his predecessors had asserted: but contented himself with governing his contracted dominions in the enjoyment of the universal respect, which was accorded to his virtues, both by his own People and the adjacent States.*

Ceadwalla,

A. D.
685.

The same year in which Egfrid perished was marked by the rise in Wessex of Ceadwalla, who became the most distinguished Saxon Prince of his times. The failure of issue in the direct Royal line after the death of Cenwalch, had reduced the Kingdom of the West Saxons to the condition of a turbulent Aristocracy; in which many Chieftains of the race of Cerdic alternately contended with each other for the ascendancy, and conferred the Royal title on one of their number for the exigencies of common defence against foreign enemies. In the vicissitudes of faction produced by this disorderly form of Government, the young Ceadwalla, himself a descendant from Cerdic, was first banished from Wessex, and subsequently raised to its throne. His abilities and fortune, in peace and in war, enabled him not only to maintain that dignity over his own subjects, but to establish his superiority over the Kingdoms of Sussex and Kent. His victorious career was sullied by frightful cruelties; and it was probably the impulse of a repentant conscience which induced him, before he had reached the age of thirty years, to abandon his dominions and proceed on a pilgrimage to Rome, to receive the rite of Baptism from the hands of the Pope. He died very soon after his arrival in the holy city: but his example was followed in the course of a few years by two other Anglo-Saxon Kings, Cenred of Mercia, and Offa of Essex; who travelling also to Rome, there assumed the Monastic profession, and died.†

and Ina, of Wessex.

A. D.
685.

The death of Ceadwalla was followed in Wessex by the long reign of Ina. He was lineally descended from Cerdic; but the irregularity which prevailed in the order of Royal succession among the Anglo-Saxons is evinced in the example of his election to the throne, while his own father and two children of the late King were living.

His elevation, however, justified the national choice; for the martial abilities and achievements of Ina were not inferior to those of the most distinguished of his predecessors; and it was his victorious career which confirmed the increasing power of Wessex. By his successive conquests over the Cornish Britons, he added a considerable territory to his Kingdom; by some unrecorded means he acquired the paramount sovereignty of Essex; and after an obstinate struggle of the People of Sussex to recover their independence, he finally annexed that State to the Crown of Wessex. A war in which he engaged with Ceolred, King of Mercia, produced no other fruits than a sanguinary and indecisive battle at Wodnesbeorg: but he had previously reduced the less powerful State of Kent into complete subjection to his arms. The name of Ina, however, is chiefly indebted for its fame to his efforts as a Legislator; and the Collection of his Laws, which yet survives, avouches his best title to remembrance. In the fifth year of his reign, at a Witena-gemot, or Assembly of the National Council of Wessex, and "with the advice," as it is simply expressed in the exordium to his Code, "of his father Cenred, his Bishops Hedda and Ercenwald, and of all his Ealdormen, the oldest Sages of his People, and a great collection of God's servants," he collected or enacted these Laws, in number seventy-nine.* In such an attempt to reduce the customary and oral rules of judgment, during a rude condition of society, into a series of written jurisprudence, we are not, of course, to expect any approach to a perfect system of legislation; but the Code of Ina entitled him to the gratitude of his People, and its purpose may command the respect even of more enlightened Ages. It determined the scale of those pecuniary compensations for crimes, which were, perhaps, the only restraint upon violence which the fierce spirit of the times would endure; by punishing robberies and frauds which ruined industry, and obstructed the fair interchange of property, it attempted to give security to the trader and the cultivator; and it extended the protection of humanity in some measure even to the domestic bondsman and the serf of the soil.†

As the Laws of Ina mark some of the first advances of the Saxon mind in the work of social order, so the traditional account which has descended to us of the last scene of his lengthened and prosperous reign, may at least serve to exemplify the tone of Religious and Philosophical sentiment which belonged to the same Age. In his declining years, the Consort of Ina had often vainly besought him to withdraw with her from the World, and to exchange the cares of Royalty for the retirement of the cloister. As her eloquence failed to wean the aged Monarch from the habitual passion for Regal state, she had recourse to a singular practical homily against the grovelling objects of all earthly luxury. After giving a sumptuous banquet to their Nobles and Clergy at a country Palace, the Royal pair departed on a journey; but, having travelled a short distance, Ina was induced, by the earnest entreaty of the Queen, to retrace their way. As he again approached the scene of recent festivity, the King was astonished at the silence and desolation which seemed to pervade it. His amazement increased, when, on entering the banquetting chamber, he found its Regal garniture vanished, the apartment overspread with filth and

Britain.

From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
800.

His conquests over the Cornish Britons.

A. D.
710.

He subjected the Cornish Britons.

A. D.
694.

and Sussex.

A. D.
725.

Laws of Ina.

* Bede, lib. iv. c. 12. lib. v. c. 24. Chron. Sax. p. 49.
† Ibid. lib. iv. c. 15. lib. v. c. 7. Ibid. p. 44—48.

* Wilkins, Leyes Sax. p. 14.
† Ibid. p. 14—27.

History. rubbish, and the very couch on which he had reposed occupied by a litter of swine. While he yet gazed in silent disgust on the change, his Queen confessed that it had been prepared by her command: "My lord and husband, behold how shortly may all appliances of human grandeur be converted to the vilest uses! Here are no longer the voices of revellers and parasites, the glitter of silver vessels, or the allurements of exquisite viands. All these are gone like the wind and the smoke, and shall not our enjoyment of such toys soon be as vain and fleeting? See, I beseech you, how disgusting is the transformation in these objects of our solicitude. To still more loathsome changes must our own pampered bodies submit. Unhappy then must we be if their indulgence absorb our minds. Ah! let us not cling to these corrupting vanities, but seek rather the things of Eternity!" But History has suggested some other, and, it may be, better authenticated explanations of the retirement of Ina from the throne.* His frame was oppressed by infirmities, and his mind distracted with the cares of government. The peace of his old age was broken by rebellions; and experience had taught him the difficulty of curbing with an enfeebled hand the restless spirit of a factious and warlike Nobility. He perhaps resolved to descend voluntarily from a station, which he could no longer retain with dignity; and the customs of the times regulated the subsequent purpose of his piety. Having solemnly resigned the Crown in a Witenagemot, he soon after travelled on a pilgrimage with his Queen to Rome: where they both sought a voluntary obscurity, and died in their self-inflicted condition of poverty.†

His abdication. The abdication of Ina was followed by the disorders of a disputed succession, which for a time impaired the power of Wessex, and placed that of her rival State in the ascendant. The sceptre of Mercia was at that epoch held by Ethelbald, an able and active Prince, who soon took advantage of the intestine divisions of the West Saxons to assert the superiority of his throne over all those portions of the Island which lie between the Humber and the Southern Channel. He seems to have been the first Monarch since the Bretwaldas who arrogated to himself the universal Sovereignty of the Anglo-Saxons: for in his Charters he assumed the title of "King of Britain, and King not only of Mercia, but of all the Provinces which are known under the general South-Anglian name;" or, in other words, of all England, unless it should be thought that Northumbria was designedly excepted by the phrase. That Kingdom was governed, during great part of the Southern reign of Ethelbald, by Eadbert, whose successive victories over the Caledonians and Strathclyde Britons enlarged his dominions, and revived the glory of the Northumbrian name. The Mercian King in general respected the power of Eadbert; or, at least, it was only during his absence in the Scottish wars, that Ethelbald ventured to attack his dominions: and the issue of those predatory invasions redounded little to the honour of the aggressor. After a brilliant reign of twenty-one years, Eadbert imitated the example, which so many Anglo-Saxon Princes had already offered, of retiring into a Monastery; and from that event may be dated the rapid and final decline of the Northumbrian power.

* William of Malmesbury, p. 15.

† Lingard, vol. i. p. 198.

† Bede, lib. v. c. 7. Chron. Sax. p. 48—52.

Henceforth Mercia and Wessex were left without a third rival to share their deepening contest for the Sovereignty of the Anglo-Saxon Nation.*

Against the ascendancy, however, which the warlike ability and the fortune of Ethelbald had acquired, the contemporary Princes of Wessex for some time ineffectually struggled. Ethelheard, who had finally prevailed over a competitor, after the death of Ina, and had become the vassal of the Mercian, made a vain effort to throw off his yoke, and was punished with the loss of Somerset, then the chief place in Somersetshire. His brother Cuthred, who succeeded him eight years later, was compelled to serve Ethelbald in his wars against the Welsh; and the united army of the Anglo-Saxons inflicted a severe defeat upon that People, and devastated their Country in several expeditions. At length Cuthred, a Prince of more vigorous character than his late brother, who bore with impatience the exactions of his Tyrant, resolved to emancipate himself and his Country from the Mercian supremacy; and encountered Ethelbald on the field of Burford in Oxfordshire. The circumstances of this great and obstinate battle have been depicted by an ancient Chronicler with unusual spirit and vividness of colouring. In the insolence of confident power, the Mercians fought for dominion and plunder; with the courage of desperation, the West Saxons struggled to escape the worst horrors of subjection. The national standards of the People were directly opposed in the van of either army; and the thickest and fiercest of the fight soon gathered round them. In the onset a gallant Ealdorman, Edelm, once a rebel, but now the most faithful subject of Cuthred, who bore the Golden Dragon, the banner of Wessex, slew with his own hand the standard-bearer of Ethelbald. The West Saxons hailed the deed of their champion with shouts of exultation as the sure presage of victory; the Mercians rushed forward to rescue their standard; and the hostile lines closed in one general and furious death-struggle. The murderous conflict with the sword, the spear, and the ponderous battle-axe—the last the most common weapon of the Anglo-Saxon array,—long hung in suspense, until the Ealdorman Edelm, who figures as the hero of the battle, confronted the Mercian King. Each collected his full vigour for the collision: but Ethelbald was overpowered by the gigantic stature and strength of the champion. Forgetful of his former fame, and preferring safety to glory, Ethelbald, the conqueror of many fields, gave to his yet struggling followers the first example of a precipitate flight, which produced the total rout of his army. This victory of the West Saxons destroyed for a time the supremacy of Mercia; and five years later, Ethelbald lost in battle against his own rebellious subjects, the life which had been only ingloriously protracted by fleeing before his foreign enemies.†

The death of Cuthred preceded that of his humbled rival, for he survived his victory of Burford only two years: but in that interval he undertook another successful expedition against the Britons, and annexed to his dominions a fresh district, torn from the Welsh frontiers. His successor, Sigehyrt, after a brief and tyrannical reign, was deposed and murdered; and the West Saxon Nobles elected in his place Cynewulf, a descendant of Cerdic: in whose long reign of twenty-nine years

Britain.
From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
800.
Mercia predominant South of the Humber under Ethel-
bald.
A. D.
743.

Great battle of Burford.
A. D.
752.

Defeat of Ethelbald
by Cuthred of Wessex.

Death of Ethelbald.
A. D.
757.

Succession of Cuthred in Wessex.

A. D.
755.

* Bede, lib. v. c. ult. Chron. Sax. p. 64—59.
† Chron. Sax. p. 54—56. Huntingdon, p. 341.

History.

From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
800.
Examples of personal fidelity and revenge
among the Anglo-Saxons.
A. D.
784.

there is nothing better worthy of record, than his defeat in a contest with Mercia, which terminated disgracefully by the surrender of the West Saxon territory on the Northern bank of the Thames. The circumstances, however, which attended the death of Cynewulf, throw too curious a light upon some qualities of the Anglo-Saxon character to be passed over in silence. Cyneheard, brother of the last King, having been driven into exile by the jealousy of the reigning Prince, had secretly returned to Wessex, still brooding over long-cherished desires of revenge, when the incautious security of Cynewulf gave him an opportunity of putting them into execution. While Cyneheard lay concealed, with a devoted band of about eighty adherents, whom he had collected in the forest near Winchester, the King one afternoon left that Royal residence but slightly attended, to visit a lady to whom he was attached at Merton in Surrey. The conspirators secretly followed his train; and after his attendants were dismissed for the night to some neighbouring houses, surrounded that to which he had retired, and broke in upon his unguarded slumbers. The Royal victim, roused by their intrusion, seized his sword, and rushing upon their leader, whom he recognised, severely wounded him: but he was overpowered by numbers, and slain, before his attendants, awakened by the clash of weapons and the shrieks of his mistress, could arrive to his assistance. The conspirators offered safety to the Royal servants, and even tempted them, few as they were, by bribes to be gone in peace: but personal fidelity to a Lord was a principle of honourable obligation already deemed as sacred among the Anglo-Saxons, as in the feudal relations of later times; and the faithful followers of the King, rejecting all compromise, fiercely assailed his murderers, and continued the generous but unavailing conflict, until they fell to a man beside their master's body. Even a Briton, in their company, who had been detained as a hostage at the Saxon Court, fought by their side, until he was desperately wounded, and was indebted for his life to the forbearance of the conspirators. The tidings of this dismal tragedy had no sooner reached Winchester, than the Thegns of the Royal household assembled their retainers, and took horse for Merton; where the conspirators had hastily fortified themselves. Cyneheard met the new comers in parley at the barrier, dwelt upon the family wrongs which had roused him to vengeance, asserted his own claim to the Crown which his brother had worn, offered munificently to purchase their assistance in obtaining it, and reminded them that many of his band were their kinsmen. The Royal Thegns indignantly spurned the proposal: declaring that their murdered Lord was not less dear to them than their kinsmen; that, if the latter wished to save their lives, they were free to depart; but that on Cyneheard and the rest of his band, vengeance should be done. The kinsmen of the Royal Thegns, in their turn refused to obtain the proffered safety, by desertion of their Lord: the same boon, they said, had been rejected but yester-even by the King's train, and it should that morn be seen that Cyneheard had followers not less generous in their devotion. The impatient assailants waited no further question to commence a furious onset; the barrier was hewn down by their battle-axes; the conspirators defended themselves with desperation; and the struggle ceased only with the fall of the last of the guilty band. Among the heap of his slaughtered companions, which covered the dead body of Cyneheard, one youth only was found to breathe. He was the godson of the Ealdorman Osric, who had led the assailants; and reverence for that sacred tie preserved his solitary life.*

The undistinguished reign of Cynewulf in Wessex was eclipsed by the superior power of Offa of Mercia; who, after an interval of anarchy, which followed the death of Ethelbald, had been raised to the throne of that Kingdom. The original claims of Offa to the Regal dignity were founded on his descent from a brother of Penda: but his Crown was laboriously won by the sword; and the first fourteen years of his reign were consumed in Civil wars, during which he shed much blood and committed many atrocious cruelties. His talents were, however, as eminent, as his temper was sanguinary and his ambition unscrupulous; and he had no sooner established his authority in his own Kingdom, than his enterprises began to be formidable to the surrounding States. After having assailed and oppressed the feeble independence of Kent, he turned his arms against the more powerful Kingdom of Wessex; and his defeat of Cynewulf at Bensington, was followed, as we have already stated, by the cession to Mercia of all the territory North of the Thames. This triumph was only the prelude to still more important and permanent conquests from the Welsh. After some vicissitudes of fortune, he finally expelled that People from all their possessions between the Severn and the Wye; filled the intermediate Country with Anglo-Saxon colonies; and effectually repressed the fierce incursions of the mountaineers upon the new settlers, by drawing a ditch and rampart from the mouth of the latter river to the estuary of the Dee. This gigantic work, which was long celebrated under the name of "Claudh Offa," or "Offa's Dyke," and of which some traces remain to this hour, was carried through marshes and rivers and over mountains for a distance of above one hundred miles; and it served in subsequent Ages for the boundary which determined the confines of England and Wales.†

The predominant power of Offa may be determined by the eagerness of the other Anglo-Saxon Princes of the period to court his alliance. One of his daughters, Elfreda, was married to Ethelred, King of Northumbria, whom he had compelled by the terror of his arms to acknowledge his supremacy. Another, Eadburga, was united to Beorhtic, the successor of Cynewulf on the throne of Wessex. The overture of a third Royal suitor for the hand of his remaining daughter, Etheldritha, was followed by an act of horrible treachery, fatal alike to the life of the lover and the fame of Offa. Attended by a numerous retinue, Ethelbert, King of East Anglia, a youthful prince of handsome person, virtuous disposition, and excelling in all the accomplishments of the Age, arrived on the Mercian frontiers to solicit Etheldritha for his bride. The announcement of the purpose of his journey was met by Offa with a warm invitation to proceed, and by solemn assurances of a safe and respectful reception. Thus encouraged, on his arrival at the Court, he was welcomed with the honours claimed by his rank, and the affectionate attentions due to a favoured suitor. But on retiring to his chamber, after the festivity of a banquet, he was basely assassinated. The ancient Chroniclers differ in the 449. to

Rein.
From
A. D.
A. D.
800.
Offa of Mercia.
A. D.
757.

Victims over Wessex
A. D.
777.
And the Welsh.

Construction of his
"Dyke."
A. D.
750.

The power of Offa predominant.

His proposals were denied by Ethelbert
East Angles

* Chron. Sax. p. 59—63. Huntingdon, p. 343.

† Chron. Sax. p. 56—61. Asee, de Gedra Efredi, (Wise,) p. 10.

History. share of this most foul and inhospitable murder which they attribute to Offa: but they are unanimous in assigning to his Queen Cynefrida the original guilt of its suggestion. But the subsequent conduct of the Mercian King betrays the purpose of the crime, and stamps on his memory the full infamy of its accomplishment: he immediately seized the East Anglian dominions, and annexed them to his own.*

From A. D. 449. to A. D. 800. And death of that Kingdom. A. D. 792. Death of Offa, and remembrance of his family. With the natural and pious desire of marking the retributive justice of Heaven, the Chroniclers of the Age before us have felt some satisfaction in tracing the punishment of Offa's crimes by the calamities of his House. Of his three daughters, Elfreda was widowed by the murder of her husband; Eadburga, expelled from the throne of Wessex for her atrocities, died wretchedly in exile; and Etheldritha, the destined bride of the young Ethelbert, horror-stricken at his assassination, fled from her father's Court to the Abbey of Croylund, and there ended her days in mournful seclusion. Cynefrida, the evil counsellor of her husband's blood-stained ambition, perished miserably; and Offa himself survived to possess his ill-gotten Crown of East Anglia only two years, and then sank into the grave the victim of remorse and disease. His son Ecgfrid, who succeeded him, died childless after he had possessed the throne of Mercia only one hundred and forty-one days; and thus, in a few years, the Race of Offa, whose elevation had been purchased at the expense of so much bloodshed and guilt, disappeared for ever.†

Correspondence of Offa and Charlemagne. The reign of Offa is memorable, among other circumstances, for the opening of an amicable intercourse between the Anglo-Saxon States and the Carolingian Empire. It was that learned Englishman, Alcuin, the Preceptor of Charlemagne, who seems to have originated an epistolary correspondence between his great pupil and the Mercian King. It commenced by the humane intercession of Charlemagne with Offa to obtain the pardon of some noble Anglian exiles; and was improved into the establishment of provisions for regulating the commerce of their dominions. In Letters, which are still extant, Charlemagne terms Offa his dearest brother, and greets him with presents: but those friendly relations were interrupted by the very means employed to cement them. Charlemagne, in pledge of his amity, having offered his natural son, Charles, as a husband for one of the daughters of Offa, the Mercian King assented, upon condition of obtaining a Princess of the Carolingian House for his legitimate heir, Ecgfrid. Though the Frankish Monarch had hitherto addressed Offa as a Prince of not inferior dignity to himself, his pride conceived such unreasonable offence at the assumption of equality implied in this counterproposal, that he suddenly suspended all intercourse between his Court and that of Mercia, and even forbade altogether the importation into his dominions of the woollen gowns, which already formed an article of English manufacture. But his own subjects, as well as those of Offa, suffered so much inconvenience from the suspension of this traffic, that he soon allowed Alcuin to exercise his mediation successfully for the re-establishment of a friendly intercourse between the two Governments.‡

The protection which the Court of Charlemagne meanwhile afforded to an illustrious Anglo-Saxon exile, led at a subsequent period to a closer intercourse between the predominant English State and the Frankish Empire. After the tragical fate of Cynewulf, the Nobles of Wessex, exerting their customary right of election, had raised Beorhtric, one of their Order of the race of Cerdic, to the vacant throne. The elevation of the new King had been opposed, or his jealousy at least was excited, by the rival pretensions of Egbert, another scion of the same Royal stock; and the youthful Prince was compelled to consult his safety by retiring, first to the Mercian, and afterwards to the Carolingian Court. By the great Monarch of the Franks Egbert was received with kindness; and the period of his exile at the most civilized and intellectual Court of the times was beneficial to the enlargement of his mind, and the cultivation of his natural talents. He is said to have attended Charlemagne in several of his military expeditions; and the superior acquirements which he subsequently displayed in the arts of war and government, may reasonably be referred to the experience which he had gained in the service of his accomplished and powerful protector.*

Egbert seems, during the life of his enemy, to have made no effort to reestablish himself in his native land; and for sixteen years Beorhtric reigned undisturbed over Wessex. To conciliate the friendship of the formidable Offa, and to induce him to withdraw his protection from Egbert, the King of Wessex had solicited and obtained the hand of one of the daughters of the Mercian; and the alliance by which he thus sought to secure his throne, became eventually the occasion of his destruction. His Queen, Eadburga, was a woman of arrogant temper and vicious passions. With a spirit as ambitious and unprincipled as that of her father Offa, she acquired a complete ascendancy over the more feeble mind of her husband, and subjected both himself and his Kingdom to her despotic sway. Her jealousy of his partiality for a young Nobleman of the Court at last induced her to mingle a deadly potion for the favourite; and Beorhtric, accidentally partaking of the poisoned chalice, shared the same fate with the intended victim. The murderess eluded the vengeance with which her husband's subjects would justly have visited her crimes, by a timely flight to the Continent, with considerable treasures which she had accumulated: but the Witena-gemot of Wessex, strangely extending to her whole sex the indignation provoked by her wickedness, enacted a law by which the future consorts of their Kings were excluded from participating in the Royal titles and prerogatives. Eadburga sought the usual refuge of the Carolingian Court, and laid splendid offerings from her treasure before the throne of its Monarch. In reply to a jesting inquiry from Charlemagne, whether she would wed him or his son, she declared her preference for the latter, because he was the younger. In real or affected displeasure, the King taunted her with the assurance that, if she had chosen differently, he would have transferred her to his son; but, as it was, she should have neither. He assigned to her a station under the discipline of the Cloister, which he perhaps deemed better fitted than a new marriage for the correction of her Morals and the expiation of her guilt; and he endowed her with possession of a

Britain.

From A. D. 449. to A. D. 800. Affairs of Wessex. Reign of Beorhtric. A. D. 784.

Exile of Egbert, at the Court of Charlemagne.

Death of Beorhtric.

Story of Eadburga.

* Chron. Sax. p. 65. Vita Offa, (apud Matthew Paris, Ed. Watts.) p. 23.

† Vita Offa, p. 24, 25. Auser, p. 10, 12.

‡ Epistola Caroli Magni, (apud Dom Bouquet,) vol. v. p. 620. See also Bouquet, Ibid. p. 315—620; and Alcuini, Ep. 61.

* Chron. Sax. p. 63. Malm. lib. ii. c. 1.

History wealthy Convent, with the title of Abbess. But even in this retreat, she continued to indulge her depravity, until the public scandal of her conduct compelled her ignominious expulsion. In her last years, after many adventures, she wandered into Italy, dragging on in squalid vice and poverty a miserable and loathsome existence; and accompanied only by a little girl, the daughter and widow of two Anglo-Saxon Kings she was reduced to beg her daily bread in rags through the streets of Pavia, where she terminated an abandoned life by a deplorable death.*

Accession of Egbert to the throne of Wessex, A. D. 800.

Introduces a new Epoch in the Anglo-Saxon Annals. By the decease of Beorhtric, Egbert had become the only surviving Prince of the line of Cerdic, from whom he derived his origin through Iuigils, the brother of Ina; and the hereditary attachment of the Nobles and People of Wessex to the Race of the victorious founder of their State, was evinced by their unanimous recognition of the claim of his last descendant.† Egbert was immediately recalled to his own Country; and his unopposed accession to the throne of Wessex introduces a new Epoch in the Anglo-Saxon Annals. The Island was approaching a condition peculiarly favourable to the lasting predominance of a single Power. It now presented in effect only a Triarchy. Three of the petty Kingdoms of the Octarchy, Kent, Essex, and East Anglia, had already permanently fallen under the virtual sovereignty of Mercia, whose Western boundaries had been extended to the foot of the Welsh mountains: but that State itself, which since the death of Offa and the extinction of his family, had been ruled by the vigorous sceptre of Kenwulf, a collateral descendant from the family of Penda, was destined after his death, by its intestine disorders, to become an easy prey to the better administered power of Wessex. That Kingdom, which had already absorbed Sussex and the greater portion of the territory of the Cornish Britons, was sufficiently prepared, under the active and able pupil of Charlemagne, to overmatch its ancient rival. Neither in the North was any countervailing Power left to check the West Saxon ascendancy. The remaining Kingdom, composed of the two more ancient Principalities of Deira and Bernicia, had, since the death of Eadbert, been continually convulsed by revolutions so numerous, so incessant, and so ferocious, that Charlemagne, to whom one of their Princes had fled, after some vain efforts to interpose his good offices in appeasing their discords, stigmatized the Northumbrians as a nation faithless and intractable, and worse than the very Pagans.* Favoured by the distracted state of Mercia and Northumbria, the genius of Egbert finally triumphed over every opposition; and although the title of the first Monarch of all England, which has sometimes been given to him, is neither justified by facts, nor was ever claimed by his own assumption,† his general supremacy over the contemporary Kings of the Island, revived a long suspended dignity in his person as the Eighth Bretwald of the Anglo-Saxons, and established that permanent and paramount Sovereignty in the Crown of Wessex, which under his descendants ensured the complete Union of the Octarchy into the KINGDOM OF ENGLAND.

Distractions of Mercia,

Britain.
From
A. D.
449. to
A. D.
800.
And Northumbria.

Supremacy of Wessex thereafter permanent.

Egbert, Eighth Bretwald of the Anglo-Saxons.

* Malms. p. 26.

† Mr. Turner, vol. i. p. 441, has distinctly disproved the assertion. Egbert styled himself no more than King of the West Saxons, as his predecessors had done; and as indeed his successors, until Athelstan, continued to do. Even the great Alfred, though sometimes called Primus Monarcha by the Saxon Chroniclers, retained the old style, and was not in strict truth King of all England, since Danish Princes divided the Sovereignty with him; and Athelstan was properly the earliest Monarch of the whole Anglo-Saxon nation.

‡ Chron. Sax. p. 72.

* Asser, p. 10—12.

† Chron. Sax. p. 68.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXI.

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SAXON CHURCH.

History. In order that this subject may be discussed with greater perspicuity, it is necessary to give a brief yet comprehensive view of the Religious state of Britain before the Saxon invasion. A sketch of the History of the Island after its conversion to Christianity from Druidical Paganism, will properly precede its second recovery from the superstitions of its Saxon conquerors.

Britain converted to Christianity in the Apostolic Age. It is an opinion commonly received, that Christianity was first planted in Britain in the reign of Tiberius Cæsar; but that event may be fixed with more probability after the victory of Claudius, when the Romans began to colonize the Island, and to establish magistrates and jurisdictions. To what particular Apostle Britain is more immediately indebted for its knowledge of Christianity, it is not easy to determine. Yet, although it may be difficult to ascertain who was really the first Apostle of the Britons, there is no difficulty in showing that the honour does not belong to some names for whom it has been claimed. It was not James the son of Zebedee, as some have conjectured, for he suffered martyrdom before the dispersion of the Apostles; it was not Simon Zelotes, as others have supposed, for he was killed in Persia; it was not Saint Peter, for he was the Apostle of the Circumcision; it was not, according to any authentic evidence, Joseph of Arimathea, for the monastic records adduced in support of that opinion bear strong marks of forgery.*

Probability that Christianity was planted in Britain by St. Paul. The testimonies which prove that a Christian Church was planted by some one of the Apostles, and probably by Saint Paul, are entitled to grave consideration. Among these we find Eusebius,† a man high in the estimation of Constantine, the first Christian Emperor born and proclaimed in Britain. He had, therefore, an opportunity of learning from the Emperor, the actual state and the origin of the British Churches. That Historian, having proved that the Apostles of Christ who preached the Gospel to the World could not be impostors, among other arguments suggests that it would have been madness in men so illiterate, who understood only their native tongue, to attempt to deceive mankind by preaching the Christian doctrine in the most remote Cities and Countries. In the number of those Countries he specifies those which are called the British Islands.‡ Theodoret§ also, in his eunu-ration of the different nations converted by the Apostles, names the Britons; and in another part of his History, speaking of the labours and success of Saint Paul, he says, that after his release from confinement at Rome, that Apostle went into Spain, and thence carried the light of the Gospel to other nations, and to the Islands which lie in the Ocean. These testimonies are confirmed by circumstances of great probability. Saint Paul had leisure and opportunity to visit Britain, and he had sufficient invitation and encouragement to extend his missionary travels thither. The proofs brought by some Ecclesiastical Writers, for particular reasons, to show that Saint Peter was the original Apostle of Britain, are slender in comparison with the evidence in favour of Saint Paul; but the controversy is of use in showing, from the concurrence of two opposite parties in the fact, that Christianity was planted in Britain soon after the death of its Divine Author.

The Gospel having been introduced into Britain, a Christian Church subsisted there, though not always in an equal degree of vigour, till the Persecution of Dioclesian.* It then acquired new strength and reputation from the pious fortitude of its martyrs. Though the names of only three of those Confessors have been recorded, yet all Historians agree that numbers suffered in Britain with the greatest constancy and courage.† The first Martyr is said to have been Saint Alban, who lived in the town of Verulam, which had a Roman colony, and who had been converted from Paganism by a Priest to whom he had afforded protection from the general Persecution.

Though Constantine, the Roman Governor of Britain, had an inclination to favour the Christians, yet it was not in his power to dispense with the edicts of the Emperors, and he complied so far with them as to demolish the Churches. This act however was compulsory, and it was forgiven on account of his subsequent conduct when he succeeded to the Imperial crown. Though he died a Pagan, yet he granted to the Christians a free exercise of their Religion, and protected

Of the Saxon Church.

British Churches under the Persecution of Dioclesian.
A. D. 303.
to
A. D. 305.

* Some are willing to believe, on the authority of Bede, that under the reign of Marcus Antoninus, Lucius, King of Britain, addressed himself to Eleutherus, the Roman Pontiff, for teachers to instruct him in the Christian Religion. But the traditions of the British Writers are so blended with fiction, that this fact does not merit insertion in the body of our narrative. Still there is undoubted proof that the Gospel was widely extended in Britain before the close of the 11d Century; Britannorum successu Romanorum, Christo erit subdita. Tertul. advers. Jud. c. 7.

† St. Alban, Aaron, and Julius.
‡ Gildas, sec. 8. Bede, lib. i. c. 6, 7.

* "We have not one testimony which reaches to the point concerning Joseph of Arimathea which is not originally taken from the Glastonbury Legends." Stillingfleet, Orig. Britan. c. 1.

† Euseb. Dem. Evang. lib. iii. c. 7.
‡ Evi vñs uatupñs Repreñatñs rñsñs.
§ Theod. tom. iv. Scrm. 9.

History.
Constantine
succeeds.
A. D.
306.

them from injury or insult. This Emperor, it is well known, died at York, and succeeded in securing the throne to his son Constantine. From the accession of Constantine must be dated the reestablishment of Christianity in the British Islands. The happy change is thus described by Gildas: "After a Persecution of ten years, its authors were taken off by remarkable judgments, the Christians were brought back to a state of ease, the victorious Cross was displayed, the churches were rebuilt, and the holy solemnities kept without any disturbance." At that period a church was erected at Verulam in honour of Saint Alban, and the town was called by his name.

Three British Bishops present at the Council of Arles.

A. D.
314.

But the first decisive evidence of the settled condition of the British Churches, is found in the number of Bishops which attended the Council of Arles. The Canons of that Council were subscribed by Eborius, Bishop of York, Resitutus, Bishop of London, and Adelphus, Bishop of the Third Province, into which Britain was then divided, and which was sometimes called Britannia secunda.^{*} We are not, however, to conclude that there were no more than three Bishops at that time in Britain, for it was the custom of every National Church to send a deputation of its Prelacy to a General Council. There is every reason to suppose that the Christians in Britain were always under an Episcopal administration, and that the British Church was governed in conformity with the rest of Christendom. When the Emperor Constantine first summoned a Council, a number of Bishops appeared from Britain proportional with other Provinces of the Empire. The Apostolical succession of the British Bishops was undisputed, and their subscriptions were received without any question of their authority; an argument sufficiently convincing that their character was as well authenticated as that of the other Prelates.

No direct evidence that any British Bishops were present at the Council of Nice.

A. D.
325.

When the Christian Church was disturbed by the Arian Heresy, and the Council of Nice was convened to compose its divisions, there is no direct evidence that any Bishops from Britain were present. But it must be remembered that the subscriptions to the Canons of the 1st Nicene Council are confused and imperfect even in the best copies; and there is a strong presumption, although not a direct proof, that the Bishops of Britain were summoned, and that some of them appeared. Eusebius relates, that it was the intention of Constantine to procure as large an assemblage as possible of Bishops from all parts of the Empire, and for that purpose his summons was universal. In the Epistle of the Emperor to the different Churches, it is distinctly expressed that there was a necessity for all Bishops to meet together, in order to settle and determine the true Christian Faith.

British Bishops at the Council of Ariminum.

A. D.
359.

There is only a strong presumption of the appearance of any British Bishops at the Council of Nice, but for their presence at the Council of Ariminum and Sardica,† there is equally positive evidence as for their attendance at the Council of Arles. They subscribed the definitions in favour of Arianism, but their subscriptions were extorted by the Emperor Constantius, and it is probable that after their return they followed the example of the Gallican Church by re-establishing the Nicene Faith. In the time of Julian, Athanasius mentions the Orthodoxy of the Britannic Churches.*

Arianism, it is probable, only slightly infected the British Churches;† they were more corrupted by the diffusion of the Pelagian doctrine. The errors of Pelagius have indeed been charged originally on the British People, and his fierce and contentious spirit has been attributed to National temperament.‡ Several Bishops of Britain were seduced by Agricola, a disciple of Pelagius, and Prosper, speaking of the efforts of Celestine to eradicate the Pelagian Heresy, says, that it had taken possession of the soil from which it originally sprang.§ Yet the opposition to Pelagianism in Britain was vigorous and persevering, and the British Bishops, distrusting their own sufficiency to encounter it, called in the aid of their Gallican neighbours.|| Lupus and Germanus, Bishops of great reputation, accepted the invitation, and in a conference with the Pelagians at Verulam,¶ they defended the Orthodox Faith in so convincing a manner, that they left Britain, as they supposed, confirmed in the principles of pure Christianity. But no sooner had they returned to Gaul than Pelagianism again raised its head, and Germanus undertook a second voyage to Britain, in company with Severus. Despairing of convincing the Pelagians by argument, Germanus procured their banishment by an edict of Valentinian, and from that time, according to the testimony of Bede, the British Churches continued sound and orthodox.

Besides the suppression of Pelagianism, the Gallican Bishops rendered other aid to the British Church, in the institution of schools, and in the introduction of a Liturgy. Germanus and Lupus were in this instance, as well as in the confutation of the Pelagian doctrine, the principal benefactors to our Island. They consecrated several Bishops, and they founded a Cathedral at Llandaff, over which Dubricius, a disciple of Germanus, was placed. The authority of Dubricius was archiepiscopal, but how far it extended is uncertain. The celebrated Monastery of Baunchor, a place distant about ten miles from Chester, was founded also about that time.†† It is observed of that Monastery, that the members of it united learning with devotion, and differed from many other monastic institutions in which labour was associated with ignorance.

Such was the Faith and Learning of the British Church; its Liturgy and Ritual were those of Gaul, derived, as it is said, from Saint John, through Irenaeus and Polycarp.‡‡ It is acknowledged by the Romanists that the Liturgies of Rome and Gaul were different; and Charlemagne affirms not only that there was a difference, but that the Gallican Churches were unwilling to change their ancient service, and to practise a conformity with the Church of Rome.§§

* Athan. ad Jov. p. 246.

† The charge of Arianism is preferred against the British Churches by Gildas and Bede. Gildas, Ep. 12. Bede, lib. i. c. 8. 10. 17.

‡ Bede, lib. i. c. 10.

§ The Pelagians are called the enemies of God's grace, Salem sua origine accipientes. Prosper, v. Coll.

¶ Bede, lib. i. c. 17.

|| Matt. West.

 Bishop of Trier, Bede, lib. i. c. 21.

†† Bede, lib. ii. c. 2.

‡‡ Spelman, Brit. Conc. tom. i. p. 167.

§§ Stillington, Orig. Brit. c. 4.

* Birmond, Council Gallie: tom. i. p. 9.

† Sulpit. Sever. lib. ii. Britain was then comprehended under Gaul.

Of the Saxon
Church.

Conference
at Verulam.
A. D.
446.

History.

Having described the establishment, we must now give an account of the declension of the British Church.

On the subjugation of the Island by the Saxons, whose progress we have already traced, Christianity appears to have maintained itself only in Wales and in Cornwall. In Wales we find the Schools of Dubricius and Illutus; and also Saint David, whose name is still preserved in the Saxon Church.* The tutelary Saint of Wales was educated under Paulinus, a disciple of Germanus; he then visited Jerusalem, where he received Episcopal consecration from the Patriarch; and soon after his return was held, at a place called Llandewey, the famous Synod of Brevy,† a general Convention of all the Bishops and Clergy of Britain on account of the Pelagian controversy. Saint David was present at that Synod, and by his authority and eloquence suppressed Pelagianism. There also he was chosen by general consent Archbishop of Caerleon, the See of which he removed to Menevia.

Church of Cornwall.

The Church of Cornwall is involved in yet greater obscurity than that of Wales.‡ Two British Bishops, we are told by Bede, assisted Wini, Bishop of Winchester, at the consecration of the Archbishop of York; but whether they were Bishops of the Cornish Britons, tributary to the West Saxons, or whether they were Bishops of South Wales, there is not sufficient evidence to determine. Thus much is certain, that the Christians in Cornwall were numerous, and that they preserved their ancient rites and usages till the latter end of the Fifth Century.

With the exception of Wales and Cornwall, however, the light of Christianity was extinguished in Britain, and the natives complied with the Paganism of their Saxon conquerors; and since those conquerors remained in their primitive ignorance for more than a century and a half, the Ecclesiastical History of England presents nothing but a few unconnected traditional events, till we come to the foundation of the Anglo-Saxon Church.

For a long time the conversion of the Saxon nation had attracted the compassionate attention of the Bishops of Rome; and Gregory the Great, who had cherished the wish with more than common zeal, at length found that circumstances were favourable to its completion. It was at the end of the VIth Century of the Christian Era, and about one hundred and fifty years after the first invasion of England by the Saxons, that Ethelbert, the King of Kent, received intelligence that a number of men, clad in a foreign garb, and practising several unusual ceremonies, desired to be admitted to his presence. This band consisted of Augustin, a Monk of the newly-founded Order of Benedictines, with forty of his associates, who had landed in the Isle of Thanet, the same place on which the Saxons had made their hostile descent.

At his first interview with these strangers, Ethelbert heard them in the open air, on a principle of Druidical superstition, in order to counteract the effects of their enchantments.* Augustin delivered the purport of his mission through a Gallic interpreter. Its favourable reception had been secured by Bertha, the Queen of Ethelbert, daughter of Charibert, King of the Franks, and herself a Christian. A place in the city of Canterbury, the Capital of the Kingdom of Kent, was allotted for the reception of Augustin and his companions. They entered in solemn procession, preceded by two persons bearing a cross of silver, and a painted figure of Christ, and singing Litanies as they proceeded, to avert the Divine wrath from the unbelievers. As Ethelbert soon avowed his own conversion, the principal part of his subjects, and especially his Nobles, followed his example, induced, as it is said, by many signal miracles performed by Augustin and his companions, but, undoubtedly, influenced by the extraordinary zeal of the missionaries, and the sanctity of their lives. The new Religion, adopted by a Prince so respected as Ethelbert, soon spread itself through all that part of England which lies South-West of the Humber.

It is probable that the Druidical Order did not at that time subsist among the Anglo-Saxons, or else that it had greatly declined in authority and reputation, since Christianity experienced little or no opposition from the Pagan Priesthood. On the contrary, some of that Body were among the foremost in embracing the new doctrine. But even if Druidism did not then flourish in its former vigour, still the Religion of the Anglo-Saxons was derived from a Druidical source, and the capital objects of their worship were trees, stones, the elements, and the heavenly bodies.

In the change of the National Religion, care was taken to render the transition from Paganism to Christianity as little violent as was possible in any change from Error to Truth. It was a maxim with Gregory, under whose auspices the mission was undertaken and conducted, that the Pagan Temples should not be destroyed, especially when they were well built, but that the Idols having been previously removed from them, they should be consecrated by more holy rites to better purposes. He was unwilling wantonly to offend the prejudices of the People by a profanation of those objects which had long been regarded with veneration, and he carried his compliance so far as to connive at their ancient sacrifices. He ordered that oxen should, as usual, be slaughtered near the churches,† and that the indulgence of ancient festivities should accompany the celebration of new ceremonies. Whatever popular customs were found not absolutely inconsistent with Christianity were retained.‡ Even the names of some of the Christian Festivals were taken from those of the Heathens, which had been observed at

Of the Saxon Church.

Ethelbert, King of Kent, converted to Christianity.

General account of the progress of Christianity in England.

Change from Paganism to Christianity gradual.

Augustin holds in Kent. A. D. 596.

* It is the just complaint of Bollandus, Act. Sancti, that nothing is interesting about Saint David, which was written near his own time; and what is exact is so mingled with fable, that it is impossible to find out the truth. Giraldus and John of Tinnmouth have written his life. An edition of Giraldus has been published by that generous patron of learning Sir R. C. Hoare.

† Giraldus says it was a convention both of clergy and laity.

‡ "We know scarcely any thing of the early transactions of the Welsh or the Cornish, before the Saxons invaded them, and so twisted their own History with that of the native Britons. Thus two large communities which had been composed each of united Tribes of Britain, and enlightened by all the rays of the literature of Rome, even more enlightened still by the myra of the Gospel, sunk back into the darkness of their original History; and they owe the main knowledge of their own Annals immediately after the Roman departure, to those rude Barbarians who had come from the shores of the Baltic, and whom they had half raised into knowledge, while those had wholly depressed them into ignorance. So much heavier is the scale of ignorance in man than that of knowledge."—Whitaker, History of the Cathedral of Cornwall, p. 2.

* Fetris unus augurio, says Henry of Huntingdon, p. 321.

† Bede, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 30.

‡ Deer were at a certain season brought into St. Paul's Church in London, and laid on the altar, and this custom subsisted until the Reformation. Dugdale, History of St. Paul's.

History. the same time of the year. The names of the days of the week also were retained, though derived from Pagan Deities.

Prudence of the first missionaries. The prudence of the missionaries in the gradual propagation of Religious Truth, and their activity in disseminating their doctrines, were joined with a superiority in the Arts of Civil life. When Christianity was first preached in Sussex, that Country was reduced to the utmost distress, by a drought which had continued during three years. The barbarous inhabitants, destitute of any means to alleviate the calamity of famine, frequently united in bodies, and precipitating themselves from the cliffs were either drowned or dashed in pieces by the rocks. Though a maritime people, they were ignorant of fishing, and this ignorance probably arose from a remnant of Druidical superstition, which forbade the use of food so procured. In this extremity, Wilfrid, their first Christian preacher, collecting nets, plunged into the sea, at the head of his attendants, and having first provided sustenance for their famishing bodies, he soon disposed their minds to receive his spiritual instructions.

Wilfrid. Not only was the introduction of Christianity attended by the progress of Civilization, but with another blessing, that of Liberty. The Christian Kings sometimes made donations to the Church of lands which they had obtained by conquest from their Heathen enemies, and the Clergy, so soon as they had baptized their new vassals, accompanied the sacred rite with manumission. Such conduct naturally endeared the persons as well as the doctrines of their teachers, to a People who saw Religion and Freedom advancing with equal steps. These monks, indeed, deserve the praise of enlarged and generous views for the improvement of mankind. In a Canon wherein the Clergy were prohibited from alienating their lands, among other charitable exceptions to the rule, it was specified that they might do so for the release of slaves by purchase. This duty which they were most careful to practise, they were not less earnest in enforcing on their flocks. Whenever they imposed penance, they permitted no other commutation than acts of charity and beneficence. They urged their penitents to the enfranchisement and redemption of slaves, and to the repair of public works; and they practically taught that no offences could be expiated, unless by some act which contributed to the happiness and welfare of Society.

Christianity attended by civilization. The marriage of Ethelbert to a Christian Princess, was, as we have seen, the mean of introducing Christianity into his dominions; and similar influence contributed to extend it through the other Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, the respective Sovereigns of them being generally converted by their Queens. Ecclesiastical establishments were gradually formed, as they were demanded by the Religious wants of the People, or as these wants were anticipated by the piety of the Saxon Princes. Augustin erected the Cathedral of Christ Church in the City of Canterbury, and founded there a Benedictine Abbey called after his own name; and having received Episcopal ordination from the Bishop of Arles, he was invested by Pope Gregory with a jurisdiction over all the Saxon Prelates.*

Progress of Christianity in the other Saxon Kingdoms. As the Anglo-Saxon Church was established through the Popes, they were naturally solicitous to preserve its dependence on the See of Rome, and for the period of a century from its foundation, the English Primacy was filled by foreigners nominated by the Roman Pontiffs. By these foreign Prelates considerable accessions were made to the originally scanty stock of Saxon Literature, the largest as well as the most valuable of which additions arose from Theodore, the seventh Archbishop of Canterbury, of whom we shall have occasion to speak more fully hereafter. He was a Greek by birth, a man of lofty spirit, of enlarged views, and of cultivated talents. Unexpectedly raised to his high station, he laboured with singular activity to render his attainments useful to the comparatively barbarous people committed to his pastoral charge. He first introduced the study of his native Language into the Island; he brought with him a number of books in different faculties, and among them a magnificent copy of the Works of Homer. Under his patronage a school was founded at Canterbury, and thus both the great fountains of knowledge, the Greek and Latin Tongues, were opened in England.

The labours of Theodore were not confined to the British Isles, they are recorded in the Annals of the general Christian Church. Among his other works, he reduced to a regular Science, that branch of the Ecclesiastical Law which is commonly known by the name of Penitential Discipline; and published his celebrated Penitential,* by which the Clergy were taught to distinguish sins into various classes, both as to their degrees of guilt, and their publicity. He discriminated the degrees of guilt, according to the nature of the offence, its consequences, the intention of the offender, the time and place of commission, and the circumstances under which it was committed. The Penitential likewise contained the different modes of proceeding against offenders; it pointed out the penalties suitable to the various classes of transgressors; it prescribed the different forms of consolation, of exhortation, and of absolution; and it detailed in an ample and accurate manner, the duty of those who were appointed to receive the confessions of penitents. The discipline of Theodore, though he was of Grecian extraction, was eagerly adopted by the Latin Churches, and in a short time it passed from Britain into all the Western Provinces. It was universally practised until Penitentiary Discipline assumed a new form, under the title of the Canon of Indulgences.

As yet the Anglo-Saxon Church has been considered only in regard to its triumph over Paganism, and its beneficial influence on the Morals and Laws of a barbarous nation; it remains to consider the contests between the Anglo-Saxon and the ancient British Church which still existed in the Northern and Western parts of the Island. In these struggles the governors of the Anglo-Saxon Church have incurred severe reproach. The Roman mission of Augustin has been set forth with so much pomp, and its charitable motives as well as its salutary effects have been so highly extolled, that the conversion of the Saxons has been ascribed solely to the Christian zeal of the Popes. This is not surprising; but it is not with equal justice that the Saxon Historians have reproached their neighbours the British Christians with having suffered the invaders to live in Pagan darkness, without endeavouring to enlighten their ignorance. It was impossible that any Christians under Saxon oppression could have been fit instruments for the conversion of their persecutors, and it was

Of the Saxon Church

Theodore, seventh Archbishop of Canterbury.

His Penitential.

Contests between the Anglo-Saxon and the British Churches.

* The Penitential of Theodore is yet extant, though mutilated and imperfect. An edition was published at Paris in the year 1679, by Petit.

* Bede, Hist. lib. i. c. 23.

History unlikely that the conquerors, engaged in foreign and domestic wars, should have been favourably disposed towards the Religion of their vassals. The reproach is therefore unjust and groundless.

Augustin Metropolitan of Eng-land. It has been already related, that so soon as Augustin had communicated to Gregory an account of the success of his mission, he received from the Pontiff the pall, the emblem of Metropolitaneal dignity. Had the English missionary been contented with the title and office of a Bishop, there would have been no room for censure; but that he should aspire to the dignity of a Metropolitan when he had no Suffragan under his jurisdiction, has laid him open to the charge of vanity and ambition. He was, it is true, solicitous to correct the anomaly, as soon as possible, after his return from Arles, and he founded an Episcopal See at Rochester, of which Justus, one of his companions, was constituted the first Bishop.

Justus, Bishop of Rochester. Augustin being invested by Gregory with the Primacy of Britain, and with a jurisdiction over its Bishops, together with a commission to teach the unlearned, to confirm the weak, and to punish the obstinate, applied himself with the greatest anxiety to reduce the British Bishops to conformity with the Church of Rome. Instead of propagating the Christian Faith among unbelievers, his chief exertions were directed to the extension and enlargement of his own authority, and that of his patron Gregory.

State of the British Churches. The Gospel having been preached in Britain either by the Apostles of Christ or by their immediate followers, the British Churches had as yet always observed the customs and ceremonies prescribed by their first teachers. Their forms were remarkable for simplicity, whereas Augustin introduced a number of pompous ceremonies borrowed from the Romish ritual. The Britons maintaining but little intercourse with the rest of the World, had scarcely any communication with the Bishops of Rome, and considered them as no more than Diocesan Bishops, or at the highest as Patriarchs, on whom their own Church had no dependence. But Augustin, out of the abundance of his gratitude to that See from which he derived his own authority, sought to gain from the British Prelates an acknowledgment of the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff over the whole Christian Church.

Conference between Augustin and the British Bishops. For that purpose he secured the cooperation of Ethelbert, and succeeded also in obtaining a conference with the British Bishops on the borders of the County of Worcester.* The Synod being assembled, Augustin proposed first, that the Britons should embrace the unity of the Catholic Church, and then cooperate with him and his Clergy in converting the Pagan natives. This proposition, however reasonable at first sight, was not received with approbation; Augustin was unable to prevail on the British Bishops to admit the slightest change in their ancient customs. The Historians of this period relate, that, finding his arguments ineffectual, he caused a blind man to be introduced into the assembly, whose restoration to sight, after useless similar attempts by the Britons, he effected by his prayers. But even against this miracle the Britons were impenetrable, and all the concession which Augustin could obtain was, that they would take into consideration the propositions which he had submitted, and would come to a determination in a future Synod.

Of the Saxon Church. The Britons having returned from the conference, and considering that their obstinacy might draw on them the resentment of Ethelbert, applied themselves to a consideration of the propositions. Not being able to come to any conclusion among themselves, they solicited the advice of an Anchorite of great reputation for sanctity and wisdom: and besought him to give an opinion on this difficult question; whether they ought to quit the customs and usages of their ancestors, and adopt those of Augustin? His answer was, that he saw no reason why they should adopt any alterations in their Religion, simply on the bare request of a stranger; but since the essence of Religion consisted in love and unity not in forms, if the stranger were a holy man and sent from God, they should follow him. This answer occasioned a second question, by what marks they could discern whether he were a holy man or not? The answer of the Anchorite was worthy of his reputation: he told them to judge the character and pretensions by the conduct of the man who supported them; if he were meek and humble, then they might conclude that he was the disciple of Him who had taught men to bear his yoke; but if the stranger were haughty and arrogant, then it was certain that he could not be sent from God, whatever might be his pretensions. The Britons still unsatisfied, demanded what were those marks of gentleness and condescension by which they might discern of what spirit the stranger was? "His spirit," the Sage replied, "you will discern in this; let him and his companions first come to the Synod, and if on your approach he shall rise up in condescension and love, and greet you, then look upon him as a servant of Christ, and submit to whatever he shall ordain; but if he shall contemptuously refuse to rise up to you who are the greater number, then let him see that you despise his insolence, and disclaim his authority."*

Second conference. After some time had been consumed in these deliberations, the British Bishops, seven in number, with Dinoh, Abbot of Banchor, and some other learned men, consented to meet Augustin at a second conference. The Archbishop and his companions were seated in the place of meeting before the Britons entered, and as Augustin did not rise from his seat to receive them, they acted in conformity with the advice of the Hermit, and opposed all his overtures of union with great spirit and perseverance. After a violent contest, the Archbishop addressed them in these words: "In many things you act contrary to our customs as well as to the usages of the Catholic Church; notwithstanding, if you will submit to my authority in these three matters, namely, in observing the Easter Festival after our manner, in using the same rites and ceremonies with the Church of Rome, and in joining with us to convert the Saxon Pagans; in all other things which you do contrary to our customs, we will bear with you." To this demand, the British Bishops answered, that they would not comply with any one of the three particulars, neither would they acknowledge him for their Archbishop. Augustin, fired with indignation at this refusal, answered them with threats, and plainly intimated, that if they would not accept peace from their brethren, they must expect war from their enemies; and if they would not preach the word of life to the Saxons, they should themselves suffer death.

Such is the account delivered by Bede of this Synod,

* The place has been since called Augustin's Oak.
VOL. XI.

* Bede, Hist. Ecc. lib. ii. c. 2.

History.
Speech of Dunsth, Abbot of Banchor.

but the British writers, as may be learned from Leland, give a different view of the transaction. He relates, that Dinoth, Abbot of Banchor, disputed with great ability, and spoke at great length, against submission to the authority of the Bishop of Rome, or the Bishop of Canterbury, and that he defended the authority of the Archbishop of Caerleon, or Saint David's. "You propose to us," he said, "obedience to the Church of Rome; are you ignorant that we already owe a deference of love and charity to the Church of God, to the Bishop of Rome, and to all Christians? Other obedience than this to the Pope we know not, and this we are always ready to pay. But for a superior, what need have we to go so far as Rome, when we are governed under God by the Archbishop of Caerleon, who hath authority to superintend our Churches and our Ecclesiastical affairs." The Abbot of Banchor went so far as to censure the Pope, for permitting the usurpation of Augustin, telling him and his companions that it was their duty if they were good Christians, to restore their unjust and tyrannical power into those hands from which they had received it.

Thus the project entertained by Augustin, of establishing his power as Metropolitan over the whole British Island, was defeated. But the Saxon Historian has added, that Ethelfrith, King of Northumbria, sent a large army into Wales, and not only gained a signal triumph over the British near Caerleon, but slaughtered the Ecclesiastics, and particularly the Monks of Banchor. If this event happened during the life of Augustin, and at his instigation, he must, in addition to his acknowledged haughtiness and ambition, be charged with cruelty and revenge.

Having related the state of the Anglo-Saxon Church at the death of Augustin, we proceed next to describe its advancement, under Lawrence, who succeeded him in the See of Canterbury, and whom he had consecrated for that end, a short time before his death. In the scheme of Ecclesiastical government which Gregory had transmitted, he directed that the Primacy should be removed from Canterbury to London, at the death of Augustin; and Mellitus, one of the companions of Augustin, had been consecrated Bishop of that See. But the scheme of Gregory was found to be impracticable, and his authority was disavowed. The City of London was not yet converted to Christianity, and therefore could not be the See of the Metropolitan of the Anglo-Saxon Church. Ethelbert, likewise, while he lived, would not permit the removal of the Primacy from his own Kingdom, nor the subjecting of his Bishops to the jurisdiction of a Bishop of London.

Lawrence, therefore, was both the second Archbishop of Canterbury, and the second Primate of the Anglo-Saxon Church; and he not only imitated the vigour of his predecessor, but supported his authority by the assiduity of his preaching, and the strictness of his life. He resumed the project of reducing the Britons under the Papal authority, but without success; and he then wisely transferred his exertions towards an object, by success in which they were fully rewarded. By the interest of Mellitus, the conversion of the East Saxons inhabiting the Counties of Middlesex and Essex was happily accomplished. He appeared at the Court of Sebert in his Episcopal character, and that Prince, together with a multitude of his subjects, embraced the Christian Religion and were baptized. The Abbey Church of Westminster was built on the site of a Heathen Temple dedicated to Apollo, and was consecrated by Mellitus to the honor of God, and dedicated to Saint Peter. Another stately edifice, intended for the Cathedral, was erected on the ruins of a Temple of Diana, and was consecrated to Saint Paul.*

Neither Ethelbert nor Bertha long survived Augustin, and on the death of the former, Paganism revived in the Kingdom of Kent, and threatened the destruction of the British Church. Eadbald, the son and successor of Ethelbert, either had never been converted to Christianity, or, as soon as he possessed the crown, had renounced it. His morals were licentious, and the cause of his apostasy, or his aversion from Christianity, is said to have been an incestuous connection which he had formed with his father's wife. The Archbishop had remonstrated with him in a manner becoming a Christian teacher, but his reprimands were received with disgust. The King was a latitudinarian in principle as well as a libertine in practice, and he encouraged his subjects to restore the Pagan idolatry. Notwithstanding the zeal and assiduity of the Archbishop of Canterbury, of the Bishop of Rochester, and of the Clergy in general, the defection of the People from Christianity was great. The calamities of the Christians were increased by the death of Sebert, King of the East Saxons, for notwithstanding his own recent conversion, his three sons, who jointly succeeded him, had not sincerely renounced Idolatry. They kept their profession, indeed, secret during the life of their father, but he was no sooner dead than they openly avowed Paganism, and gave their subjects also liberty to profess it. A Persecution of Christianity commenced, and Mellitus was commanded to leave the Kingdom of the East Saxons.

The condition of the Church of Kent, although depressed, was not, like that of the East Saxons, destroyed, and thither Mellitus fled for protection. After a consultation with the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Rochester, it was concluded that an open resistance against the general apostasy would be fruitless, and that their personal safety demanded their immediate return to Rome. Mellitus and Justus, Bishop of Rochester, immediately departed, and thus deserted the cause in which they had engaged. Lawrence also resolved to follow them, and on the evening before his intended desertion of his pastoral charge, he caused his bed to be brought into the Cathedral, purposing to take his rest there on the last night of his stay. But according to the legend which Bede has transmitted to us, Saint Peter appeared to him in a form more appalling than that of an unsubstantial vision, for, after reproaching the cowardice of the Primate, the Apostle inflicted on him a severe flagellation. On the next day, Lawrence appeared before the King, bearing the marks of the discipline which he had undergone in the preceding night, and having given an account of the manner in which he had received his castigation, the King was so affected, that he changed both his faith and morals, and became a Christian and a new man.†

Eadbald being converted by this miracle or stratagem, sent to France to recall Mellitus and Justus to their dignity and duty. Those fugitives returned about a year after their flight, and the Bishop of Rochester was reinstated in his See by the King of Kent. The inhabitants of London having refused to admit Mellitus,

Death of Augustin.
A. D.
611.
Lawrence
second Archbishop of Canterbury.

His diligence in preaching and exemplary life.

Mellitus,
Bishop of London.

Of the Saxon Church.

Death of Ethelbert.
A. D.
616.
Eadbald.

Persecution of Christianity
in the Kingdom of the East
Saxons.

Mellitus seeks refuge in Kent.

Mellitus and Justus retire into France.

Contriance of Lawrence.

Conversion of Eadbald.

Mellitus third Archbishop of Canterbury.
A. D.
619.

* Bede, Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. 3.

† Ibid. lib. ii. c. 5, 6

History.
Japhet
Archbishop of Canterbury.
A. D.

Conversion of the Kingdom of Northumbria.
624.

Marriage of Edwin and Ethelburga.
A. D.
628.

Paulinus.

Edwin disposed to receive Christianity.

Edwin deliberates on his subject.

Eadbald afforded him an honourable retreat in Kent, till the death of Lawrence, when he succeeded to the Primacy. Mellitus continued in that station about five years, without much exertion for the advancement of Christianity, and at his death, Justus, the only surviving Bishop consecrated by Augustin, was raised to the Archbishopric.

With the exception of the abortive attempt to plant the Anglo-Saxon Church in the Kingdom of the East-Saxons, its limits had as yet been bounded by the Kingdom of Kent; it next extended itself into the Kingdom of Northumbria. Northumbria at that time was governed by Edwin, the most powerful Prince in the Saxon Heptarchy, whose proposed alliance was eagerly accepted by Eadbald. Their connection was to be cemented by a marriage between Edwin and Ethelburga, the sister of Eadbald; but as Edwin was still a Pagan, Eadbald insisted that it was not lawful for his sister, who had been educated in the Christian Faith, to contract a marriage with an Idolater. Edwin readily stipulated not to oppose the Religion which the Princess had embraced, and to grant liberty of worship both to herself and her retinue; and more than this, he added, that if on examination he found the Christian Faith more worthy of belief than that in which he had been educated, he was inclined to conversion.

On such a satisfactory basis, the treaty of marriage between Edwin and Ethelburga was completed, and when the Princess left her brother's Court for that of Edwin, she took with her Paulinus, one of the missionaries who had been sent by Pope Gregory, and who had been consecrated to the Episcopal order by Justus.* At his first arrival in Northumbria, Paulinus seems to have made little progress in converting either the King or his subjects; but after Ethelburga had been delivered of a daughter, and Edwin had been dangerously wounded by an assassin, these two events altered his prospects. The King was inclined to believe, that the prayers of Paulinus had contributed towards the happy parturition of Ethelburga; and his own imminent peril also had disposed his mind to serious reflection. As a proof of the change in his sentiments, he consented that his infant daughter, together with eleven other persons of his Court and family, should be baptized by Paulinus;† and since the assassin who had attempted his life was employed by the King of Wessex, he promised to renounce Idolatry, if the God of the Christians would avenge him of his enemy.

As soon as Edwin had recovered from his wound, he marched at the head of a large army into the dominions of the King of Wessex, yet although he returned crowned with victory, yet he deferred the entire performance of his vow.‡ He at once, indeed, disengaged himself from Idolatry, but when the Queen and Paulinus urged him to proceed further, he answered that the adoption of a Religion different from that in which he had been educated was a matter which required a solemn and mature deliberation. For some time, he continued in a state of suspense, or rather of neutrality, until Pope Boniface attempted to remove his doubts. The Pontiff wrote to Edwin, pointing out the folly of the Pagan worship;§ and to Ethelburga also, exhorting her to renew her arguments and persuasions with the King, and never to remit her prayers to Heaven for a blessing on her endeavours. But for a long time the Epistles of Boniface, the entreaties of Ethelburga, and the instructions of Paulinus, were equally ineffectual. Edwin was not to be won unless by conviction, and he examined the evidences of the new Religion with candour and impartiality.

At length he avowed his assent to the truth of Christianity, influenced by the dexterous application which Paulinus made of an event which we have already related in the earlier part of the King's life,* or as the Monkish Historian would persuade us, by the intervention of a positive miracle. Paulinus having heard the circumstances of the vision seen by Edwin when a wanderer and a guest at the Court of Redwald, one day entered the King's apartment as he was pursuing his meditations on the opposing Religions, and advancing with a solemn air, imitated the action of the imaginary figure, and placed his hand on the head of the Northumbrian Prince. "Do you understand," inquired Paulinus, "the meaning of this token?" Surprised at the question, yet recollecting the divine oracle, Edwin is said to have prostrated himself at the feet of Paulinus; who, preventing this act of humiliation, reminded the King in a tone of authority, that it was his duty to obey the injunction of God, by submitting himself to the Religion which that God had revealed. Edwin immediately resigned himself to the direction of his spiritual guide, and yielded an implicit assent to the Christian Faith.†

How much of this supernatural appearance ought to be attributed to the credulity of the Age, it is unnecessary in this place to inquire. The fact which now demands relation is the manner in which Edwin procured the conversion of his subjects. He had held frequent conferences with Coifi, his Pagan High Priest, on the arguments which Paulinus urged in favour of Christianity, and Coifi perceiving from these conversations the bias of his Sovereign, resolved not to oppose his wishes. When Edwin, therefore, summoned a Council to inquire the sentiments of his Nobles concerning the new Religion, and to propose that if they participated in his own feelings they might all be baptized together, Coifi, in the order of precedence, rose first, and thus addressed his Prince and the assembly: "You see, O King, what is now preached to us. I declare to you most truly, what I have most certainly experienced, that the Religion which we have hitherto professed, contains no virtue at all, and as little utility. No one of all your Court has been more attentive than I have been to the worship of our Gods; and yet many have received far richer benefits, far greater honours, and have prospered more in all that men transact or pursue than I have. If then, on due inquiry, you shall perceive that those new things which are preached to us will be better and more efficacious, let us hasten to adopt them without any delay."

The King, pleased with this address, applied to the Priest next in dignity, who enforced the opinion of Coifi, in the following manner: "The present life of Man, O King, seems to me, if compared with that after period which is so uncertain to us, to resemble a scene at one of your wintry Feasts. As you are sitting with your Ealdormen and Thegns about you, the fire blazing

Of the Saxon Church.

His dream.

Yields his assent to Christianity.

Discussion on the subject in his Witenagemot.

* Bede, Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. 9.

† Ibid.

‡ Saxon Chron. 28.

§ Bede, Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. 10.

* Ch. ix. p. 385.

† Bede, lib. ii. c. 12.

3 F 2

History. in the centre, and the whole hall cheered with its warmth, and while storms of rain and snow were raging without; a little sparrow flies in at one door, roams around our festive meeting, and passes out at some other entrance. While it is among us, it feels not the wintry tempest; it enjoys the short comfort and serenity of its transient stay; but then plunging into the winter from which it had flown, it disappears from our eyes. Such is here the life of Man. It acts and thinks before us, but, as of what preceded its appearance among us we are ignorant, so we are of all that is destined to come afterwards. If then, on this momentous future, this new doctrine reveals anything more certain or reasonable, it is in my opinion entitled to our acquiescence."⁸

The other Royal counsellors exhibited similar dispositions. Paulinus was immediately summoned, and having stated the arguments in favour of Christianity, Coifi declared aloud that there was no further room for doubt. "Formerly," he said, "I understood nothing that I worshipped. The more I contemplated our Idolatry, the less Truth I found in it. But this new system I adopt without hesitation, for Truth shines around it, and presents to us the gifts of eternal life and blessedness. Let us then, O King, immediately anathematize and burn the Temples and altars which we have so uselessly venerated." To show the sincerity of his conversion, or the warmth of his zeal, the High Priest, on being asked who would be the first to profane the Idols and their Altars, answered, "I will; as I have led the way in adoring them through my folly, I will give the example of destroying them in obedience to that wisdom which I have learned from the true God." Placing himself at the head of the other Priests, Coifi, armed with a sword and lance, and mounted on one of the King's chargers, proceeded to the Heathen Temple, hurled his lance at the Idol, and assisted in burning his sanctuary to the ground.†

Edwin having declared his conversion, was baptized at York, with two sons by a former wife, and Hilda his niece; and all the Nobility and courtiers followed his example. His love for Christianity incited him to propagate it beyond his own dominions, and his efforts were first directed to Eorpwald, King of the East Angles, the son of Redwald. Sigebryht, the brother and successor of Eorpwald, not only contributed to the dissemination of Christianity in East Anglia, but applied himself so closely to the study of it, as to be called by the Chronicler "Most Learned."

Edwin having enjoyed a long reign of prosperity, was destined to experience a reverse of fortune. Five years had not elapsed after his conversion, before he was slain in battle, and Paganism once more overspread his dominions. Of the Northumbrian Christians some fell with their Prince on the field, and others were put to death. Ethelburga and her children, accompanied by Paulinus, were compelled to fly for safety into the Kingdom of Kent.

The affairs of the Northumbrian Church remained in a calamitous state, until Oswald ascended the throne;

he first restored external peace, and then endeavoured to reestablish Christianity. But instead of recalling Paulinus, who was now Bishop of Rochester, he sent for a Scottish Bishop called Aidan to convert and instruct his subjects. Aidan having received Episcopal consecration engaged with alacrity in the undertaking. His success was indeed great, yet not greater than his assiduity merited; he not only instructed the Pagans in the principles of Christianity, but he was an eminent example of holiness and charity. At his desire, the King of Northumbria, without any regard to the appointment of Gregory or the succeeding Popes, removed the Archiepiscopal See from York to a small Isle at the mouth of the river Lindis, known by the name of Holy Island. Here Aidan discharged all the important duties of a Bishop, diligently preaching the word of God, and exhibiting a model of primitive simplicity totally unlike the pomp of the Romish missionaries. The See of York was for many years neglected; its Bishops were reduced to the state of Diocesan Bishops, and went into Scotland to receive consecration.

Having thus related the foundation of the Northumbrian Church, we now turn to that of Wessex, which was planted about this time, by the care of Birinus. He came into England already invested with the Episcopal character, and with the sanction of the Bishop of Rome. It was his original design to preach the Gospel in the interior of the Country where no Religious instructor had preceded him; but happening to land in the territories of the King of Wessex, and finding that they were overspread with Paganism, he thought it unnecessary to go further. Here then he entered on his office, and performed it with effect. The King of Wessex was tributary to the King of Northumberland, and the two Princes therefore joined in a grant to Birinus of the city of Dorchester near Oxford, where an Episcopal See was founded, and where Birinus continued to edify his converts both by instruction and example until his death.

Leaving the Church of Wessex, the order of time demands that we should revert to the Church already founded in the Kingdom of the East Angles. It has been mentioned, that Eorpwald had embraced the Christian Faith, but that he had been murdered by his subjects, and his people had relapsed into Idolatry. Sigebryht, his brother, had also been compelled by a faction to retire into France. A Prince of his endowments could not without profit inhabit a Country in which civilization had far advanced. He devoted himself to study, and his recreation was found in the correspondence and conversation of literary men. Convinced of the vanity and falsehood of Paganism, he embraced Christianity as a revelation worthy of God. One of his chief companions and instructors was Felix, a Burgundian Bishop, from whom he received the sacred rite of Baptism. No sooner was Sigebryht enabled to return to his own Country and Kingdom than he endeavoured to introduce among his subjects the learning which he had imbibed in France, and above all other things, to establish the Christian Faith. Whether he sent for Felix, or whether Felix came voluntarily into England, it is not material to determine. As soon as that Bishop arrived, he applied to Honorius, then Archbishop of Canterbury, either for advice in the exercise of his sacred function, or for authority to assume Episcopal jurisdiction. Honorius approved and promoted the design of Felix,

Of the Saxon Church.
Aidan a Scottish bishop sent for by Oswald.

Appointed Bishop of Holy Island.

Church of Wessex.
Brenus.

Bishop of Dorchester near Oxford.

Church of the East Angles.
Sigebryht,
King of the East Angles.

His conversion.

Felix.

Edwin slain in battle.

A. D.
633.

Oswald
King of Northumbria.

A. D.
634.

* Bede, lib. ii. c. 13.

† The scene of this event was a little to the East of York beyond the river Derwent, at a place, in the time of Bede, called Godmund-dunham, and still called Godmundham, or the home of the mound, or protection of the people. Bede, lib. ii. c. 13.
‡ Flor. Wig. 233, 234.

Of the Saxon
Church.

History. who was received at the court of Sigebyrht with the highest marks of respect, and the city of Dummock, now called Dunwich, in the County of Suffolk, was assigned for his Episcopal residence. The King and the Bishop cooperated in the erection of schools, and some Historians ascribe the foundation of the University of Cambridge to the munificence of Sigebyrht.

Church of the East Saxons. From the Church of the East Angles we must recur to that of the East Saxons. Mellitus, as we have seen, had been expelled from London, and when he became Archbishop of Canterbury, he used his utmost endeavours to recover his ancient flock from their apostasy. But his efforts were vain, and it was reserved for the English and Scottish Clergy to accomplish what had been left unfinished by the missionaries of Rome. Between Oswy, King of the Northumbrians, and Sigebyrht, the third King of the East-Saxons, the existence of a firm friendship occasioned frequent interviews. During those meetings Oswy frequently turned the conversation to the errors of Paganism, and urged his friend to inquire into the grounds of the Religion in which he had been educated.* The inquiry was followed by the conversion of Sigebyrht to Christianity, and the new convert was baptized by Finan, Bishop of the Northumbrians. Chad, a Northumbrian Priest, and an Englishman by birth, had long been employed as a missionary in the midland Counties, and he was induced to transfer his spiritual labours to the Kingdom of the East Saxons. He received consecration from Finan, assisted by two other Bishops, and was placed in the Episcopal See of London, from which Mellitus had been expelled forty years before.

Church of Mercia. The next Kingdom which was converted to Christianity was the powerful State of Mercia. Penda, its King, was remarkable for his cruelty and pride; and during a long reign had been actively opposed to a Religion so alien from his own temper as Christianity. But that tyrant was at last brought to tolerate though not to profess the Gospel.† He had a son endued with qualities the reverse of his own; and the young Prince being enamoured of a daughter of the King of Northumbria named Atheledda, embraced the Religion of his future Queen. He returned to the dominions of his father accompanied by Atheledda and four Priests; and the whole Kingdom of Mercia was in consequence brought under the Christian Faith.

Church of the South Saxons. Last of all, we turn to the South Saxons inhabiting the Counties of Surrey and Sussex, the latest in their conversion to Christianity. The long continuance of that Kingdom in Idolatry, must be attributed to its subjection to the King of Wessex, and its ultimate conversion to the persecution of Wilfrid Bishop of York, who fled thither for safety. Edilwarch its King, although educated in Paganism, had married Edda, a Christian Princess, and no sooner did Wilfrid appear at his Court, than he encouraged the Bishop to undertake the conversion of his subjects. Wilfrid proceeded to establish a Church, and by the influence which he possessed with the King, a Bishopric was founded, and a Cathedral built at Selsey.

Technically divided into Anglo-Saxons. Having thus described the manner and the instruments by which Christianity was established in every one of the States of the Anglo-Saxons, it is necessary to observe, that the Kingdoms of Kent, of the West Saxons, and of the East Angles, derived their Faith solely from Rome, while the remainder of England, containing the whole territory from the Friths of Edinburgh to the Thames, was for the most part indebted for Religious instruction to the Scottish or Irish missionaries. On that account, there was a great diversity in the customs and ceremonies of the different Churches, which soon gave rise to factions. Every Prince established such an Ecclesiastical polity as suited the extent of his dominions; and with the exception of Kent, no Kingdom on the first settlement of its Church had more than one Episcopal See, with a Bishop independent of any Metropolitan.

Religious parties. It has been seen that in the conference between Augustin and the British Bishops, he promised an indulgence in many of their ancient rites, on condition of their submission to the Romish method of celebrating the Festival of Easter, and of administering the Sacrament of Baptism. But it appears that both the Britons and the Scots had a Liturgy distinct from that of Rome, the former using the Liturgy of the Gallican Church, the latter one peculiar to themselves.* The whole Island may therefore be said to have been divided into two parties; on one hand the Scottish Clergy and all their adherents, on the other hand the French and Italian Ecclesiastics with their followers. The Church of Kent, which espoused the side of Rome, and asserted the superiority of its own Primate, had the principal share in the contest. It was soon discovered that there could be no external communion between the two parties, without a submission of one or the other, or without a mutual recognition of independence. The British and Scottish Churches, therefore, could not possibly accede to any terms of communion with the Church of Kent, unless by submitting to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and of consequence to the See of Rome.

Aldfrid joint King of Northumbria. The manner in which those Churches, which had hitherto so vigorously opposed the Romish missionaries, at length yielded their independence is now to be related. Submission was first made by the Northern Churches, whose Country had once been the nursery and support of the Scottish Ecclesiastics. Aldfrid, the natural son of Oswy, King of Northumbria, and a partner in his father's throne, had been brought over to the Church of Rome by Wilfrid his preceptor, a warm defender of the Catholic Easter and of the Ecclesiastical tithes. The seeds of dissension being thus sown, were not long in coming to maturity. Since the two great parties followed different cycles in finding Easter, it sometimes happened, that while the King was celebrating the Paschal Festival with joy, the Queen was engaged in the humiliation and austerities of Lent. Discord in the Church soon created a division in the State. The Romish party possessing stronger zeal and greater activity, soon prevailed on Oswy to yield; and if a judgment may be formed from the event, the assembly which he called to discuss the matter, was summoned rather for the purpose of defending his own reputation than of determining the question at issue. The way being thus prepared, a Synod or conference took place at the Monastery of Whitby in the County of York. At the head of the Northern English party were Oswy himself, Hilda, Abbess of the Monastery, Coleman, Bishop of the Northumbrians and successor of Finan, together with all the Scottish and English Eccle-

Synod of Whitby.Coleman, Bishop of Northumbria
espouses the* Bede, Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. c. 22.† *Ibid. lib. iii. c. 21. Called the Census Sctorum.

History.
Northern party against the Church
of Rome.

siasties, secular and monastic, who had received ordination in the Northern Churches. On the other side appeared Eadflæda, the Queen of Oswy, Alfrid, his natural son and partner of his dominions, Wilfrid, the preceptor of Alfrid, Agilbert, Bishop of the West Saxons, with Agathon, a Priest in his retinue, Roman, Eadflæda's confessor, and James the Deacon, an assistant of Paulinus, who superintended the Churches of York. The venerable Chad, who having been educated by the Scottish Bishops adhered to their view of this question, was allowed to be the interpreter of both parties.

The King opened the meeting in a short speech, reminding all who were assembled, that since they professed to serve the same God, and to expect the same heavenly kingdom, they ought to observe the same rule of life, and a uniformity of worship. It was their business, therefore, to inquire which side of the question was supported by the soundest arguments, and to acquiesce in the evidence which might be laid before them. Having said this, he commanded Coleman to state the manner in which the Church of Rome celebrated Easter, and to defend his own conformity with that Church. Coleman replied, that the manner in which he celebrated Easter was that which he had received from those who sent him into England, and which they received from their forefathers. "This rite," he said, "is the same which, according to Ecclesiastical History, was celebrated by Saint John and all the Churches under the government of that Blessed Apostle."

When Coleman had enlarged on this argument, the King commanded Agilbert to declare the manner of his observance, whence it originated, and by what authority he still conformed to it. Agilbert declined the task on account of his ignorance of the English Tongue, notwithstanding there was an interpreter, and he requested that his disciple Wilfrid should be permitted to be his substitute. The King consented, and Wilfrid spoke to this effect: "The manner of celebrating Easter practised by us, we ourselves saw generally practised at Rome, where the Apostles Peter and Paul lived, taught, suffered, and were buried. The very same observance we saw in the rest of Italy and in France. Moreover, we are informed, that in Africa, Asia, Egypt, and Greece, the inhabitants, however differing in Language and manners, universally celebrate Easter at the same time with us. So that the inhabitants of two remote Islands, contend with a foolish obstinacy against the whole World."

Since the aim of Coleman and his party was rather to defend their own usages than to convince their opponents, they persisted in appealing to the authority of St. John and Columba. But Wilfrid, after justifying St. John, asked Coleman with an air of triumph, whether he presumed to put Columba in the balance against St. Peter the Prince of the Apostles? What answer Coleman made to this question Historians do not inform us, but they proceed to relate, that the King, struck with Wilfrid's inquiry, decided in favour of the Romish observance of Easter. This great point being settled, there yet remained another, concerning which the two parties differed quite as widely, namely the Ecclesiastical tonsure. But of this controversy we know nothing more than that the Romanists were equally successful in it.

The King having delivered his decision, Coleman resigned his Bishopric in disgust, and the Nobility and Clergy who adhered to him expressed great dissatisfaction at the event. Coleman retired into Ireland, his

Coleman resigns his Bishopric.

native Country, and by this retreat gave to his adversaries all the advantage which they desired. Tada, a deserter to the Romish party, succeeded to the Bishopric, and dying a few months after, Wilfrid, the opponent of Coleman, was appointed Bishop of Northumbria by the King's solicitation.

In this manner a way was opened for the submission of the British and Scottish Churches to the See of Rome. The event was, however, in some degree retarded by the relapse of the Northumbrian Court into its ancient usages, while Wilfrid was absent in France; but it was accomplished soon afterwards by the succession of Theodore to the Metropolitan See of Canterbury. Egbert, King of Kent, shortly after he ascended his throne, consulted Oswy on the necessity of filling the Primacy then vacant, and of making a provision for the Episcopal succession of the English Church. After a mature deliberation the two Princes resolved to appoint an Englishman to fill the office, and in pursuance of their resolution fixed on Wighard, a Priest of the Church of Kent. Thus elected, he was sent to Rome with commendatory letters both from Oswy and Egbert, and was entertained there with respect and kindness. But while the ceremonial for his consecration was preparing, he died of a Plague, which was likewise fatal to most of his retinue. This incident, while it proved a disappointment to Oswy and Egbert, furnished Vitalian the Pontiff with a favourable opportunity of appointing the head of the English Church by his own single authority. Without any communication with the two Saxon Princes, he determined to send over a Prelate of his own choice; and at first he fixed on Adrian, a Neapolitan Monk, who was skilled both in the Greek and Latin Tongues, but the humble Monastic declined the situation. On the urgent demand of the Pontiff, Adrian recommended Theodore, whom we have before mentioned, a native of Tarsus in Cilicia, and the Pope accepted the recommendation, on condition that Adrian would accompany his nominee to England. Two motives operated with the Pope in making this stipulation; the one, that Adrian might be useful in propagating the Christian Religion; the other, and the more powerful, that Theodore might be restrained from introducing the customs or dogmata of the Greek Church into the British Isles.

Theodore, the most learned of all the Prelates who had as yet possessed the See of Canterbury, had no sooner arrived, than he applied himself to secure the favour and assistance of the several Saxon Princes. For that purpose he travelled over the greater part of England, instituted a visitation of its Churches, introduced the Romish custom of celebrating Easter, and brought the people to an entire conformity with the Romish Church. One of the principal objects of his visitation seems to have been the case of Wilfrid, who had distinguished himself at the Synod of Whitby, and in consequence had been appointed Bishop of Northumbria. Yet he was not permitted to enjoy this Bishopric, but had retired to his own Monastery of Rippon. Many circumstances encouraged Theodore to attempt the restoration of Wilfrid. Chad, one of the disciples of Aidan, who was settled in the Bishopric, was an eminent example of Apostolic piety, and indefatigable in the exercise of his pastoral functions. When he was reprimanded by Theodore for usurping the rights of Wilfrid, and for receiving consecration from the Bishop of Winchester, he answered with an uncommon modesty,

Of the British Church.
Wilfrid no
coele.

Wighard, an English man, now succeeded to the Primacy.
His death.

Adrian, a Neapolitan, refused the English Primacy.
Recommended Theodore.

Theodore,
seventh Archbishop of Canterbury.
A. D.
661.

Wilfrid passed a few years at the Monastery of Rippon.

Theodore renewed the visitation

History. that he always thought himself unworthy of the Episcopal character; that he undertook it not by his own choice, but at the command of his superiors; and that if there were any defect in his title, he would cheerfully resign his trust and retire. Theodore, with all his haughtiness, was overcome by such humility, and dissuading Chad from relinquishing his Episcopal function, said that he would overlook the defect of title and remedy it. Wilfrid was restored to the Northumbrian Bishopric, and Chad was soon recalled from the monastic seclusion to which he had retired, to investiture with the Bishopric of Lichfield.

Chad resolved to the Bishopric of Lichfield.

Theodore encourages Learning.

While advances were thus rapidly making towards a union of the Saxon Churches under the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Theodore endeavoured to prove that this union would operate to the public good, and not to his own aggrandizement; he proposed, therefore, that the youth should be instructed in the Greek and Latin Languages, in Geometry, Music, Astronomy, Arithmetic, and other useful branches of Learning; and he associated Adrian with himself in the prosecution of his scheme. Having incited the Saxons to a love of Learning, by his own instruction and example, he sent for foreign masters and established schools. So assiduous was his labour, and so successful were his plans, that many Saxons could soon speak the Latin and Greek Tongues with as much fluency as their own. A school for Greek was founded in a village of Wiltshire, called from this circumstance Greek-lade, and afterwards corruptly Cricklade, the teachers of which repairing to Oxford, are supposed to have laid the foundation of that University.

While the qualities of prudence and benevolence must be ascribed to Theodore, it must not be concealed that he was ambitious and overbearing. He well knew that teachers brought from Rome would practise the usages of that Church, and, that possessing greatly superior attainments to the British and Scottish Ecclesiastics, they would control, if not eradicate, their opposition. The intended union of the Saxon Churches was thus accelerated. Notwithstanding the death of his two friends, the Kings of Kent and Northumbria, Theodore had so far ingratiated himself with their successors and also with the other Saxon Princes, that he obtained their consent to a general Assembly or Synod, which met at Hereford, a place in Hertfordshire, probably that which is now the principal town of the County. Besides the Archbishop, there were present Bisi, Bishop of the East Angles, a delegate from Wilfrid, Bishop of Northumbria, Putta, Bishop of Rochester, Leutherius, Bishop of the West Saxons, and Winfrid, Bishop of the Mercians. These were all the Bishops at that time in England, and they had all been raised to their stations by the influence of Theodore.

When the assembly was met, Theodore exhorted them, in the name of Christ, to advise with unanimity, and to determine with sincerity. He enjoined them to observe inviolably those ordinances which had been canonically decreed by the Fathers. Then recommending peace, charity, and godly unity, he asked them severally whether they consented that the Canonical Decrees should be maintained? The Bishops severally consented, and Theodore producing a collection of Canons from the ancient Councils, in which he had marked ten which he thought necessary in the existing state of the English Church, urged that they should be inviolably observed. The 1st Canon, which was indeed the foundation of the union, was a uniformity in the observance of Easter. The 11d directed that no Bishop should usurp or invade the Diocese of another. The 11ld made it unlawful for any Bishop to give unnecessary trouble to any Religious Houses. The 1Vth provided that monks should not, unless for sufficient cause, remove from one Religious House to another; and the Vth laid the same prohibition on the Secular Clergy as to their Dioceses. The Vth forbade a Bishop or a Priest to exercise his function out of his Diocese without permission of the Bishop of that Diocese. The VIth proposed an annual Synod. The VIIIth regulated the priority of Bishops. The IXth regarded the augmentation of the number of Bishops. The Xth regarded marriages, that none should be allowed contrary to the Canons, that incest should be severely punished, and that the liberty of divorce should be restrained.

Such were the Acts of this Synod; and that no contention might afterwards arise concerning their meaning, nor any false transcripts be published, they were committed to writing by a public notary, and confirmed by the subscription of every Bishop present. This being done, the Archbishop pronounced the following sentence and dismissed the assembly: "Whosoever shall endeavour to infringe these our definitions, conformable to the Decrees of ancient Canons, and confirmed by our unanimous subscription, let such a one know that he is separated from our communion, and from the exercise of all sacerdotal offices."

The Romish writers assert that this Synod was convened by the authority of the Pope, and that Theodore presided in a Legatine capacity; but the assertion is not borne out by the facts, for Bede has attributed it to the sole authority of Theodore. It may rather be said, that the Synod was called with the consent of the Saxon Princes, and that to their consent Theodore was also indebted for his Metropolitan dignity. It may fairly be concluded, that the consent of the Saxon Princes originated in reasons of convenience and policy, not in a belief in the right of the Roman Pontiff to any supremacy over the Saxon Church. But whatever were their motives, and whatever were the grounds on which the union was formed, we have in the Synod of Hereford, the first assembly of the Saxon Church under a common Metropolitan.

Though no other terms of communion were mentioned in this Synod than the Romish observance of Easter, yet it appears from the Penitential of Theodore, that the Bishops who had been consecrated by the Scots or Britons, were not to be permitted to exercise their function without an imposition of hands from, what he calls, a Catholic Bishop. This regulation, ungrateful as it must have been in itself to the British and Scottish Clergy, was aggravated by the unyielding strictness with which it was enforced.

Soon was his authority questioned and opposed, and he adopted the most violent measures to support it. The first who felt the effects of his displeasure was Winfrid, Bishop of Lichfield, who had been consecrated by Theodore himself, and had been present at the Synod of Hereford. He was deprived for nonconformity, and availing himself of the usual retirement of a monastery, he quietly retreated and passed the remainder of his life in religious contemplation. About two years after this deprivation Wilfrid

Opposition to a heathen.

* Camden, Britannia.

History.
Deprivation of Wilfrid by Theodore.

also was condemned to the same fate. His disgrace, if it may be so called, might partly arise from resistance to the authority of Theodore, but that was not the only cause. His secular pomp had long drawn on him the jealousy of the Northumbrian Court, and even of Egfrid the King; and his influence in persuading the Queen Consort to quit her regal state for monastic retirement, had aggravated Egfrid's dislike into open hostility. A complaint was preferred to Theodore, who came by the King's desire into Northumbria to hear and judge it. Some Historians have ventured to assert that the Archbishop was bribed to support the interest of the King, and to decide against Wilfrid. But it is certain that Theodore willingly consented to his deprivation, and not contented with this act of power, that he divided the Diocese of York into three portions, and erected a new See at Holy Island.

Appeal of Wilfrid to Pope Agatho.
A. D.
678.

The deprivation of Wilfrid occasioned a remarkable event in the History of the Anglo-Saxon Church, namely an appeal from the decision of the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Roman Pontiff. Wilfrid, accompanied by a number of his followers, repaired to Rome, at the time when Agatho I. was employed in arranging the VIth General Council against the Monothelites. It is more probable that Wilfrid went thither voluntarily, than that he was summoned, but it is an unquestioned fact that he presented a petition of appeal to the Pontiff.* It set forth the injustice of his treatment, that he had been expelled his Diocese without being convicted of any crime, and that Theodore, unsanctioned by any other authority, either Civil or Ecclesiastical, had divided the Bishopric of York, and appointed a Bishop to each division. The petitioner referred himself wholly to the Apostolic See, and was willing to acquiesce in its decision with all imaginable submission. Wilfrid told his wrongs with such eloquence and earnestness, that Agatho and his counsellors were of opinion that he ought to be restored to his Bishopric, and if the interests of Religion demanded that the See of York should be divided, yet that the coadjutor ought to be appointed by Wilfrid.† The cause being thus decided, he was required to return, to show the decree of the Pontiff and his Council to the King of Northumbria and the Archbishop of Canterbury, a command which the triumphant Prelate obeyed with alacrity.

His restoration decreed by the Pope.

Theodore refuses obedience to the Decree.

Notwithstanding that Theodore had been educated at Rome, and had owed his advancement entirely to the favour of the reigning Pontiff; notwithstanding, also, the recent and formal union of the Saxon with the Romish Church promoted by himself; yet he refused obedience to the sentence restoring Wilfrid. As for the King of Northumbria, he was so far from acquiescing, that he upbraided Wilfrid for having obtained the decree by fraud or bribery. Pretending to suspect, or really suspecting, that it was an imposture, he called together his Nobles and Clergy to examine into its authenticity. When it was found impossible to entertain any reasonable doubts on this subject, instead of obeying the sentence, he was advised to punish Wilfrid by imprisonment. The Bishop was accordingly committed to a most severe confinement, his property was confiscated, and his attendants were dispersed. In this miserable condition he languished nearly a year, and at length obtained his liberty, in consequence of the solicitation

Wilfrid is imprisoned
by Egfrid.

of the King's aunt, and on condition that he should never again set his foot in the Kingdom of Northumbria.

Of the Saxon
Church.
Jurisdiction of the See of Rome not acknowledged in England.

Throughout these proceedings against Wilfrid there is the strongest evidence that the Bishops of Rome possessed no acknowledged jurisdiction over the Anglo-Saxon Church; and that the deference usually shown towards them was limited by policy and convenience. With regard to doctrine, the homology of England to the Metropolis of the Western Church was unreserved, and in the Heresy of the Monothelites, which at that time divided the Christian World, Theodore appeared on the side of Rome with promptness and vigour. When we consider the depressed state of Learning in his Age, and the great abilities of Theodore, there cannot be any reason for wonder that Agatho should have invited him to Rome, in order to write against the prevalent Heresy. Declining the invitation, he was not less zealous in opposing the Monothelites in the Country committed to his spiritual care. With the consent of the Kings of Northumbria, of Kent, and of the East Angles, he convened a Synod at Hadfield, for the purpose of opposing its progress.

Synod at Hadfield.
A. D.
680.

The conduct of Theodore in that Synod fully justified the reputation which he had obtained. The whole Kingdom of Mercia, comprising the midland Counties of England, had then only two Bishops; Wilfrid was in prison; and the whole number of Bishops assembled could not have exceeded ten. Yet the proceedings were conducted with the greatest decorum and discretion. Not only was the Heresy of the Monothelites condemned, but a permanent standard of doctrine and discipline was established for the Saxon Church. The Council being assembled, Theodore, who presided, delivered a summary of the Christian Faith, as it was laid down in the Scriptures, in the Creed, and in the General Councils. The Bishops present having declared their unanimous assent to this exposition, proceeded to make a particular Confession of their Faith with relation to those doctrines which had been questioned or opposed by Heretics, testifying the agreement of the Synod in the decisions of the Catholic Church, as set forth in the first five General Councils. And lest this declaration might be thought too general, or liable to evasion and misinterpretation, the Synod expressed its special assent to the Decrees of the Council called by Pope Martin against the Monothelite Heresy. Theodore having brought the Synod of Hadfield to the issue which he intended, its Decrees were drawn up, and signed by all the Bishops present.

The Christian Religion being now generally professed throughout England, Wilfrid, who had been banished from Northumbria, employed his labours between the South and West Saxons. But Egfrid having been killed by the Picts, and Aldfrid, his brother, who had been Wilfrid's pupil,* having succeeded, the ambitious Prelate was inspired with a sanguine hope of regaining his former station. He had found that the authorities of the Bishop of Rome was little regarded in England, and therefore he prudently determined to show a deference to the authority of the Archbishop of Canterbury, which he had formerly opposed. The services which he had rendered to the Church among the South and West

* Cornwald, a Monk, appeared as the advocate of Theodore.
† Bede, lib. iv. c. 12—19. Ed. 24—31.

* Aldfrid is thus described by Aleuin: Qui sacris fuerat studiis imbutus ab omni aetate prima, valido sermone ornatissimus acer et ingenio, idem at simul atque magister.—De Pont. 749.

History. Saxons since his exile, had softened the resentment of Theodore, and a reconciliation was sought by the Primate. A conference between these two Bishops took place at London, in the presence of Erconwald, Bishop of that See. Theodore made the first advances, acknowledging his fault, and implored forgiveness. "I am warned," he said, "by my present age and infirmities, that my death will not be long delayed. I beseech you graciously to forgive me." Desirous to prove the sincerity of his contrition, he offered to resign the Archbishopric to his former rival, since he knew no one so worthy of governing the Church.

Nothing could be more praiseworthy than the temper which these reconciled Bishops displayed. Wilfrid received the apology with candour and frankness, forgiving all past injuries and offering assurances of future friendship. To accept the Archbishopric without the sanction of a General Council was a thought which Wilfrid could not entertain, and he only wished to be reinstated in his Bishopric of Northumbria. Theodore cheerfully wrote letters of recommendation to Aldfrid, and to Eelfrida, the King's sister; and, in consequence, Wilfrid was invited to return. Bosa, Bishop of York, was removed to the Bishopric of Holy Island, at that time vacant by the resignation of Cuthbert, and Wilfrid was appointed Bishop of York. With the Episcopal revenues, he also repossessed the Monasteries of Hexham and Rippon.

Death of Theodore.
A. D. 692. In the year following this memorable reconciliation, Theodore died, but unfortunately his death did not put an end to the turbulence or the troubles of Wilfrid. No sooner was he placed in the See of York, than he experienced opposition on every side. His contentious spirit alienated his Sovereign and pupil Aldfrid, who unable to bear his inuperious temper, drove him from the See of York, and from the Kingdom of Northumbria. Wilfrid sought refuge in Mercia, and obtained the Bishopric of Leicester, which, however, he had not possessed long, before he provoked Ethelred, King of Mercia, to banish him.

Not contented with having drawn on himself the enmity of two Princes, he engaged in a contest with Brithwald, the successor of Theodore, at the time when he most needed the protection of an Ecclesiastical superior. He had been banished from the See of York almost eleven years, when a Council was called by Brithwald, at the suggestion of Aldfrid and Ethelred, to investigate his conduct. At first he refused to appear before the Synod, being apprehensive of his personal safety, but having been promised a safe-conduct, he presented himself. His deportment was so improper, that a general sentence of deprivation was pronounced by the Archbishop, though the other Bishops implored that the sentence might be mitigated. He was allowed therefore to return to his Monastery of Rippon, on condition that he would cease to exercise his Episcopal functions. It was natural to expect that terms so humiliating would not only be rejected by Wilfrid, but would heighten his resentment. He protested vehemently against the proceedings of the Synod, reproached the Bishops with ingratitude, and threatened to appeal to the Pope. The Synod exhibited great firmness, but Aldfrid displayed a violence equal to that of Wilfrid. He even proposed to deliver the refractory Prelate to summary death, but the Bishops insisted on the safe-conduct, and Wilfrid was permitted to depart. Old as he then was, his spirit was unbroken, and he hastened to Rome. Presenting himself before the Pope, he set forth the injustice of his treatment, and implored redress. It happened that a Provincial Council was at that time sitting at Rome, and two Legates from Brithwald appeared before it, to vindicate the proceedings of himself and the Anglo-Saxon Bishops.

Wilfrid on his own behalf, and the two Legates on the part of Brithwald, submitted the case to the Pope in Council. The chief, or rather the only accusation preferred against Wilfrid was, that he had refused to submit to the authority of an English Synod. Wilfrid stated in his defence, that he had never refused obedience to the Archbishop of Canterbury, unless his decisions were contrary to the Apostolic See. The appeal itself, as well as the defence, inclined the Pope to favour Wilfrid, and he was pronounced innocent. Instead, however, of issuing any decree, the Pope wrote to the Kings of Northumbria and Mercia, desiring that a Synod might be called by the Archbishop, in which Wilfrid should be present; that the Bishops of York and Hexham should be summoned; that after hearing all parties they should endeavour to settle the quarrel at home, but that in case it could not be adjusted, the disputants should attend at Rome, and the cause should be again referred to the Pope and his Council.

With this declaration in his favour, it might be supposed that Wilfrid would have hastened home, but as he had once before experienced the danger of returning with a favourable determination of the Pontiff, he requested that he might be permitted to remain, and to pass the short remnant of his life at Rome. This request was not granted. He was enjoined to return, under the specious pretext that his presence was necessary to the English Church and Kingdom, and he therefore took a reluctant leave, and tardily obeyed.

No sooner had he returned than he directed his application in the first place to Brithwald, on whom he so far prevailed as to promise a revision and mitigation of the sentence of deprivation passed in the former Synod. He then went to the Court of the King of Mercia, and as Ethelred his foe had quitted his Palace for a Monastery, Cened the reigning Prince was not unwilling to favour his pretensions. The only obstacle remaining to his restoration was the King of Northumbria, and he sent two Ecclesiastics to Aldfrid, soliciting that he might be allowed to attend that Prince with the letters and determination of the Roman Pontiff. The solicitation was refused; Aldfrid, with the advice of his Council, declared that he would not reverse the decisions of an English Synod, in consequence of any letters from the Apostolic See.* But the King having been shortly afterwards seized by a violent sickness, and thinking that his malady was a divine judgment in consequence of his disobedience to the commands of the Pontiff, made a vow to restore Wilfrid in case of his recovery, and in case of his death bequeathed the performance of it on his successor. After a lingering illness, Aldfrid died, and his son being an infant, the crown was usurped by Eudulph. Wilfrid was well known to Eudulph, and confidently expected his immediate recall; but he was deceived, for in reply to his overtures, he was sternly told, that if he did not leave the Kingdom of Northumbria within six days, all his friends and followers should be put to death.†

* "As you choose to call it," was the language of Aldfrid to the two Ecclesiastics.—Eddias, Fil. Wilfrid, c. 41.

† Eddias, Fil. Wilfrid.

Of the Saxon Church.
He appeals to Rome.

Cause of Wilfrid is decided at Rome in his favour.

Wilfrid returns to England.

His reception by Brithwald and the King of Mercia.

and by Aldfrid.

Death of Aldfrid.
A. D. 725.

History. The reign of the Usurper, however, was short, and Wilfrid having some interest in the Council of Osered, the lawful heir, succeeded in obtaining a Synod to revise the proceedings against him. The place of its assembly was near the river Nidd, where Brithwald agreed to meet him. The Archbishop, after a short prayer for peace, stated the manner in which Wilfrid's Cause had been determined at Rome, and read the Epistles from the Pontiff to the Kings of Northumbria and Mercia. He avowed his own reconciliation with Wilfrid, and recommended that the deprived Bishop should be reinstated. But when the Letters of Pope John were produced, and obedience to the Pontiff enjoined under the penalty of degradation, the assembled Bishops appealed to the authority of their own Provincial Council, and refused to alter its decisions. Nevertheless, what they refused to do in compliance with the commands of the Roman Pontiff, they did from another motive. The Abbess Elfleda declared the vow made by her brother in his last sickness, a declaration which was confirmed by the Regent of Northumbria, and the Bishops after first withdrawing for the purpose of deliberation, came to the following resolution: That the Bishop of Hexham should be removed to the See of York vacant by the death of Bosa, and that Wilfrid should have the Bishopric of Hexham, together with the Abbey of Rippon. Further than this, they refused to go either in compliance with the solicitations of Elfleda and the Regent, or in regard of the memory of their deceased King.

Synod of Nidd.

Wilfrid restored to the Bishopric of Hexham.

His death. Restored to a part of his honours and emoluments at the age of seventy-six, Wilfrid did not long enjoy them. About four years after he repossessed the Bishopric of Hexham, he died at Oundle, in Northamptonshire, an Abbey of which he was the founder, and his body was removed to Rippon, where it was buried with great funeral pomp. Notwithstanding his deprivations and exile, the magnificence of his living, and his munificent foundations, he left great wealth, which he directed to be divided into four portions. The first and largest part he bequeathed to the Churches of St. Mary and St. Paul in Rome for masses to his soul; the second part he gave to the poor; the third to the monasteries which he had founded; and the fourth to his friends and servants.

Scheme of the Anglo-Saxon Church. Conjointly with the death of Wilfrid may be noticed a scheme of the Anglo-Saxon Church, which subsisted independently of the Heptarchy or Octarchy, though the Dioceses were commensurate with the different Sovereignities. It consisted of seventeen Bishoprics under one Metropolitan. Of these, the Kingdom of Kent had two, Canterbury and Rochester; the Kingdom of the East Saxons one, the Bishopric of London; the Kingdom of the East Angles was divided between the Bishoprics of Dunwich and North Elmham; the Bishoprics of Winchester and Sherborn comprehended the Kingdom of the West Saxons; the extensive Kingdom of Mercia had not less than five Bishoprics, and these were fixed at Lichfield, Leicester, Sydnacester, Worcester, and Hereford: the entire Kingdom of the South Saxons was within the Diocese of Solesbury; and lastly, the Kingdom of Northumbria had four Sees, York, Holy Island, Hexham, and Withern.

In this state stood the Anglo-Saxon Church at the death of Brithwald, and such is its state as described by Bede. These Bishops were subject to the jurisdiction of one Metropolitan, till Egbert presided over the See of York. His brother being King of Northumbria, he took the advantage which this alliance gave him, in conjunction with personal merit, and obtained the pall, the characteristic of Archiepiscopal dignity. Yet though some of the successors of Egbert obtained the same honour, and the Archiepiscopal title was conferred on them, it is doubtful whether the Archiepiscopate of York was completely settled until after the Norman Conquest.

At the latter end of the VIIIth century, the whole Kingdom of Mercia was taken out of the Archiepiscopate of Canterbury by Offa. That restless Prince resolved to make his Church as well as his Kingdom independent. For that purpose, he obliged his Bishops to yield obedience to the See of Lichfield, the Metropolis of his Kingdom, and he obtained from Pope Adrian a pall for his Bishop. Besides the natural inquietude and ambition of his temper, Offa had an antipathy to Lambert, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and accused him to the Pope of encouraging Charlemagne to make a descent on England. Whether this was a true charge is uncertain, but not long after the separation of Mercia from the jurisdiction of the See of Canterbury, Offa invaded the Kingdom of the East Angles, and subverted its Ecclesiastical as well as its Political Government. He placed the whole Kingdom under the Archbishop of Lichfield;* by which means the Bishops of Hereford, Worcester, and Sydnacester, in addition to the Mercian Bishops of Elmham and Dunwich, became suffragans of that See. Lambert strenuously opposed the diminution of the jurisdiction of the ancient See of Canterbury; he sent several appeals to Rome; but the affair having been settled by Offa and the Pope, he was obliged to yield. He even quitted his See and retired into France, till he was brought back by the persuasions of the celebrated Alcuin.†

Thus we have traced the establishment of the Anglo-Saxon Church, as well as the progress and extent of its submission to the See of Rome. Its future History will be resumed hereafter, and the changes will be then described which took place in its polity, before and at the Norman Conquest.

* Higbert, Bishop of Lichfield, was selected by Offa to be the Metropolitan; but the pall was not conferred till the time of Adolph, Higbert's successor.—Malina. sec. 15. Spelman, Cæsar. p. 302.

† The reader is referred on this subject to Wharton's Anglica Sacra.

Of the Saxon
Church.

Egbert first Archiepiscop
of York.

Mercia withdrawn from the See of Canterbury by Offa.

Archiepiscop-ric of Lich-
field.

Conclusion

HISTORY

CHAPTER LXII.

THE EASTERN EMPIRE.—FROM THE FALL OF THE WESTERN EMPIRE OF THE ROMANS, TO THE END OF THE VIIIth CENTURY.

FROM A. D. 476. TO A. D. 800.

History. At the Epoch of the final destruction of the Roman Empire in the West, the Eastern Division of that stupendous fabric of Universal Dominion still continued to present the majestic remains of pristine grandeur, and retained at least the outward aspect of splendour and power. It had sustained the rude shock of successive Barbarian irruptions, less through the courage of its defenders, than by the passive solidity of its structure, and the natural strength of its position; and it had witnessed and survived the prostration of the more ancient edifice of the Roman glory before that irresistible deluge, which, after bursting through its external bulwarks, had recoiled and swept past its walls to overwhelm the whole surface of Western Europe. The receding current of invasion forsook the devastated Provinces between the banks of the Danube and the shores of the Mediterranean: the remoteness of the Asiatic and African dependencies of the Empire had protected them from a similar desolation. At the period, therefore, when the sword of Odoacer destroyed the last vestige of the Augustan Sovereignty in the West, the Eastern successors of Constantine still boasted an extent of dominion little diminished since the original partition of the Roman World. Of the Eastern Empire,—or to substitute a familiar title which more appropriately describes its principal Nation and Language, and expresses its protracted duration, the GREEK or LOWER EMPIRE,—the European portion comprehended the Provinces of Greece with its Islands, Illyricum, Macedonia, Thrace, and Mæsia; or the whole vast tract of Country bounded by the Adriatic, the Mediterranean, the Euxine, and the Danube. Its transmarine possessions included Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and Lybia.

If we ask by what conservative force the People of these various and distant Countries, formed of discordant races, and animated by no common sentiment of patriotism or loyalty, were held together under the same sceptre, we shall rise from the inquiry only to echo the general surprise of Historians that, in the mere inheritance of the Laws and Arts of Rome, consisted all the strength of the Eastern Empire. We shall be astonished to observe that, with no firmer bond of Government than the habitual reverence which the Roman Institutions, all corrupted as they were, still commanded over the popular mind, that Empire could preserve its existence; not by the manifestation of those qualities which are the usual safeguards of human power, nor through the exercise of political wisdom in its Chiefs, or of generous energies in its People; but amidst the total absence of virtue in both:—in despite of the inherent vices of a continually degenerating despotism, the base intrigues of a dissolute Court, the insolent factions of a luxurious Capital, and the depraved character of a predominant population of Greeks, shameless alike in their turbulence and their perfidy, their slavery and their cowardice.

During the expiring throes of the Western Empire, the throne of Constantinople was unworthily filled, as we have seen,* by the Isaurian Zeno. The commencement of his wicked and pusillanimous reign was disturbed by the intrigues of the Empress Verina, his mother-in-law, and the widow of his predecessor Leo, misnamed the Great. In the palace of the Eastern Empire, the influence of women and of eunuchs was supreme; and the ambition of Verina easily excited a revolt against the husband of her daughter. By the success of the conspiracy, the Isaurian was compelled to take refuge in his native mountains; and Basiliscus, the brother and creature of Verina, already infamous for his cowardice or treason in the Vandalic war,† was raised to the vacant throne. Except to mark the depravation of morals, the quarrels of a profligate Court are little deserving of Historical record. The usurper rewarded his sister for the diadem which she had bestowed on him by the murder of her lover; and it was an offended paramour of his own wife who assisted the vengeance of Verina. By a second conspiracy of the Palace, Basiliscus was hurled from the throne, Zeno was recalled, and the restless spirit of Verina was again displayed in the excitement of another revolt and the support of a second usurper. But this new enterprise, which she maintained in the Provinces until the close of her life, terminated unsuccessfully; and Zeno continued to hold the sceptre in his feeble grasp until the period of his natural death. His reign is chiefly memorable for the art, or good fortune, with which he diverted the dangerous force of the Ostrogoths from the ruin of his own Empire to the conquest of Italy; and the only faint shadow of glory in the life of Zeno is reflected from the alliance of the great Theodoric, who subjugated, and condescended to rule, the fairest portions of the dismembered Western Empire under the nominal supremacy of the Despot of the East.‡

The Eastern Empire.

From A. D. 476. to A. D. 800.

Reigns of Zeno, the Isaurian, A. D. 474.

* Vide p. 264 of this Volume.

† Ibid. p. 266.

‡ Theophanes, Chronographia, p. 111. 113, &c. and Marcellinus (in Chron. Evangelium) passim. Procopius, (De Helio Gothi) lib. i. c. 1. Jornandes, c. 52—57.

History. On the death of Zeno, the marriage of his widow Ariadne with Anastasius, a respectable officer of the Imperial household, produced the elevation of her new husband to the throne of the Cæsars. The private virtues of Anastasius placed his life in strong contrast to that of his predecessor: but his domestic reign of twenty-seven years was undistinguished, except by a Civil war, of which Religious discussions formed the pretext; and, of its foreign events, the most remarkable was the defeat of the Imperial forces in a contest, jealously and rashly provoked with the more vigorous power of Theodoric.* Anastasius was succeeded by Justin, an illiterate Dacian peasant, who had risen by his military merit, during a service of fifty years, to the command of the Imperial guards, and who was seated by their suffrages on the vacant throne. The new Emperor, at the epoch of his accession, was already advanced in years; and he gradually resigned the Civil administration of government to his nephew, Justinian, whom he had previously drawn from obscurity in Dacia, and educated as his heir. The design of this adoption expanded with the fortunes of Justin, and shortly before his death he was induced or compelled, by the influence which his artful and aspiring nephew had gained over the Senate, to admit him to a full participation in the honours of the purple. On the decease of his uncle, Justinian became the sole Ruler of the Empire, and commenced a long, a memorable, and, on the whole, a glorious reign, of thirty-eight years.†

Accession of Justinian.
A. D. 527.
Domestic events of his reign.

History of the Emperress Theodora.

The internal and the foreign transactions of the Empire during this busy period are sufficiently various and important to deserve a distinct enumeration;‡ and our notice may first be engaged by those domestic events in the government of Justinian which illustrate the personal merits and actions of the Monarch, and the condition and resources of his dominions. Of the peculiar character of his reign no inconsiderable share is attributable to the influence of the extraordinary woman who was raised by his affection from the lowest degradation to the partnership of the purple. This was the famous Theodora, a comedian, a courtesan, and an Empress. Without imitating the purrulent taste with which a great Historian has laboriously polluted his pages by exhausting the scandalous chronicle of her vices,§ it is only necessary to observe, that the origin of Theodora was vile; that her youth was educated in the theatre of Constantinople, and consumed in an abandoned licentiousness which deepened the shame of a disgraceful vocation; and that on a repentant or artful retirement from a life of public and vagrant infamy, she accidentally attracted the notice of the Patrician Justinian, retained sufficient beauty to captivate his fancy, and developed mental endowments which fixed his attachment, and finally ensured his confidence and respect. The Roman law forbade the marriage of a Senator with a woman of servile origin or theatrical profession: but Justinian was resolved to raise his concubine to the dignified station and sacred rights of a wife; and during his uncle's life his influence obtained an Imperial edict which relaxed the morality of the ancient jurisprudence, declared a glorious repentance open to the females of the theatres, and permitted them to contract the most honourable unions. The nuptials of Justinian and Theodora were immediately solemnized; she shared the subsequent exaltation of her husband; and on his accession to the purple, he gave the highest proof of the constancy of his attachment and the unbounded measure of his esteem, by associating her in honours which, in the earlier Ages of the Empire, his predecessors had denied to the most virtuous of consorts. She not only shared his coronation, but was seated on his throne as an equal and independent colleague; and the oaths of allegiance were administered to the Provincial Governors in the joint names of Justinian and Theodora, as Emperor and Empress of the East.*

The fidelity of Theodora to Justinian from the hour in which she became his concubine may be safely inferred from the silence of a malignant satirist: his reproaches of her arrogance and her avarice may be received with suspicion. Her anxiety, by burying herself in the retreat of a rural palace, to escape from the adulation of a Capital to which her infamy had been too familiar, may have been as much the impulse of disgust and shame as of pride; and a portion, at least, of her treasures was expended in various pious and charitable foundations, of which the most remarkable and munificent attested her sympathy for the unhappy of her sex, and was devoted to the benevolent purpose of reclaiming them from guilt and misery. Yet it must be admitted that the evidence of her cruelties is better established, at least by the unanimous consent of her enemies. They may have exaggerated the atrocities which were believed to have been perpetrated in her peculiar and secret prisons under the palace: for, as it has been well observed, darkness, if it be propitious to cruelty, is likewise favourable to calumny and fiction. But if the report of her Historians may be credited, the living accusers of her tyranny were the suffering and mangled objects of her resentment, and the spoiled orphans of the victims who had perished under her vengeance. It would appear that ambition was the master passion which had subdued or absorbed her more grovelling vices; and the cruelties which are odiously opposed to her better qualities, were probably the dictates of her political fears. To the wisdom of her counsels, Justinian himself has bequeathed a questionable testimony; but it is certain that he was more than once indebted for the safety of his throne to the strength of her resolution. In balancing the weight of her virtues and her vices, a large allowance is due to the demoralizing influence of her education, the corruption of her Age and Country, and the precarious tenure of her power. Upon this estimate some indulgence and even honour may be claimed for the memory of a woman, who raised herself from the infamy of the theatre to the dignity of the throne, whose moral energies were equal to a conqueror over the habitual licentiousness of her youth, and whose mental firmness and

The Emperress Theodora.
From A. D. 476. to A. D. 600.

Estimate of her character.

* Jornandes, c. 58. Marcellinus, Chron. p. 44—48.

† Marcellinus, Chron. p. 49, 59, &c. Zosarus, lib. xiv.

‡ The principal authority for this period is Procopius, the Secretary of Belisarius, from whose various pages both the foreign and domestic events of the reign of Justinian may be collected. But the testimony of Procopius, notwithstanding the elegance and skill of his narration, is impeached by its base contradictions; and in his public History and his more secret Anecdotes, he doubly disgraces himself by his adulation and his malignity.

§ Gibbon (c. 40.) has nowhere betrayed the lamentable corruption of his mind more disgustingly than in the eagerness with which he has here taken up the grossest indecencies from the Anecdotes of Procopius.

* Novell. viii. lit. 3.

† Ibid. viii. lit. 1.

History. prudence sustained the administration of an Empire. After a reign of twenty-two years she sank under the slow tortures of a cancer; and with her expired the last symptoms of vigour in the government of Justinian.*

From A. D. 476. To A. D. 500. Furious of the Circus. When that Emperor ascended the throne of the East, the peace of Constantinople had been long distracted by the violence of two factions, which derived their origin from the Chariot races of the Circus. In these ancient Games the drivers were now distinguished by the different colours of their dresses; and the absurd ardour which the idle population of a luxurious Capital felt in the issue of every contest was shown in the espousal of a chosen hue. But of the four usual colours of Red, White, Green, and Blue, it was principally the last two which obtained and divided the favour of the populace; and these badges of festivity were gradually converted into the emblems of Political and even of Religious party. In the decline of the two Empires of the West and East, no sign can be adduced more indicative of the contemptible levity of the public spirit than the origin of these infuriated factions both at Rome and Constantinople, not in the manly opposition of Principles but in the frivolous contests of the Circus. For, not merely the common herd, but Patricians, Senators, and Emperors, were enrolled among the supporters of the Blue and Green colours, encouraged their follies, and indulged their excesses. These soon swelled into tumultuous and bloody combats between the factions, which disturbed every Festival; and on one occasion, in the reign of Anastasius, the Greens are said to have drawn their concealed weapons and treacherously murdered three thousand of their Blue opponents.† The Provinces and Cities of the East imitated the pernicious example of the Capital; and the disgraceful brawls of the Theatre were suffered to give birth to two powerful parties, whose deadly hostility outraged the majesty of the Laws and convulsed every portion of the Empire. The feeble though pompous administration of government was alternately assailed and protected by the opposition of these factions; and Emperors were not ashamed to purchase the security of their throne by an alliance with one and the oppression of the other. Before his accession, Justinian had displayed his partiality for the Blue Faction, who supported his claims to the throne and professed to share his zeal for the purity of Religion. At the commencement of his reign, they presumed on the Imperial favour to satiate a furious vengeance upon their opponents, and to fill the Capital with their licentious excesses. An edict of Justinian, which repeatedly declared his resolution to enforce the equal administration of justice, was as often eluded by the superior influence of the triumphant faction; and the public anarchy increased with impunity, until the insolence of the Blues and the despair of their adversaries threatened a total dissolution of the powers of government.‡

In the fifth year of his reign, Justinian was at length provoked to make a serious and impartial effort for repressing the disorders of Constantinople by the execution of some notorious assassins of both factions. This act of equal justice served only to produce a momentary truce and union between Blues and Greens to resist the Imperial authority. A violent sedition was excited, in which the combined insurgents burned the Palace of the metropolitan Prefect, massacred his attendants, and spread a conflagration which destroyed the Cathedral of St. Sophia, a portion of the Imperial Palace itself, and a great number of public and private edifices. The rioters even proceeded to place a reluctant nephew of the Emperor Anastasius on the throne; and the fortunes of Justinian must have perished in the same hour, if they had not been sustained by the firmness of a woman. In the universal panic of the courtiers, Theodora alone preserved courage to oppose the proposition for an ignominious flight; her spirit overcame the timidity of her husband; and the obvious and easy expedient of rekindling the animosity of the factions was successfully adopted. The Blues, reminded of the danger of an union with antagonists whom they had long outraged and oppressed, were persuaded to return to their allegiance; with their aid the deserted Greens were surrounded and assailed in the Circus or Hippodrome, the nursery and citadel of faction, by the Imperial forces under Belisarius; and thirty thousand of the insurgents were slain in a merciless and indiscriminate slaughter. The unfortunate and involuntary usurper was made prisoner and executed; and an Imperial edict suppressing the Games of the Theatre marked the close of a sedition which, from the cry of the insurgents, Nika, (Conquer!) has obtained its distinction in the disorderly annals of the Byzantine Empire. But the revival of the Chariot races of the Hippodrome, a pernicious concession to the darling passion of the People, which was granted in a few years, revived the same scenes of disorder; and the baleful struggle of the two factions was perpetuated by the weakness and vices of the Government.*

Immediately after this exposure of the internal disorders which disgraced the feeble administration of Justinian, it might seem a forced and unnatural transition to introduce an eulogy of his legislative labours: yet the same epoch strangely exhibits the impotence of the Laws and the triumphs of Jurisprudence. This contradiction belongs less to the character of the Emperor than to the condition of the Empire: and the aspect of mingled splendour and weakness presented by the Byzantine Annals, faithfully reflects the theory and practice of its government. The factions of the Circus and the disputation of the Courts, simultaneously divided the anxiety of Justinian; and at the moment when the wildest ebullitions of popular license threatened the safety of his person and the duration of his reign, he was actively engaged in a design which has immortalized his name as a Prince and perpetuated his authority as a Legislator. This noble and memorable enterprise had for its object to digest, to reconcile, and to explain the accumulated Civil Jurisprudence of Republican and Imperial Rome. In the Age of Justinian such a reformation had become equally desirable and

The Eastern Empire
From
A. D.
476.
To
A. D.
800.
Furious sedition of the Nika.
A. D.
582.

* From the original evidence collected by Gibbon (ubi supra) it is not difficult to form a candid estimate of the conflicting qualities of Theodora. Many passages of her life suggest an obvious parallel between her character and that of Catherine of Russia; not will the comparison be unfavourable to the Eastern Empress. Her genius was, probably, not inferior to that of the famous Czarina: her moral reformations are honourably contrasted with the personal dissoluteness which survived and disgraced the elevation of Catherine to a throne.

† Marcellinus, Chron. p. 47.
‡ Theophrastus, p. 142. Procopius, (De Bello Persico.) lib. i. c. 24. Gibbon, ch. xl.

* Procopius, (De Bello Persico.) lib. i. c. 26. Marcellinus, Chron. p. 54. 56. Theophrastus, p. 155–158. Zoonar, lib. xiv. ad p. 63. Gibbon, ubi supra.

History,
From
A. D.
476.
to
A. D.
500.

Reformation of the Roman Law.

Publication of the Jus-tinian
Code.
A. D.
529.

THE INSTI-TUTES,

and PAN-DECTS,
A. D.
533.

difficult. During a period probably of above one thousand years, since the original enactment of the Twelve Tables of the Roman Law, the statutes of the Republic and the edicts of the Emperors had been incessantly multiplied; and the confused and often contradictory mass of Jurisprudence was swollen by the commentaries of lawyers into countless volumes of various reputation and authority, which divided the opinions and distracted the judgments of the Courts.*

The merit of originating so stupendous a work of revision must be conceded to the personal resolve of Justinian: but the principal agent whom he employed was his subject Tribonian, an illustrious lawyer, whose genius, alike in its grandeur, and the meanness which sullied it, has not unsapiently been compared to that of Bacon.† To the learning and discretion of Tribonian, aided by the counsel of nine other jurisconsults of eminence, Justinian, in the first year of his reign, intrusted the duty of revising the ordinances of his Imperial predecessors; and the selection, which expunged the contradictions and superfluities of these enactments, was diligently accomplished in fourteen months. The work, composed, by imitation perhaps of the number of the Twelve Tables of the Roman Law, in as many Books, was then confirmed by the signature of the Emperor, and distinguished by his name; and the JUSTINIAN CODE was solemnly proclaimed as the universal Law of the Empire. A labour of far greater extent and more arduous execution was next assigned to Tribonian with an increased number of associates: to compose a general commentary on the spirit and substance of the ancient and existing Jurisprudence; to pass judgment on the conflicting opinions and decisions of previous Civilians; and to extract from the most celebrated of their innumerable Treatises, the approved principles and deductions of the Science. In three years the whole of this design was completed by Tribonian and his coadjutors, and its execution was ratified by the authority of their master. Under the title of INSTITUTES, the elementary principles of Law were defined and promulgated in a distinct and invaluable Work, of which the publication in IV Books,‡ immediately preceded the appearance of the grand and ultimate digest, in the shape of commentaries, on the whole circle of Roman Jurisprudence. The term of PANDECTS, or general receivers, denotes the comprehensive object of these Books, fifty in number; and their authority was intended and declared to supersede the use of the voluminous texts of various antiquity, of which they formed the abridgement or abstracts. Thenceforth, the three Works of the Code, the Institutes, and the Pandects, were to form the complete and only recognised system of Jurisprudence; and all earlier provisions were discarded as either obsolete and valueless in themselves, or embodied into the perfect collations of Legal Wisdom.§

The merits of these Works, when fairly weighed against the difficulties of their execution, have commanded the admiration of all subsequent Ages: the vain boast of their perfect sufficiency was shamed in the Age itself which produced them. In less than six years after the publication of his Code, Justinian acknowledged its deficiencies by promulgating a new and improved edition, in which, besides many supplementary decisions on the disputed or contradictory edicts of his predecessors, no less than two hundred new laws of his own were introduced. Nor were even these revisions and additions adequate to satisfy the wants of the tribunals, or the restless passion of legislation; and every year in the long reign of Justinian was marked by the production of some new Edict, or Novel Law. Of these, many were subsequently repealed by himself, and others were rejected by his successors: but the remaining number of the Justinian Acts, under the general term of NOVELLS, were collected after his death: their authority has been admitted in conjunction with that of the Code, the Institutes, and the Pandects, into the general system of the Imperial Legislation; and they form the fourth great division of that famous body of Jurisprudence which is still emphatically distinguished as THE CIVIL LAW.*

The praise and censure of this celebrated collection of written Reason are equally foreign to our present subject. The general excellence of its rules and the usual equity of its decisions in the business of social life have been universally admitted: but the political character of the system is stamped with the spirit of arbitrary monarchy; and the slavish principles which it inculcates,† were fitted only for the purposes of an oriental despotism, and have rendered it deservedly odious to the advocates of freedom.‡ These features, however, of the Civil Law, should not in fairness be objected to detract from the credit which is due, both to Justinian and his counsellors, for the grandeur of the design and the careful industry of the compilation. They were called upon in their situation to legislate for the wants not of a free nation, but of a People for Ages degraded from the rights, and incapable of appreciating the uses, of liberty. Nor was the manly spirit of personal independence, which breathed in the ancient Laws of the Roman Republic, any longer suitable to the Jurisprudence of a Greek Empire, of which every subject was confessedly the slave of the Prince. The corruption, indeed, of ancient legal texts into the servile language of arbitrary power was a Historical forgery: but it is a far heavier reproach against the honour and justice of Justinian, if the suspicion be well founded, that the frequent changes of Law which appear in the Novels are so unimportant, that no other cause can be found for them than the base venality of a Prince, who shamelessly sold both his judgments and his laws.§

The transmission of the Civil Law to the States of Western Europe, in which it has become naturalized, forms a doubtful and curious chapter in the History of Jurisprudence and of Nations. We may reject the

The Eastern Empire.
From
A. D.
476.
to
A. D.
500.

and the Novels.
A. D.
563.

Merits of the Civil Law.

History of its transmission to modern times.

* Tassonus, Histoire de la Jurisprudence Romaine, fol. p. 1—73. Heineccius, Historia Juris Romani, No. 112—349.

† Gibbon, ch. xlv.

‡ Gibbon, who eulogizes the method of the Institutes, has failed to observe how closely the order of their division is imitated in that admirable compendium of our own Law—the Commentaries of Blackstone.

§ Tassonus, 295—354. Heineccius (Hist. Juris Rom.) No. 384—404, and a reference is always implied to the more modern text of Gibbon, whose XLIVth Chapter contains an excellent digest of the history and principles of the Roman Law.

* Tassonus and Heineccius ubi supra. Ludewig, Vitæ Justiniani, p. 250—253.

† Witness the famous maxim (Inst. 1. 2. 6.) Quod principis placuit, legis habet vigorem.

‡ Blackstone, Commentaries, Introduction, sec. 1. p. 4, 5.

§ The internal evidence of these changes is thought by a great authority to confirm the secret accusations of Procopius. Cervarations sont la plupart sur des choses de si petite importance qu'on ne voit aucune raison qui eût dû porter un législateur à les faire à moins qu'on n'eût été poussé par l'histoire secrète, et qu'on ne dût que se prêter vent d'ignorer ses jugemens et ses loix. Montesquieu, Grandeur et Décadence des Romains, ch. xx.

History.
From
A. D.
476.
to
A. D.
500.

vulgar tale which attributes its adoption in the Italian Schools to the discovery of a copy of the Pandects at Amalfi in the sack of that city by the Pisians in the XIIIth Century; for it is certain that Lectures on these Books were read in the University of Bologna a few years before that event.* The introduction of the Jurisprudence of Justinian into Italy was a necessary result of the conquest of that Peninsula; and the government of the Imperial Exarchs must at least have perpetuated its authority in the Italian Provinces during more than two centuries. The immediate causes which after the Dark Ages led to the revival of its scientific study, are involved in obscurity; but when the German Emperors attempted to establish the title of their succession to the universal monarchy of the Cæsars, they eagerly enlisted the services of a crowd of Civilians, who were prepared to deduce the loftiest maxims of Imperial prerogative from the arbitrary doctrines of the Institutes. In another cause, the zeal of the Romish Clergy laboured to establish the authority of the same system of Jurisprudence; and the method and principles of the Canon, were founded on those of the Civil Law. The growing fame of the latter system occasioned its reception also among the Free Municipal Communities of Italy and Germany; from those Countries its study was disseminated by its clerical and lay professors throughout Europe; and while, in most of the continental nations, it is still closely interwoven, under different modifications, with local varieties of Jurisprudence, the Civil Law has in our own Country extended and retained its influence over the ordinary Tribunals of Scotland and the Ecclesiastical and Maritime Courts of England.†

Tales of Justinian.

The reformation of the Roman Jurisprudence was not the only great work which adorned the reign of Justinian. A love of magnificence may have been indulged in his architectural designs; but both his zeal for the honour of Religion and his laudable precautions for the defence of an unwelcome Empire were evinced in the construction and repair of numerous Ecclesiastical, Military, and Civil edifices. The majestic Cathedral of St. Sophia, at Constantinople, which he rebuilt entirely after the earlier fabric had been consumed by fire in the sedition of the Nika, remains to this hour a splendid and venerable monument of his piety and taste; and both the Capital and Provincial Cities were decorated by his care with numerous other churches, inferior only to that more famous structure in grandeur and beauty. The fortifications which lined the banks of the Danube, and those also which covered the internal European Provinces, were assiduously augmented in strength and number; the Asiatic frontier on the side of Persia was protected by many new fortresses; and if the multiplication of these artificial bulwarks reveals the real weakness of the Empire, it at least avouches the provident forethought and indefatigable exertions of Justinian for the security of subjects whose courage was insufficient, without such aid for their own defence.‡

The avarice and the profusion of Justinian have been

* Gibbon, ch. xlv. 86. 89. notes, threw some suspicion on this tale, for which the only original authority is an anonymous and undated Mean chronicle: but Mr. Mülls, (Travels of Theodor Ducat), vol. ii. p. 78. 79, has completely exploded the fable.

† Backhaus, Introduction, sec. 1. p. 11—20. Gibbon, ch. xlviii.

‡ Montesquieu, Grandeur et Décadence des Romains, ch. 32.

§ The principal authority for the public works of Justinian is Procopius: (De Edificiis;) and the flattering homage of these VI Books may be weighed against the malignant depreciation of his secret History, or Book of Anecdotes.

condemned by his secret satirist with equal virulence; and some authority is given to both charges by the rapacity of his administration, and the debts which he bequeathed to his successor. But it is among the incurable vices of a corrupted despotism that the imposts of Government are aggravated by the venality of its officers; and Justinian has perhaps been unjustly reproached for disorders which were inherent in the times, and for ministerial extortions which it was alike beyond his power always to detect or to control. A large portion of his lavish expenditure was consumed, not in purposes of selfish luxury, but in the construction of Churches, Fortresses, Bridges, and Aqueducts; and the merit of these useful public works may excuse the cost of Palaces, and even atone for the more expensive ambition of conquest. The sale of honours and offices, the imposition of onerous taxes, and the injurious privilege of monopolies, were the usual disgraces of the Imperial Government; but some earnest though vain efforts to check the progress of venality by rigorous legislative enactments,* prove that Justinian was not insensible to the shame which it entailed upon his administration; and a more honourable example may be adduced of his desire to advance the internal prosperity of his Empire by the promotion of the industrious Arts. By his liberality, some Persian monks were bribed to effect the secret and difficult introduction of the silkworm from China into the Eastern Empire; under his encouragement his subjects soon learned to rival the Chinese in the treatment of the insect and the manufacture of its produce; and to the enlightened views of Justinian is Europe originally indebted for the establishment of one of the most useful among the occupations which minister to the purposes of elegant luxury.†

To these circumstances in the juridical and domestic administration of Justinian which have given celebrity to his reign, is to be added the more dubious fame of foreign conquest. When he ascended the throne, he found the Empire engaged in a war with the Persian Monarchy, over whose vast extent the Dynasty of the Sassanides still exercised their hereditary dominion. After a truce which was observed between the Roman and Persian Empires for nearly eighty years, the reigns both of Anastasius and Justin had been consumed in desultory hostilities with Kobad, the nineteenth Sovereign of his House; and under the reign of his son Chosroes, so renowned in Oriental Romance under the more proper appellation of Nushirvan, the contest was still protracted, little to the glory of the Byzantine arms, until the penetration or good fortune of Justinian intrusted their direction to a commander, whose martial spirit and genius were worthy of the best ages of the Roman Republic or Empire. This was the famous Belisarius: the submissive servant of a jealous despot; the dupe, or domestic slave, of a licentious and domineering wife; but a consummate General in the field, a hero in personal prowess, a merciful and prudent victor, and a sagacious Statesman. By birth a Thracian peasant, Belisarius had enrolled himself in the private guard of Justinian before the elevation of that Prince to his uncle's throne; but we know nothing positively of his early life and services until the new Emperor promoted his fidelity to a command in the Persian War. The natural genius of Belisarius for war was of that

The Eastern Empire.

From
A. D.
476.
to
A. D.
500.

Internal administration of the Empire.

Introduction of the silk worm.

A. D.
552.

War of Justinian.

Rise of Belisarius.

The Persian War.
A. D.
529.

* Novellæ, viii. tit. 3.

† Procopius, l. viii. (miscellæ De Belle Gothico) c. 17. Theophaues, p. 39. Zonaras, lib. xiv. p. 69.

History. lofty and decisive cast, which has little to borrow from the experience and rules of the science. At the head of an army inferior in numbers and dispirited by recent defeats, he encountered and totally overthrew a Persian host on the plain of Dara. In the following campaign, his skilful movements baffled the design of a second Persian invasion of Syria, and saved that wealthy Province from impending ruin.* Soon afterwards, the impatience of Justinian to embark in projects of conquest in the West induced him to submit to the dishonour of buying Peace from Persia; and Belisarius, who, in the sedition of the Nika, had meanwhile signalized his devotion to the cause of Justinian, by his defeat of the insurgents, was selected by his Imperial Master for the conduct of the VANDALIC WAR.

THE VANDALIC WAR. Since the failure of the expedition against Carthage under Basiliscus, in the reign of Leo, which we have elsewhere recorded,† the Vandalic Kingdom of Africa had been no further assailed by the arms of the Eastern Empire. But the internal divisions of the Vandals themselves now tempted the ambition of Justinian. Gelimer, an aspiring Chieftain of the Royal line, had dethroned his Sovereign Hilderic; and the reign of a usurper and an Arian was equally detested by a faction of the Vandals and by his Catholic subjects, the descendants of the Roman Provincials. The ostensible and immediate pretext under which Justinian covered his design for the conquest of Africa, was the pious desire of obtaining the release of the deposed Monarch of the Vandals, his personal friend and the tolerant protector of the Catholics. But the claim of universal dominion had been easily supposed to descend upon all the successors of Constantine; and after the extinction of the Western Empire, the Cæsars of the East assumed the sole title of Roman Sovereignty. The recovery of the deserted Provinces of the West was regarded by the Court of Constantinople not as an enterprise of lawless conquest, but as the assertion of an indefeasible right; and the distraction of the Vandalic Monarchy was hailed by Justinian as an auspicious occasion for the reestablishment of the Roman dominion over the Prefecture of Africa.‡

The resources of the Empire were earnestly collected for the Vandalic war; but their accumulation is a memorial of declining strength. Less than seventy years had elapsed since a force of eleven hundred vessels and one hundred thousand men had been despatched from the port of Constantinople for the reconquest of Africa:‡ the utmost efforts of Justinian could assemble for the same enterprise only six hundred vessels and thirty-five thousand soldiers and mariners: of these, but fifteen thousand were land forces; and their heterogeneous composition falsified their title to the proud name of a Roman army. The guards of Belisarius, who had been enlisted in his private service, and suffered, in consonance with an usual and dangerous abuse of the age, to devote themselves by an oath of fidelity to the personal fortunes of their leader, formed the flower of his host: the remaining bands were composed chiefly of Isaurians, Heruli, Huns, and other Barbarians. Wherever war has arisen into a service, the infantry are the strength of armies; and the large proportion of five thousand horse to an irregular array of only ten thousand foot, the chief dependence placed on this cavalry, and their prevailing use of the bow, all mark the decay of the Roman Art. But the defects of military spirit, of discipline, and of organization, were all counterbalanced by the personal character of one man; and in the motley squadrons of Belisarius, the qualities of the ancient Legions were supplied by the valour and genius of their leader.

After a tardy navigation from Constantinople to Sicily, Belisarius led his fleet over to the African coast, and effected the disembarkation of his troops at a spot distant about five days' journey from Carthage. For the defence of their Capital, the Vandals were compelled to risk an engagement; but neither their dissensions, nor the absence of a part of their force in the Civil war of Sardinia, nor the skill of Belisarius, would explain their successive and easy defeats by the far inferior numbers of the Imperial army; if, during a century of luxurious indulgence in a warm and enervating climate, they had not utterly degenerated from the valorous qualities of their Northern ancestors. After a feeble struggle, Gelimer himself set the example of flight, and the subjugated descendants of the Roman Provincials, in hereditary hatred to their conquerors, gladly opened the gates of the Capital and other Cities to their Imperial deliverers. The Vandals, who in three generations had multiplied from their original number of fifty thousand warriors to one hundred and fifty thousand men, besides women and children, secured their lives by an inglorious submission; and in a single campaign the ancient Roman Province of Africa was completely reduced under the dominion of the successor of Constantine. Sardinia, Corsica, and the Balearic Isles, all dependencies of the Vandalic Kingdom, followed its fate. The usurper Gelimer himself, after removing the last obstacle to the ambition of Justinian, by the murder of his captive, Hilderic, the lawful King of the Vandals, and ally of the Emperor, was finally compelled to surrender to the generosity of his conqueror, and conducted to Constantinople: where, by the Imperial bounty, he was permitted to pass the remainder of his life in affluence and peace.*

Belisarius had no sooner increased his previous claims to the Imperial favour by the rapid conquest of Africa, than he encountered the envy of an intriguing Court, and the fears of a suspicious master. To refute the secret charge of an intention to seat himself on an independent throne in Africa, the hero abdicated the government of Carthage, and with the courage of innocence immediately returned to Constantinople. His voyage was attended by his guards, with the spoils and captives of the Vandalic war. His presence put to shame the accusations of his enemies and the apprehensions of his Sovereign; his brilliant services extorted the admiration of Justinian; and Belisarius deservedly obtained the honours of a Roman Triumph, the first which the City of Constantine had ever witnessed, and the last which History may deign to record. The modesty or prudence of the conqueror declined the full measure of those honours of which he was equally worthy with the earlier heroes of Rome, and instead of mounting a triumphal car, Belisarius marched on foot in the procession at the head of his veterans.

The success of the African war had only served to

* Procopius, De Bello Persico, lib. i. c. 12—18.

† Vide p. 266 of this Volume.

‡ Procopius, De Bello Fundacio, lib. i. c. 7.

§ Theophaues, p. 99. Zonaras, lib. xiv.

* Procopius, De Bello Fandal. lib. ii. ad c. 9.

The Eastern Empire.

From A. D. 476. to A. D. 500.

Conquest of Africa by Belisarius.

A. D. 534.

The Gothic War.

A. D. 535

Military. inflame the ambition of Justinian with the thirst of further conquests; and in the year after the overthrow of the Vandalic Monarchy, Belisarius was appointed to the command of a second expedition for the subjugation of the Gothic Kingdom of Italy, and the recovery of that ancient seat of the Empire. The origin, the events, and the issue of the Gothic War, have been already more appropriately embraced in a former Chapter under the Annals of Italy; and a reference to those pages* may briefly supply the narrative of the continued achievements of Belisarius, the completion of his labours by the more fortunate Narses, and the reduction of all Italy under the sceptre of Justinian.† His conduct to Belisarius after the conquest of a second Kingdom, was a disgraceful aggravation of the unfounded jealousy which he had before displayed. A second time was the progress of the hero arrested in his glorious career, by the suspicions of the Emperor; and a second time did his ready obedience to the mandate of recall disprove the insinuation that he aspired to the throne of a conquered Province. The exigencies of a new Persian war were made the pretext for his removal from Italy; and soon after his arrival at Constantinople, he was despatched to the Eastern frontiers of the Empire.

The second Persian War. While the pride of Justinian had sought its indulgence in the subjugation of Africa and Italy, the Asiatic Provinces had been abandoned in a defenceless condition to the assaults of the powerful Monarch of Persia. Tempted by the withdrawal of the Imperial forces, or alarmed for his own ultimate security by the report of their Western conquests, Chosroes resolved to anticipate the probable aggressions of Justinian; and bursting into Syria with an immense army, he penetrated without resistance to its Capital, and after consigning Antioch to the flames, extended his ravages throughout the Province to the shore of the Mediterranean. His progress was checked only by the appearance of Belisarius; and the genius of the conqueror of Carthage and Rome never shone more conspicuously than when, with a feeble and disorderly army, which he dreaded to expose in an encounter, the skillful activity of his movements in two successive campaigns compelled the Persian Monarch to withdraw his host with precipitation and loss from the prosecution of his successes.‡ After these bloodless victories, the removal of Belisarius to his second command in the Gothic war, disclosed the value of his presence in both extremities of the Empire; and Syria was again exposed, by the incapacity and weakness of the Imperial commanders and armies, to the Persian ravages. But, without pursuing the vicissitudes of a long and indecisive warfare, it is sufficient that we record its termination in an inglorious Treaty, by which the Emperor of the East became the tributary of the Persian.§

Successors of Belisarius. In an Age of degeneracy, the virtues of a hero acquire additional lustre by contrast; and the fame of Belisarius merits the peculiar celebrity which it has obtained, by the rare and inexplicable superiority of his great qualities to the debasing spirit of the times. His achievements fill the largest space, and supply the most interesting objects, in the wars of Justinian; and the History of that Emperor's reign may be concluded little to his honour in that of the man, whose accomplished offerings to its glory he repaid with an increasing measure of ingratitude. The domestic fortunes of Belisarius were not happy; and some fond weakness of spirit is discernible in the confiding husband of an imperious and abandoned woman, who tyrannized over his affections while she was faithless to his honour. A close intimacy and a bitter enmity, which alternately prevailed between his wife Antonina and the Empress Theodora, were equally injurious to his domestic peace and his political prosperity. His slow detection and lenient punishment of the infidelity of Antonina during the last Persian war, were followed by a strange scene of humiliation, in which, at the command of the Empress, he was reconciled to his infamous wife, and submitted to the ignominy of a double slavery to both women. At the conclusion of the same war, upon an ambiguous charge of treason, in opposition to all the preceding and subsequent tenour of his life, his person was disgraced, and his treasures confiscated; and still, such was the confidence really reposed by the Emperor in the patient integrity of the formidable subject whom he had so cruelly injured, that Justinian dared to intrust him with the retrieval of the Gothic war. But abandoned to the resources of his unassisted genius, without troops and without supplies, the former conqueror of Italy could only imperfectly sustain the weight of a neglected cause; and he was condemned to remain the mortified spectator of the Gothic successes, until his solicitations through Antonina obtained his recall. The Imperial support which had been denied to him was afterwards freely rendered to the eunuch Narses; and Belisarius survived to learn that the fruits of his Italian services had been gathered by a rival, who was indeed no unworthy successor to his station. After his return to Constantinople, the appointment of Belisarius to the highest dignity in the Imperial household marks a capricious tribute to his services; and while he thus reposed on his laurels, the last years of the aged hero were crowned with a victory which saved the Emperor and the Capital. A sudden and fierce invasion of the Bulgarians, a barbarous people of Slavonic race, who carried their ravages from the Danube almost to the gates of Constantinople, struck terror into the heart of Justinian and his people. Their pusillanimous fears rested the sole hope of protection on the spirit of a feeble veteran; and the last exploit of Belisarius and a handful of his guards, justified the public dependence.* His defeat of the Bulgarians, and the acclamations which attested the popular gratitude, revived the suspicions of Justinian; and while both the jealous despot and his injured champion were rapidly descending into their graves, the Monarch inflicted the last unmerited blow upon his preserver. Upon an unfounded charge of his share in a conspiracy in which two officers of his household were implicated, his person was imprisoned, and his fortune again sequestered. His innocence was soon recognised, and his honours and wealth were restored; but his death was probably hastened by grief and resentment at this bitter aggravation of insult and injury, for he survived his release only a few months.†

The death of Belisarius was soon followed by that of his ungrateful master; and the retributive judgment of posterity has perpetuated the name of Justinian in

The Eastern Empire.

From
A. D.
476.
to
A. D.
800.

His disgrace.

Second command in Italy.
A. D.
544.

And last victory over the Bulgarians.
A. D.
559.

Base ingratitude of the Emperor.

Death of Belisarius, and of Jus-tinian.

A. D.
565.

* Vide pp. 282, 283 of this volume.

† Procopius, De Bellis Gothicis, lib. i.—iii.

‡ Ibid., De Bellis Persicis, lib. ii. c. 1—28.

§ Agathias, lib. iv. c. 142.

* Agathias, lib. v. p. 155—174. Theophanes, p. 198.

† Theophanes, p. 204. Zonaras, lib. xiv. p. 69. The popular fiction that Belisarius was deprived of his eye and reduced to beggary, has been clearly exposed by Gibbon, ch. xlii.

History.

From

A. D.

476.

to

A. D.

800.

reproachful association with the wrongs of his illustrious General. The memory of the Emperor has thus deservedly incurred nothing but disgrace from the exploits of the hero, who achieved the chief glories of his reign. His treatment of Belisarius is altogether indefensible: but with this exception, his character appears in favourable opposition to the selfish and furious vices which deformed the lives of the Byzantine Cæsars. His reign of thirty-eight years occupies a space more memorable than Centuries of their weakness and tyranny; and a large share of the importance of this epoch is derived from the personal qualities of the Sovereign. The blameless morality of his private life, his habits of industrious application to business and science, and the general clemency of his disposition, are admitted even by Writers who have sought occasion for ridicule in his anxiety for the interests of Religion, and his zealous observance of devotional exercises. The useful merit of his extraordinary activity in the Civil administration of his Empire, may have been depreciated by errors of judgment or conduct, but it was more probably defeated by the resistance of incurable abuses. The distinction between the personal vanity and generous ambition of Princes is not easily defaced: but the desire of fame was the master passion of Justinian; and if it was sometimes displayed in projects which lavished his treasures and multiplied exactions from his People, that was at least no vulgar self-love which numbered among its monuments many magnificent public edifices, the recovery of the ancient Provinces, and the reformation of the ancient Jurisprudence of Imperial Rome.*

Rapid decline of Justin II's Empire.

Those successful enterprises, although the impulse of only a transient and fallacious rigour, have given an extraordinary interest to the reign of Justinian, and entitled the narration of its events to occupy a far greater space than any period of equal length in the inglorious series of the Byzantine Annals. Beyond this epoch there is little temptation to linger over the worthless catalogue of despots, whose reigns were with few exceptions neither dignified by personal virtue, nor illustrated by memorable undertakings; and the fleeting vicissitudes of two Centuries may with propriety be dismissed in fewer pages than have been devoted to the transactions of thirty-eight years. From the death of Justinian to the accession of Heraclius, an interval of nearly half a century is marked by the rapid decline of the Empire; by the loss of Northern Italy through the Lombard conquests; by the frequent ravages of the Persians in the Asiatic Provinces; by the incursions of the Bulgarians and Avars from the banks of the Danube to the gates of Constantinople; and by the distractions of internal rebellion and revolution.

Reigns of Justin II

A. D.

565.

This period is filled by the reigns of four Princes: Justin II., Tiberius II., Maurice, and Phocas. The first of these, one of the seven nephews of Justinian, rested his pretensions to the throne on the common title of that consanguinity, and owed the preference of his claims over those of his relations to an intrigue of the Palace. Though his personal intentions were good, his public administration was disorderly and calamitous; his feeble reign was disgraced by the establishment of the Lombards in Italy, the unresisted settlement of the Avars on the Danube, and the last conquests of the great Chosroes in Asia; and the only benefit which Justin conferred upon the Empire was his adoption of the virtuous Tiberius, the commander of his guards, for his Imperial colleague and successor.⁶ The merit by which Tiberius had raised himself from obscurity, justified the choice of his patron, and was honourably displayed in the foreign and domestic government of the Empire. His vigorous preparations provided for the successful defence of Syria against the Persians; and the repulse of Chosroes was the principal event of a brief reign, which was closed by disease too soon for the happiness of his People.⁷ On his death-bed he bestowed the hand of his daughter, and the diadem of the Empire, on Maurice, a soldier of fortune, who had honourably risen by qualities similar with his own, and who continued on the throne to emulate his principles and example. During the reign of Maurice, the Civil wars of the Persians gave some respite from their assaults to his Asiatic Provinces; and the restoration of the grandson and heir of the name of Chosroes, to the throne of the Sassanides, by the alliance and the auxiliary arms of the Emperor, was followed by an advantageous Peace in the East. This success enabled Maurice to recall his troops to the defence of his European Provinces from the oppression of the Avars; a Tartar Nation, who in the reign of Justinian had approached the frontiers of the Empire in their flight before a still more formidable Scythian race, and first revealed to Europe the existence of their conquerors the TURKS. The cruel inroads of the Avars, the annual scourge of the Empire, were with difficulty repelled; but the licentious spirit of the Imperial armies was more fatal to Maurice than the fury of the Barbarians. The vices of the Age, and the disorders of the Empire, were incapable of correction by the virtuous efforts of a single individual. The introduction of reforms was resisted by a meeting of the troops, and a sedition of the Capital; Maurice was abandoned by his faithless guards; and after a vain effort to escape he was inhumanly murdered with five of his sons, by the command of the rebel Phocas, who was raised by the troops from the rank of a simple centurion to the throne of the Empire.⁸ The usurper proved himself a monster of cruelty; and his ignominious and tyrannical reign of eight years was closed by a well-merited fate. The Green faction of the Hippodrome, who had powerfully favoured his elevation, was abetted by his ingratitude; the unanimous voice of the Capital approved the revolt of the Exarch or Governor of Africa; and the approach of an armament, which that officer despatched from Carthage against the tyrant under his son Heraclius, was welcomed by the people of Constantinople. Phocas was seized and beheaded; and Heraclius was invested, by the united suffrages of the Clergy, the Senate, and the Populace, with the Imperial title.⁹

* The character of Justinian, of which a candid examination even of the evidence of Procopius, when cleansed from the palpable malice of the Anecdotes, leaves a favourable impression, has been too harshly treated by Gibbon, who could not forgive the attachment of the Emperor to the cause of Religion. The whole narrative of the reign of Justinian, otherwise among the most splendid efforts of that great Historian's genius, is deformed by the unhappy mental obliquities which delighted in the insult both of piety and decency.

⁶ Theophanes, Chronograph. p. 204—210. Zonaras, lib. xiv. p. 70—72. Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. lib. v. c. 1—11.

⁷ Theophanes, p. 210—212. Zonaras, lib. xiv. p. 72. Evagrius, lib. v. c. 13.

⁸ Theophanes, p. 213—244. Zonaras, lib. xiv. p. 73—80. Evagrius, lib. vi. c. 1—24.

⁹ Theophanes, p. 242—250. Zonaras, lib. xiv. p. 80—82. Nicephorus, Breviarium Historicum, p. 1—8.

History.

From

A. D.

476.

to

A. D.

500.

Accession

and reign of Hera-clius.

Contrast of his youth and vigour.

Considered

conquest of the Asiatic

Provinces

and Egypt

by the Persians.

The European Provinces recaptured by the Avars.

Heracles

commences his deliverance from the Enigma.

A. D.

622.

His triumphant

career.

The reign of Heraclius, which was illustrated by the last triumph of the Roman arms over the Persians, and disgraced by the first successes of the Saracens, is a memorable era in the Annals of the Eastern Empire. The character of Heraclius himself is among the strangest contradictions in History. During the first twelve years after his accession, the promise of an enterprising spirit which had been given in his adventurous attempt against the tyrant Phocas, was belied by the slothful dissipation of his life, and an apparent insensibility both to his own honour, and the glory and the safety of the Empire. Under the fair, and perhaps sincere, plea of avenging the cruel fate of his benefactor, Maurice, the second Chosroes had indignantly refused the alliance of his assassin, declared war against him, and wrested the greater part of Syria from his dominion. But when Heraclius announced the fall of the common enemy, Phocas, and proposed a renewal of friendship between the two Empires, the ambition of the Persian Monarch had been too eagerly excited by his success, to be restrained by the feeble appeal to his consistency and justice. Abandoning without shame the original motive of hostilities, he pursued his career of conquest; and Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Asia Minor were successively overrun by his armies, and fell an easy prey to his assaults. His want of a navy alone saved the European Provinces, and prevented the total destruction of the Empire: but his cavalry penetrated to the Asiatic shore of the Hellespont, and a Persian camp was maintained for above ten years in sight of Constantinople itself. Meanwhile the ferocious Avars annually devastated the European Provinces; and the remains of the Roman Empire were reduced to the walls of its Capital, with the remnant of Greece and Italy, the Prefecture of Carthage, and a few cities on the Asiatic coasts.

In this extremity of dishonour and calamity, Heraclius, to the amazement both of his hopeless subjects and his insolent enemy, suddenly shook off the sloth of years, and arose a patriot and a hero. The narrative of his subsequent exploits might seem to belong rather to the creations of Romance than to the records of History; nor have the meagre though florid pages of the Byzantine Chroniclers satisfactorily explained the causes of that alternation of supineness and vigour in the personal conduct of the Emperor, of which they have supplied the authenticated results. In his first campaign, Heraclius, abandoning his Capital to be defended by its own strength against the Avars, and unable to oppose a front to the Persian hosts which threatened its safety from the opposite shores of Asia Minor, landed far in their rear on the coast of Cilicia. His troops, few in numbers, and weaker in spirit, were reinforced from the maritime garrisons, and were gradually restored to discipline and confidence by his ability and example. A signal victory was the honourable reward of his exertions, and the Persian invaders of the Empire began already to feel the weight of his presence in Asia, when he was recalled to Constantinople to repel a fresh menace of the Avars. His temporizing policy purchased a short respite from the assaults of those rapacious Barbarians; and again embarking from the Capital, he directed a new attack upon his Persian enemies from the opposite quarter to that in which he had last disquieted them. Disembarking at Trebizond on the Euxine, he at once boldly led a small but now well-disciplined and gallant army through the Armenian mountains into the heart of Persia, and obliged Chosroes to recall his armies from their pursuit of conquest to the protection of his own devastated territories. During five glorious campaigns, the course of Heraclius was frequently almost lost to the knowledge of his own subjects at Constantinople, until they finally experienced the full effects of his victories in the retreat of the Persians from Asia Minor. The danger of the Metropolis of the Empire had meanwhile been imminent. In concert with the Generals of Chosroes, an immense army of the Avars had advanced to its walls, and subjected the luxurious population to the horrors of a siege; while the Persians, though prevented from crossing the Strait by the Grecian fleet, destroyed the Asiatic suburbs, and aggravated the terror and conflagration which were spread by the Barbarians on the opposite shore. But the Senate and People were animated by the spirit of Heraclius, and assisted by a succour of twelve thousand regular troops which he sent by sea to their relief, and the host of the Avars were finally compelled either by the courageous operations of the defence, or the want of provisions, to retreat from the walls. The last encounter of the Roman and Persian armies, which completed the deliverance of Constantinople, had for its scene the far distant plain of Nineveh. The host of Chosroes was totally defeated; and the flight of the Great King was followed by the ordinary spectacle of an Oriental Revolution. He was murdered by his son; and the parricide hastened to conclude a Peace with the conqueror. The original limits of the two Empires were restored; and Heraclius returned crowned with glory to his Capital.*

The trophies which he had won were among the most honourable that ever rewarded the arms of an absolute Prince: yet his victories were almost equally fatal to his own subjects and to his enemies. The result of the long and desolating contest between the Byzantine and Persian Monarchies left them in a common state of exhaustion, and prepared the easy triumph of the followers of Mohammed over both. Under no circumstances, perhaps, would the slaves of Heraclius or Chosroes have been capable of resisting the free and vigorous fanaticism of the Moslems: but the epoch at which Mohammed issued the tremendous precept of conquest and conversion, was singularly favourable to its success. The Persian power was disorganised by foreign defeats and intestine disorders; the Eastern Empire had only been rescued from destruction by an overwrought and unnatural effort of expiring strength, which subsided into the languor of a hopeless decay. The personal character of Heraclius aggravated the weakness and danger of his Empire. After his return from the Persian war, he relapsed into the sluggish spectator of the public calamities; the only efforts of his mind were uselessly excited in theological disputations; and when the progress of a new and more formidable enemy disturbed his indolent repose, he proved himself incapable of being a second time effectually roused by the sense of shame or the voice of duty. The laurels of his reign withered in the Syrian war against the Saracens; his flight before their arms renewed the dishonour of his youth; and a meridian life of glory was sullied by an old age of sloth and ignominy.†

* Theophrastus, p. 250—278. Nicephorus, p. 8—16. George Pisd. (Acras and Bell. Avaricus) passim.

† Theophrastus, p. 278—283. Nicephorus, p. 16—18.

The Eastern Empire.

From

A. D.

476.

to

A. D.

600.

and final success.

A. D.

625

Reverses of his reign.

The Sarac-

ens invasions and conquests.

A. D.

632.

to

A. D.

640.

Disaster

and death of Heraclius.

A. D.

641.

History.

From
A. D.
476.

to
A. D.
800.

Reigns of the descendants of Heraclius:

Constantine III.
and Heraclonas.

A. D.
641.

Constans II.

A. D.
641.

Constantine IV.

A. D.
668.

Justinian II.

A. D.
685.

Exile of the Heraclian Dynasty.

A. D.
711.

Interval of anarchy.

Philipppus.

A. D.
711.

Anastasius II.

A. D.
713.

Theodosius III.

A. D.
716.

During the last years of Heraclius, and throughout the reigns of his feeble and vicious successors, even to the close of the period before us, the foreign affairs of the Eastern Empire are disgracefully involved, and have been briefly traced, in the progress of the Saracen conquests. The domestic Annals of the Byzantine Palace are little worthy of a separate notice: since their passive uniformity is relieved only by the alternation of voluptuous pleasure and atrocious crime. The progeny of Heraclius were seated on the throne of the East for seventy years after his death; and this period is occupied with the reigns of five Princes, each of whom is almost equally destitute of ability or virtue. By his last Testament, Heraclius declared his two sons, Constantine III., and Heraclonas, the equal heirs of the Empire: but the elder survived this association only a few months; and it was believed that he had been poisoned by his step-mother Martina. His death was revenged by a popular tumult, in which Martina and her son, after suffering a horrible mutilation, were condemned to end their days in banishment; and Constans II., the youthful son of Constantine, was raised to the throne. As he advanced towards manhood, the character of the new Emperor developed the most atrocious qualities; and the sacrifice of a brother's life to his inhuman jealousy may sufficiently characterise the spirit of his reign. He was driven by the imprecations of his subjects into a voluntary exile from the Capital, and was murdered by his domestics in a bath at Syracuse. His eldest son was immediately proclaimed as his successor by the Senate and People of Constantinople: but the character of Constantine IV., was little less flagitious than that of his father. It was equally stained with fraternal discord; and the pretensions of his two brothers to an effectual participation in the Imperial dignity were cruelly punished by the Emperor with mutilation and imprisonment. The commencement of the reign of Constantine IV. was indeed illustrated by the first Saracen siege of Constantinople and the repulse of the Moslems: but the Emperor had no share in the honour of the defence; and his whole life was equally inglorious and worthless. With the name of his son and successor, Justinian II., we may impatiently close the enumeration of the Heraclian Dynasty. His tyranny provoked an insurrection; the vicissitudes of his deposition, his exile, and his restoration, are equally uninteresting; and a second rebellion, which was aroused by his cruel revenge, and closed by his own murder together with that of his son, extinguished at once the life of Justinian II. and the race of Heraclius.*

This catastrophe was followed by six years of anarchy, into which were crowded the troubled reigns of no less than three Emperors, Philipppus, Anastasius II., and Theodosius III. Of these ephemeral Princes, the first owed his elevation to his principal share in the revolt against Justinian, and was himself assassinated in a conspiracy of the Palace. His secretary and successor, Anastasius, was innocently compelled by the conspirators to assume the purple, and by a mutiny in the fleet to resign its possession. Theodosius, from an obscure office in the Customs, reluctantly ascended the vacant throne, and submitted in his turn to the superior fortunes and energy of a new pretender, the leader and choice of the Asiatic troops, who derived the most honourable claim to the diadem from the imminent danger of the Empire, and justified his election by its deliverance from foreign assailants. This was Leo III., by birth an Isaurian, whose reign is illustrated by the foundation of a Dynasty, the repulse of the Saracens in their second siege of Constantinople, and the origin of the great Schism on Image Worship. But the defeat of the Moslems in their gigantic enterprise against the Capital of the East has been already related; and the particulars of the contest on Image Worship will be more appropriately placed under the Ecclesiastical division of our subject. The consequences of the Emperor's Religious zeal were disastrous for the interests of his temporal dominion; and the revolt and eventual loss of the Italian Exarchate have been traced to the same cause which produced the separation of the Latin and Greek Churches. In other respects the administration of the IIIrd Leo, who is distinguished in his series by the surname of the Iconoclast, or Image Breaker, was equally virtuous, able, and fortunate; and after a reign of twenty-four years, he peacefully bequeathed his sceptre to his son Constantine V., who inherited both his zeal against Idolatry, and his martial activity against foreign and domestic enemies. The personal character of Constantine has been fiercely assailed by the hatred of the votaries of Images, both in his own and later Ages: but the evidence for their accusations is suspicious; and the fact is certain that his long reign of thirty-four years was neither inglorious for the Empire nor devoid of benefits to his subjects.†

Constantine V. was succeeded by his son Leo IV., a Prince equally feeble in body and mind, whose marriage with an Athenian maid of private station, the fair but infamous Irene, produced a long tissue of crimes terminating in the restoration of Image Worship and the downfall of the Isaurian Dynasty. The Empress is accused of having shortened by poison the life of her husband; and the probability of her guilt is strengthened by her subsequent conduct towards her son, in which she showed herself hardened by ambition against the last compunctious feelings of her sex and of nature. By the Testament of Leo IV., she was invested with the guardianship of their infant son Constantine VI. and the administration of the Empire. During his minority, she ably and faithfully discharged the duties of a Regent; but as soon as Constantine attained the age of manhood, and was instigated by the companions of his dissolute pleasures to remove her from the administration, she conspired against him, procured the seizure of his person, and deprived him of his eyes in the same apartment of the Palace in which she had given him birth. For this horrible crime, to which it has been justly said that History may scarcely offer a parallel, the execration of all Ages has deservedly pursued the memory of the unnatural mother: yet its perpetration was suffered for five years to secure a reign of considerable splendour; and her fall was finally effected, not by the retributive vengeance of her subjects, but by the treason of domestics whom she had laden with benefits. By a conspiracy of the Palace, her treasurer Nicophorus was elevated to the purple, and Irene was dismissed to drag on the miserable residue of her guilty life in exile and indigence.

The Eastern Empire.

From
A. D.
476.

to
A. D.
800.

Reigns of the descendants of Heraclius:

Constantine III.
and Heraclonas.

A. D.
641.

Constans II.

A. D.
641.

Constantine IV.

A. D.
668.

Justinian II.

A. D.
685.

Exile of the Heraclian Dynasty.

A. D.
711.

Interval of anarchy.

Philipppus.

A. D.
711.

Anastasius II.

A. D.
713.

Theodosius III.

A. D.
716.

* Theophanes, p. 293.—321. Nicophorus, p. 18.—32. Zonaras, lib. xv.

• Vide p. 374 of this Volume.

† Theophanes, p. 321.—344. Zonaras, lib. xv.

History.

From
A. D.
476.
to
A. D.
800.State and extent of the Eastern Empire at the close of the VIIIth Century.

But the reign of Irene is divided by the chronological line of separation at which we terminate the First Period of Modern History; and instead of here pursuing further the revolutions of the Byzantine Palace, we may pause to survey the general state and extent of the Eastern Empire, in the wane of her fortune and at the close of the VIIIth Century. Under the Isaurian Dynasty the strength of Constantinople had resisted the last tremendous shock of the undivided Saracen power; and the subsequent disruption of the Khalifate, or rather the rapid decline of the fanatical energy, which in a single Age had effected the conquest of one half of the Empire, suspended the destruction of the remainder. After the failure of the Saracens in their second siege of Constantinople, the Eastern Empire enjoyed a cessation from their assaults of above sixty years; and during the sanguinary struggle of the Ommiaden and Abbassiden factions, the Greeks even found an opportunity, from the distraction of their enemies, to retaliate on them some of the calamities to which they had themselves been exposed by the corruption and disorders of their State. But when the descendants of Abbas were firmly seated on the Oriental Khalifate, the danger of the Empire revived. Several of the early Khalifs of the new Dynasty were enterprising and warlike; and Mohadi, the third of the race, took advantage of the weakness of a female reign to invade Asia Minor with an immense army. After penetrating to the shores of the Bosphorus, this host in sight of Constantinople itself exacted from Irene the promise of an annual tribute; and as often as its payment was refused, the great Ha-roun al Raschid, the son of Mohadi, after his succession to the Khalifate, renewed the devastation of Asia Minor, and compelled the disgraceful submission of the Byzantine Court. The superiority of the Greek navy in its inextinguishable fire alone protected Constantinople and the European Provinces from his arms; and the Eastern Empire still lingered through its feeble existence until the vigour of the Abbassiden Dynasty was spent, and the Khalifate of Bagdad fell into a decay, if possible more corrupt and more fatally irretrievable than its own. Thus destined to survive the fall of the fierce power which had threatened its total destruction, the Eastern Empire, at the close of the VIIIth Century, still embraced some of the fairest portions of the Earth, and presented an extent of territory which, under a less vicious Government, and with a less pusillanimous People, might have renewed the hope of glorious dominion. Syria, Egypt, and Western Africa were indeed totally lost; Northern and Central Italy—the Kingdom of Lombardy, the Exarchate of Ravenna, and the venerable ruins of Rome—had been successively, and for ever, dissevered from the Empire of Constantine and of Justinian. But the whole of Ancient Thrace and Macedonia, or of Modern Turkey, with the Continent and Islands of Greece, a part of Southern Italy under the title of the Duchy of Naples, all Sicily, Corsica, Sardinia, and Crete, and the fertile Provinces of Asia Minor, were still possessed by the Sovereigns of Constantinople.*

* Theophanes, p. 344—407. Zonaras, lib. xv. ad p. 122. (vol. ii.) Gibbon, ch. xlviii. li. &c.

The Eastern Empire.From
A. D.
476.
to
A. D.
800.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXIII.

OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH—OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS—AND OF THE HERESIES IN THE VIIth AND VIIIth CENTURIES.

History.
Western Church advances its power as the Eastern Church declines.

At the time at which the rapid success of the Mohammedan Religion threatened the destruction, not only of the Greek Church, but of the Eastern Empire, the Latin Church was gaining an accession to its power and privileges, and also an extension of its limits. Besides the danger which threatened the Greeks from the military conquests of a new Religious Sect, they were so entirely occupied by their Theological disputes, that they had little solicitude for the propagation of Christianity among Infidel nations. The Bishops of Rome, and the Church over which they presided, neglecting the cultivation of Letters and Philosophy, were intent on the enlargement and the extension of their preeminence and authority. But that disposition, as it led them to establish their supremacy over the barbarous nations of the North and West of Europe, incited them to attempt also the necessary preliminary, of converting those nations to the Christian Faith.

The foundation of the Anglo-Saxon Church, and the encroachments of the Popes, both on the absolute independence of the ancient British and Irish Churches, and also on the limited dependence which subsisted between the original Saxon Church and the See of Rome, have been already related. The ambitious views of the Romish Bishops over the other parts of the Western Empire, though at first resisted, were ultimately successful. It is affirmed by the Latin Historians, that the Emperor Constantine Pogonatus formally abandoned the privilege of confirming by his approbation the election of the Bishops of Rome; and it is indisputable that he abated or remitted the sum which, since the time of Theodorice, they had been obliged to pay into the Imperial Treasury before their election was confirmed.*

Constantine Pogonatus abandons the Imperial power of confirming the election of the Popes.
A. D. 684.

Degeneracy of Monastic institutions.

Nothing contributed more to the extension of the Papal power, than the increase and the degeneracy of Monachism. In the establishments originally consecrated to the service of God, there was a lamentable decay both of Learning and Morality. The most bitter dissensions also took place between the Seculars and Monastics, during which the latter had recourse to the alliance of the Roman Pontiffs. The Popes gradually exempted the Monastic Orders from the jurisdiction of the Bishops; and the Monks in return for this immunity devoted themselves to advance the interest and dignity of the Popedom.*

The opulence of the Clergy, augmented as it now was by extravagant bequests and donations, occasioned a general corruption of manners in the Church. An opinion generally prevailed that the punishments of another World might be averted by liberal donations to Churches and Ecclesiastics; and the great and wealthy, who had been remarkable for their flagitious lives, thought to appease the Divine wrath by their munificence to the Ministers of Religion. The Roman Pontiff was the chief gainer by this lavish secular bounty during the VIIth and VIIIth Centuries. The Barbarous nations who received the Gospel, regarded the Bishop of Rome as the successor of their chief Druid or High Priest, and paid to him similar honours. Hence arose the popular notion, that such persons as were excluded from the Church by the Pontiff or by any other Bishop, forfeited not only their Civil rights but the common privileges of humanity. This opinion, which was the prolific source of wars and rebellions, was borrowed from the Pagan superstitions, and encouraged by Christian Rome.

Of the Christian Church.
And of the secular Clergy.

Constantine, at the commencement of the VIIIth Century, was the first Pope who assumed those lofty titles which his successors persevered in claiming, and arrogated a right of confirming temporal Princes in their dominions. When Felix, the Exarch of Ravenna, journeyed to Rome for consecration by the Pontiff, and refused to pay a tribute demanded on that occasion, the unfortunate Prince was sent to Constantinople, where the Emperor deprived him of sight, and sent him back to Rome, as a rebel against the Apostolic See.† The same Emperor, Justinian II., offered to the Pontiff the homage of prostration and kissing his feet.

Felix, Exarch of Ravenna, cruelly treated by Justinian II.
A. D. 702.

It was not, however, from the Emperor that the Roman Pontiffs derived the largest accessions of authority, but from the French nation. Pepin, who was originally Mayor of the Palace to Childeric III., and in this capacity virtually possessed Regal power, aspired to the title as well as the authority of a Sovereign, and formed the design of dethroning his master. For that purpose the Estates of the Realm were convened by the usurper; and probably by his instigation they delivered Pepin advances the temporal power of the Roman Pontiffs.

* Muratori, Scriptor. Rerum Ital. tom. iii. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. vii. sec. 13. Anastas. Vit. Pontif. in Benedic. II.

* Muratori, Antiq. Ital. tom. ii. p. 944—949.
† Anastas. Vit. Pontif. Vit. Constant. I.

History.

A. D.
751.

an opinion that the Bishop of Rome was to be consulted, whether such a project were lawful or not. In consequence of that opinion, ambassadors were sent by Pepin to Zachary the reigning Pontiff, with the following question: Whether the Divine Law did not permit a valiant and a warlike People to dethrone a pusillanimous and indolent Monarch, who was incapable of discharging the functions of Royalty, and to substitute in his place one who was more worthy to rule, and who had already rendered most important services to the State? Zachary, who stood in need of the assistance of Pepin against his enemies the Greeks and Lombards, returned a favourable answer to the usurper. In pursuance of an opinion delivered by an authority now esteemed sacred, the unhappy Childeric was deposed, and Pepin, without the smallest opposition, seated himself on the throne of France. The decision of Zachary was confirmed by his successor Stephen II., who undertook a journey into France to solicit assistance against the Lombards, and at the same time dissolved the oath of allegiance which Pepin had sworn to Childeric, but which he had shamelessly violated.*

The advantages derived by the Roman Pontiffs from their attachment to the Kings of France were important. They gradually became masters of the Grecian Provinces in Italy, which had been subject to the Exarchs of Ravenna. When Astolpho, King of the Lombards, meditated the conquest of Rome and its territory, Stephen II. addressed himself to Pepin. The French Monarch espoused the cause of the terrified Pontiff with zeal. He crossed the Alps with a numerous army, and having defeated Astolpho, obliged the vanquished King to deliver up to the See of Rome the Exarchate of Ravenna, and all the cities which he had seized belonging to the Roman Dukedom. The Lombard King having violated this Treaty shortly after its conclusion, Pepin returned into Italy a second time, compelled Astolpho to execute the terms, and made a formal grant of the Exarchate to the Roman Pontiff, and his successors in the Apostolic See of Saint Peter.†

Dideric, King of the Lombards, renewed an attack on the patrimony of Saint Peter after the death of Pepin, and Adrian I., who was at that time Pontiff, applied to Charlemagne, the son of Pepin. That Prince, whose veneration for the Roman See was rather the offspring of policy than of superstition, declared himself without hesitation on the side of the Pontiff. He crossed the Alps with a formidable army, and terminated the contest between the Bishops of Rome and the Kings of Lombardy for ever. The Exarchate of Ravenna was overthrown; its vanquished Prince was sent into France, and Charlemagne proclaimed himself King of the Lombards. The conqueror visited Rome, where it is said he not only confirmed the grants which Pepin had made to its Bishops, but added to them new donations. By these acts he opened a way to the attainment of an object, which Pepin had contemplated, but was unable to accomplish, he was enabled to gain the authority, as well as to assume the title of Emperor of the West. While he reserved to himself the nominal sovereignty over the Metropolis of the West, he granted to the Church a subordinate jurisdiction over the city and the adjacent territory.*

It is impossible to deny that the progress of Christianity in the West was simultaneous with the growth of the Papal power; but the work of conversion was not undertaken by the Pope. The British, Scottish, and Irish Ecclesiastics were the principal Missionaries; through them Germany was brought to the knowledge of Christianity; and the Scottish and Irish Convents in Germany still subsisting, attest the pious zeal of those nations.

Columban, an Irish Monk, aided by a few companions, had, in the preceding century, extirpated the ancient superstitions of Gaul, in which Country idolatry had taken its deepest root. He then extended his travels among the Suevi, the Boii, the Franks, and other German nations, and persevered in his pious labours until his death. Saint Gal, one of his companions, laboured in the same cause among the Helvetii around the lakes of Zurich and Constance. Near the latter lake, at a small distance from Bregent, he erected a Monastery which still bears his name. In fortitude and zeal he was inferior to none of his contemporaries, although little is recorded of his virtues.

The history of Killan, another Irish missionary, is Saint better known. He received a commission from the Bishop of Rome to preach the Gospel among the Infidels, and with some of his disciples he came to Wirtzburg upon the Mayne, a city under the government of a Pagan Duke called Gosbert. Gosbert embraced Christianity and was baptized, but having married his brother's wife, Killan ventured to imitate the example of John the Baptist towards Herod, and experienced a similar fate. In the absence of Gosbert, Grilana, the German Merodias, procured the murder of Killan and his companions, and Gosbert was prevailed on by the artifices of his consort to suffer the murderers to escape with impunity.

Towards the conclusion of this century, Willebrod, a native of England, with eleven of his countrymen,† crossed over into Holland to preach the Gospel among the Frieslandens, thence they passed into Fosteland, but having been cruelly treated by Radbod, King of the Frieslandens, who put Wigbert, one of the company, to death, they visited Cimbria and the adjacent parts of Denmark, and returned to Friesland. Their second visit was more prosperous than the first. Willebrod was ordained Bishop of Willeburg; by the Roman Pontiff, and died among the Batavians in a good old age, while his associates continued their labours in Westphalia and the neighbouring Countries.

But the greatest luminary of Germany in this century was an Englishman named Winfrid, born at Kinton in Devonshire. From his infancy he was brought up in Monastic habits, and the place of his education was Nutrell, in the Diocese of Winchester. There he was instructed in the sacred and profane Learning of the times. At the age of thirty he was ordained Priest

Of the Christian Church.Missionary exertions of Columban.His death.
A. D.
615.
Saint Gal.Murdered with his companions.
A. D.
699.

Willebrod.

Winfrid.

* This remarkable event is differently related by different Historians. See Mosheim, Eccl. Hist. vol. iii. c. 2. § 9. Epist. Hist. Christ. sec. viii. sec. 4.

† The existence of the grant by Pepin has been hotly controverted. Aræto slyly places it among the deperda treasured in the Moon.

* The extent of Charlemagne's grant is disputed between the partisans of the Popes and those of the Emperors. Adrian affirms that Charlemagne intended to atone for his sins by his liberality to the Church. A letter from that Pontiff to the Emperor is contained in Muratori, Script. Rerum Ital. tom. iii. p. 11.

† Suidbert, Wigbert, Aæa, Willebald, Unibald, Lebwin, the two Ewalds, Werend, Marcellin, and Adalbert.

‡ Now Utrecht.

History. by the recommendation of his Abbot, and his inclinations led him to exercise his ministry in the conversion of Pagan nations. He went to Friesland, accompanied by two Monks, and immediately proceeded to Utrecht, where Willebrod had already displayed his Christian zeal. But a war breaking out between Radbod, King of Friesland, and Charles Martel, Winfrid thought it prudent to return to England, and settled himself once more in his Monastery.

Goes to Friesland.
A. D.
716.

On the death of the Abbot of Nutrell, the fraternity would have elected Winfrid into the vacant seat, but the missionary, keeping his purposed destination in view, declined the proffered dignity. Having obtained recommendatory letters from the Bishop of Winchester, he went to Rome and presented himself to the Pope, expressing a desire of being employed in the conversion of Infidels. Gregory II. approved his undertaking, and gave him a commission of the most ample and unlimited nature.

Receives a commission from Gregory II.

With that commission, Winfrid passed into Bavaria and Thuringia; in the first Country, he reformed Churches which had been already planted, in the second he planted Churches where none had previously existed. But his stay in either of them was not long; he learned that the obstacles which opposed his labours in Friesland were removed, and thither he immediately hastened. Radbod, King of the Frisians, a patron of Idolatry, was dead. Winfrid, therefore, joined the venerable Willebrod, and these two missionaries cooperated in their labours.

Settles in Friesland.

Willebrod declining in strength, chose Winfrid for his successor; but the latter refused the offer, since the Pope had commissioned him to preach the Gospel in the Eastern parts of Germany. Willebrod acquiesced in the resolution of Winfrid, and dismissed his coadjutor with a blessing. The younger missionary departed immediately, and went to Hesse; where his preaching was eminently successful, although he was occasionally obliged to support himself by the labour of his own hands, and was exposed to imminent peril from the rage of barbarous Infidels.

Returns to Rome,

After some time he returned to Rome, was received with great kindness by Gregory II., consecrated Bishop of the newly founded German Churches, under the name of Boniface, (a Roman name seeming more likely to procure respect than one of English origin.) and took an oath of subjection to the Papal authority. Boniface, encouraged by the addition of fresh missionaries from England, returned with alacrity to the scene of his pastoral care. Passing through Hesse, he confirmed by imposition of hands several converts who had already been baptized, and exerted himself vigorously in suppressing idolatry. Charles Martel, whose dominions extended over Germany, distinguished the zealous Bishop by the protection of regal authority.

and lastly to Friesland.

His correspondence with Daniel Bishop of Winchester.

Boniface, however, retained a strong attachment for his native Country, and his early friends. His intimacy with Daniel, Bishop of Winchester, was never interrupted, and the epistolary correspondence of those two Prelates is highly interesting. From England, Boniface was constantly supplied with fellow-labourers, in whom he found consolation under the difficulties by which he was surrounded. His mission was obstructed by the scandalous lives of the Ecclesiastics under his government, and he was often involved in doubts how he should regulate his own conduct towards them. If he avoided all communication with them, he might offend the Court of France, upon whose protection he was obliged to rely. If he preserved an intercourse with them, he was fearful of incurring guilt. He laid his doubts before his ancient friend the Bishop of Winchester, who advised him to endure with patience those evils which he could not amend, not to make a schism in the Church under the hope of purifying it, yet, notwithstanding, to exercise ecclesiastical discipline against notorious offenders.

Of the Christian Church.

The assiduity of Boniface was rewarded by an advancement to the Archiepiscopal See of Mentz. To that dignity he was raised by Gregory III., by whose authority, and under the protection of Carloman and Pepin, the sons of Charles Martel, he founded in Germany the Bishoprics of Wurtzburg, Burabourg, Erfurth, and Aichstadt. The See of Wurtzburg was filled by Burchard, an Englishman, who laboured for ten years with unceasing assiduity, and having exhausted his strength, resigned his Bishopric.

Boniface created Archbishop of Mentz.
A. D.
723.

When Boniface was far advanced in life, he once more visited Rome, and after some stay there, induced several of his Countrymen, who resided in that celebrated city, to join him in his German mission. Returning into Bavaria by the desire of Duke Odilo, he established in that Country three new Bishoprics, Saltzburg, Frisingen, and Ratisbon.

He visits Rome.
A. D.
738.

At last he fixed at Mentz, but his activity was not diminished, and his connection with England was constantly preserved. He often wrote for books, especially for the Works of Bede, whom he styled "The lamp of the Church." He addressed a circular Letter to the Bishops and People of England, entreating their prayers for the success of his missions. Having laboured throughout a long life, he was resolved to labour even to its close. Quitting his archiepiscopal dignity, to which he appointed Lullus an Englishman, he determined to end his life at the spot on which he had begun his missionary undertakings. He returned to Friesland by the Rhine; and there, with the assistance of Eoban, the second Bishop of Utrecht, he brought numerous Pagans to the profession of Christianity. He had appointed a day to confirm those whom he had previously baptized; and in expectation of their attendance, he had encamped with his followers on the banks of the Bordne, a river which was then the boundary between East and West Friesland. On the appointed day he beheld not the new converts whom he expected, but a troop of fierce Pagans armed with shields and lances. His servants prepared for resistance, but Boniface repressed their ardour, and prepared his companions, as himself was prepared, for martyrdom. The Pagans attacked them with fury, and slew the whole company, fifty-two in number, besides Boniface himself. The Christian Germans resented his death by an attack upon the murderers, and the memory of Boniface is still reverently preserved by the honourable appellation of the Apostle of the Germans.

Settles at Mentz.

Quits his Archiepiscopate.

Returns to Friesland.

Is murdered by the Pagans.

Boniface was not the only missionary who attempted to deliver the nations of Germany from the bondage of Pagan superstition; many others signalized their zeal in the same pious undertaking. Corbinian, a French Benedictine Monk, after having laboured with great diligence in planting the Gospel in Bavaria and other Countries, became Bishop of Freisingen. Firmin, a native of Gaul, preached the Gospel under various kinds of suffering and opposition, in Alsatia and Helvetia. The missionaries of this Century would fill a numerous Corbinian.

Firmin.

History. catalogue, but as they are of no great reputation, they may be passed over in silence.

But Idolatry experienced the attacks of a more formidable adversary than any Christian Priest, in the person of Charlemagne. At the conclusion of this Century, that Emperor turned his arms against the German Saxons, not only for the purpose of chastising their rebellious spirit, but of abolishing their idolatrous worship. He expected that their conversion to Christianity would soften their ferocity. This project, however wise in theory, was difficult in practice; his first attempt to convert the vanquished Saxons was defeated, for he made use of Bishops and Monks whose exhortations were vain. More forcible means were afterwards used, and that warlike people, allured by promises of favour, or awed by threats of punishment, suffered themselves to be baptized by missionaries expressly sent by the Emperor. Widekind and Albion, two of the most valiant among the Saxon Chiefs, attempted to extirpate the profession of Christianity by the same violent methods through which it had been planted; but the courage and wisdom of Charlemagne ultimately engaged those two warriors to make a public and solemn confession of their Christian Faith, and to promise an adherence to it during the remainder of their days. Bishops were appointed, and Monasteries and Schools were founded, in order to preserve the knowledge and continue the propagation of Christianity.

Such is the general outline of the state of the Western Church in the VIIth and VIIIth Centuries. To enter minutely into the History of the Eastern Church, would involve a repetition of the Mohammedan and Byzantine Histories, or would anticipate the Biographical notices of Ecclesiastical Writers, and the narrative of the Controversies and Heresies, upon which we are about to enter separately.

Ecclesiastical Writers of the VIIth and VIIIth Centuries.

ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS OF THE VIIth AND VIIIth CENTURIES.

VIIth CENTURY.

GREEK WRITERS.

SOPHRONIUS, DIED CIRCA A. D. 637.

ANTIOCHUS.

MAXIMUS, DIED A. D. 682.

LATIN WRITERS.

ISIDORE OF SEVILLE.

ALDHEN, DIED 709.

THEODORE.

JULIAN POMERIUS.

CRISCONIUS.

VIIIth CENTURY.

GREEK WRITERS.

GERMANUS.

COSEAS.

JOHANNES DAMASCENUS, DIED A. D. 750.

SYNCELLUS.

THEOPHANES.

LATIN WRITERS.

BEDE, DIED A. D. 735.

ALCUIN, DIED A. D. 804.

JOHANNES ERIODEN.

PAULINUS.

GENERAL REMARKS.

The VIIth Century is remarkably barren of Writers, and several circumstances contributed to the declension of Learning. First, may be reckoned the irruption of the Saracens; secondly, the prevalence of the Monothelite Heresy; and thirdly, the increasing corruptions of the Romish Church. The VIIIth Century is of the same complexion, and we shall find few Writers distinguished either for elevation or genius.* The Eastern Church was distracted by the Image controversy, and among the Iconoduli destroyed or suppressed all writings which opposed their superstitions. From the catalogue of obscure authors, we will extract notices of the most remarkable.

SOPHRONIUS

was a native of Damascus, and having first applied himself to the study of Philosophy, became a Monk, and was finally raised to the Patriarchate of Jerusalem. He was chiefly remarkable for the controversies which he carried on against the Monothelites. When Jerusalem was taken by the Khalif Omar, A. D. 637, Sophronius, by the terms of capitulation, was allowed the free exercise of his Religion, but he died shortly after that calamitous event.

Dupin, tom. i. p. 261. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 579.

ANTIOCHUS

was a Monk of Palestine, and belonged to the celebrated Monastery of St. Saba. He was of a very superstitious disposition, and composed a Pandect of the Holy Scriptures, or a Summary of Christian doctrine, contained in one hundred and thirty Homilies. This is his only Work extant, except a Life of St. Euphrosyne, a member of the Monastery of St. Saba.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 576.

ISYCHIUS, OR HESYCHIUS was Bishop of Jerusalem. He wrote a Commentary on several Books of Scripture, and some Homilies which are still extant, besides an Ecclesiastical History which is lost.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 572.

MAXIMUS

580—662, holds the first rank among the Greeks of the VIIth Century. He was born at Constantinople, and held a con-

31

* The VIIth Century is styled Sæculum Monotheliticum; the VIIIth Century Sæculum Iconoclasticum.

History.

fidential situation in the Court of the Emperor Heraclius. When that Prince was seduced by the Monothelite Heresy, Maximus indignantly left the Court, and retired into a Monastery near Constantinople. His literary labours were almost entirely devoted to the Monothelite controversy, with the exception of some Illustrations of the Holy Scriptures. His style, on account of its involutions, is obscure, and moreover tumid.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 586.

GERMANUS

was Bishop of Constantinople, and has obtained a notoriety for his violent zeal in favour of Image-worship. For his pertinacity in opposing the edicts of the Emperor Leo, he was removed from his Bishopric, but ended his life in retirement and peace.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 621.

COSMAS

acquired the appellation of Hagiotopolites, on account of his proficiency in Polite Literature. Having been captured by the Saracens, he was carried to Damascus, and had the honour to be Preceptor of that consummate master of the Peripatetic Philosophy, whom we next about to notice.

JOHANNES DAMASCENUS.

OR. 750.

This eminent writer, who was called Damascenus from the place of his birth, and Chrysorroas from his extraordinary eloquence, was also known by the appellation of Mansus, that being his patronymic.* His father held a station in the Saracenic Court, to which himself succeeded. Having with some difficulty obtained from the Khalif an embassy to Jerusalem, his Preceptor Cosmas was the companion of his journey. At Jerusalem he was advanced to the Order of Priesthood, and soon after he retired to the Monastery of St. Saba, where he passed the remainder of his days.

His Works. His writings are numerous, and illustrate the leading doctrines of Christianity, but he was tinctured with the superstition of his Age, and was a warm advocate for Image-worship.† His Works have been collected in two volumes folio; the best edition is that of Paris, 1712.

Bayle, Dict. tom. ii. p. 950. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. viii. and Hist. Imag. Restit. sec. 2. num. 13. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 624.

SYNCELLUS AND THEOPHANES were two writers on the Byzantine History. The Chronicon of Syncellus was in a great measure borrowed without acknowledgment from the Work of Eusebius. That of Theophanes in its style is rude, and in its matter replete with contradictions.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 641.

* Toi Maestri, Monasterii filius. Thus he is named in the Acta of the Nicene Council, in which he bore a distinguished part, and by Suidas. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. viii.

† Baronius, a favourable witness, confutes of him, In multa ejus scriptis fides vacillat, et compluribus ipsius sceleris mendacia. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 624.

ISIDORE OF SEVILLE.

Ecclesiastical Writers of the VIth and VIIIth
Centuries

The Latin writers of the VIth and VIIIth Centuries were of a higher order than the Greeks. Isidore governed the Church of Seville for forty years. He was born in the VIth Century, but flourished at the beginning of the VIIth. He was a voluminous writer, but perhaps the most useful part of his Works is his Collection of Sentences out of Gregory. The Mosarabic Liturgy, which became the text Book of Spanish worship, was principally from his hand.

ALDHELM

OR. 709.

was of English birth, and of Regal descent, but received his early education in France and Italy. Returning to his native Country, he embraced the Monastic life, and became Abbot of Malmesbury. Having passed more than thirty years in this seclusion, he was promoted to the Bishopric of Sherborn. In the Paschal controversy which so long divided the British and Saxon Churches, he sustained a distinguished part. According to Camden, he was the first Englishman who wrote in Latin, and according to the testimony of Bede,* his erudition was various. His book on the Paschal controversy is lost, but several Poems remain, Concerning the Christian Life, which exhibit no striking marks of genius.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 595. Collier, Ecc. Hist. vol. i. p. 121.

THEODORE

was the seventh Archbishop of Canterbury. The Biography of this Prelate may be seen under the History of the Anglo-Saxon Church. Besides his famous Penitential, there are extant of his writings, 1. Capitula Ecclesiastica, 120. 2. Epistola Theodori ad Ethelredum Merciorum Regem de amicitia inter se et Wilfridum Episcopum Eboracensem quam injustè deponi curaverat Theodorus reintegratâ. Apud Guil. Malmesbur. de Gest. Pontif. lib. iii. fol. 151. et Concil. tom. vi. p. 1383.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 592.

JULIAN POMERIUS

was a native of Toledo, and ultimately elevated to its Archbishopric. Such of his writings as are still extant, were chiefly in confutation of the Jews, and several of his tracts both in prose and verse are lost.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 596.

CRISCONIUS

FLOR. 690.

was an African Bishop, but of what city does not appear. He was the author of two books on Ecclesiastical Law, the one being an Abridgement and the other a Concordance of the Canons. He also wrote a Poem on the wars and victories of Patricius over the Saracens, which is lost.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 600.

* Vix undecunque doctissimus; nam est sermone nitidus, et scripturam tam liberalem quam ecclesiasticarum erat eruditio miranda. Bede, Ecc. Hist. lib. v. c. 19.

BEDE.

672—735.

The Venerable Bede, as he is universally and justly styled,* was born in the neighbourhood of Durham, in a village now called Farrow, near the mouth of the Tyne. Concerning his parents, Biography is silent, but it is probable that they were poor. It is however certain, that he was deprived of them in his infancy, and that he was placed by his kindred in the Monastery of Wearmouth. His youthful days were passed in that retirement, until he became capable of professing the discipline in which he had been educated: he was then removed to the neighbouring Monastery of Jerrow. In those two Religious Houses, situated scarcely five miles from each other, Bede passed and ended his days.

In the nineteenth year of his age, he was ordained a Deacon, and in his thirtieth year was admitted to the Order of Priesthood. We are not informed who the instructors of Bede were, but some notion may be formed of the ability of the teachers in the Benedictine Monasteries from the noble Libraries with which they were furnished. So great was the progress of Bede both in sacred and profane Learning, that his fame had spread to the Continent, and Sergius I., at that time Roman Pontiff, invited him to the Metropolis of the Western Church, to assist in the settlement of some Ecclesiastical disputes, then warmly agitated; an offer which he declined.

The course of his life and studies is thus described by himself. "From the time of my receiving the Order of Priesthood to my fifty-ninth year, I have employed myself in briefly noting from the Works of the venerable Fathers, those things on the Holy Scriptures which are adapted to the necessities of me and mine, and in adding something to the form of their sense and interpretation."

A Monastic life, above any other, must be barren of events, and the chief celebrity of Bede arose from his Lectures. His death is described in the following manner by his pupil Cuthbert. "He was attacked with a severe infirmity of frequent short breathing, yet without pain, about two weeks before Easter Day, and so he continued joyful, employed in returning daily, or rather hourly, thanks to God, till the day of Ascension. He gave lessons to us his disciples every day, and during the remainder of it was employed in singing Psalms. The nights he passed almost without sleep, yet rejoicing and giving thanks, unless when a little slumber intervened. When he waked, he resumed his accustomed devotions, and with expanded hands ceased not to utter thanksgivings. He recited the passage of St. Paul, 'It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God,' admonishing us to awake from the sleep of the mind. He sang the Antiphonæ according to our custom and his own, of which one is 'O King of glory, Lord of virtues, leave us not orphans, but send the promise of the Father, the Spirit of Truth, upon us. Alleluiah.' When he came to the words 'Spirit of Truth,' he burst into tears, and wept much, and we wept with him." After mentioning that Bede was even then occupied in translating St. John's Gospel into Saxon, his pupil adds, "When he came to the third festival before the Ascension day, his breathing began to be very strongly affected, and his feet to swell. All that day he dictated cheerfully, and sometimes said, 'Make haste, I know not how long I may contain. My Maker may call me away very soon.' He passed that whole night in watching and devotion, and in the morning commanded us to write diligently what we had begun. This being done, we walked till the third hour with the relics of the Saints, as the custom of the day required. One of us was with him who said, 'There is yet, beloved master, one chapter wanting, will it not be unpleasant to you to be asked any more questions?' He answered, 'Not at all; take your pen, prepare it, and write with speed!' He did so. At the ninth hour, he said to me, 'I have some valuables in my little chest; but run quickly and bring the Presbyters of the Monastery to me, that I may distribute my small presents.' He addressed each, and exhorted them to attend to their Masses and Prayers. They wept when he told them that they would see him no more, but he said that it was time for him to return to the Being who had formed him out of nothing. He conversed in this manner cheerfully till the evening, when the boy said, 'Dear master, one sentence still is wanting.' 'Write it quickly,' exclaimed Bede. When it was finished, he said, 'Take my head in your hands, for I shall delight to sit opposite the holy place where I have been accustomed to pray, and where I can invoke my Father.' When he was placed on the pavement, he repeated the Gloria Patri, and expired in the effort."

The Theological Works to which Bede alludes in the passage above quoted, consist of Commentaries on the Holy Scriptures, Homilies, Lives of Saints, and Ecclesiastical History. And those comprise three-fourths of all his writings.† He has commented on every Book of the Scriptures from Genesis to the Revelations, and he has introduced on each, as much learning and knowledge as any individual could at that time accumulate by the most patient research. His Treatise on the Trinity is a Commentary on the Tract of Boethius on that subject. His Meditations on the last words of our Saviour display great devotional sensibility. His Homilies must, in the dearth of knowledge which then prevailed, have been abundantly useful. His Lives of Religious persons are disfigured with absurd legends, but as they were the object of general admiration and belief in his day, his credulity was no more than the credulity belonging to the Age.

Of all his Works, the most valuable is the Ecclesiastical History of the Nation of the Angles, which, while it treats professedly of the establishment of Christianity in the different Saxon Kingdoms, contains almost all which we know of the History of their more early Princes. His industry and abilities in this department may be best estimated if we recollect that all notice of public transactions ceased with him. The greatest objection to his History arises from its marvels.

The style of Bede is plain and unaffected, seldom eloquent, and often homely, but clear and precise. His talent of reading is undisputed; he was one of the greatest Ecclesiastics of his times, and while his learning

Ecclesiastical Writers of the VIIth and VIIIth Centuries.

* The legendary story of the origin of the title informs us that one of his scholars willing to surpass his master, wrote

Hæc sunt in fons Bedæ—osm.

Being unable to discover any proper epithet, in his perplexity he fell asleep, and when he awoke he found the verse filled up as follows, Hæc sunt in fons Bedæ VENERABILIS OSm.

• Smith's Bede, p. 793.

† Six folio volumes out of eight.

History. qualified him for the highest stations in the Church, his humility kept him in one of the lowest. Instead of being, as he might have been, a munificent patron of learned men, he chose the laborious life of a Monk, an author, and a teacher, in one of the most remote parts of his native Island.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 616—618. Life of Bede, prefixed to his Works. Turner, Hist. of the Anglo-Saxons, book ix. ch. vi. Muratori, Antiq. Italic. Med. Ævi, tom. iii. p. 325.

ALCUIN, OR ALBINUS

was a native of York or its neighbourhood, although some writers have fixed his birth in the vicinity of London.* He is said to have been one of the disciples of Bede. By Egbert, Archbishop of York, he was appointed Master of the School in that Archiepiscopal city. His reputation attracted crowds of students from Gaul and Germany to his Lectures, and recommended him to the notice of the Emperor Charlemagne. He accepted the invitation of that Prince to reside in his Court,† dislaid a taste for Learning throughout all the Provinces of the Empire, and numbered the most distinguished Prelates and Statesmen among his scholars. When in his old age he retired from the splendour and intrigues of the Imperial Court, many followed him to his retreat at Tours, where he continued his favourite occupation of teaching till his death. His Works are numerous;‡ they consist principally of Poems, Elementary Introductions to the different Sciences, Treatises on a variety of Theological subjects, and Epistles to the most celebrated characters of his Age. His Commentary on the Book of Proverbs and the Epistles of St. Paul, a Treatise on Orthography, and on Music, are lost.

Hist. Lit. de la France, tom. iv. p. 295. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 637—639. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sec. viii. sec. 10.

JOHANNES ERIGENA

was another disciple of Bede, and distinguished for the acuteness of his intellect as well as for the extent of his Learning. He was by birth an Irishman, but was well skilled in Grecian Literature, for he translated from that Language a Work of Dionysius, and the Scholæ of Maximus on Gregory Nazianzen. He dedicated the latter Work to Charlemagne, at whose command he had undertaken it. At the request of his Ecclesiastical superiors, he wrote against Godeschallus on Predestination, but his principal Work was a Treatise, De Divisione Naturæ, a Dialogue which is distinguished for its Aristotelian neatness and extensive information. In a subsequent Age it was condemned, and Pope Honorius III. issued a Bull declaring that it "abounded with worms of heretical depravity." Excommunication was denounced against all who should retain in their possession a copy of so dangerous a Work.*

Erigena enjoyed a great share of Royal favour. King Charles the Bald, one day, when they were feasting opposite to each other, took occasion to give him a gentle rebuke for some irregularity by asking him, Quid distat inter Satum et Scutum? The Philosopher replied with ready wit, Mensa tantum. The Emperor had the good sense and good nature to smile at the repartee.

After the death of Charles, Alfred invited Erigena to England, and rewarded his talents by settling him at Malmesbury. His life ended unfortunately, for it is said that he was stabbed by the boys whom he taught. This story is related also of Erigena, Abbot of Ethelney, but the probable solution of the difficulty is, that Johannes Erigena had been removed from Malmesbury to Ethelney. A difficulty less capable of explanation is, how one and the same Erigena could have been the disciple of Bede and the literary companion of Alfred, or a contemporary of Charles the Bald. These anachronisms cannot be settled.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 45. Turner, Hist. of the Anglo-Saxons, book ix. ch. vi.

PAULINUS,

an eminent Grammarian, was a native of Germany, and rewarded by the patronage of Charlemagne, who advanced him to the See of Aquileia, in which station he proved a formidable opponent of the Felicians. Besides a Treatise on the Trinity, and some controversial Books against the Felicians, he wrote some Sacred Poems.

Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sec. viii. sec. 10. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 696. Art. Sanctor. tom. i.

OTHER WRITERS OF THE VIIth AND VIIIth CENTURIES.

Fredegarius the Historian claims the first place in the list of minor Writers. Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, of whom we have already spoken, wrote a Treatise entitled De unitate Fidei, which is lost, but his Epistles are still extant. Eginhard is known for his Life of Charlemagne. Charlemagne himself is placed in the catalogue of authors.‡ The laws which are known by the title of Capitularia, a Tract concerning Images, with several Epistles, are attributed to him, though it is highly probable that they were the production of some of those illustrious characters whom he so munificently patronised.

* He himself says that he was born and educated at York. Malmb. De Grat. Reg. p. 24.

† He acquired great riches by the favour of Charlemagne. He was indeed reproached on that account, and he does not deny the fact, but affirms that wealth had not corrupted his mind. "It is one thing to possess the world; it is another to be possessed by it." Alb. Ep. p. 927.

‡ They were published by Du Chesne at Paris, in 1617

* The Bull is contained at length in Fabric. Bib. Med. lib. ix. 402. It is dated 10 Kal. Feb. 1225.

† Matt. West. 333.

‡ Yet, according to his Biographer, this great Prince was unable to write. Tentabat et scribere; tubalag et codicillos ad hoc in lectulo sub cervicalibus circumferri solbat; ut cum vacuum tempus exeat munum effugiendis literis assueficeret. Sed parum prosperi successit labor præposterus ac vero inchoatus. Eginhard, Vit. Carum.

History.

VIIth CENTURY.

MONOTHELITES.
MARONITES.

VIIIth CENTURY.

FELICIANS.
ICONOCLASTS.
ICONODULI.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

These two Centuries are remarkable for the progress of ancient Heresies, rather than for the establishment of new. The opinion propagated by Arius were extended in Italy, and the Lombards openly espoused his doctrine, in preference to the Nicene. In Britain the Pelagians continued to excite the warmest dissensions.* The Nestorians and Monophysites acquired new vigour under the empire of the Saracens, from whom they not only received protection but encouragement.† A modification of the Manichean doctrine, the followers of which were known by the appellation of Paulicians, had its rise in this Century; but Ecclesiastical Historians have reserved a more particular account of that Sect until the IXth Century, during which they acquired sufficient strength to support a war with the Greeks. But one Sect arose in the VIIIth Century whose History from its connection with other transactions merits a detail.

THE MONOTHELITES.

Origin of the Heresy.

This Heresy was derived from the Eutychian doctrine, and it arose under the reign of the Emperor Heraclius. It had its rise from an ill-digested and untimely project of that Emperor, to restore the Nestorians to the communion of the Greek Church. In pursuance of this project on his return from the Persian war, he held two conferences, the one with a certain person named Paul, a man of great credit and authority among the Armenian Monophysites, and the other with Athanasius, the Catholic Bishop of Hierapolis. These conferences had for their object the peace and concord of the Church. Both Paul and Athanasius assured the Emperor that the Monophysites might be induced to receive the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, and thereby to terminate their controversy with the Greeks, on condition that the latter would give their assent to the following proposition, viz., that in Jesus Christ there was, after the union of the two natures, but one will, and one operation. Heraclius communicated the proposal to Sergius, Patriarch of Constantinople, a Syrian by birth, and a Monophysite by profession, and that Prelate delivered his opinion that the doctrine of one will and one operation after the union of the two natures, might be adopted without departing from the decrees of the Chalcedonian Council.

Flattering as was the first appearance of this project, it was soon changed. The Emperor published an Edict in favour of the Monothelite doctrine, and it was received if not with general approbation, yet without serious opposition. Some Ecclesiastics refused obedience, but the Patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch received it without hesitation, and from the See of Jerusalem, at that time vacant, no opinion could be received. The consent of the Romish Pontiff was deemed unnecessary in an affair which belonged solely to the Eastern Church. Cyrus, who had been raised by Heraclius from the Bishopric of Phasis to the Patriarchate of Alexandria, assembled a Council, by the VIIIth Canon of which the doctrine of Monothelism, or one will, was solemnly confirmed. Hence Cyrus has been generally esteemed the founder of the Sect. The decree of the Alexandrian Synod, bringing the doctrine of the Council of Chalcedon nearer to the Eutychian system, had the desired effect, and numbers of the Eutychians, who were dispersed throughout Egypt, Armenia, and other remote Provinces, returned to the bosom of the Church. But in the Council of Alexandria there was one dissenter, who carried his opposition to the Monothelite doctrine further than the limits of mere argument, and hostility in debate. Sophronius, a Monk of Palestine, had opposed the decree of the Alexandrian Synod with violence; but his opposition was treated with contempt. In the succeeding year, however, he was elevated to the vacant Patriarchate of Jerusalem; and he soon exercised his authority by summoning a Council, and condemning the Monothelite as a branch of the Eutychian system. Not satisfied with this formal condemnation, he endeavoured to gain Honorius, the Romish Pontiff, to his side, but his efforts were vain. Sergius, who at that time filled the See of Constantinople, informed Honorius of the state of the question, and the Pontiff determined in favour of the Monothelite doctrine.

In order to terminate, if possible, the commotions to which this division of opinion had given rise, Heraclius issued an Edict composed by Sergius, and entitled the Ecthesis, or Exposition of the Faith, in which all controversies upon the question whether in Christ there was a double operation, were prohibited, though the doctrine of a unity of Will was inculcated. A considerable number of the Eastern Bishops declared their assent to the Ecthesis, and above all by Pyrrhus who succeeded Sergius in the See of Constantinople. A similar acceptance was obtained from the metropolis of the Eastern Church; but at Rome the Ecthesis was differently received. John IV. assembled a Council in which that Exposition was condemned.

Neither was the Monothelite system maintained in the Eastern Church any longer than during the life of Heraclius. The Emperor Constantine published a new Edict under the name of the Type, or Formula, suppressing the Ecthesis, and enjoining a silence on both the controverted points of one Will and one Operation. This silence was not sufficient for either of the contending Heresies of the VIIth and VIIIth Centuries.

Edict of Heraclius.

Council at Alexandria.

A. D. 633.

Author of the Heresy.

Ecthesis of Heraclius.

A. D. 639.

It is condemned at Rome.

A. D. 639.

Formula of Constantine.

648.

* Bede, Hist. lib. ii. c. 19.

† The famous Testament of Mohammed was brought from the East in the VIIth Century by Pacificus Scaliger, a Capuchin Monk. It was first published in Arabic and Latin, at Paris. This document is considered by the best writers, as the forgery of some Arabian Monk, with a view to soften the rigour of the Mohammedan yoke. Renaudot is one of those who argue in favour of its genuineness. Hist. Patriarch. Alexandrin. p. 168. In this Testamentary Diploma, Mohammed promises and bequeaths to the Christians in his dominions the quiet and undisturbed enjoyment of their Religion, and of their temporal advantages and possessions. Accordingly the Nestorian Christians enjoyed a considerable degree of favour and confidence under the successors of Mohammed. Renaudot, Hist. Patriarch. Alexandrin. p. 163—168.

History.
Martin condemns the Ecthesis
and the Type.

parties, for both were desirous of keeping alive the subject of contention. They excited Martin, Bishop of Rome, to oppose the pacific Edict, and that Pontiff in a Council of one hundred and five Bishops, having condemned both the Ecthesis and the Type, denounced the most tremendous anathemata on the Monothelites and all their patrons.*

A. D.
619.
Martin is imprisoned by order of the Emperor Constantine.

The Emperor Constantine, offended at these haughty proceedings of Martin, ordered him to be seized, and carried a prisoner to the Island of Naxos, where he remained more than a year.† His imprisonment was attended by much cruel treatment; and a similar punishment was inflicted on the opponents of the Monothelite doctrine.‡ Eugenius and Vitalianus, the succeeding Bishops of Rome, were more moderate and prudent than their unfortunate predecessor; and the latter received Constantine with the highest demonstrations of respect.

A. D.
630.

Vth General Council.

The flames of contention, though suppressed, were always in danger of breaking forth anew; and in order to extinguish them, Constantine Pogonatus, the son of Constantine, by the advice of Agatho, the Roman Pontiff, convened the Vth General Council. It consisted of not less than two hundred and eighty-nine Bishops, among whom were four Legates to represent the Roman Pontiff, the Patriarchs of Constantinople, Antioch, Alexandria, and Jerusalem; and that "Pope of another world," Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury. The place of meeting was in a spacious hall of the Imperial Palace called Trullus, i. e. Cupola, from the form of the building. The President of the Council was Constantine himself.

A. D.
680. to
A. D.
681.

Monothelites
condemned.

The Monothelite controversy was accurately investigated from its beginning: the Epistle of Sophronius to Sergius, the rescripts of Honorius, the letters of Cyrus and Theodore were compared; and a unanimous judgment was passed. 1. The Nicene Creed was defined to be the standard of orthodoxy. 2. The Heresy of the Monothelites and Pope Honorius were condemned, together with Sergius, Pyrrhus, Cyrus, and Meaneus. 3. Those who opposed the decree of the Vth Council were anathematized.

Their tenets.

The truth, or the falsehood, of the Monothelite tenets, bears no proportion to the fury with which they were assailed and defended; and the contending parties mutually disclaimed the errors with which they charged each other. 1. The Monothelites disclaimed all connection with the Eutychians and Monophysites; but maintained in opposition to these two Sects, that in Christ there were two distinct natures which were so united, though without the least mixture or confusion, as to form by their union only One Person. 2. They acknowledged that the soul of Christ was endowed with such a will or faculty of volition, that it was retained even after its union with the Divine Nature. For according to their system Christ was not only perfect God, but perfect Man, whence it followed that his soul was endued with the faculty of volition. 3. They denied that this faculty of volition in the soul of Christ was absolutely inactive, maintaining on the contrary that it cooperated with the Divine Will. 4. They therefore virtually attributed to Christ two Wills, both operative and active; although they affirmed that in a certain sense he had but one Will and Operation.*

Heresy
of the VIIIth and VIIIth Centuries.

THE MARONITES.

These were in fact Monothelites, who, after their doctrine had been condemned by the Council at Constantinople, found a place of refuge among the Mardaites, or mountaineers of Libanus and Antilibanus. About the end of the VIIIth Century they were known by the name of Maronites, from Maro, their first Bishop. This Sect retained the opinions of the Monothelites until the XIIIth Century, when abandoning and renouncing the doctrine of One Will in Christ, they were readmitted to the Communion of the Roman Church. The most learned of the Maronites have indeed laboured to prove that their Communion was never infected with the Monothelite Heresy.

Their name whence derived.

THE FELICIANES.

Felix, Bishop of Urgella, was consulted by Elipand, Archbishop of Toledo, to decide in what sense Christ was God. The answer of Felix was, that Christ, with respect to his Divine Nature, was truly and properly the Son of God, begotten of the Father, and hence he was the true God, together with the Father and the Holy Spirit, in the unity of the Godhead. But that with respect to his Humanity, Christ was the Son of God by adoption, born of the Virgin by the will of the Father, and thus he was nominally God. Hence, according to the opponents of the Felicianes, it followed that there was a twofold Sonship in Christ, and that He must consist of two Persons. The opinion of Felix was considered by the orthodox as nothing more than a scion of the Nestorian Heresy.

Origin of the Heresy

The doctrine of Felix was adopted by Elipand, who, being the Primate of Spain, propagated it through the different Provinces of that Kingdom, while Felix himself contributed to spread it throughout Narbonne and other parts of Gaul. The Roman Pontiff Adrian was a vigorous opponent of Felix, and the Bishop of Urgella was successively condemned by the Councils of Narbonne, Ratisbon, Frankfurt on the Maine, and Rome.† He was at length obliged by the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle to retract his errors. His retraction was, however, merely nominal, for he died at Lyons, whither he had been banished by Charlemagne, in the firm belief of his doctrine. Elipand lived securely in Spain, and was never called before any Synod or Council. The disciples of Felix were sometimes known under the name of Adoptians;‡

Its progress.

Its followers called Adoptians

* It was held in the Lateran, and was summoned by Martin in pursuance of the advice of Maximos, Abbot of Chrysopolis, near Chalcedon. The labour employed to gain Maximos to the Monothelites was most extraordinary. Fleury, Ecl. Hist. book xxiv. c. 12.

† He died in the year 655.

‡ Maximos was scourged, his tongue cut out, and his right hand cut off; and the maimed Abbot was then banished and imprisoned for life. His banishment took place in 636, and he died in 662.

* A copious account of the Monothelite Heresy is contained in the Works of Johannes Damascenus in a Treatise on the two wills, and in his Books on the Orthodox Faith.

† The Council of Narbonne was held A. D. 788, that of Ratisbon A. D. 792, that of Frankfurt A. D. 794, that of Rome A. D. 799.

‡ The Authors who have written concerning the Felicianes are enumerated by Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Med. Ev. tom. ii. p. 492.

THE ICONOCLASTS AND ICONODULI.

The controversy on Image worship which terminated in a schism between the Greek and Latin Churches, cannot be more commodiously related, than by classifying the party which incurred the condemnation of the Church of Rome with the Heretics of the VIth Century, although without assenting to that decision.*

The beginning of this unhappy dispute has been placed in the reign of Philippius Bardanes, Emperor of the Greeks. That Prince, by the advice of John, the Patriarch of Constantinople, ordered a picture which represented the VIth General Council to be removed from its place in the Church of Sta. Sophia. His dislike to the picture was occasioned by his hatred of the Council which had condemned the Monothelites whose cause he espoused. Bardanes, satisfied with this exercise of power, sent an order to Rome for the removal of all similar pictures from the churches. So far, however was this order from producing the desired effect, that Constantine, the Roman Pontiff, published a formal protest against the Imperial Edict. His disobedience to it was expressed by his actions as well as by his words. He commanded six pictures representing the six General Councils to be placed in the porch of the Church of St. Peter; and to render his contempt of the Emperor more public, he assembled a Council at Rome, in which Bardanes was condemned as an apostate from the true Religion. Constantine at the commencement of the dispute gained a decisive victory, for in the following year a revolution deprived Bardanes of the Imperial throne.

Under the two Emperors who succeeded Bardanes the controversy appears to have been suppressed; but when Leo the Isaurian assumed the purple, it broke out with redoubled fury. Leo, disgusted at the superstitious veneration shown by the Greeks to Images, and feeling the reproach which the abuse had drawn on the Christian Religion, determined to extirpate the evil if it were possible. For this purpose he issued an Edict, prohibiting the adoration or worship of Images, which some Writers have misrepresented as an injunction to destroy them. For he expressly commanded that they should be placed higher in the Churches in order that adoration of them might be prevented, and he excepted from his Edict those Pictures or Images which represented the Crucifixion.† It was not till he found that such precautions would not prevent idolatrous worship, that he condemned Pictures and Images by an absolute prohibition.

The Imperial Edict occasioned the most violent tumults. A Civil war commenced in the Islands of the Archipelago, it soon spread over Asia, and it ultimately reached Italy. The people were taught to believe that the Emperor was an apostate, and that they were therefore freed from their allegiance. Gregory II. was the author and ringleader of these commotions in the West. Upon the refusal of Leo to revoke his Edict against Images, the Pontiff declared him unworthy of the name and privileges of a Christian, and thus excluded him from the Communion of the Church. No sooner was this sentence made public, than the Romans and the inhabitants of other Italian Provinces which were subject to the Grecian Empire, threw off their allegiance and massacred the Imperial dignitaries and officers. The temper of Leo was too warm and resolute to be subdued by this opposition. He vented his rage against both images and their worshippers; and having assembled a Council at Constantinople, he degraded Germanus the Patriarch of the Imperial city who was a patron of Images, and placed Anastasius in the See. He commanded all Images to be publicly burned, and he inflicted the most severe punishments on their worshippers.

These rigorous measures divided the Christian Church into two factions emulating each other in violence; the one which maintained that Images should be worshipped, was called Iconoduli, or Iconolatri; the other, which maintained that such worship was impious, was called Iconomachs and Iconoclasts.

Leo was succeeded in the Empire by his son Constantine, to whom the Image worshippers in derision gave the surname of Copronymus.‡ He had not less zeal than his father against Idolatry, and employed his power and influence in its extirpation, in opposition to the Roman Pontiffs. But his proceedings were characterised by greater moderation than those of his father, for knowing the respect which the Greeks entertained for the decisions of Councils, he assembled at Constantinople a Council of the Eastern Bishops. By the Greeks this is considered as the VIth Ecumenical Council; by the Romish Church it is not acknowledged. There were present not less than three hundred and thirty-eight Bishops, and it was more numerous than any of the Ecumenical Councils, that of Chalcedon excepted.

The two principal Bishops, the Bishop or Exarch of Ephesus, and the Bishop or Metropolitan of Perga, presided in the assembly. Its decrees were, according to the custom of the Eastern Councils, in favour of the opinions espoused by the Emperor, and an anathema was pronounced against all Image worshippers, among whom Germanus was specially condemned.† Calumnies of the most improbable and contradictory nature were vented against Copronymus. He was accused of Manicheism, of Nestorianism, and of Arianism. The blind obstinacy of superstition was not vanquished, and the Monks still continued to excite commotions among the People. Copronymus, filled with a just indignation at their seditious practices, restrained them by new laws, and inflicted on some of them exemplary punishment.

After the death of Constantine, Leo IV. was declared Emperor, and he pursued the measures adopted by his father and grandfather for the extirpation of Idolatry. His consort was Irene, a woman remarkable for wit and beauty, but of a most abandoned and profligate mind. Having poisoned her husband in order to Heretics from the VIth and VIIIth Centuries.

Revolt of the Italian Provinces.

Council at Constantinople.

A. D. 730.

Two factions.

Constantine succeeds Leo.

A. D. 741.

Council at Constantinople.

A. D. 754.

Idolatry is condemned.

Leo IV. succeeds Copronymus.

A. D. 775.

* Kogesi, stercus. This name was given to Constantine from a story that he had defiled the sacred font at his baptism.

† The Council thus expresses its censure of Idolatry. "Jesus Christ hath delivered us from Idolatry and hath taught us to adore him in spirit and in truth. But the Devil not being able to endure the beauty of the Church, hath insensibly brought back Idolatry under the appearance of Christianity, persuading men to worship the creature, and to take for God a work to which they give the name of Jesus Christ." Fleury, Ecc. Hist. lib. 7.

* Spanheim has thus classified them. He has a separate Treatise on Image worship, besides a Chapter in his General Ecclesiastical History. It is mentioned in the 11th volume of his Works, Miscell. book vi. It was composed in answer to maintaining the same.

† Non haec spectant mea sententia ut ea prorsus deleantur, sed hoc aut, sublimare loco eas collocandas esse. Spanheim, Miscel. Sac. Antiq. lib. vi. Oper. tom. ii.

History. escape the punishment due to her infidelity which he had discovered, she held the reins of government, during the minority of her son Constantine, and the cause of Idolatry was then once more triumphant. To establish her authority more firmly, she formed an alliance with Adrian, Bishop of Rome, and the Roman Pontiff summoned a Council at Nice in Bithynia, which is known by the name of the 11d Nicene Council.

11d Nicene Council.

A. D. 786.

An eclipse of the sun immediately preceded it, which the Iconoclasts did not fail to represent as ominous. Its President was Tarasius, a creature of Irene, and raised by her to the Patriarchate of Constantinople; and although the Council was assembled at Nice, that ambitious Priest took precedence of the Legates of Adrian. None of the Eastern Patriarchs were present, but there were two Monks of Palestine, John and Thomas, who assumed the names of two of those Patriarchs. There are said to have been at least three hundred and fifty Bishops present, but none of the Eastern Church, and none also of the Western who had signalized themselves by opposition to Idolatry. In this assembly the Imperial laws concerning Idolatry were abrogated; the decrees of the Council of Constantinople were reversed; the worship of Images and of the Cross was restored; and severe punishments were denounced against those who maintained that God was the only object of Religious veneration.

Idolatry restored.

A middle course adopted by some Churches.

The Four Books of Charlemagne.

In the violent contests between the Iconoduli and the Iconomache, most of the Latins, as the Britons, Germans, and Gauls, seemed to take a middle course. They were of opinion that Images might be lawfully retained in the Churches for the purpose of exciting devotion, but they regarded all Image worship as highly injurious and offensive to the Supreme Being. Such was the opinion of Charlemagne, who took a decisive part in this controversy. By the advice of his Bishops, he caused some eminent Theologian to compose Four Books concerning Images, which he sent to Adrian,† with a view of engaging him to withdraw his approbation from the 11d Nicene Council. In this performance the arguments for Idolatry were accurately examined, and ably refuted. Adrian, however, was resolved not to leave the cause undefended, and he composed an answer to the Four Books of Charlemagne.‡

Council at Francfort.

A. D. 794.

The Emperor at length adopted a better way of settling the dispute than that of prolonging a controversy with the Pontiff. A Synod was called by Charlemagne at Francfort for the double purpose of settling the Adoption or Felician controversy; and of examining the question of Image worship. Not less than three hundred Bishops were present, collected from France, Spain, Italy, Germany, and Britain, to whom must be added the Legates of Adrian. In this Synod, the decrees of the 11d Nicene Council were condemned, and every kind of adoration of Images was declared to be superstitious and impious. The opinions contained in the Four Books of Charlemagne were confirmed.

11d Nicene Council condemned.

* It is called by Spanheim Concilium Nicenum.

† Alcuin, the Preceptor of Charlemagne, has been supposed to have had a considerable share in the composition of the Four Books, although he was at this time in England. The Books of Charlemagne were published at Hanover in 1791, with a Preface by August Heumann.

‡ They were presented to Adrian by Engilbert, the ambassador of Charlemagne.

§ Dupin, Ecc. Hist. Cent. viii. His answer to Charles was tame and insipid.

From the decrees of this Council it may be concluded, that the Western Churches sometimes dissented from the Roman Pontiff. The Caroline Books not only condemned all Image worship, but reprehended the flattering addresses of the Grecian Bishops to Adrian. Though they allowed the primacy of the Church of St. Peter, yet they denied that implicit faith was to be yielded to the decrees of the Romish Pontiffs. And it does not appear that Adrian required an unequalled submission, for, notwithstanding the Council of Francfort, there was no interruption of harmony between the Pope* and the Emperor.

Heresy of the VIIth and VIIIth Centures. The decrees of the Roman Pontiff were not implicitly followed.

CONTROVERSY CONCERNING THE EUCHARIST.

Some writers date the origin of this great question from the VIIIth Century, and assert that it had a connection with the controversy on Image worship. It was disputed whether the Symbols used in the Eucharist were only a representation and figure of the body and blood of Christ, or whether they underwent a supernatural change into his real body and blood. The Iconomachi in the Council of Constantinople convened by Copronymus, having recited the words of the Nicene Council, that the bread consecrated in the Eucharist is the true image or type of Christ, added this explanation: That the Eucharistical bread, by the consecration of the Priest, becomes holy,† but without any transubstantiation, or destruction of its former substance.

The Iconoduli asserted a contrary opinion, that the bread and wine are not the image or type of the body and blood of Christ, but actually his body and blood. They become so by a change of substance,‡ or transubstantiation.§

CONTROVERSY CONCERNING THE DERIVATION OF THE HOLY GHOST.

While the controversy concerning Images was at its height, a new contest arose among the Latins and Greeks about the procession of the Holy Ghost. The Latins affirmed that the Divine Spirit proceeded both from the Father and the Son; the Greeks denied this, and affirmed that he proceeded from the Father only. The question was agitated in the Council of Gentilli, near Paris, called by Pepin at the request of Copronymus. The Latins adduced in favour of their opinion the Creed of Constantinople; but the Greeks accused the Latins of having corrupted this Creed by an interpolation. The Synod at Gentilli was principally called on the question of Image worship, and therefore this was a subordinate dispute. Another Synod at Frejus, convened for the purpose of suppressing the Adoption Heresy, took cognizance of this dispute on the procession of the Holy Ghost. It was there determined against the Greeks that the Holy Ghost proceeded both from the Father and the Son.

Synod of Gentilli.

A. D. 767.

Synod at Frejus.

A. D. 791.

* Adrian died in 795, the year after the Council of Francfort.

† Ἐκ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ υἱοῦ.

‡ Johannes Damascenus, an antagonist of the Iconomachi, has this language. Ὁς ἐκ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ υἱοῦ, ἀλλὰ τοῦ θεοῦ καὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ, καὶ οὐκ ἐκ τοῦ υἱοῦ, ἀλλ' ἐκ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ υἱοῦ καὶ τοῦ πατρὸς. Joh. Damascenus de Orthod. Fide, lib. iv. c. 14.

§ Μετουσίαν.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXIV.

THE CARLOVINGIAN EMPIRE FROM THE DEATH OF CHARLEMAGNE TO ITS DISSOLUTION UNDER CHARLES THE FAT.

FROM A. D. 814. TO A. D. 888.

History. THE great Empire rather constructed than consolidated by the genius of Charlemagne, was peaceably transmitted to his son Louis; who is known in History more generally by the title le Debonnaire, conferred on him by his French subjects, than by that of Pius which he received from the Italians. His reign might have been less turbulent and less unhappy, had he not been too largely gifted with the gentle qualities, the possession of which those names avouch. From his birth he was invested with the title of King of Aquitaine; and when ripening into manhood, the conduct of numerous expeditions against the long and pertinacious rebellion of the Gascons, or the fierce opposition of the Moorish Tribes on the Ebro, were intrusted to his care. Hitherto that mild and flexible temper, which ultimately degenerated into weakness, had manifested itself only in acts of kindness and affability; and the personal valour in which he never was wanting in the field, and which he especially exhibited at the siege and capture of Barcelona from the Saracens, combined with his urbanity to secure for him unalloyed popularity.

To these generous and noble qualities was unfortunately appended a narrow, superstitious zeal, more fitted for the Tonsure than for the Crown. When unoccupied by the necessary duties of the Camp his hours were wholly devoted to the services of the Cloister; and a Prince born to wield the Sovereignty of the Western Empire was more than once prevented, not without difficulty, from adopting the habit and the profession, together with the manners and the fanaticism of a Recluse. Far, however, from diminishing the attachment of the Nations whose sway devolved upon him by the death of Charlemagne, this mistaken and ill-directed enthusiasm seemed, in the first instance, but another tie by which he was linked more strongly to their hearts; and his progress from Toulouse to Aix la Chapelle, to take possession of his Crown, was every where attended by unequivocal marks of popular joy.

Notwithstanding the dazzling splendour which environed the Government of Charlemagne, many and great indeed were the abuses which demanded reform from his successor. Uninterrupted wars of long continuance had planted round his throne a host of military Chieftains, under whose exactions Liberty had become almost wholly extinguished; and not only had the burdens of the peasants been insupportably aggravated, but even those freemen in the Provinces, whose resources were too scanty to resist the force or fraud of their more powerful neighbours, had in many instances embraced a voluntary servitude; in order that they might obtain the dubious patronage of an acknowledged superior, instead of continuing exposed to the certain enmity of one nominally their equal. Relief was to be administered to this suffering class. The gross dissoluteness also of the Court of Charles could not but prove most offensive to the staid and exact morals of his son; and the first cares of Louis were accordingly directed to the purification of the Palace. Seven daughters of the late Emperor and five of his deceased son Pepin, had lived in compulsory celibacy, and in community of habits and apartments with the numerous Imperial mistresses; and neither the beauty nor the consanguinity of his sisters or of his nieces was allowed by Louis to plead against the unmeasured scandal of their licentiousness. A sentence far more severe than that inflicted upon his female relatives awaited their minions. All of these were pronounced guilty of high treason, both "for the enormity of their offence, and for the arrogance which it discovered;" but punishment was remitted to most of them. Nor till one, bolder than his companions, resisted arrest, and slew the Officer who was commissioned to apprehend him, did Louis manifest an inclination to exact any rigid penalty. Unable to take vengeance upon that chief criminal, who had perished in the affray, he ordered the eyes of another offender, whom he had already pardoned, to be plucked out, and the remainder to be either banished or imprisoned.

At the States General, which he immediately convoked, Louis proposed many salutary measures, and despatched into the Provinces new Imperial Deputies, or Muni Dominici as they were termed, to hear and adjust causes. To the Saxons he restored the right of inheritance, of which they had been unjustly deprived by Charlemagne, and by thus wisely placing them on a level with his other subjects he secured their permanent fidelity. Nor was he less successful in the outset of his foreign policy than in these domestic arrangements. An expedition despatched to support the pretensions of Harald, who had been compelled to abandon the throne of Jutland, was signally victorious; and Louis doubtless esteemed as far more honourable than this success in arms, a pacific triumph, which he obtained a few years afterwards, over the idolatrous blindness of the Monarch to whom he had thus extended the protection of his sword. Harald, with his Queen and a large train of Danish Chieftains, was presented by the Emperor at the font of the Church of St. Alban's in Mayence; and there made a solemn profession of the Christian Faith, renouncing "the works and words of the Devil, of Thor, and Woden, and Saxonidm, with all the evil Spirits

Carlovin-
gian Empire.
From
A. D.
814. to
A. D.
888.

Baptism of Harald the Dane.
A. D.
926.

History.

From

A. D.

814.

to

A. D.

889.

Irregularity of Papal elections.

A. D.

816.

their confederates." Neither his gratitude nor his Religion, however, appear to have been permanently founded; for on his return to Denmark, he abjured Christianity and renounced his vassalage to France.

The ascendancy which Charlemagne had maintained over the Papal elections, was in some measure shaken when, on the death of Leo III., the Romish Clergy and People nominated Stephen IV. to the vacant tiara without consulting Louis. The new Pope, anxious that his authority should be established on a secure basis, sent an embassy of excuse to the Emperor, admitting the irregularity, and soliciting confirmation; and in order yet further to deprecate the resentment which he feared might be awakened, he not long afterwards undertook a personal visit to France. Great, therefore, was his surprise when the Monarch hastened in advance to meet him before his arrival at Rheims; and far from contesting the validity of the late election, asked for a divine sanction of his own right. Louis, dismounting from his horse, when in sight of the Holy Father, prostrated himself thrice on the ground, exclaiming, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord;" nor would he quit that humiliating posture, till he was raised and embraced by the Pope. The intervening days were spent in festivity, and on the fourth morning Stephen crowned and anointed the Emperor and his Consort Hermengarde; thus testifying that the Imperial power depended neither upon hereditary descent, nor popular choice, but upon the sole will of the Head of the Church; an admission not likely to be forgotten hereafter by the arrogance of Rome. The election of Pascal I., which followed in the succeeding year, was performed with equal disregard to the Emperor's supremacy, and was recognised by him with equal complacency.

But it was necessary that some years should pass away before strangers fully discovered the weakness of those hands into which the sceptre of the mighty Charlemagne had passed; and it was from the bosom of his own family that the inroads upon the power of Louis were to commence. Three sons, Lothaire, Pepin, and Louis, were his male issue by Hermengarde, to whom he had been married three and twenty years; and among these he now obtained the consent of the French to share his authority. Lothaire accordingly was crowned and associated with him in the Empire, and Pepin and Louis were respectively named Kings of Aquitaine and Bavaria. One at least of these new appointments was regarded with jealousy by Bernard, King of Italy, son of Pepin, the elder brother of the Emperor, and who inherited his Father's dominions. He had recognised with apparent cheerfulness his uncle's right to the Imperial Crown as the immediate son of Charlemagne, but he was now unwilling to cede its reversion to Lothaire; and the claim of primogeniture, as then understood, no doubt existed in his person as son of an elder brother. Hastily levying troops, and supported by a numerous band both of Ecclesiastical and Lay Chieftains, amongst whom the reforms of the new reign had created discontent, he occupied all the passes of the Alps, and made open demonstration of revolt. As Louis advanced to suppress this insurrection by arms, it is said that Hermengarde proffered her mediation; and that Bernard, a brave, gallant, and unsuspicious youth, scarcely in his nineteenth year, confiding in a safe-conduct, presented himself before the Emperor in his camp at Chalons. Whether alarmed at the unexpected promptitude with which Louis had taken the field, or dispirited by the absence of their commander, the forces of the young Prince soon gradually disbanded, or threw themselves on the mercy of the Emperor; and notwithstanding the solemn promises of immunity by which Bernard was protected, the feeble Louis permitted his trial and condemnation to death; and then, with an ambiguous lenity, commuted the punishment for loss of sight. At the instigation, as is affirmed, of Hermengarde, who coveted the fair dominion of Italy for her own sons, the sentence was executed with so great barbarity, that the unhappy sufferer expired three days after its infliction. Of his followers, the Ecclesiastics were degraded and shut up in Convents, and the Seculars imprisoned; and so far were the suspicions of Louis awakened against the fidelity of his remaining kinsmen, that he compelled three younger brothers, bastards of Charlemagne,* whom he had hitherto entertained in his Palace, and treated with marked affection, to receive the Tonsure; notwithstanding they were altogether free from any imputed connection with the late revolt.

The death of Hermengarde, which occurred not long after this Tragedy, once again opened to Louis the monastic seclusion, which he still coveted; but his Ecclesiastics, keenly alive to the advantage which they might deduce from the continued rule of a Monarch so devoted as he manifested himself to their Order, urged upon him the necessity of a second marriage. The Chroniclers represent the nuptials upon which he soon afterwards entered, as preceded by a muster in his Court of all the most celebrated Beauties whom the limits of the Empire contained; and in that new rivalry for the golden apple, Judith, daughter of Count Guelfo of Bavaria, was the triumphant competitor.

Success, for the most part, continued to attend the military operations of the Franks; but we are told of unrevenged ravages by the Northmen, who threatened Flanders, made a demonstration at the mouth of the Seine, and laid waste some parts of Aquitaine. So ill provided indeed was the Empire for maritime defence, that in a single Piratical incursion, a band of those marauders, not amounting to 1000 men, spread terror over 300 leagues of coast, and retired with a costly booty.

Unhappy for the tranquillity of his dominions, the thoughts of their Ruler, as he advanced in years, became hourly more and more absorbed by superstitious observances. In a new Assembly of the States he performed an open Penance, publicly deploring his cruelty to Bernard, a crime which indeed might with reason press heavily upon his conscience; and yet further confessing that he had sinned grievously against Adelard and Wala, the Ministers of his late Father, and other Priests and Bishops whom he had exiled for their share in the late rebellion. He sought pardon from them and from his brothers whom he had forced into the Cloister, and as a compensation for their former wrong, he advanced them to high Ecclesiastical dignities. These unworthy exhibitions were interrupted by the necessity of a campaign

* In the times of which we are writing Concubinage was a legitimate species of marriage, and the women who entered upon it were styled Femmes du Deuisme Ordre. But it is to be feared that the memory of Charlemagne cannot be sheltered under this singular institution. The Law admitted one wife or one Concubine, but not both at the same time; and therefore a fortiori it prohibited the numbers whom the Emperor simultaneously entertained under the latter name.

* The original form of abjuration, of which the above is a translation, is given in Wheaton's History of the Northmen, p. 176.

Charles great Empire

From

A. D.

814.

to

A. D.

888.

He is deprived of sight and dies.Second marriage
Louis.

A. D.

819.

Piracy of the North-
men.

A. D.

820.

Louis produces evidence in this case.

A. D.

822.

Rebellion
of Bernard, King of Italy.

History. to suppress a spirit of insurgency manifested by both the Bretons and the Gascons. But the operations which followed in consequence were conducted more by his sons than by himself; and the sole passion which shared his affections with the services of the cell and of the altar, was that for hunting; in which pastime he indulged with no less ardour than had been felt for it by Charlemagne himself.

The fidelity of the new Empress was far from being unsuspected; and to an illicit intercourse with Bernard, son of the Duc de Toulouse, whom she had selected as her intimate friend and Counsellor, has been attributed the birth of a son with whom she presented Louis three years after their marriage; and who is known in History as his successor, under the title of Charles the Bald, (le Chauve.) The inauspicious nativity of that Prince, the source of so many evils and so much bloodshed, is confidently affirmed by the credulous writers of his times to have been accompanied by manifest omens of calamity. The Palace at Aix la Chapelle trembled to its foundations under an earthquake; torrents of rain, mingled with hail and huge masses of stone, deluged the neighbouring districts; numerous men and beasts were killed by lightning; a girl continued to live without food during the long period of ten months; and before the close of the year in which the object of these portents first drew breath, Famine and Pestilence desolated the entire circuit of the Empire. From the moment indeed of the birth of Charles, his Father's Government appears to have become disorganized. We are not possessed of sufficient information to state accurately the causes of that general internal discontent which agitated the Empire; but while the weakness of her Monarch had been sufficiently revealed to the foreign enemies of France to expose her frontiers to attacks from the Musulmans, the Bulgarians, and the Northmen, a formidable conspiracy also was ripening within her bosom. The ambition of Judith and of her minion Bernard accelerated its progress; and when Louis, in a Diet held at Worms, proclaimed his youngest son King of Germany, a dominion formed by the union of Suabia, Helvetia, and the Grisons, little was wanting to kindle into an immediate blaze the fierce torch of Civil conflict.

In that provision for their half-brother, his three elders perceived nothing but the dismemberment of their own Governments; and seizing as a pretext for placing themselves at the head of an armed force, a gathering which Louis had then ordered against the Bretons, Pepin and the King of Bavaria united a considerable body of troops at Verberic. Disaffection spread rapidly through the Imperial Camp, and Louis became the prisoner of his two sons, who demanded that Bernard should be exiled; that Judith should take the veil; and that even the Emperor himself should abdicate and enter upon a Religious profession. The Cowl, however, at that moment appears to have lost its former charms in the eyes of the unhappy Prince; and on the arrival of Lothaire it was determined not to press upon him the unwilling change, but that he should still retain the shadow and titles of Monarchy, the real power being absolutely vested in his eldest son. Such an arrangement was most satisfactory to one great division of the Empire, and the French, as they now began to be named, hoping to win from the sons of Louis that ascendancy in its Government from which they had been excluded both by his Father and by himself, warmly supported the ambitious projects of Lothaire.

But the Germans, to whose arms the Carolingian Family was mainly indebted for its elevation, and whose great services accordingly had always been repaid by Charlemagne with distinguished favour, naturally preferred the rule of a Son who trod in his footsteps, before that of a grandson whose policy had led him to deviate from them. In an Assembly at Nimeguen, chiefly composed of Germans, it was evident that the majority of voices greatly preponderated in behalf of Louis. It was in vain that the partisans of Lothaire urged him to a decisive stroke, and that the Chiefs of his faction passed a whole night in impressing upon him the strong necessity that he should continue master of his Father's person. They proposed an open attack upon the morrow; but Lothaire shrank from the guilt or from the boldness of the project; and after a long private conference, the joint Emperors presented themselves to the Assembly, and announced their cordial reconciliation. The first consequence was the arrest of Lothaire's followers; the second was the release of Judith. She boldly confronted her now humbled foes, threw back with scorn the foul charge of adultery which they had advanced, and demanded the Ordeal of fire as a test of innocence. The Assembly with one voice rejected such an appeal as unnecessary; her oath was received as a sufficient guarantee; and she was replaced by acclamation in all Conjugal and Imperial rights. Bernard was not less forward in defiance of his enemies. He also appealed to the judgment of God; and challenged any accuser to meet him in the lists on horseback, there to decide the quarrel by mortal combat. No champion appeared, and in the absence of all evidence against him his acquittal was unanimously pronounced. Louis, with his accustomed clemency, suspended the chief rebels from their offices but for a short time, and before the close of the year remitted them to his presence and restored them to favour.

But the causes of discontent among the French were far from being extinguished. The quarrel was soon renewed between the Father and his sons, and the armies of the opponents once more appeared in each other's presence on the plain of Rothfeld,* near Colmar. The Pope, Gregory IV., who accompanied the march of Lothaire, employed his mediation in vain; and it appeared as if blood were now about to flow in this most unnatural conflict. We know not the allurments which were held out, nor the intrigues by which the Revolution was so rapidly effected; but in a single night, the Emperor was abandoned by his entire host, and at the dawn of day he stood, together with his Empress and his youngest child, a prisoner in the Camp of his other rebel sons. The infamy of this base transaction was long recorded by a striking memorial, and Rothfeld, the Red field, on which Louis was deserted by his subjects, received the appropriate name of Lugenfeld, The Field of lies. The Emperor was immured in a Monastery; Judith was imprisoned in the citadel of Tortona; and the boy Charles was removed to the safe precincts of an Abbey in Treves.

Thus twice dethroned by his sons, Louis was to be restored again by another bloodless revolution. Before the close of the year which witnessed his second captivity, public opinion appeared to have undergone great change; and Lothaire's principal supporters, especially the Ecclesiastics, feeling alarmed at the possibility of a Carlovingian Empire.

From A. D. 814, to A. D. 888. His restoration.

Second rebellion of his sons. A. D. 833.

June 24.

The Field of lies.

* Hod. Rotteberg, between Brinnac and the River Ill.

History.

From
A. D.
814. to
A. D.
888.

Penance inflicted on Louis after his second dethronement.

countermovement, resolved so far to degrade the fallen Emperor, as to render him for ever incapable of returning to power. The diplomatic ignorance either of the individuals concerned or of their times, is strikingly evinced by the Instrument still preserved to us as drawn up for the second public Penance to which Louis was enjoined to submit at Soissons, on the 11th of November. There, in the Church of the Virgin Mary, the wretched Prince was led into the presence of the assembled Clergy, of the Nobles, of a countless throng of Laics, and of his own Son Lothaire. Clothed in sackcloth, he prostrated himself before the High altar, and confessed aloud that he had administered his power unworthily, that he had sinned against God, had scandalized the Church, and had betrayed his People into numerous disorders. On these accounts he expressed a wish to undertake a solemn Ecclesiastical Penance, so that by the aid of God he might obtain absolution from those to whom that God had accorded the power of the keys. At these words, the Prelates, his spiritual Physicians, as they are termed in the Acts of the Ceremonial, admonished him, as he regarded his salvation, to make true and unreserved confession; then placing in his hands a document already prepared, they instructed him to read it before the People; and he obeyed with many tears. That Confession embodied his sins under eight vague and ill-divided heads. In the first he deplored the death of his nephew Bernard, and the violence offered to his bastard Brothers. He admitted in the second place that he had compelled his subjects to repeated perjuries by frequently remodifying the partitions of his Empire already sanctioned by national oaths; next he pronounced himself guilty of infraction of the Canon Law by having assembled Diets or troops during Festivals or the Season of Lent; fourthly, of having exacted too severe punishment from the opposers of his bad Government; fifthly, of encouraging perjury when he allowed Judith to clear herself by oath; sixthly, of being the cause of bloodshed, rapine, and sacrilege, by the Civil Wars which he had occasioned; seventhly, of creating intestine discord by arbitrary allotments of his realm; and lastly, of having brought total ruin upon a State of which he was the natural guardian and protector. After pronouncing this self-accusation, he delivered to the Priests the written catalogue of his offences, in order that it might be preserved as an everlasting testimony against him; and they having received the Instrument placed it on the altar. Then himself ungirding his knightly belt, he placed that also on the altar; and divesting himself of his secular habit, he was clad by the Bishops in a penitential garb, with the imposition of hands, as a token that he bade eternal farewell to all pomps of the World.

Second Restoration of Louis.

The great object, as we have already stated, of this most unprecedented spectacle was to incapacitate Louis, by its dishonour, from remounting the throne; and it was believed that, coupling this Penance with his former Confession, according to certain Decrees of the Canon Law, he must for ever remain under the ban which affected relapsed Penitents. But, on the contrary, the meek and unresisting obedience with which he bowed his head to the extremity of Ecclesiastical censure, excited pity and produced a revulsion in his favour. During the following winter, Lothaire swayed the Empire singly, and either secluded his Father in his confinement, or watched him under his own immediate cognizance; but proofs of attachment to the person of Louis were at length so unequivocally displayed by his fickle subjects, that at the expiration of two months Lothaire found it expedient to retire to Vienne. A milder interpretation than that at first proposed having been annexed to the Canons which seemed to prohibit renewal of connection with the Church, Louis, soon after his son's flight, was solemnly reconciled in the Cathedral of St. Denis; and having been again invested with his belt and arms by the officiating Bishops, he resumed his Sovereignty also together with those insignia of Knighthood. Lothaire continued in rebellion, and on more than one occasion was successful against his Father's troops; but Louis, incapable of long resentment, sought opportunities for accommodation, encouraged his Son's first overtures, pardoned his revolt, and permitted him to retain the Crown of Italy.

The death of Pepin, King of Aquitaine, appeared to furnish an opportunity not to be neglected for increasing the portion of Charles; and after some previous inconclusive arrangements, the intrigues of Judith procured from the imbecile Emperor, with the consent of Lothaire, a final partition of his territories more unjust than any which had preceded it. Reserving Bavaria for Louis's present King, and excluding the sons of Pepin altogether from their paternal inheritance, an imaginary line drawn from North to South along the course of the Rhone and the Meuse was supposed to divide the Empire into two equal portions; and the first choice being given to Lothaire, he selected the Eastern, while Charles received the Western allotment.

The short remainder of his life was devoted by the Emperor to compel his Son Louis whom he refused to aggrandize, and the Grandsons whom he despoiled, to accept this inequitable division; for which purpose he took the field in more than one campaign. Happily a personal conflict was avoided, and the Emperor, while in arms, was attacked by a defluxion on the lungs in the Castle of Ingelheim near Mayence. A Solar Eclipse which occurred during this illness is said to have oppressed him with a strong conviction that his disease was mortal, and to have accelerated its crisis. Yet Louis was accomplished in all the Learning of his time, a subtle Canonist, a fluent speaker of Latin, and a competent reader of Greek; although, as Thegan informs us, after having studied that Tongue in his youth, he ever afterwards shunned with horror all its profane Poesies. By his skill in Astronomy also he had calculated that very defect of the Sun which he now esteemed the harbinger of his demise; and one of his Biographers, an anonymous Writer known as "the Astronomer," on account of the conversations on that Science with the Emperor which he has reported, informs us that his Imperial master was the first discoverer of a Comet which appeared in 837. Louis supported a long illness of forty days with piety and resignation, receiving the Host on each morning, and, the season being Lent, taking scarcely any other sustenance in the course of the day. As his end manifestly approached, he was asked by the ministering Priest to bequeath his pardon to all the World, even to his rebel Son. "Willingly," was the reply, "notwithstanding he has brought my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave." In his last agonies he twice loudly exclaimed, "Out! Out!" and the attendants declared that he was then wrestling with the Evil Spirit, who was visibly attempting to force an entrance at the window. But the Chronicle of St. Denis has done fuller justice to the memory of this weak but amiable Prince by stating that he gives Empire.

Charles

From
A. D.
814.

to
A. D.
888.

Reconcilition with Lothaire.
A. D.
834.

Partition between Lothaire
and Charles.

A. D.
838.

Last illness
and

Death of Louis le Debonnaire.

A. D.
840.

History.

From

A. D.

814.

to

A. D.

888.

Accession

of Lothaire

as Emperor.

Charles the Bad King

of France.

Battle of Fontenay.

June 25.

A. D.

841.

A. D.

842.

Origins of Trans-

sylvia.

"never had any thing to do with such bad company either alive or dead."

On the death of Louis, the title of sole Emperor devolved upon his eldest son Lothaire; but the power conferred by that sounding name was now little more than visionary. He asserted a supremacy indeed over those Provinces which his brothers considered and administered as Kingdoms; he might claim, but he could seldom command their military services; and he summoned them to General Diets, which they attended or neglected at pleasure. Bent upon rescinding the latest partition of the Empire to which he had agreed only upon compulsion, Lothaire was still compelled by prudence to temporize; and a year had passed since the death of their Father, before any of the Brothers found themselves sufficiently strong to decide their rival claims by arms. Lothaire had allied himself with his nephew Pepin, the Pretender to the Crown of Aquitaine; Charles had established a far more powerful union with his brother Louis of Bavaria; and it was at the village of Fontenay, near Auxerre in Burgundy, that one of the most sanguinary battles in French History was fought between these competitors, whose enmity appears to have been aggravated by a recollection of their nearness of consanguinity. The numbers on either side were almost equal, and the field was contested with so great obstinacy that Charles and Louis, although conquerors, were little able to profit by their victory.† The Brothers, not many months after their success, made a solemn renewal of alliance, and the French King, for the first time on record, employed in his public oath on that occasion the Romanse; from which was afterwards derived the Language of modern France. The festivities which succeeded are detailed by the contemporary Historian Nithard, and they present a rude outline of those magnificent Tournaments which became the favourite diversion of later times. "When the spectators were assembled," says the Chronicler, "without the barriers, on a spot fitted for the show, an equal number of champions from the four chief nations which formed the camp, advanced rapidly against each other as if they wished for combat. The party which was attacked retired, covering themselves with their shields; then advancing in turn, they charged their opponents, till the Kings themselves and all their train rode with loud shouts and at full gallop against each other. Then might you see them gallantly shivering their small lances and pursuing the fugitives. Yet in so vast a host of armed men of different races, not one was hurt or wounded."

The renewal of this League and the distracted state of the Empire, not only torn by intestine convulsions, but exposed as a prey on all its frontiers to foreign ravage, at length induced Lothaire to relax from his assertion of sovereignty. By a Peace concluded at Verdun, he acknowledged the independence of his brothers and abandoned Pepin. Italy, Bavaria, and Aquitaine, being set apart in the first instance as the respective inheritances of the three Brothers, the remainder of the Empire was to be divided into three equal portions, from which they were to make choice in order of primogeniture. Three hundred Commissioners surveyed the entire territory previously to its distribution, and it is to be regretted that no trace of their Geographical labours now remains to us. Few documents could throw more light upon the state of Europe in the IXth Century than the Domesday Book of the Empire which must then have been compiled. More than a year was consumed in the survey; and at its close, Lothaire annexed to his Italian Kingdom that strip of Eastern France which received its names, Lotharingia, Loterrich, and Lorraine, from the master to whom it fell. The whole of Germany was chosen by Louis, who in consequence is known to us as le Germanique; and as that dominion was unproductive of wine, the Cities and Dioceses of Mayence, Worms, and Spire were especially secured to him.* And finally, the new France of Charles the Bald embraced the Country Westward of the Meuse, the Saône, and the Rhône, and the Spanish district between the Pyrenees and the Ebro.

The death of the Empress-mother Judith, to whose ambitious projects for the aggrandizement of her son Charles so much of the calamity endured by the Empire was owing, occurred in the year following this Peace, and her reputed lover Bernard, Duke of Septimania, did not long survive her. That Nobleman possessed all the Provinces which had anciently formed the Kingdom of the Visigoths; and his favourite design was to elevate them into an independent State. Waiting therefore upon opportunity, although he had assembled troops, he abstained from any decided part in the recent Civil War; and contented himself by observing the combatants at Fontenay from a position within three leagues of the field of battle. We know not what circumstances awakened the jealousy of Charles, nor the precise details of Bernard's fate. By some authorities he is said to have been tried and condemned to capital punishment; by others to have been assassinated by the hand of the King himself, whose memory in consequence is not altogether free from a fearful suspicion of Parricide.

Hostilities were still urged against Pepin, till increasing distractions induced a compromise, and the Kingdom of Aquitaine was granted to him as a Fief of the Crown of France. Incapacitated by his vices, of which drunkenness appears to have been the chief, from the duties of Government, he was solemnly deposed within a few years from this Treaty by an Assembly of his own subjects, who transferred their allegiance to the King of France. War accordingly was renewed between Charles and Pepin, and the latter allying himself with William,

Carlovin-

gian

Empire.

From

A. D.

814.

to

A. D.

888.

Partition of the Empire.

First separation of

Germany

from France.

Death of the Empress

Judith.

A. D.

843.

and of Duke

Bernard.

Sequel of the History of Pepin.

A. D.

845.

A. D.

848.

* The authorities for the reign of Louis le Debonnaire are contained in the VIth Volume of Bouquet's Recueil des Historiens des Gaules et de la France; they consist chiefly of a Life by the above-mentioned Astruc; another Life by Thégan, Bishop of Treves; Annals, attributed to Eginhard; the 1st Book of a History by Nithard, Grandson of Charlemagne; the Lives of Adalhard and Hala, and some Diplomata of the Emperor. These are admirably condensed by M. Simonde de Sismondi, in the VIth and VIIth Chapters of his Histoire des Français. Velly's narrative of the reign of Louis I. is written as usual with care; and, for summaries, the reader may advantageously consult the excellent Chronological Heads prefixed by Bouquet to the original Historians, Mézeray, Abregé Chronologique, or the later similar Work of the President Hénault.

† Some authorities have attributed to the great drain of Noble blood in this Battle that ancient Constitution of Champagne by which Nobility was permitted to follow the venter, in other words, by which the children of a Rohere marrying into a Noble family were ennobled by the mother. Such, insist, however, was always considered inferior to that which derived Nobility de parente, i. e. par le père.

‡ Romanica, or Rustica Latina, a patois of corrupt Latin mixed with Celtic. The oath of Charles has been frequently printed. It may be found in Roquefort, Glossaire de la Langue Romaine, Discours Préf. 20, in Sismondi, Hist. de France, c. 8. p. 70, and in the Encyclopédie Méthodique, ad v. Romanica.

History. son of the deceased Duke Bernard, invited the Saracens from the Ebro to his assistance. The Infidels contented themselves by a predatory incursion; and on their withdrawal, William being taken prisoner, expiated his treason on the scaffold. The fate of Pepin was somewhat longer deferred; in a paroxysm of intemperance he quarrelled with and insulted one of his most zealous partisans, Sancho, Marquis of Gascony, and through the resentment of that Noble, he was delivered into the hands of Charles. The King adopted with him that measure by which a rival Prince was thought to be most effectually degraded. He compelled him to submit to the Tonsure and to seclusion in an Abbey at Soissons. By the connivance of the Monks, however, he was soon permitted to escape, and after many years restless solicitation of his former subjects, in whom he found it impossible to arouse interest, he formed a second and far more nefarious compact with the enemies of his Country and of his Faith. In order to secure the fidelity and attachment of a band of Northmen whose command he assumed, it is said that he apostatized from Christianity; and at the head of those Barbarians he first sacked Poitiers and burned its Cathedral, and then ravaged Limousin and Auvergne. While besieging Toulouse, a city which during his former wars he had twice successfully defended, forgetting that a betrayer might in turn be betrayed, he imprudently trusted himself to a conference with the Count of Poitiers, who feigned willingness to embrace his cause. During the interview he was seized and transmitted to his justly offended Uncle, and a Diet sitting at the time pronounced sentence of death upon him both as a renegade and a traitor. Charles, however, felt reluctance to drain the blood of a great-grandson of Charlemagne; and having taken surer precautions than had been before adopted for the safe custody of the criminal, he condemned him to linger out a miserable life of perpetual imprisonment in a cell of the Monastery of Senlis.

His apostasy, and final imprisonment. A. D. 864.

secure, During the twenty years which elapsed before the final captivity of Pepin, (whose catastrophe we have treated somewhat in advance of our general narrative, in order that we might preserve unbroken the thread of his particular story,) France with little interruption had been a prey to the adventurers from the North. In various expeditions, Rouen, Rennes, Nantes, and Vannes had been laid in ashes. Paris,—which since the termination of the Merovingian dynasty had ceased to be the Capital, but which nevertheless maintained a rank scarcely secondary to any other City, and which surpassed them all in the number of its Religious Houses, and the costliness and abundance of their treasure,—was abandoned by its inhabitants and sacked without resistance. Nor was it evacuated by the marauders till Charles, having taken refuge in the Monastery of St. Denis, the strongest fortification in his Kingdom, ignominiously purchased their retreat by seven thousand pounds sterling weight of silver. Human arms were wholly unavailing, but the Chroniclers assure us with undoubting confidence that when Tours was attacked in 839 by Hastings,—a Frenchman by birth, but who from his earliest boyhood had associated with the Northmen, and who by his valour had attained high command among them,—the City was preserved by the miraculous intercession of St. Martin, whose body was carried out by the garrison during a sortie.*

and final imprisonment. A. D. 864.

Miserable internal condition of France. A. D. 845.

Paris corrupted by the Northmen. A. D. 845.

A. D. 847.

Rome and Naples in the following year were plundered by a descent of Moors and Arabians; and at nearly the same time both Louis, the son of Lothaire, was totally defeated by those invaders, and Louis le Germanique, by the cowardice of his own troops, was compelled to fly before the Selavonians who had passed his frontiers. While the Greek Pirates of the Archipelago stormed and ruined Marseilles, the Northmen were in possession of Bourdeaux; and so deeply were the miserable peasants of France imbued with terror of their pitiless Barbarian foes, that in the hope of mitigating that fury from which their own Government was powerless to shield them, whole villages renounced their Baptism and their Redeemer, and made a new profession of the ancient Idolatry of the Teutones.

In this almost general desolation of Christendom by the incursions of the Infidels, the single triumph of the Head of her Church must not be forgotten. Leo, the IVth Pontiff who bore that name, by birth a Roman, and worthy of the better days of his Country, was called by acclamation to the chair of St. Peter in 847, and he soon justified the choice of his People. The Eternal City was rapidly placed in a state of defence; fifteen towers were raised or strengthened on the ancient walls; the Tiber was guarded by a massive chain; and when the Saracens, who, under the Pontificate of Gregory IV. and Sergius II., had plundered the coasts with impunity, cast anchor at Ostia, Leo summoned allies from Greece, from Naples, from Gaeta, and Amalfi; mingled in person with the camp; distributed his benediction among the troops; and animated them with holy ardour by his prayers. In the naval fight which ensued, the Christians were signally victorious; and that remnant of the enemy which escaped the sword was either shipwrecked and dashed to pieces in a storm which interrupted pursuit, or thrown into the hands of their conquerors to atone for their former ravages, on the gibbet or in a laborious captivity. Leo employed his prisoners in the restoration and the embellishment of his Capital. Four years were spent in the construction of a wall which protected the Vatican and the Basilica of St. Peter from future depredations; and the suburb on the Western bank of the Tiber, with its six gates and its consecrated ramparts, received the name of the Leonine City, by which the memory of its founder was to be honourably transmitted to posterity. The pencil of Raffaele has given immortality to another reputed act of this great Pontiff; and few, perhaps, ever regarded the magnificent Incendio del Borgo without for the moment almost according a more than half belief to the verity of the legend forming the subject of that splendid composition; namely, that the prayers of Leo miraculously arrested the progress of a fire in the Saxon quarter of Rome, between his own City and the Trastevere.

Six years before he became sole Emperor by the death of Lothaire, Louis II. had been associated with his Father both in title and in power; but his dominion, when it fell to his single hand, was restricted to Italy; Lorraine becoming the appendage of one of his brothers, Lothaire; Provence, as the district between the Rhine and the Alps was then called, of another, Charles; and on their death, not many years afterwards, both territories being divided between Charles the Bald and Louis le Germanique, without regard to the superior claims of Louis II. The Emperor Lothaire had consented to the above-named partition between his sons not many Carlovingian Empire.

From A. D. 814, to A. D. 888. A. D. 848.

Pontificate of Leo IV.

A. D. 849.

The Leonine City

Accession of Louis I as Emperor. A. D. 855.

* Baronius, ad ann. sec. 29.

months previously to his decease; when oppressed with years, and stricken with remorse for his early violations of filial duty, he assumed the Religious habit.

Meantime the weakness of the King of France exposed his dominions to further outrage from the Northmen. Ascending the Loire more than five and twenty leagues from its mouth, they pillaged Orleans, deluged its neighbourhood with blood, and then fortified a winter camp on the banks of the Seine. Thence, finding themselves unopposed, they once again directed their course on Paris, and burned all its Churches, excepting those of St. Stephen, St. Germain, and St. Denis, which were ransomed at an exorbitant price. The Lords of Neustria and of Aquitaine indignantly regarded the cowardice and impotence of their Monarch; and finding remonstrance unavailing, they directed their views to Louis le Germanique, the sole descendant of Charlemagne who appeared to inherit any portion of his Grandsire's intellect or valour. Louis eagerly obeyed the summons, advanced upon France, and, when his brother fled into Burgundy, exercised the full sovereignty over the Kingdom thus abandoned. For awhile it seemed probable that the sceptre would be permanently transferred to more worthy hands. But Charles dexterously conciliated his vassals, and divided their opposition by temporizing; so that after the armies of the two Kings had manœuvred for some months in each other's presence, without open hostilities, a negotiation restored the former good understanding between the brothers. Even then, however, Charles did not acquire sufficient vigour to attempt the expulsion of the Northmen by the French arms; and he completed his own degradation and the misery of his subjects by subsidizing a fresh piratical band, which had made a descent upon Amiens, to attack and exterminate their comrades still encamped upon the Seine. In order to raise the 3000 pounds weight of silver promised for this disgraceful service, Charles had recourse to the most cruel exactions; and when the confiscation of Church plate, and a tax upon every hearth and upon every commodity of merchandise, failed to produce the necessary sum within the given time, the demand was almost doubled by the resentment of the Northmen; who inveighed against his breach of contract, and insisted that the 3000 pounds should now be increased to 5000. The money was at length paid, and the Barbarians commenced operations against their Countrymen. At first, true to their engagement, they surrounded the Camp, intercepted its supplies, and reduced its defenders to the utmost extremity of famine; but no sooner were they bribed by the surrender of the rich booty of the Isle of France, 6000 pounds of silver, than they forbore from hostility, and amicably descended the Seine in company with their late foes, as if for reembarkation. But the winter was too far advanced to permit their voyage, and the coast of France, instead of being delivered from this scourge, once again saw the tents of the Pirates blackening her strand. On the Spanish March Charles was no less unfortunate; and by a Treaty which he was compelled to negotiate with Mohammed I. the Christians on the North of the Ebro, whom Charlemagne had united to his Empire in 778, were wholly abandoned to the Khalifs of Cordova.*

The last years of the turbulent reign of Charles the Bald were to be embittered, like those of his Father, by breaches of domestic duty. His two elder sons at an earlier period had openly revolted against him, but their insurrection had been suppressed and pardoned, and one of them, Charles, was now dead. He perished by a singular accident. On his return one evening from the chase with some friends of his own age, the thoughtless youths, in a frolic, agreed to attack one of their companions who loitered behind, and to fall upon him as if they were robbers. Charles paid severely for his jest. Alboin, the person whom they intended to alarm, defended himself gallantly, and before he could discover his mistake had dealt so heavy a blow on the head of the Prince, that he died of its effects after two years' languishment. Carloman, the King's youngest son, had been dedicated from his youth to the Cloister, a course of life unhappily most repugnant to his disposition. Already laden with spiritual Pluralities, he manifested a strong inclination to return to secular life, when, on suspicion of some rebellious design, the details of which have not reached us, he was arrested, stripped of his benefices, and imprisoned. Although his confinement was of short duration, little longer than a single month, the Prince, either conscious of guilt or resenting punishment, fled to Belgium immediately on his release; and placing himself at the head of a troop of brigands, he laid waste that Province. Difficulty of escape from the forces despatched against him, induced Carloman to trust less to resistance than to the clemency of his Father; and having first interested Pope Adrian II. in his behalf, he surrendered, and was a second time imprisoned. A Synod of Bishops adjudged his degradation from the Priesthood, and Carloman received their sentence as a benefit rather than as a punishment; for only one surviving brother stood between the Crown of France and himself, and the abrogation of his Religious vows restored him to his full chance of succession. Some imprudent expressions of satisfaction which he let fall, irritated his judges; and revising their former sentence, they pronounced that by the Divine Law he was worthy of death, but that from a hope that he might profit by the time given for repentance, they mercifully condemned him to no higher penalty than loss of sight. Adrian pressing remonstrated against this exercise of authority to the detriment of an Ecclesiastic already under protection of the Holy See. "In your excesses," were the arrogant and indecent words in which he addressed the King of France, "you surpass the Brutes themselves, raging against your own entrails, and imitating the Ostrich as described by Job." But guard yourself against the addition of sin to sin; repent your past avarice and usurpations; strive with all your power to obtain the Apostolic pardon, by showing amendment under correction; labour even unto the end that you may not perish altogether. So the close of your offences shall be that also of my reproaches, and by God's assistance you may at the same time bring to a termination both your sin and your punishment."† Charles replied with temperance but with dignity; and the Pope observing that the King was supported by the general voice of his Clergy and of his People, adopted a milder tone, and made no more mention of Carloman. His sentence was then inflicted upon that wretched but guilty Prince; who afterwards, by the assistance of some partisans, escaped from the Convent in which he Carlovingian Empire.

From A. D. 814. to A. D. 888.

Story of Carloman. A. D. 874.

* L'Art de vérifier les Dates, i. 737.

* Ch. xxxix. ver. 13. 17.

† Labbe Concilia, viii. 929. Bouquet, vii. 452.

History. was immured, and was appointed, by the piety of Louis le Germanique, to an Abbey, in the possession of which he did not long survive.

From The eldest branch of the Carolingian Family was
A. D. extinguished with Louis II., who died without male 814. issue in the year following. In an assembly of the
to
A. D. chief Italian Nobles at Pavia the vacant Crown was 888. offered at the same moment both to the Monarchs of Death of the Emperor France and Germany; in the hope probably of so far Louis II. weakening each by a contest with the other, that neither
A. D. might ultimately be able to establish himself in its pos-
875. session. Both Princes proceeded at the first summons

Coronation of Charles to strengthen themselves in Italy; Louis by his sons, the Bald as Charles in person. The latter advanced to Rome, and Emperor. was crowned Emperor by the Pope; but speedily after-
A. D. wards returned to his ancient dominions in order to 876. repel a threatened invasion by Louis. The designs of Death of that great Prince, the most wise, virtuous, and valorous

Louis le Monarch of his time, were interrupted by death; and his Germanique. dominions became partitioned among his three sons, Carloimann, Louis the Saxon, and Charles the Fat. (le Gros), the last of whom was afterwards destined for a short time to sway a far mightier dominion. In the death of his brother, the King of France perceived a new opportunity for personal aggrandizement; and hastily arming against his nephews, he advanced upon Louis, at that time encamped at Andernach on the left bank of the Rhine. Adding perfidy to this unjust aggression, Charles basely violated an armistice which he had concluded,* and hoping to surprise his enemy, lulled into security by reliance on his honourable observance of that engagement, he marched stealthily on the German lines. It was on a sharp October night that he attempted this movement, the roads were scarcely practicable, and as the soldiers advanced slowly and painfully through deep morasses, they were numbed by a cold rain, and exhausted by fatigue. Apprized of his Uncle's treacherous design, Louis was under arms to receive him; and the harassed and dispirited French were met by a fresh and vigorous force, and put to flight on the first encounter. The rout was complete and most disastrous; arms, baggage, equipages and magazines, choking the bogs through which the vanquished attempted to retreat their steps, impeded their escape; and the consequent slaughter was murderous. Charles himself, who commanded the reserve, was among the earliest fugitives; and his Empress, in the last stage of pregnancy, abandoning the Palace of Heristal, in which she had been placed for security, was seized with the pains of labour during the night in an adjoining farm, and the Prince of whom she was then delivered was carried in the arms of one of her attendants till she rejoined her Consort near Rheims.

Battle of Andernach.

France still groaned under the cruelty and rapacity of the Northmen; the extent of whose ravages is best described by a single striking fact. So desolate was the state of Aquitaine that a Papal Brief transferred the seat of an Archbishopric from Bourdeaux to Bourges, because, as the words of the Instrument declared, "the Province of Bourdeaux is altogether abandoned by its inhabitants." To escape from the near spectacle of those miseries which he was unable to remedy, and from the deep murmurs with which they were represented to him by his suffering People, Charles, in the year after his defeat at Andernach, revisited Italy. At Vercelli he was met by the Pope, who accompanied him to Pavia; but the festivities by which it was intended that this progress should be magnificently distinguished, were interrupted by intelligence that his nephew Carloman was approaching at the head of a well-appointed army to dispute the Imperial Crown. The Court broke up in haste and confusion; the Empress instantly recrossed the Alps; and Charles, after a vain attempt to collect troops, perceiving or suspecting disaffection among his scanty followers, bent towards Mont Cenis, in order to retire upon Savoy. In the obscure village of Brios, while passing that mountain range, he was attacked by a violent fever; and his death rapidly followed, in spite, or in consequence of the skill of Zedeclias his physician. The charge of poisoning brought against that attendant, however, does not appear supported by conclusive evidence; but it found ready credence at the time, because the accused was a reputed magician and a Jew,—which People, by their training in the Arabian Universities of Spain, far surpassed the French in medical knowledge;—and also because the body of the King underwent too rapid decomposition to permit conveyance to the Royal Cemetery in St. Denys. Thither, however, the bones were transferred seven years afterwards.*

It is to the reign of Charles the Bald that the exploded Pontificate of Pope Joan was once assigned. It was long believed that a woman named Gilberte, by birth a native of Mayence, but of English descent, assumed male attire, studied at Athens, was reputed a man, and having taken Religious vows and distinguished herself by great learning and ability, was elected to the Papacy on the death of Leo IV. in 853,† under the style of John VIII.; that when the Imperial title devolved on Louis II. that Emperor was crowned by her hands at Rome; and that but for a subsequent unhappy discovery, her name might have descended to posterity as one of the most unblemished Pontiffs by whom the Tiara has been worn. Yielding, however, to a natural weakness, she listened too freely to a Cardinal, one of her chaplains, to whom either chance or her own attachment had revealed the mystery of her sex; and the consequence of their intercourse was the public delivery of the successor of St. Peter in the open streets of Rome, between the Colosseum and the Church of St. Clement, during a Religious procession. The ambiguous Pope died in giving birth to the child; the route of the procession was altered for the future, so that it might not pass near the polluted spot; a statue was erected in commemoration of the incident; and certain ingenious precautions were adopted to prevent its recurrence. This tissue of fables, with an occasional addition that the Female Pope was a Magician, has furnished materials for reproach or for regret, for accusation or for denial, to many controversial writers, according as they were friendly or hostile to the Church of Rome; and it is not impossible, in spite of its distinct refutation by the research even of Protestants,‡

Carloman Emperor.

From
A. D.
814. to
A. D.
868.

Second visit of Charles to Italy.

A. D.
877.

Table of Pope Joan
A. D.
853.

* Louis, in order to demonstrate his own fidelity and the injustice of his Uncle, despatched thirty Knights, ten of whom submitted without injury to the Ordinal of cold water, ten to that of boiling water, ten to that of red-hot fire; and the Chronicler assures us that for the time the ambition of the King was checked by these prodigies. Annal. Fuldenens.

* The authorities for the reign of Charles the Bald are collected in the VIIth and VIIIth Volumes of Bouquet's Recueil. The same authorities belong to the remainder of this Chapter.

† Leo IV. really died in 855.
‡ Bayle has discussed the History of Pope Joan, of c. Papace, at much length, and with great diligence and acuteness. Perhaps the History. that there may still be found some spirits disinclined to surrender their belief in a legend, well adapted to throw ridicule upon the scarlet abomination of the Seven Hills.

The dominion to which Louis le Begue, the Stutterer, succeeded on the death of his father, Charles the Bald, was greatly diminished by rival claimants. Carloman* disputed the Imperial title, and Italy and Lorraine were wholly separated from France. During the short reign of Louis were established those numerous fiefs by which a powerful Aristocracy long afterwards more than balanced the influence of the Crown; and the weak Prince, despoiled of territory by foreigners, and of Kingly authority by his subjects, sank into the grave unregarded and forgotten after a nominal sway of eighteen months, so that to him as well as to Louis V. has sometimes been assigned the degrading epithet le Pâleant. His sons, Louis III. and Carloman, jointly ascended the throne; the latter chiefly through the powerful support of his father-in-law, Boson, Duke of Provence. That ambitious Noble, strengthened by the distinguished alliances which he had contracted, brother of an Empress, son-in-law of an Emperor, father-in-law of a King,† now meditated the establishment of an independent Crown for himself; and so dexterously did he intrigue with the Clergy, that in a few months after the late accession, the assembled Prelates of France inaugurated him King of Arles, or Provence;‡ or Lower or Cisjurane Burgundy, (it is known by each of these names indifferently,) without defining the limits of the new State formed by dismemberment of the territory of Louis and Carloman. The young Princes appealed for protection to their Uncle, Charles the Fat, (le Gros), youngest son of Louis le Germanique, and from him they received such assistance as enabled them to prosecute a successful campaign against the usurper whom they drove into the mountains. By the death of his two elder Brothers without issue, the Crown of the Empire had devolved on Charles the Fat, and the imbecile youths into whose hands the sway of France had passed, considered themselves as mere vassals of his Crown. The death of Louis, the elder of these brothers, was occasioned by a singular accident. Attracted by the beauty of a daughter of one of the gentlemen of his Court whom he observed while on horseback, he addressed her in terms more ardent than maidenly reserve approved. The King spurred his horse as the object of his admiration withdrew within her Father's gates; and in his eagerness of pursuit, not measuring with an accurate eye the height of the portal, he struck his head against the archway, was thrown from his horse with violence, and expired a few days afterwards.§ During the two years

From A. D. 814. to A. D. 888. Louis II. the Stutterer.

From A. D. 888. Louis III. and Carloman.

From A. D. 880. Boson, King of Arles or Provence.

Death of Louis III.

A. D. 882.

learned Blondel, however, is a writer who will be received for the most part with less suspicion, notwithstanding the obloquy which he encountered from the bigotry of his times.

* Eldest son of Louis le Germanique. Velly maintains that since the Pope would not decide between the competitors, the title of Emperor remained in abeyance during three years. i. 349.

† His sister Richilda was the second Empress of Charles the Bald; he himself had married a daughter of the Empress Louis II., before promised to the Emperor of the East, and forcibly carried off by Boson with the connivance of her Brother; and his daughter, the issue of that marriage, was now Queen of Carloman, upon whose association in the Government he therefore insisted.

‡ The Kingdom was called indifferently by either of the first names, Arles being the Capital of Provence; Burgundy was the collective name for that Kingdom and its dependencies; Cisjurane the distinctive name upon the subsequent erection of Transjurane Burgundy.

§ Paulus Emilien.

VOL. XI.

in which his brother Carloman retained the sceptre of France in his single hand, his Realm was desolated by the Northmen. A great victory, but without results, is said to have been gained over these invaders, at Sacour, near Abbeville, before the death of Louis; and one occasion, afterwards, was fatally and disgracefully neglected, in which Charles the Fat might have engaged them with the advantage of overwhelming numbers. Every where else want of men prevented Carloman from taking the field with chance of success, want of money from purchasing more than a short occasional suspension of rapine and massacre. The young King, like his brother, owed his death to accident. While chasing a wild boar in the forest of Baiseau he was inadvertently wounded in the leg by the hunting-spear of one of his attendants,† gangrene rapidly ensued, and he died having scarcely attained the age of eighteen years.

The rightful inheritor of the Crown of France, on the demise of Carloman, was Charles the Simple, a half-brother of the two late Kings, borne posthumously by Adelaide, the widowed Queen of their father Louis the Stammerer. But the dangers to which France was exposed required a steadier pilotage than could be afforded by an Infant; doubts also existed respecting the legitimacy of the second marriage of Louis, who, contrary to a Papal decision, had been compelled to repudiate his first wife Ausgarde; and, consequently, in the estimation of many, Charles the Simple, the issue of his second nuptials, was esteemed a Bastard. If he were excluded, the sole legitimate surviving descendant of Charlemagne was the Emperor Charles the Fat; and by a singular concurrence of personal good fortune, that least worthy of a race too generally distinguished by want of desert, successively united on his single head the Crowns of Bavaria, of Suabia, of Saxony, of Italy, and of Oriental and Occidental France; and received homage from almost all the many Nations which had been swayed by his great ancestor Charlemagne.

The first act of the new reign was cowardly and perfidious.* Hugh, son of Lothaire, late King of Lorraine,§ pretended to that Crown, and his claim was sup-Carlomagno Empire.

From A. D. 814. to A. D. 888.

Death of Carloman. A. D. 884.

Reunion of the Empire of Charlemagne under Charles the Fat.

Treachery to the Duke of Frisia.

* A Ballad in the ancient Teutonic Dialect, commemorating this victory, still exists.

† Some authorities attribute the wound to the tusks of the boar. The Annals of Metz notice as a trait of magnanimity on the part of the King, that in order to screen his attendant from the chance of future punishment, Carloman himself while on his death-bed gave out the latter report.

‡ Occidental France, or Germany, according to the partition of the Empire by Louis le Debonnaire between Lothaire and Charles the Bald, in 846.

§ The Episode of Lothaire, King of Lorraine, son of the Emperor Lothaire, is a remarkable instance of the great authority of the Church in the IXth century. His queen Theutberge, daughter of Count Boson of Burgundy, was accused of incest with her brother Hubert, an Abbot, and consequently was repudiated by her husband; who immediately married Valdrade, a lady to whom he had been betrothed before his first nuptials, and whom he had been compelled to abandon from motives of political expediency. Theutberge having established her innocence by the Ordeal of boiling water, was restored to conjugal rights; but not long afterwards, induced either by ill treatment or by remorse, she offered a voluntary confession of her crime, was formally divorced, and then, having placed herself under the suspected guardianship of her brother, once more avowed her innocence. Pope Nicolas I. espoused her cause, compelled Lothaire to receive again as his wife a woman by whom he had been thus disgraced, and to abandon Valdrade long the object of his affection. It was in vain that Theutberge herself, again anxious for separation, jointly with her husband solicited Nicolas and his successor Adrian II. for a dissolution of marriage. The latter Pontiff administered the Host to the King of Lorraine and his

3 L

History.

From
A. D.
814. to
A. D.
888.

ported by a Northman Chief, Godfrey, upon whom the Emperor had recently bestowed the hand of one of his sisters, together with investiture of the Duchy of Frisia.* The Piratical leader no doubt estimated those extorted concessions at their real value, and held them to be no more than preliminaries to future and far greater gain. In order to accelerate his projects he demanded some vineyards at the confluence of the Rhine with the Moselle; a position which, if once occupied, would introduce the Northmen to the very centre of the Empire. Charles appointed a conference for discussion of the claim in the Isle of Betaw, and there treacherously assassinated Godfrey and his whole Northmen train. Hugh was seized at the same moment in violation of a safe-conduct, deprived of his eyes, and committed to the Monastery of St. Gal, in which he soon afterwards died.

Siege of Paris by the Normans.
A. D.
885.

The Northmen, justly irritated by this base act of treachery, poured down with more than former thirst for blood and rapine upon the defenceless tracts of France; and while Charles, far distant from the scene of calamity, remained in Germany, 40,000 Barbarians under Sigefroi, one of their most distinguished leaders, scoured with unsparring fury the Country between Belgium and the Seine, and finally sat down before Paris. The whole of Paris, properly so called, was then comprised within the little islet now known as L'Île de la Cité, or du Palais. Both on the North and South of the River, however, numerous Ecclesiastical edifices had been built; and these with much of the adjoining Country constituted the Duchy of France, the great fief or domain of the Count of Paris. Eudes, the Noble who then held that conspicuous title, was a son of Robert le Fort,† Count of Anjou, and founder of the Duchy; a brave warrior who had perished in battle against the Northmen about twenty years before. The reputation of the Father was well maintained by his Son; and Eudes, aided by two Ecclesiastics, Gauzelin, Bishop of Paris and Abbot of St. Germain, and Hugh, Abbot of St. Martin de Tours, resolutely maintained himself during a close siege of more than a year. Gauzelin planted a Crucifix on the ramparts, and was frequently seen armed at all points, and combating in its defence. All the military science of that period was exhausted in attack, and we read of a formidable train of now forgotten artillery, catapults, perrieres, and balliste, movable towers, battering rams, vineæ and cavaliers, which were employed in effecting a breach. The chief instrument of offence used by the besieged was a huge massive beam, shod at its extremity with iron. This machine having been raised almost perpendicularly was let fall upon the framework of the enemy beneath, and when the roofs had been beaten in by repeated blows, vast stones, showers of arrows and javelins, and a deluge of scalding oil and pitch were poured upon the exposed combatants. Three general assaults had been successfully repulsed, when a sudden swell of the river carried away the wooden Bridge which connected the City with the Southern bank, and enabled the Northmen to capture and destroy the tower which protected its approach, on the site afterwards occupied by le petit Châtelet. No further ground was won by the besiegers; and the Emperor, at length shamed by the brilliant defence of the little handful of men whom he had as yet neglected to assist, despatched Henry Duke of Saxony to their relief in the Spring of the following year. Unwilling, or unable to effect a sufficient diversion, that leader retired after a few skirmishes; and the Northmen, while they burned every cottage and tree, and put to the sword every peasant within their range, at the same time felt so little apprehension of being dislodged, that they fearlessly amused themselves with the pastime of the chase under the very walls of their enemy's great City.

The toils and privations of the siege proved fatal to many of the French leaders, and the Abbots Hugh and Gauzelin were among those who fell victims to their generous self-devotion. Eudes, now left singly in command, and finding that the messengers whom he despatched to the Emperor for assistance returned with cold or evasive answers, resolved on a bold attempt at a personal interview. He proceeded accordingly to Metz, in which City Charles had assembled a considerable force, which he had neither the courage nor the activity to lead to the relief of his suffering People. The return of the gallant soldier was a far more difficult enterprise than his outbreak from the besieged city; for the Northmen, warned of his approach, had placed numerous sentinels before its gates: Eudes commended himself to God, unhesitatingly clapped spurs to his horse, galloped through the opposing ranks, and gained the City unharmed. The spirit of the times attributed a success, really due to the undaunted heroism of the individual, to the special intervention of Providence by a miracle in his behalf.

The Emperor meantime advanced by tardy marches; and willing, if possible, to avoid exposure of his own person, he despatched the Duke of Saxony with an advanced guard, to reconnoitre from the heights of Montmartre.‡ At the edge of one of the trenches of the besiegers the Duke's horse stumbled and threw him, and before he could recover himself he was pierced by a thousand swords of Northmen, rejoicing in vengeance upon a Chief who had been employed in the perfidious murder of Godfrey.† Far different was the feeling of the pusillanimous Charles when he heard of the loss of his devoted servant; he advanced indeed, but it was to negotiate, not to punish by the sword. The Northmen concentrated their forces on the left bank of the Seine, while the Emperor entered Paris by the right; and from the Palace of the chief City of his great Kingdom he tendered 7000 pounds weight of silver, to induce his foes, not to abandon the war, but to change the scene of hostilities; to retire from the face of an Imperial army which dared not fight, and to transport themselves to Burgundy, an untouched Country, in which not a single armed man could be mustered to oppose their progress.

Pursued by the murmurs and the contempt of the French People, Charles, after signing this ignominious suite, accompanying it with a terrific imprecation in case he should ever renew intercourse with "his concubines," Valdrade; and the death of the King and the greater part of his attendants within eight days from the denouncement of this curse, was esteemed a sure proof of the vengeance of Heaven upon their criminal intentions. Hugh, the issue of Lothaire and Valdrade, was pronounced illegitimate.

* Godfrey was the first Northman Chief who received a grant of land in France from Charles the Bald in 850.

† Grand-grandfather of Hugh Capet, the founder of the IIIrd French Dynasty.

* Various derived from Mons Martin or Mons Montmartre; as the Hamstead and Highgate of Paris, undoubtedly on its summit.

† Sismondi, iii. 266. Velly ascribes the commission of that great crime to a tool of the Emperor, whom he names Kemard, i. 346.

Carlomagno
Karolus
Fons
A. D.
814
to
A. D.
888

Chiroir action of Count
Eudes.

Disgraceful negotiation
by the Emperor.

History. Treaty, hastened back to Germany; and in that Country a fresh act of weakness precipitated his fall. His authority had long been chiefly wielded by the hands of a Minister, Liutward, Bishop of Verceil. Whether that Ecclesiastic really abused the great power intrusted to him, or whether his overthrow was a necessary prelude to that of his master, is not now to be determined; but he was publicly accused of various acts of tyranny and extortion, and with the profession of some unintelligible Heresy. To those charges was added another, personally affecting the Emperor in a point on which he was peculiarly sensitive; and Liutward was denounced as maintaining a criminal intercourse with the Empress Richarde. The Prelate, stripped of his high dignities, was exiled to his Diocese; and the Empress, maintaining her innocence before a Diet of the Nobles, offered to avouch it either by her Champion in the lists, or by the perilous Ordeal of the red-hot ploughshares. Such appeals to the judgment of Heaven were little needed; for Richarde had yet another evidence in store, which not only established her own purity, but which also covered her husband with ridicule for his credulous imbecility. Ten years had elapsed since their marriage, yet the Empress was still a virgin. Every hour increased popular discontent by some new betrayal of the faith of Charles. In his youth, in order to excite remorse for some acts of filial disobedience, (for the sons of Louis the German more than once rebelled against their father,) the Ecclesiastics persuaded him that he was possessed by an Evil Spirit; and the wretched victim of that pious fraud solicited and underwent, in the presence of the assembled Barons and Prelates of the Empire, the solemn and impressive ceremonies framed for the exorcism of an energumen. The remembrance of those days of suffering was never effaced from his imagination; and at length he shut himself up from public view within the walls of his Palace, and became engrossed by a fearful belief that he was again subjected to the immediate influence of the Devil.* His disorder was heightened by deep incisions in the head, injudiciously made by the surgeons with the hope of relieving him from tormenting pain with which that part was affected.

Notes This failure of intellect determined the German Nobles to commit themselves at once to the rule of some more efficient Sovereign. The legitimate race of Charlemagne was extinct with their present monarch, by the reputed bastardy of Charles the Simple, whose extreme youth indeed, even under other circumstances, rendered him ineligible. Of the many pretenders to connection with the founder of the Carolingian line, Arnulf, a natural son of Carloman, King of Bavaria, had secured the most numerous partisans. At a Diet convoked in the name of the Emperor, at Tribur, between Mentz and Oppenheim, Arnulf appeared with a powerful band of Slavonian followers; the ex-minister, Liutward, declared in his favour; the Saxons, the Thuringians, the Bavarians, and the Suabians, successively proffered their support; and in three days the whole Court of Charles transferred itself to his now avowed successor. Chased from his Palace, abandoned by every domestic of his establishment, shattered in bodily health, and approaching the utmost verge of mental derangement, the miserable outcast wandered forth, houseless and penniless, to seek even for food. He was received with tenderness and hospitality by Liutbert, Bishop of Mayence; who not only sheltered and supported his fallen master, but with a rare exercise of disinterestedness, pleaded also for him with the Prince by whom he had been supplanted. Bearing with him a piece of the true Cross, upon which Arnulf had formerly sworn allegiance, Liutbert petitioned for some small allowance, by which the dethroned Emperor might be rescued from destitution. The scanty revenues which in consequence were assigned to him in Suabia were not long enjoyed. Charles died in three months after his retirement to the Chateau of Indings in that Country; and if we accorded that belief to the Annals of Fulda, which they no doubt received at the time of their compilation and long afterwards, we should admit that at the moment at which the Empire, built up by Charlemagne, was dissolved in the person of his great grandson, the heavens opened for the expiring Monarch, "in order to show that he whom men had chiefly despised, was the Sovereign of all others most acceptable to the Deity."*

Carlovingian Empire.

From A. D. 814. to A. D. 888. Arnulf, Emperor.

Death of Charles the Fat, and dismemberment of the Carolingian Empire.

A. D. 888.

* Annales Fuldenes, p. 51. It would almost seem as if Velly, a fertile creator of Herons, had been inoculated by the Monkish spirit in his delineation of Charles le gros. After an impartial recital of his courtiers, unkindly, and usually weaknesses, he sums up, C'étoit en effet un très-bon Prince, juste, dévot, même jusqu'à l'exercer, qui n'avoit d'autre vice que celui d'être au dessus de son rang et de sa puissance.

* Annal. Bertin. ad ann. 883. It is most probable that Charles was epileptic.

ITALY.

FRANCE.

GERMANY.

THE CARLOVINGIAN EMPIRE.

A. D.

- 812 Death of Pepin, eldest son of Charlemagne.
814 Death of Charlemagne. Accession of Louis the Debonnaire, 817 who divides the Empire among his Sons.

820 They make war against him.

833 Deposition of Louis the Debonnaire, followed by his Restoration and Death.

840 Lothaire, Emperor.

841 Civil War with his brothers. Battle of Fontenay.

843 Treaty of Partition at Verdun. France assigned to Charles the Bald, Germany to Louis, Italy, Switzerland, and the Rhenish Provinces to Lothaire.

849 Defiance of Rome against the Saracens by Pope Leo IV.

855 Louis II, Emperor, and King of Italy.

864 Re-conquest of the Spanish March by the Saracens. 873 Continued descents of the Northmen.

875 Charles the Bald, Emperor, and King of France.

877 Loss the Sicamores. 878 Louis III., and Carloman, joint Kings of France. 882 Death of Louis III. Carloman singly.
879 Commencement of the Kingdom of Cisjuran Burgundy under Boson, Count of Provence.

884 Charles the Fat, Emperor, reunites the whole Empire.

888 He is deposed.

DISMEMBERMENT OF THE CARLOVINGIAN EMPIRE.

A. D.

888 Eudes, King.
896 Charles the Simple, grandson of Charles the Bald.

911 Settlement of the Northmen, or Normans in Neustria, hence called Normandy.

923 Robert.
923 Rodolph.

926 Louis IV.

934 Lothaire.

986 Louis V. (le Fainéant)

III. THE CAPEVIAN DYNASTY OF FRANCE.

987 Hugh Capet, King of France.

996 Robert the Wise.

1031 Henry I.

1060 Philip I.

1066 The Norman Conquest of England.

A. D.

889 Arnulf, (an illegitimate descendant of Charlemagne.)
King of Germany.
900 Louis III.

911 Extinction of the Carolingian Dynasty in Germany.
Count of Francoonia elected King.

919 Henry I., or the Fowler

934 Inflicts a great defeat on the Hungarians.
936 Otto I.

955 Finally repels the Hungarians.

961 THE IMPERIAL TITLES RESTORED IN HIS PERSON.

973 Otto II.

983 Otto III.

1003 Henry II.

1024 Conrad II., the Salic.

1032 Acquires the Kingdom of Burgundy (Cisjuran and Trans-juran united 996) by bequest.
1039 Henry III.

1056 Henry IV.

1059 Commencement of the great struggle between the Empire and Papacy for Ecclesiastical Investitures.

1076 The Emperor excommunicated.
1078 Rejection of Rodolph of Barria, supported by the Gregory VII.
1080 Death of Rodolph.

1095 Godfrey of Bouillon, Duke of Brabant, undertakes
THE FIRST CRUSADE.

A. D.

889 Berenger, Duke of Friuli, (descended from Charlemagne.) King of Italy.
900 Civil Wars, aggravated by the incursions of the Hungarians.

915 Berenger, Emperor.

924 His murder.

926 Hugo, Count of Provence, King; rules the Kingdom of Cisjuran Burgundy to Rodolph, King of Transjuran Burgundy; (the latter founded in 923.) deposed and succeeded by his son.

938 Lothaire.

940 Berenger II.

941 Invasion of Italy by Otto, King of Germany.

961 Otto the Great, Emperor, and King of Italy.

973 Otto II....

983 Otto III.... Emperor of Germany and Kings of Italy.

1. The Lombard Cities gradually independent.

1002 Henry II....

2. Rising Power of Venice, Genoa, and Pisa.

1024 Conrad II....

3. Settlement of the Normans (a. d.
1066) in Southern Italy.

1039 Henry III....

1059 Conquest of Sardinia and Corsica from the Saracens, by the Pisans and Genoese.

1056 Henry IV., Emperor and King.

1059 Commencement of the great struggle between the Empire and Papacy for Ecclesiastical Investitures.

1073 Accession of Pope Gregory VII.

1077 Subjection of the excommunicated Emperor (Henry IV.)
who, however,

1080 Captures Rome, and sets up an anti-Pope.
The Norman Conquest of Naples completed; and in 1090 that of Sicily from the Saracens.

1085 Pope Urban II.

1095 Promotes THE FIRST CRUSADE.

1095 The Council of Clermont. Hugh, brother of Philip I, joins THE FIRST CRUSADE.

HOUSE OF SALICUS.

HOUSE OF FRANCOVIA.

HISTORY.

in the Person of Charlemagne, to the Commencement of the Crusades.

—1095.

SPAIN.

A. D. Alfonso II., King of Asturias, (since A. D. 791.)
Alfonso, Khalif of Cordova, (since A. D. 796.)

Abdallah II., Khalif of Cordova.

Ramiro,.....

Kings of Asturias.

Ordoño I.,.....

Muhammad, Khalif of Cordova.

Alfonso II., (the Great) King of Asturias.
Reconquest of the Spanish March from France by the Saracens.

Muhammad,.....

Khalifs of Cordova.

Abdallah IV.,.....

Garcia, King of Asturias.

Abdallah III., Khalif of Cordova.

Ordoño II.,.....

Fraila II.,.....

Alfonso IV.,.....

Ramiro II.,.....

Kings of Leon and Asturias.

Ordoño III.,.....

Ordoño IV.,.....

Sancho I.,.....

Abel Alkali, Khalif of Cordova.

Ramiro III., King of Leon and Asturias.

Abmasser, Khalif of Cordova.

Bernardo II.,.....

Kings of Leon and Asturias.

Alfonso V.,.....

Boncho the Great, King of Navarre and Aragon.

Abdallah III.,.....

Abdallah IV.,.....

Muhammad Alkhalil.

Decline of the Saracen Power in Spain.

Ordoño II.,.....

Bernardo III., King of Leon and Asturias.

Ramiro I., King of Aragon.

Wardward the Great, King of Castile, acquires Leon by marriage.
Extinction of the Dynasty of the Omeyyads Khalifs in Spain.

Sancho II., King of Leon and Castile.

Sancho II., King of Aragon.

Alfonso VI., King of Leon and Castile.

Toledo recovered from the Saracens.

Henriques, Count of Portugal.

Alfonso, King of Morocco, seizes all Saracen Spain under his vassals.

Alfonso I., King of Aragon.

ENGLAND.

A. D. Egbert, King of Wessex.

Soldiers the Welsh Britons.

Extends his supremacy over all South Britain, and becomes Eighth Bretwalda of the Anglo-Saxons.

The regular invasions of the Northmen, or Danes, commence, but are repelled by Egbert.

Ethelwolf succeeds him.

Kenneth II. King of the Scots, subjugates the Picts, and rules over North Britain.

Great defeat of the Danes by Ethelwolf.

Ethelbold,.....

Ethelbert,.....

Ethelred,.....

Alfred the Great.

England overrun by the Danes, and Alfred compelled to fly in concealment, until he equally defeats them, and recovers his dominions.

Publication of his Laws. He finally repels a fresh invasion of Danish invaders.

Edward the Elder succeeds him.

Defeats the Northumbrian Danes.

And reduces both them and their countrymen in East Angles under his scepter.

Aethelstan, FIRST KING OF ALL ENGLAND.

Inflicts a great defeat on the combined Danes, Scots, and Britons, at Brunanburgh.

Edmund I.

Ethelred. The Danes of Northumbria finally subdued.

Edwin.

Edgar. Scotland acknowledges his supremacy.

Edward II. (the Martyr.)

Ethelred II. The Danish invasions begin now.

England tributary to the Danes.

Great invasion of the Island by the Danes under the King of Denmark and Norway.

General massacre of the Danes in England.

Revenge by Swedes, King of Denmark, who Conquers the Kingdom.

Edmund II. (Ironside) succeeds his father Ethelred, on his death.

Cnut, (the Great), King of Denmark and England.

Harold (Hardfot),.....

Cnut II. (Hardfot),.....

Edward III. (the Confessor.)

Malcolm Canmore recovers the throne of Scotland from the usurper Macbeth.

Harold II. succeeds the Confessor, and is slain in the Battle of Hastings, which produces

THE NORMAN CONQUEST OF ENGLAND.

William I. (the Conqueror), King of England.

Seizes Scotland.

Donaldegus King begins.

William II. (Rufus).

Inherits his brother Robert's State of Normandy, and obtains possession of that Duchy by mortgage from Robert, who joins THE FIRST CRUSADE

THE EASTERN AND MOHAMMEDAN EMPIRES.

A. D. Irene, Empress of the East (since A. D. 797.) Haroun Alrashed, Khalif of the East (since A. D. 786.)

Nicephorus I., Emperor of the East, defeated by Haroun Alrashed. 808 Alamin, Khan of the East.

Stavros Michael I., 813 Leo V., Emperors.

Alaminus, Khalif.

Michael II., Emperor. 828 Constantinople besieged by the Saracens.

Theophilus, Emperor, defeated by the Saracens.

Motassin, 841 Haroun Wasir, Khalifa.

Michael III., Emperor.

Motawakkil, 861 Mustassir, 862 Motas, 865 Motas, Khalifa.

Basil I., Emperor, FORTWEN OF THE MACEDONIAN LINE.

Egypt revolts from the Khalifs.

Mutaid, 870 Mutammed, Khalifa.

Leo VI., Emperor. 892 Mutaid, Khalif.

Southern Italy subject to the Eastern Empire.

Mustafa, 907 Mostader, Khalifa.

Alexander, Constantine VII., (912) Romanus I., Christopher, Stephen, Constantine VIII., Emperors.

Rise of the Fatimid Dynasty of Khalifs in Egypt, Western Africa, and Syria.

Cahir, 803 Alradi, Khalifa.

Extinction of the power of the Abbasides Khalifs. DISMEMBERMENT OF THE KHALIFATE OF THE EAST.

Romanus II., 863 Nicephorus II., Emperors.

Joh. Zimenes, Emperor. The Empire triumphant over the Saracens, Bulgarians, and Russians.

Basil II. and Constantine IX., joint Emperors.

Rise of the Turkish Dynasty of the Gaznavides.

Basil II. finally reduces the Kingdom of Bulgaria.

Constantine IX., sole Emperor.

Romanus III., 1034 Michael IV., Emperor.

Michael V., (Zoe and Theodora), 1042 Constantine X., Emperors.

Conquest of Persia by the Turks.

Theodora II., Empress of the East, THE LAST OF THE MACEDONIAN LINE.

Michael VI., 1057 Isaac Comnenus, 1059 Constantine XI., Ducas, Emperors.

Jerusalem captured by the Turks from the Saracens.

Romanus IV., Emperor, defeated and made prisoner (A. D. 1071) by the Turks.

Michael VII., Andronicus I., Constantine XII., Emperors.

Nicephorus III., Emperor, 1080 Southern Italy wrested from the Empire by the Normans.

Albanus Comnenus, Emperor.

Conquest of Asia Minor by the Turks, who fixed the Subjunct Kingdom of Rum.

Under the Reign of Alexius Comnenus

THE FIRST CRUSADE for the recovery of Jerusalem.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXV.

OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH—OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS—AND OF THE HERESIES IN THE IXth CENTURY.

GENERAL STATE OF THE CHURCH.

History.
External state of the Church.

THE external state of the Church in the IXth Century derived its complexion chiefly from the character of Charlemagne. The zeal of that great Monarch for the propagation of Christianity was ardent, but his piety was debased by violence and superstition; and thus, although the propagation of the Gospel during his reign was extensive, yet it was too frequently effected by force rather than by argument. His son, Louis the Debonnaire, inherited many of the faults of his father without his counterbalancing virtues or talents. Yet the missionaries who were sent to instruct and convert the Barbarous nations in the North of Europe, displayed a conduct worthy of the Religion which they professed. Although the system of Religion which they taught was corrupted, yet their mode of inculcating it was by ratiocination, enforced in most instances by exemplary living.

Conversion of Denmark and Sweden.

Under the reign of Louis the Debonnaire, Christianity was established among the inhabitants of Sweden and Denmark. We have seen that Harald, the expelled Sovereign of Jutland, purchased the Emperor's assistance for his restoration by the adoption of Christianity.* On his return to his native Country he was accompanied by two Priests, named Ansgar and Authbert, the former a Monk of Corby, in Westphalia, the latter belonging to a Monastery of the same name in France. Those missionaries preached the Gospel with remarkable success, till after the expiration of two years death removed Authbert, and Ansgar pursued his labours alone. The loss which he had sustained did not repress his activity; he travelled into Sweden, where he was rewarded by the unexampled success of his ministry, and after a residence of three years there returned to Germany, where he was honourably received by Louis, and was created Archbishop of Hamburg. This was rather a post of danger than of profit, and the perils in which it involved Ansgar were truly formidable. His toils were incessant, and they ended but with his life, after having supported them through a long period of more than thirty years.†

Other conversions.

The Masians, Bulgarians, and Gazarians, and after them the Bohemians and Moravians, were converted by Methodius and Cyril, two Greek Monks under the patronage of the Empress Theodora. A solemn embassy was sent to Constantinople by certain Provinces of Dalmatia, declaring their resolution of submitting to the Grecian Empire, and of embracing the Christian Faith. The warlike nation of the Russians also was converted in this Century, and a Church was established by the Greek Patriarch Ignatius, under the government of an Archbishop.*

Of the Christian Church.

These accessions to Christendom were by no means a compensation for the calamities of the Church under the growing power of the Saracens, who were now masters of Asia, with the exception of a few Provinces, and were extending their conquests in Europe also. In the East a large number of Christians professed the Religion of their conquerors, in order that they might retain their possessions. In the West the Christians were exposed to the fury of those Barbarous nations which issued from the North.

Processions of Gamb-sity.

The state of Learning in this Century was by no State of means so depressed as might be expected from the unsettled condition both of the Eastern and Western Empire. There was now a twilight which rendered the darkness of the succeeding Age more deep by contrast. The liberality of the Emperors, and the generous patronage of the Patriarchs of Constantinople, particularly of Photius, rendered the Capital of the East the residence of a certain number of learned men. Eloquence, Poetry, and History were cultivated there, and the study of Philosophy, which had been long neglected, was revived under the Emperors Theophilus and Michael. At the head of the men of Science was Leo, surnamed the Wise, an Ecclesiastic of extraordinary erudition, who was afterwards Bishop of Thessalonica.

Not only among the Christians did Learning and Science partially revive, but the Arabians also were excited to literary pursuits, by the example of Almansur or Abdallah, the celebrated Khalif of Egypt.‡ He erected Schools at Bagdad, Cupa, and Basora; drew to his Court the learned of all Countries by his extraordinary liberality; and caused translations of the best Grecian Works to be made into the Arabic Language.

Abdallah

In that part of Europe which was subject to the dominion of the Franks, there was not less ardour for the advancement of Learning. The first successors of Charlemagne imitated the zeal of their ancestor for the encouragement of Literature and Science. Louis the Debonnaire formed and executed several designs for their promotion, and Charles the Bald was the rival of Abdallah himself. His brother Lothaire endeavoured to revive Science in Italy, but his efforts were frustrated through the corruption and ignorance of the Clergy.

The Carolingian Rena.

The degeneracy of the Sacred Order in this Century arose to an enormous height, and their licentiousness

Depravity
of the Clergy

* Page 429.

† An account of this Prelate is to be found in Fabricius, Bib. Med. Aet., tom. i. p. 292.

* Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sec. ix. In this Century Christianity was propagated in India by the Nestorians. Mar. Thomas, a Syrian, established Churches on the coast of Malabar.

† For an account of this Khalif, see D'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. Art. Meman.

History. and impiety have called forth the just censure of all impartial Historians. Their ignorance was not less deplorable; many of them were unable to write or even to read, and most were incapable of explaining their corrupted Faith with any tolerable degree of perspicuity. In the East, the favour of the Court was the only step to the high and influential dignity of Patriarch of Constantinople; and even after its attainment, nothing was more common than to see a Patriarch degraded by an Imperial decree. The Roman Pontiffs in this Century obtained from Charles the Bald, the important privilege of an election by the suffrages of the Clergy without the Imperial ratification; yet this mode of election was not more pure than that of the Eastern Patriarch. The election was rarely conducted with any observance of law, order, or decency, and was generally followed by Civil tumult and commotion.

Few of the Prelates who were raised to the Western Pontificate, could boast either of Learning or virtue; not a few are known only by their flagitious actions; but the universal aim of the Heads of the Western Church, appears to have been an extension of their authority wherever it was not acknowledged, or an enlargement of their power over those Churches which owned their supremacy.

It was in this Century that the elevation of a woman to the Pontifical throne, already related by us,* is said to have taken place, which, if true, must have interrupted the regular succession of Bishops in the See of Rome. During five Centuries succeeding this event it was almost generally believed, nor was it until after the Reformation that it became questioned. The arguments of Bayle, who rejects the story, and to which we have already referred, have acquired greater credence than those of Spanheim,† who maintains it; and the general opinion seems to be that the testimonies by which the fact is supported are insufficient, and that it is inconsistent with the most accurate chronological computations.

It is universally acknowledged, even by the advocates of the Papacy, that from the time of Louis the Debonnaire, the Ecclesiastical state of Europe underwent a complete change. The European Sovereigns were divested of their supreme authority in the Religious polity of their respective Kingdoms; the power of the Bishops was greatly restrained; and the authority of Councils began to decline. The Roman Pontiffs succeeded in persuading the World, that the Bishop of Rome was constituted by Jesus Christ the supreme legislator and judge of the Universal Church.

In order to establish this usurpation, a variety of memorials, deeds, and other records were forged, in order that it might appear as if the Roman Pontiffs enjoyed, in the first Ages of the Church, the privileges which they now so arrogantly claimed. Among these forgeries the Decretals Epistolæ chiefly deserve to be mentioned. They were said to have been written by the Pontiffs of the primitive times, although they were actually the production of some obscure and later writer, who, in order to obtain respect for his inventions, published them under the name and authority of Isidore, Bishop of Seville in the VIIIth Century. The Prelates, as a token of humility, frequently added to their names the word Peccator, a Sinner; and some ignorant transcriber ludicrously changed this word in the title of the Decretals to Mercator; so that these forgeries have always passed as the collection of a writer who is no more than imaginary, one Isidorus Mercator.*

Yet even in the Latin Church, there were men of prudence and sagacity who penetrated these frauds. The Gallican Bishops distinguished themselves by the spirit with which they opposed the spurious Decretals; but the pertinacity of the Pontiffs, and particularly of Nicholas I., subdued their opposition, and their defeat struck terror into all who were disposed to support the expiring liberties of the Church.

Ecclesiastical Writers of the IXth Century.

Increasing power of the Papacy.

The forged Decretals.

ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS OF THE IXth CENTURY.

GREEK WRITERS.

PHOTIUS, DIED CIRCEIT A. D. 886.
IGNATIUS, DIED A. D. 878, AGED 80.
NICEPHORUS, DIED A. D. 828.
LEO VI., REIGNED FROM A. D. 886 TO A. D. 911.

LATIN WRITERS.

RABANUS MAURUS, DIED A. D. 856.
AGOBARD, DIED A. D. 840.
CLAUDIUS, DIED A. D. 839.
EGINHARD, DIED CIRCEIT A. D. 840.
GILBAS, FLOR. A. D. 820 ET DEINCEPS.
GOTTESCHALK, DIED CIRCEIT A. D. 870
HINCMAR, DIED A. D. 882.
PARCHASIUS RADBERT, DIED A. D. 851.
BERTRAMN, OR RATHMANN, DIED CIRCEIT A. D. 870.
HAYMO, OR AIMO, DIED A. D. 853.
WALAFRIDUS STRABO, OR STRABUR, DIED A. D. 849.

PHOTIUS.

DIED CIRCEIT A. D. 886.

The IXth Century is styled the Photian Age, and therefore this illustrious Patriarch of Constantinople claims the first place in the catalogue of learned men. His extraction was of the highest order, and his connections enabled him to attain the chief dignities in the State at an early period of life. His elevation to the Patriarchate of Constantinople was so far from being solicited, that it was accepted with the greatest reluctance, since the See was vacant by the deposition of Ignatius, and he consequently incurred the resentment of a formidable party. That party, on the accession of the Emperor Basil,† had sufficient influence to procure the deposition of Photius and the condemnation of his doctrines; he was compelled to submit to a rigorous exile, deprived of the consolation of his friends, and what was more pain-

* Page 436.

† Spanheim, Exercitationes de Populi Fœderis. Op. tom. ii. lib. v. The Dissertation of Spanheim is well worthy attention, since he has considered the objections of Blondel, who rejects the story. Blondel was not a member of the Church of Rome, but a zealous Presbyterian.

* Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 21.

† For the Civil History of the Eastern Empire, which will elucidate this and other transactions of the Greek Church during the IXth Century, the reader must turn to a subsequent Chapter, which contains the Annals of that Empire, hitherto not detailed beyond the year 755.

History. to the Court of the Emperor Lothaire. A more copious account of him, and also of his antagonist, will be found under the next division of this Chapter.

HINCMAR.

DIED A. D. 882.

This turbulent Prelate, but able Theologian, was Archbishop of Rheims. His Works are numerous, and although mostly controversial, they throw a great light on the Civil and Ecclesiastical History of the times in which he lived. They have been collected by Père Sirmond, the learned Jesuit,* and published in two vols. folio, Paris, 1647.

Hist. Lit. de France, tom. v. p. 416. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 33, 34.

PASCHASIUS RADBERT.

DIED A. D. 851.

This name is famous in the controversy concerning the Real Presence of Christ's body in the Eucharist, under which head it will be noticed. He was first a Monk, and afterwards Abbot of the Monastery of Corby, and was consequently the Ecclesiastical superior of

BERTRAMN, OR RATRAMN,

DIED CIRCA A. D. 890,

whose Work on the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was composed by order of Charles the Bald, in opposition to those who asserted the Real Presence. Several editions of this Treatise have appeared, and among them two in England of the dates of 1686 and 1688. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. Radbert, p. 32. Bertramn, p. 27.

Heretics of the IXth Century.

HAYMO, OR AIMO,

DIED A. D. 853,

was a pupil of Alcuin, a fellow-student and friend of Rabinius Maurus, and afterwards Bishop of Halberstadt. He wrote Commentaries on the Psalms, on the Prophet Isaiah, on the Epistles of Saint Paul, and on the Apocalypse, and also a Summary of the Ecclesiastical History. He took a part in the controversy on the Real Presence. It is proper to observe that a great part of the writings commonly attributed to Haymo, were the production of Remi, or Remigius of Auxerre.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 28.

WALAFRIDUS STRABO, OR STRABUS.

DIED A. D. 849.

The reputation of this author depends on his Poems, his Lives of the Saints, and his Glosses on some difficult parts of Scripture.

Hist. Lit. de France, tom. v. p. 544. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 31.

HERESIES OF THE IXth CENTURY.

THE PAULICIANS.

This Sect was confined almost entirely to Armenia. It is said to have been formed by two brothers, Paul and John, from the former of whom it derived its name; though others attribute its origin to another Paul who lived under the reign of Justinian II.† It was censured by several Imperial edicts, and had almost disappeared, when it was revived by a zealot, called Constantine, who lived in the VIIIth Century. The Emperor Constant and his successors treated this Sect with the greatest rigour, but they were unable to suppress it. Its followers displayed the most unshaken fortitude under the barbarities exercised towards them.

In the commencement of this Century, the external condition of the Paulicians was altered, since the Emperor Nicephorus favoured them in a particular manner, and not only restored their freedom of worship, but conferred on them several Religious privileges. Yet this temporary freedom from Persecution was of short duration. Under the reigns of Michael Curopalates and Leo the Armenian, a severe inquisition was made after the Paulicians throughout all the Provinces of the Grecian Empire, and death was inflicted on all such as refused to abjure their tenets. But Persecution had a different effect on them now than formerly, for it excited vindictive desperation. Thomas, Bishop of New Cæsarea, and several of the Imperial magistrates established in Armenia, fell victims to their fury, and after the commission of numerous outrages, they fled for refuge to the Countries under Saracenic dominion, and thence made incursions on the neighbouring Provinces of the Empire.

A short interval of tranquillity appears to have succeeded, until the Empress Theodora issued a Decree, leaving to the Paulicians the alternative of renouncing their opinions, or of being exterminated by fire and sword. This Decree was executed with the most unrelenting cruelty; for the Imperial officers after having seized the property of above one hundred thousand Paulicians, inflicted on their possessors the most excruciating kinds of death. Those who escaped fled, like their predecessors, for protection to the Saracens, who received them with kindness, and permitted them to build for their residence a city called Tibrica. In that settlement, they formed a League with their protectors, and declared against the Greeks a war, which was carried on with the utmost fury.* Many of the Grecian Provinces felt the effects of the sanguinary contest, and exhibited the most appalling scenes of desolation and misery. Wherever the arms of the Paulicians were victorious, their opinions took root, and they propagated their tenets with great rapidity among the fierce Bulgarians.

What those tenets were, has been a matter of dispute. By the Greeks this Sect was reckoned a branch of the Manichæans, yet, according to Photius, the Paulicians expressed the greatest abhorrence of some of the Third persecution by Theodora.

Protected by the Saracens. Declare war against the Greeks.

Propagate their doctrines.

* They chose for their chief, Carbeas, a man of great valour. Phot. lib. i.

* Who has passed on them the following encomium: In iis nihil esse quod vitiosum sit, et corruptum, et in quo præstans antiorum judicium cum acriter non placeat.

† Phot. lib. i. contra Manichæos.

History.

Manichean doctrines. They had not, like the Manicheans, an Ecclesiastical Polity, administered by Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. They had no Sacred Order, distinguished from the People, in their Religious Assemblies. They had no Councils nor Synods. They had two sorts of Teachers, Sunecdemi and Notarii, among whom there was a perfect equality. The only distinction which attended their Religious profession was, that they changed their lay name, and adopted some scriptural appellation. The Paulicians received all the Books of the New Testament, except the two Epistles of St. Peter; and in this respect, also, they widely differed from the Manicheans. In their interpretations of Scripture, however, they used great latitude, explaining it in the most fanciful manner, and perverting its literal sense whenever it was opposed to their favourite opinions. They regarded with a peculiar veneration, certain Epistles of Sergius, the most eminent teacher of their Sect. None of the Greek Writers have given a clear view of the whole Paulician system, but have contented themselves with noticing certain prominent marks of their Heresy. Their chief errors are represented to have been these: 1. They denied that this lower and visible World is the production of the Supreme Being; and they distinguished between the Creator of the World, and the Most High God. 2. They treated contemptuously the Virgin Mary, by which, perhaps, is only meant, that they refused to render adoration or divine honour to her. 3. They refused to celebrate the holy institution of the Lord's Supper. 4. They loaded the Cross of Christ with contempt or reproach, which may be explained in the same manner as their contemptuous treatment of the Virgin Mary. 5. They rejected, after the example of the Gnostics, the Books of the Old Testament, and looked on their Writers as inspired by the Creator of the World, not by the Supreme God. 5. They excluded Presbyters and Elders from all part in the administration of the Church. By this must be understood that they refused to call their Doctors by the name of Presbyters, the latter being a word of Jewish extraction.*

CONTROVERSY CONCERNING IMAGES.

After the banishment of the Empress Irene, the contests between the Iconoclasts and Iconoduli were renewed; and during the former part of this Century the success of the contending parties was various and doubtful. The Emperor Nicephorus deprived the favourers of Image-worship of the power of persecuting their antagonists; but his successor, Michael Chropalates, espoused their cause. On the accession of Leo the Armenian a Council assembled at Constantinople, which abolished the Decrees of the Nicene Council, relating to the use and worship of Images; but without enacting any penal laws against their worshippers. Such was the moderation of that Emperor, that he removed the Patriarch Nicephorus from his office, on account of his violence against the Iconoclasts. Michael, surnamed Balbus, and Theophilus were more decided in their hostility against the worship of Images.

But when Theodora was intrusted with the Regency during the minority of her son, the scene was changed. A Council, which she was prevailed on to call at Constantinople, restored the decrees of the II^d Nicene Council to their ancient authority. Thus the cause of Idolatry triumphed throughout the East; and the Council held at Constantinople under the Patriarch Photius, which is reckoned by the Greeks the VIIIth General Council, was the consummation of the victory. The superstitious Greeks esteemed that Council as the effect of a divine interposition, and instituted an anniversary in its commemoration, which was called the Feast of Orthodoxy.

Notwithstanding the efforts of the Roman Pontiffs, Image-worship was not established in the Western Church without many struggles. The Iconoclasts were powerfully supported by Claudius, Bishop of Turin. That Prelate, immediately after his promotion to the Episcopal dignity, commanded all Images, in which even the Cross was included, to be cast out of the churches and committed to the flames. He defended his proceedings in a Treatise, in which he declared against the use as well as the worship of Images. He maintained his ground against a host of adversaries, and with so great ability, that the City of Turin and its Diocese, even after his death, were comparatively free from the contagion of Image-worship, which now overspread the rest of Europe.†

CONTROVERSY CONCERNING THE CORPORAL PRESENCE IN THE EUCHARIST.

This controversy which still divides the Church, and is one of the chief marks of distinction between the Romanists and Reformed, had its origin in the IXth Century. It arose out of the controversy on Image-worship, and was founded on a dogma of the Synod at Constantinople held under Copronymus, which a Synod held at Nice afterwards expressly contradicted. The distinction was kept up by Johannes Damascenus, who maintained that a change took place in the symbols of Bread and Wine in the Eucharist, through the intervention of the Holy Spirit. Those who adhered to the decision of the Council of Copronymus, were stigmatized by their adversaries as Heretics under the name of Stercoranists.

But in this Century, the controversy assumed a more determinate shape, in consequence of the writings of Pascasius Radbert.‡ He composed a Treatise, concerning the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, which he afterwards revised, augmented, and presented to the Emperor Charles the Bald. The sum of his doctrine may be comprised in the following propositions: 1. That the substance of the Bread and Wine after consecration is changed into the real Body and Blood of Christ, the same which was born of the Virgin Mary, which suffered on the Cross, and rose from the sepulchre. 2. That of the Bread and Wine nothing remains but the outward figure under which the Body and Blood of Christ are really and locally present. 3. That all receivers partake of the Body and Blood of Council at Constantinople.

A. D. 814.

* The principal authors who have given an account of the Paulicians are Phot. lib. 1, contra Manichæos, Petr. Siculus, Hist. Monach. and among modern writers, Bayle.

† The principal Writer on this subject is Fred. Spanheim, Hist. Imaginum Opera, tom. ii. from whom the above account is abridged.

‡ The life and writings of this Polemic are treated at large by Mabillon, Act. Sanctior. Ord. Benedict.

Hermits of the IXth Century.

Another Council at Constantinople.

A. D.

842.

Council at Constantinople under the Patriarch Photius.

A. D.

842.

The progress of Image-worship in the West.

Claudius, Bishop of Turin.

Photius.

A. D.

842.

The progress of Image-worship in the West.

Claudius, Bishop of Turin.

Photius.

A. D.

842.

The progress of Image-worship in the West.

Claudius, Bishop of Turin.

Photius.

A. D.

842.

The progress of Image-worship in the West.

Claudius, Bishop of Turin.

Photius.

A. D.

842.

The progress of Image-worship in the West.

Claudius, Bishop of Turin.

Photius.

A. D.

842.

The progress of Image-worship in the West.

Claudius, Bishop of Turin.

Photius.

A. D.

842.

The progress of Image-worship in the West.

Claudius, Bishop of Turin.

Photius.

A. D.

842.

The progress of Image-worship in the West.

Claudius, Bishop of Turin.

Photius.

A. D.

842.

The progress of Image-worship in the West.

Claudius, Bishop of Turin.

Photius.

A. D.

842.

The progress of Image-worship in the West.

Claudius, Bishop of Turin.

Photius.

A. D.

842.

The progress of Image-worship in the West.

Claudius, Bishop of Turin.

Photius.

History. Christ, those who receive worthily to their benefit, those who receive unworthily to their condemnation. 4. That there is a necessity for a daily sacrifice of Christ, because the sins of mankind are committed daily.

Scotus and Ratramm. These doctrines, and especially that contained in the first proposition, called forth against Radbert a number of opponents. Two of these, Johannes Scotus and Ratramm, were selected by Charles the Bald to draw up a clear exposition of the doctrine which Radbert had so grossly corrupted. The treatise of Scotus has perished, that of Ratramm has been preserved, and has been the armoury whence the Reformed have since taken many of their weapons, in their warfare against the errors of the Church of Rome.*

In this controversy the disputants fell into the two errors commonly incident to Polemics; they expressed their own opinions without sufficient perspicuity; and they charged on each other the most absurd and dangerous tenets. Those who embraced the system of Radbert alleged that the doctrine of their opponents implied, that the body of Christ was digested in the stomach, and was ejected with the other excrements. This consequence was readily retorted by the Stercoranista, who charged their adversaries with being Theophasites. The latter accusation, in contradiction to Christian charity, has survived the darker Ages, and has not expired even with the XVIIIth Century.

CONTROVERSY CONCERNING PREDESTINATION.

In origi. The last-mentioned controversy has divided only the Reformed Churches from the Church of Rome; but that on Predestination has divided the Reformed Churches among themselves. Its origin is universally attributed to Gottschalc, who had entered against his consent into the Monastery of Fulda, whence he removed into that of Orbais in the Diocese of Soissons. He was a devoted admirer of St. Augustin, and built his system on the authority of that celebrated Father. On his return from a journey to Rome, he discoursed largely on the doctrine of Predestination in the presence of Nothingus, Bishop of Verona; and maintained that God, from all eternity, had predestinated some to everlasting life and some to everlasting misery. Rabanus Maurus, Archbishop of Mentz, no sooner heard of these discourses, than he addressed letters to the Bishop of Verona charging Gottschalc with Heresy. The accused Monk repaired to Mentz for the purpose of justifying himself, but the Archbishop summoned a Synod, and formally condemned the Predestinarian doctrine. Rabanus pursued his hostility against Gottschalc still further; he sent the condemned Heretic to Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, the City in which he had formerly been admitted to the order of Priesthood. Hincmar assembled a Synod at Quiercy, where Gottschalc was a second time condemned, and experienced the most ignominious treatment. Having been degraded from the Priesthood, he was flagellated with the greatest cruelty, until his constancy was subdued, and he was compelled to burn with his own hands the Apology for his opinions which he had presented to the Synod at Mentz. After these barbarous proceedings he was imprisoned in the Monastery of Hautvilliers, where he soon ended his days, maintaining with his dying breath the doctrine for which he had suffered.

The calamities of Gottschalc not only excited commiseration, but procured converts. Ratramm, the opponent of Radbert, was among his warmest advocates. Prudentius, Bishop of Troyes, Remi, Archbishop of Lyons, and others in inferior stations, pleaded in behalf of the unfortunate Monk, and defended his opinions. On the other side were arrayed Johannes Scotus, the coadjutor of Ratramm in the controversy concerning the Corporal Presence, Hincmar, who not only exerted his authority, but wielded his pen against Gottschalc, and many others who contended that he had not received a punishment exceeding his offences. The spirit of discord was raised to so great a degree, that Charles the Bald summoned a second Synod at Quiercy, in which the decrees of the former Council were confirmed. But a counter Synod assembled two years afterwards at Valence in Dauphiny, composed of the Clergy of the Provinces of Lyons, Vienne, and Arles, with the Archbishop of Lyons at their head; and in that assembly the doctrines of Gottschalc were cleared from Heretical imputation. A third Synod, composed of the same clergy, met at Langres; and a fourth at Tournai, in which fourteen Bishops supported the doctrine of Gottschalc and Augustin.

The tenets of Gottschalc, according to his own public confession, were these: that there is a twofold Predetermination, the one of Election to everlasting life, the other of Reprobation to eternal death; that God did not will the salvation of all Mankind, but of the Elect only; that Christ did not suffer death for the whole Human race, but for that part of it only which God has predestinated to eternal salvation; that Free will with respect to God is destroyed in Man by the Fall of Adam, and that hence arises the necessity of assisting and preventing Grace, which is not bestowed according to merit.*

CONTROVERSY CONCERNING THE WORDS TRINA DEITAS.

This was a minor dispute between Gottschalc and Hincmar. The latter had prohibited the use of an ancient Hymn in which the words Trina Deitas occurred, from a persuasion that they tended to introduce into the minds of the people notions inconsistent with the unity of the Supreme Being. But the Benedictine Monks refused to obey this mandate, and Bertramm, who belonged to their order, wrote a book in defence of the orthodoxy of the expressions. Gottschalc, at that time in prison, entered warmly into the dispute, and in an elaborate Dissertation supported the cause of the Benedictines. Thus Hincmar had an occasion of charging his adversary with Tritheism; but the dispute was of short duration. The exceptional passage continued to be used in the Churches notwithstanding the authority of Hincmar.

* The principal writers on this controversy are Sismond, Hist. Prædest. Usener Hist. Godeschalci. Fabricii Biblioth. Lat. Med. Ævi, tom. iii. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. ix. sc. 10. See also, Hist. Lit. de France, tom. v. p. 352.

* "Bertramm first pulled me by the ear!"—Bishop Ridley. An English translation of the Treatise of Bertramm was published at Dublin, A. D. 1752, with a Preliminary Dissertation.

History. CONTOVERSY CONCERNING THE MAN- NER OF CHRIST'S BIRTH.

As the two disputants Hincmar and Gotteschale had a subordinate subject of contention, so also had Radbert and Bertram. Radbert composed a Treatise to prove that Christ was born without his mother's womb being opened, in the same manner as he came into the chamber in which his disciples were assembled after his resurrection when the doors were shut. Bertram, on the contrary, maintained that Christ was born in the same manner as other men, and as other women bring forth their offspring.

CONTOVERSIES BETWEEN THE GREEKS AND LATINS, OR THE PHOTIAN CONTOVERSY.

Causes of division between the Greek and Latin Churches.

The causes of division between the Greek and Latin Churches were numerous, and a spirit of animosity had long prevailed between the Bishops of Rome and Constantinople. The Churches were divided concerning Image-worship, concerning the Procession of the Holy Ghost, and concerning their Rituals and Discipline. The contention of their respective Heads concerned power and jurisdiction; and their fury became more than ever vehement in the reign of Leo the Isaurian, when the Bishops of Constantinople, supported by the Emperor, withdrew several Provinces from the authority of the Roman Pontiffs. In the IXth Century their animosity arose to an excessive height in consequence of the deposition of the Patriarch Ignatius, and the promotion of the learned Photius in his room. This was the act of the Emperor Michael, and its cause was the treason of Ignatius. The proceeding was justified by a Council assembled at Constantinople, but it was far from being attended with general approbation. Ignatius appealed from that Council to the Roman Pontiff Nicholas I., and a Council, which assembled in consequence at Rome, excommunicated Photius and all his abettors. Photius was so little terrified by this excommunication, that he assembled another Council in the Capital of the Eastern Empire, and retorted the anathema on Nicholas.*

Promotion of Photius.
A. D.
858.

Council at Rome ex-communicates Pho-tius.
A. D.
862.

* This learned Patriarch drew up a charge of Heresy against the Church of Rome in general. It consisted of the following articles: 1. That the Church of Rome kept the Sabbath as a Fast; 2. That it permitted milk and cheese in the first week of Lent; 3. That it prohibited the marriage of Priests; 4. That it confined the rite of anointing persons baptized to the Bishops alone; 5. That it had corrupted the Nicene Creed by the addition of the words Eti quoque. This charge was answered by Bertram, by the advice of Nicholas I.

The controversy was attended with Civil tumults, until Basilios the Macedonian, who ascended the Imperial Throne by the murder of his predecessor, recalled Ignatius from exile, and confined Photius in a Monastery. A Council at Constantinople, with its accustomed versatility, solemnly approved this act of authority. In that Assembly, the Legates of the Roman Pontiff, Adrian II., possessed great influence, and it is acknowledged by the Latin Church as the VIIIth Ecumenical Council.

But however favoured by the Roman Pontiff, Ignatius refused to cede the Provinces which had been withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the See of Rome; and his death paved the way for the reinstatement of Photius with the Patriarchal dignity. His restoration was agreed to by the Roman Pontiff, John VIII., on condition that he would yield the Province of Bulgaria to the Romish See. To this demand, Photius gave an explicit consent, and the Emperor a seeming acquiescence. But the promise was so far from being fulfilled, that the restored Patriarch, by the advice of the Emperor, refused to transfer Bulgaria to the Roman Pontiff.

Irritated at this disappointment, John VIII. sent his Legate Marius to Constantinople, announcing that he had changed his opinion concerning Photius, whom he regarded as a Heretic, and justly excommunicated; but the Minister was imprisoned by order of the Emperor. The Legate soon obtained his liberation, and being raised to the Pontificate on the death of John did not forget his former injurious treatment; and a new sentence of excommunication, expressed in terms of the greatest severity, was levelled against Photius.

The haughty Patriarch treated the sentence with contempt, and continued in the possession of uncontrolled authority during the reign of Basilios. But Leo, surnamed the Philosopher, the successor of Basilios, and the pupil of Photius, deposed him from the Patriarchal See, and confined him in an Armenian Monastery. There he ended his days; yet although his removal might have terminated the schisms between the Greeks and Latins, they were not even partially closed. The Roman Pontiffs demanded that all the Bishops and Priests who had been ordained by the obnoxious Patriarch, should be degraded; but the Greeks refused compliance with such an unreasonable proposition. Hence the struggle was continued, and new causes of dissension were added to those which already subsisted, till a final separation took place between the Eastern and Western Churches.*

* This controversy is related at large by Fabricius, Biblioth. Græc. tom. iv. c. 38. See also Gianone, Hist. Neap. tom. i.

Heretic of the IXth Century.

Photius
deposed by the Emperor Basilios.

A. D.
869.

VIIIth Ecumenical Council.

Photius reinstated.

A. D.
878.

Photius excommunicated by John VIII.

Photius deposed a second time.
A. D.
886.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXVI.

ON THE RISE, GROWTH, AND GENERAL FEATURES OF THE FEUDAL SYSTEM.

History. AMIDST the universal anarchy exhibited in the dissolution of the Carolingian Empire, may first be observed the rapid development of those memorable Institutions, which have been comprehended under the name of the FEUDAL SYSTEM. No other epoch, therefore, in our Historical Division, than that whereat we have now arrived, seems more appropriate for introducing some inquiry into the Rise, Growth, and General Features of a Polity, which maintained so durable an influence over the condition of Society throughout the Middle Ages, and of which so many remarkable effects have been preserved in the Government, Laws, and Aristocratical distinctions of Modern Europe.

Source of the Feudal System. The origin of this singular System has afforded a fertile subject of disputation; and the early Institution of Patron and Client among the Romans, the later donation of lands to the veteran soldiery of the Republic and Empire,* the Celtic ties of Clanship, and the military obligation of Asiatic land-owners, have, each in their turn, been supposed to indicate the source, or to illustrate the common prevalence among various races, of the Feudal compact. But all such theories, resting only on fanciful conjectures or faint analogies, are equally incapable of supporting the test of examination. Though the Roman relation of Patron and Client bore some resemblance, in its bond of mutual fidelity, to that of Lord and Vassal, it was totally unconnected with any landed possession or condition of military service; and, on the other hand, where, in the case of the Roman soldier, this condition did exist, the personal relation was altogether wanting. The veterans of Sylla, of Julius Cæsar, and of the second Triumvirate, received their lands, not as retainers for future, but as the rewards of past service: the obligations on the military colonists in the Provinces of the Empire were due, not to an individual Feudatory, but to the State. Again, the Gaelic Clans were bound to their Chieftains, solely by regard for the real or imaginary claims of blood; and by hereditary reverence for the title of primogeniture, which was believed to be vested in one favoured branch of a common stock. But those claims and that reverence were alike independent of situation and of property; and the absolute devotion of the Clansman to his Chief knew nothing of the defined and limited services, which the Feudal Vassal paid in exchange for measured and formal rights of protection. Still less did the haughty spirit of Oriental despotism ever recognise such a reciprocal compact as formed the original relation between the Lord who bestowed, and the freeman who received a Fief. It is obvious, therefore, that in no one of these instances, is there to be found the long descending continuity and interchange of fixed obligations arising exclusively from landed tenures, which formed the peculiar essence of Feudalism, and are sufficient to distinguish that from any other form of Political association.

The Feudal System. Instead of wandering in quest of fallacious and accidental resemblances into earlier Ages or distant regions, the true and natural source of the Feudal System is to be sought among the Nations who embraced it, and the seats in which it attained its maturity; nor can any other origin be reasonably assigned to it, than the circumstances under which the Barbarian conquerors of the Roman Empire established themselves in their new possessions. We should, indeed, guard against the common error of supposing that the Feudal Institutions sprang immediately from that settlement. The inequality which, as we have formerly had occasion to observe, undoubtedly prevailed in the division of conquered lands among the Barbarians, was the remote cause of its change in the form of their Societies, which it required several Centuries to effect. When armies of freemen among the Gothic Races possessed themselves of the Roman Provinces, and erected their new Monarchies on the ruins of the Empire, every warrior received some portion of land, which became the inheritance of his posterity. Such estates, which from the mode of their original acquisition were afterwards distinguished, as we have already noticed, by the term of alodial,† or allotted, were held on a free and absolute tenure, and loaded with no other obligation than the implied duty of the owner to appear in arms for the public defence. But the principal leaders of the victorious hosts, according to the rank and influence to which their military virtues had raised them among their fellow-warriors, received a commensurate share of the spoil; and a still larger proportion by far in the distribution of conquered Provinces, under the name of Fiscal lands, or Royal demesnes, was naturally reserved to the Sovereigns of the new Kingdoms, for their personal enjoyment, the pecuniary support of their Governments and dignity, and the exercise of their munificence. In every Province of the Frankish Monarchy, such an appropriation of numerous Fiscal demesnes to the Crown must originally have been made: for, notwithstanding the spoliation which it may naturally be supposed were

* Vide p. 272 of this Volume.

† A compound of the German particle an, and lot: i. e. land obtained by lot. Robertson's Charles V. vol. i. p. 270. See also Du Cange, Glossarium, ad v. Alodia.

History. encouraged by the weakness of the last Merovingian Kings, their lands still continued, in the reign of Charlemagne, to supply the principal sources of the Royal revenue.*

Rise of a Noble Order of Society. However arbitrary and various were the accidents which influenced the division of conquered lands among the leaders and warriors of the Barbarian Nations, the gradation in the scale of distribution prepared and perpetuated an inequality of hereditary rank and territorial possessions in those rude Societies, which had probably been altogether unknown in their native forests; and hence is clearly derivable the foundation of a Noble,† or Aristocratic Order in the Gothic Monarchies. The descendants of the first fortunate Chieftains inherited with their lands their preeminence of wealth, dignity, and power; and in those possessions were easily recognised a superior claim to the great offices of State and of Provincial authority. The Kingdom of the Franks in Gaul, even on its primitive establishment under Clovis, was regularly parcelled into Governments under such Chieftains who came very early to be distinguished by the title of Counts, an appellation borrowed from the office of the Comites of the Empire; and on the foundation of the Lombard Kingdom in Italy, the same Roman original supplied the term of Duces, or Dukes,‡ for the great Officers, to whom the Military and Civil administration of Cities and their surrounding Provinces was intrusted. In the Frankish Monarchy, this latter title was also employed to express a higher dignity and more extensive jurisdiction§ than those of the Counts; and would appear, though the fact is not clearly established, to have involved a general supremacy over several of those officers. But the common duties of both were to exercise the Civil and Judicial and Fiscal authority in their Governments, and to assemble and lead the Provincial array of Alodial proprietors in national wars.] At what epoch these officers, from being held only during the pleasure of the Sovereign, became hereditary, is not agreed; but there is reason to conclude that their holders had begun to assert a great degree of independence of the Crown, in which their attempts were favoured by the disorderly structure both of the Germano-Frankish and Lombard Monarchies, full two Centuries before any defined existence of the Feudal relations can be satisfactorily traced¶ Counts.

Dukes.

Their offices.

At what epoch first hereditary.

Creation of Benefices.

The sources of Fiefs.

form of Gifts, or Benefices: * the indubitable commencement of Fiefs. At first, indeed, it would not appear that even these grants, as distinguished from Alodial estates, were accompanied with any more express conditions of military tenure than were binding upon every landed proprietor. But it may reasonably be concluded that a Sovereign or great Chieftain did not portion out his personal Estate among his followers, without at least a tacit understanding that he thereby acquired some additional and special title to their services; and even before the reign of Charlemagne, it seems to have been implied that the holder of a Royal Benefice was more closely bound in military duty to his Sovereign than the mere Alodialist: for, by those Emperor's Capitularies,‡ while only one in every three Alodial Manni, or farms, furnished a soldier, equipped at the charge of the two remaining owners, each possessor of a Benefice was required to take the field in person.

Whether Benefices were originally revocable at pleasure, is uncertain; and the fact in itself may be pronounced of little moment;‡ since it is clear, at least, that they were very early converted by the indulgence, or extorted from the weakness, of the Royal authority, not merely into grants for life, but into hereditary possessions. It would be of more importance, if it were possible, to ascertain the Epoch in which this last change was generally effected; and a point of still greater interest to determine the precise period when the Benefice acquired the complete character, by which it was at length distinguished, of a Fief or Fieff,§ through the reciprocal obligations of military service and protection. But both these links in the chain of Historical deduction are irretrievably lost; and we are absolutely ignorant, either when the Benefice began to descend regularly from father to son, or how soon, or by what process, it was permanently burdened with the conditions of a proper Feudal tenure|| Through the thick darkness which overspread the face of Europe during the IXth and Xth Centuries, we can only faintly discern the rude outlines of the Feudal structure; but when the first sure rays of light break upon the edifice, we are surprised to discover it already towering over the scene, in the fulness of its stern grandeur

In a general sense, the primitive extent of the Feudal System was enlarged and limited to the bounds of the Carolingian Empire. Its establishment was simultaneous of

* Du Cange and Spelman, Glossarij, v. Beneficium, et Feudum et Fructum.

† Baluzi Capitula, ad ann. 867, 812.

‡ See the question ably argued by Mr. Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. i. p. 161.

§ Feudum or fructum, ad federe, aut fide, from the contract or fidelity which it involved; or from the Saxons Feo, (Anglicet fe) merces, stipendium. Spelman, ubi supra.

|| A famous Capitulary of Charles the Bald, in the year 877, referring to the established custom of descent in Fiefs, is quoted by some Writers as the earliest recognition of the right of hereditary succession. Yet there are proofs that the existence of hereditary Benefices was recognised as early as, or even earlier than, the VIIIth Century. Marculfus, Formule xii and xiv. Also Leges Burgund. et Wigoth tit. i. and lii. v. tit. ii. But it has been a controversy whether the use of the word Feudum can be traced so high as the Xth Century. Du Cange (ubi supra) seems to discredit the authority of some Charters of earlier date in which it occurs; and Muratori (Antiq. Med. Ævi, vol. i. p. 594.) doubts if the word is to be found in any genuine instrument older than the XIIth Century. Yet this does not prove that Feudal obligations may not have been annexed sooner to grants of land; and still less that the familiar term itself, which was afterwards rendered by Fructum, may not already have been used in the Barbarian dialects to express the sense of the Latin Beneficium.

* Baluzi Capitularia, passim.

† The origin of a Noble Order among the Franks has been sometimes sought in the Antrustors, (from the Teutonic trout, faith, Du Cange, v. Trustis) who were the chosen companions or immediate followers of the early Merovingian Kings, and whose lives (Leges Salicæ, tit. xxiii. c. 20.) were protected by a wergild twice that of an ordinary freeman. But their dignity was at first merely personal, not hereditary, until it became so by the possession of estates.

‡ Du Cange, ad vv. Comes, et Dux.

§ For the proofs we Du Cange, who concludes (ubi supra) from various sources, "Gradus igitur a Comitatu ad Ducatum fuit."

|| Marculfus, Formule, lib. i. c. 32.

¶ Leges Bajuvar. tit. ii. c. 1. 20. Altman. c. 35. &c.

History. — tanously completed in all the Countries embraced under the dominion of the successors of Charlemagne, and can hardly be said to have obtained in any other division of Europe, until a period subsequent to its maturity. In France, Germany, Italy, and the Spanish March, the latter stages of its rise were nearly coeval. The foregoing attempt to elucidate its progress, has referred chiefly to the condition of the proper Monarchy of France, under both the 1st and 11th Dynasties. In Germany, the foundation of Provincial Governments and Beneficiary grants may be held to have given a contemporary impulse to its growth; unless it should be thought that the records which are extant in the Codes of the Alemanni and Bavarians,* of the independence of their Dukes so early as the VIIIth Century, prove even the more rapid development of its germs.

But among the Lombards, a regular division into territorial Governments, may be undoubtedly traced up to the very foundation of their Italian Monarchy; and the certainty of the fact, as well as the systematic constitution of the original Lombard Duchies so early as the VIth Century, might perhaps justify us in assigning a priority to the rise of Feudal institutions in Italy, over their origin both in France and Germany. The whole Kingdom of the Lombards from its beginning was parcelled out, as we have seen, into large Duchies, which in the next Age were thirty in number;† and thus was at once created a great territorial Aristocracy, which soon became hereditary in the descendants of the first Dukes. These formidable subjects, only eight years after the foundation of the Kingdom, were powerful enough to suspend the Regal dignity for a time, and to arrogate to themselves the whole government of the State; and their successors failed not to maintain the high pretensions of their Order. Among them the Dukes of Spoleto and Benevento, the latter especially, favoured by their Southern position at a distance from the seat of the Monarchy at Pavia, seem very early to have established an almost total independence of the Crown. After the subjugation of the Lombard Monarchy to the Carlovingian Dynasty of France, it was the policy of the conquerors to break the strength of this Aristocracy; and Charlemagne and his successors availed themselves of the extinction of several of the Ducal families, to subdivide the Provinces into smaller Governments of Citius under Counts, who held immediately of the Crown.‡ But this change only transferred a share of territorial power to another and more numerous order of Nobility, and probably accelerated the consolidation of the Feudal System.

With respect to Spain, no clearer proof of the source of that System need be demanded than its early and continued existence in the North-Eastern Provinces as far as the Ebro, which had formed part of the Carlovingian Empire; and the rare occurrence of Feudal tenures in any other portions of the Peninsula. The Counts of Barcelona continued to recognise their Feudal obligations to the French Crown so late as the beginning of the XIIth Century;§ and in the whole united Kingdom of Aragon, which, filling the greater part of the Spanish March of Charlemagne, ultimately extended from thence South of the Ebro, the Feudal System was no less completely established than in France itself. But in the Monarchies of Leon and Castile, which spread Southward with a different origin, by conquest over the Moors from the opposite or North-Western angle of the Peninsula, Feudalism never prevailed.* Nor, in our own Island, can the Feudal System be said in any decisive sense to have obtained, until after its introduction, through the Norman Conquest, from France; though there were not wanting in the Saxon constitution of Society, many relations analogous to those of territorial Jurisdiction and Vassalage.†

As the Rise and Growth of Feudal Institutions had been confined to the Countries composing the Empire of Charlemagne, so the complete Establishment of the Feudal System was effected through the gradual dissolution of that gigantic Monarchy, which may be said to have commenced at his death. Under his feeble successors, those great Provincial Governors, the Dukes, the Counts, and the Marquesses,—or guardians of the frontier Marches,—were encouraged to multiply their usurpations on the Royal authority, until they converted the personal offices, which had been committed to them in simple trust for the Crown or the State, into absolutely territorial and hereditary possessions and dignities. They openly asserted a sovereign independence, with only a reservation, which existed in little else than in name, of a superiority to the King. They seized the remaining demesnes of the Crown within their Governments; assumed to themselves the power of supreme Jurisdiction, both Civil and Criminal, in their territories; coined money with their own superscription; waged wars in their own name; and, in a word, exercised all the functions of sovereignty which are usually known under the denomination of Regalian Rights. At the same time, they imitated a Royal style by affixing the name of their Provinces to their office, shared these titles with their wives, and transmitted both their Governments and dignities in lineal succession to their sons.‡ Thus at length the Kingdoms into which the Carlovingian Empire was broken at the end of the IXth Century came to present only collections of as many separate and independent Principalities as there were powerful Nobles; and the Royal authority was in fact universally prostrated and superseded by the dominion of a great Aristocracy, of which the restless members were engaged in continual defiance of the Crown, hostilities among themselves, and spoiliations of the inferior proprietors.

Meanwhile, the creation of hereditary Benefices, by Subinfeudation. grant or extortion from the Crown, produced another general practice, as its natural consequence, which multiplied the links, and completed the long descending chain, of the Feudal Aristocracy. This was the custom of Sub-infeudation. The great Chieftains, alike for their own safety from the violence of the times, and for the furtherance of their schemes of aggrandizement, found

* In a commentary on the Laws of Alfonso IX. of Castile, (Lex ii. part iv. p. 26.) indeed, as cited by Du Cange, it is declared, Non est feudum se otorga con postura, prometiendo el vassallo al señor, de fover le servicia a un casto, &c. Glossarium, ad v. Honor. But the context and the whole course of Castilian History prove that such tenures were certainly not so general as to constitute a feature in the national Policy.

† Mr. Bailion has weighed the evidence on this point with his usual learning and acuteness. Middle Ages, vol. ii. p. 408—418.

‡ Du Cange, v. Moneta.

§ De Vie et De Vassette, Hist. Gén. de Languedoc, vol. i. p. 587. &c. vol. ii. p. 38. 108. and App. 56.

* Leyes Reales, et Aleman ubi supra.

† Leyes Roderici, en Códice Longobard. c. 6. 20. 21.

‡ Sixmoud. Histoire des Républiques Italiques, vol. i. p. 72.

§ Peccatus de Marca, Murus Hispanien, p. 513.

The Feudal System.

Growth of its establishment.

Gradual independence of the great Nobles.

Subinfeudation.

History.
its nature.

it necessary to secure the support of a Body of warlike retainers, bound to them by the mutual and personal ties of protection and dependence. For such purposes, it was an obvious expedient to parcel out among their own followers the Beneficiary estates which they had obtained of the Crown. This custom, of which there are many traces in the Age of Charlemagne, and even of his Father,* became, in the anarchical reigns of the latter Princes of their Dynasty, almost universal. With their assumption of sovereignty, the great Chieftains imitated in their grants the forms of investiture and conditions of tenure, through which they had received their own domains. They instituted these Sub-infeudations to be held of themselves, as they held immediately of the King; and the same oaths of fealty which they had taken, the same homage which they had paid to their Monarch, they required from their Vassals† to themselves. Thus was created a subordinate class of Nobility, styled in different Countries and gradations, Barons,‡ Vassalors,§ or Châtelains,|| who again enjoyed the services of inferior military tenants. Hence the greater Nobles, holding of the Crown as tenants in chief, became intermediary Lords between the Sovereign paramount and their Sub-feudatories; and the second Order of Benefices was distinguished from Royal, as Arrière-fiefs. In its descending obligations, however, the bond of Feudality grew infinitely closer and more effectual; and the Duke, or Count, still more the Vassalor or Châtelain, the actual leader of his Vassals, received the fixed measure and immediate benefit of an allegiance, which he might himself pay only nominally, or altogether withhold at his pleasure from a powerless superior. But, throughout the scale, the obligation of military service had gradually been converted into the distinct mark and condition, only the more real as the rank of the Vassal was lower, of every Beneficiary tenure of land; and in this manner, before the end of the Xth Century, the complete establishment of the Feudal System may be said to have been generally accomplished.

Conversion of Alodial into Feudal tenures.

The transition to this form of Polity drew with it another revolution equally remarkable in the state of landed property. For a long time the great Body of Alodial proprietors, who had formed the original strength of all the Barbarian Kingdoms, and were entitled to vote in their National Assemblies, held a position of proud superiority over the personal Vassals of a Lord; and might exult in contrasting the independent possession of a paternal inheritance, with the obligations imposed on the tenure of a mere Benefice. But the practice of making extensive grants of land to powerful Chieftains on any terms, had an obvious tendency to depress the strength, and endanger the rights, of an uncombined mass of small proprietors; and hence in every Country the lesser Alodials gradually lost not only many of their political privileges as an important Order in the State, but even most of their rights as simple freemen and land owners. Thus, when the Royal donations of Benefices had planted the roots, and while the custom of Sub-infeuding was extending the ramifications of the System of Vassalage, the Alodials themselves fell rapidly into the same state of dependence upon a superior Lord, which distinguished the more recent tenures.

Alodial seems so much more desirable than Feudal property, that it would appear, at first sight, extraordinary that the transition from the one sort of tenure to the other should have been, as it generally was, the voluntary act of the possessor.* But amidst the anarchy and violence, the public disorders and private wars which attended the dissolution of the Carolingian Empire and filled every district with arms and rapine, the relation of Lord and Vassal was the only security for mutual defence; and devoid of such a claim, the unconnected Alodialist could find no protection for his rights or satisfaction for his injuries. Instead of receiving them either from the Royal authority or the National laws, he was most exposed to spoliation from the rapacious Governors and overbearing Lords of his district, who had usurped the exercise both of the Regal and Judicial administration. To obtain a defence therefore for which his single arm might not avail against a host of oppressors, he had no resource but to range himself under the banner of some powerful protector; and he had in effect scarcely any choice left but to compound for security against every other tyrant, by subjecting himself in Feudal service to the nearest or most respectable Lord.

For this purpose, he sometimes surrendered his Alodial property to the Chieftain,† that he might receive it back again on Feudal tenure; or more commonly, as it is probable, simply declared himself the Vassal of the Lord; but in such ways, whether by processes more or less formal, it is certain that, before the close of the Xth Century, the old Alodial lands in France,‡ in Germany, and in Italy,§ had almost all become Feudal||

* Muratori, Ant. Med. Ævi, vol. i. p. 610.

† Ibid.

‡ This was so general that, in some Provinces at least, if the Count could prove that any lands within his Jurisdiction were held on no Feudal service, he might seize them as his own. Beaumanoir, Cost. de Beauvoisin, c. 24. Hence probably the famous maxim of Nulle terre sans seigneur, which became, in later Ages, recognised as a principle of French Law: although this, as Mr. Hallam (vol. i. p. 165,) has observed after Housard, was true only of Jurisdiction not of tenure, Alodial lands inclosed within a Fief of a Lord being subject to his territorial justice.

§ Muratori, ubi supra. There are, however, extant some Charters of the Emperors even creating Alodial tenures in Italy of so late a date as the IXth Century. But these appear as exceptions to a general rule. Muratori, Antiq. vol. i. p. 575.

|| It should, at the same time, be observed, that it is an error to speak, as is sometimes done, as if this revolution had been quite universal. Even in France, there were always some Alodial lands; and in Languedoc these tenures prevailed beyond the Xth Century. De Vie et De Vassalage, vol. ii. passim. In the Spanish March also. Marca, De Marca Hispanica, App. In the Netherlands there are traces of Alodial tenures so late as the XIVth Century. Miris, Opera Diplom. vol. i. p. 218. But see Housard, Anciennes Loix des Français, &c. vol. i. p. 192, 193, &c.

With respect to Germany, however, it may be doubted whether Mr. Hallam (ubi supra) has rendered a passage in Du Cange, on the distinction between the Baro and Semper Baro of that Country, with his usual accuracy, in presuming that the latter order held their lands Alodially. Barones in Germaniæ sunt duplici differenti. Alii enim dicuntur simpliciter Barones, alii Semper-Barones. Semper Baro, is est fterus, qui a nullo horum Feudum habet, sed alii ab

* Baluz. Capit. Pip. et Car. Mag. passim.

† Feudal, from the Celtic Gwas or Goss, a servant. Du Cange, v. Feudus.

‡ Baron from Baro, in corrupt Latin a soldier or man: Barones Regis, meaning literally the men or Vassals of a King. In a proper sense, Barons were therefore tenants in chief of the Crown: but the term was more frequently applied to Arrière-vassals. But see Du Cange, ad v.

§ Vassalors, i. e. vassalli vassallorum, Vassals of Feudatories; the word expressing their double allegiance to their immediate Lord and his Sovereign. Du Cange, ad v. Vassalores.

|| So called, obviously from their possession of Castles. Du Cange, v. Castellanus.

History. Where Alodial domains were large, the possessors would naturally strengthen themselves by sub-infeudating them among their tenants upon condition of military service; where their estates were small, they themselves needed the protection of the nearest Vassor, or Châtelain; and, in both cases, the supremacy of the great Feudatory of the Province would be necessary to complete their security. But it may be suspected that the process was far from being, in all instances, voluntary; and that the Alodialist was often compelled to confess himself the Vassal of a great Lord, by falsely admitting a Feudal derivation of lands, which his ancestors had possessed for Ages on independent tenure.

But another expedient for obtaining the protection of a Lord, without incurring the obligations of Feudal tenure and service, would appear to have prevailed to a considerable extent; and from a very early period in the Middle Ages this practice was known under the name of Commendation,^a and differed from the process and nature of Infeudation in being wholly personal and not territorial. An individual commended himself to a powerful superior; or, in other words, purchased his protection, by a fixed annual payment of money, wine, or other produce,^b and sometimes, indeed, by an engagement to serve him in his wars. Such payments were termed, in the Latin of the times, Salvamenta; and were commonly made by Monasteries as well as by simple freemen: for, in the lawless state of society then prevailing, Ecclesiastical Communities needed defence for their property, almost as much as the ordinary Alodial proprietors. But, as the latter class were gradually forced into the condition of Feudal tenants, this mode of dependence, though it was not unknown in Towns,^c became principally confined to the Monasteries. As long, however, as personal Commendation was in use for individuals, they seem to have been entitled to dissolve the engagement at pleasure without subjecting themselves, as in the Feudal compact, to any forfeiture, since it was unconnected with landed tenure. Thus a Capitulary of Charles the Bald^d declares that every freeman may commend himself to what Lord he will: though the same law contains a startling obligation that to some superior he shall so subject himself. But in the absence of direct evidence, it may be suspected that the conversion of Alodial into Feudal tenures left little room for individuals to exercise even this choice of a Lord; and that, although Monasteries and Towns might still claim a precarious protection on no more onerous conditions than that of a money payment to the Lord of the district in which they were situated, the voluntary compact of a personal Commendation^e was generally lost in a complete Feudal subjection.

Having thus rapidly and briefly noticed the Origin and Growth of the Feudal System, from its germs among the Nations of Barbarian Race, until its maturity in all the Kingdoms which arose from the dissolution of the Carolingian Empire; we may next pursue its History, and distinguish its aspect, in the different Countries in which it was adopted. Until the separation of the Empire towards the close of the IXth Century, it may be presumed that there was little or no variety in the Feudal constitutions of France, Germany, and Italy. But that event had an opposite, and in the sequel a contradictory, influence upon the internal structure of the two greatest Monarchies which were formed from the division. In tracing the operation of that influence, it will be necessary sometimes to anticipate the general order of Chronological narration, and to allude to circumstances belonging in strictness to a later period of History than that to which we have yet followed out the Annals of separate States. But, that the ramifications of the Feudal System may be brought under a single point of view, this proceeding is unavoidable; and, as preventing the necessity of repetitions to explain the distinct internal condition of each Kingdom, it seems on the whole a less objectionable plan to group the facts which bear on the Feudal State of Society under our present appropriate head of inquiry, than to revert to them hereafter in detail.

I. In France, the triumph of Feudalism was earliest effected. The rapid degeneracy of the Carolingian line of Princes, the long-continued recognition of an hereditary right of succession in so feeble a Dynasty, and the intermittent usurpations of one hundred years, produced a gradual and total annihilation of Monarchical government. The incessant ravages of the Northmen aggravated the public calamities and disorder; and the general anarchy and prostration of the Royal Authority prepared the establishment of a Feudal Aristocracy so entirely independent that, for full three Centuries, France presented the appearance rather of a number of petty States in slight and imperfect connection with each other, than of an integral Monarchy. Hence that Country has been with reason considered as forming the principal seat, and offering the most conspicuous example, of the Feudal System in the first Ages after the maturity of its institutions and principles. A bare enumeration of the privileges, which the great Feudatories had acquired by usurpation and suzerainty during the weakness of the Crown, and which had been too long confirmed by exercise to be openly disputed even by a more vigorous race of Monarchs, will be sufficient to demonstrate how deeply that haughty and powerful Aristocracy had planted the foundations of the Feudal structure. For, in these privileges were numbered, the rights of waging private wars, of exercising an exclusive jurisdiction in their Fiefs, and of coining their own money; and a freedom for themselves both

The Feudal System.

History and aspect of Feudalism in different Countries.

I. FRANCE.

Independence of its Feudal Aristocracy.

Their enormous privileges.

scarcely fulfils his promise of adding a new illustration of its features. His authorities, almost all of which are to be found in Du Cange, under the words which we have quoted, admit of no clearer interpretation than that learned authority had extracted from them. Nor does there seem ground for the charge that Du Cange "has not fully apprehended the subject" of personal commendation; since he has at least brought forward all the important evidence which is extant to determine its nature. But in fact, so obscure a custom, which must have been nearly obliterated when the Feudal System swallowed up Alodial rights, possesses neither interest nor importance sufficient to reward a more successful inquiry into its nice shades and distinctions.

igno; adeoque libere est ut nullo ad fidelitatis adstringitur juramento, ut propriis Baronibus de Limburg esse dicuntur. Yet this only declares that the Semper-Baro held of no other Baron, but that the inferior or simple Order held of him. And the Lords of Limburg, one should suppose, owed the usual Feudal superiority to the Emperor. In this sense their title implied only that they were properly his Feudatories. Barones (quoniam homines) Regis being in proper signification the men or Vassals, the immediate tenants in chief of the Sovereign.

^a Du Cange, ad re. Commendationis, et Salvamentum.

^b Iren (Comte) Adel. cronicon, et vitanus pro salvamento, et denarios, says an old Charter quoted by Du Cange, ad v.

^c Thus, by a Charter of Philip Augustus in 1189, De hominibus villis dantis, &c. habebit Præpositus noster pro salvamento 12 denarios. &c.

^d Baluzi Capitularia, Caroli Calvi, a. p. 877.

^e Mr. Hallam's notice of this practice (vol. i. p. 169—171.)

VOL. XI.

History. from all legislative control, and from every pecuniary contribution and public duty to the King and the State, except the customary Feudal services and aids. It is obvious that the assertion of such Regalian Rights and exemptions in the Aristocracy left to the Crown merely the shadow of Sovereignty; and that, while the allegiance which the great Feudatories acknowledged to the Throne, was little more than nominal, the strength of the Feudal relation was maintained only between themselves and their own Vassals. In this view, it may be objected to the perfection of the Feudal System, as it existed in France from the IXth to the XIth Century inclusive, that it was defective in the first link of the descending chain of obligations; but this imperfection was removed in a succeeding Age.

Prostration of the Royal Authority. The revival of the Royal authority slowly commenced with the accession of the IIIrd Race of Sovereigns. But those Princes were assisted in their efforts to restore the effective supremacy of the Crown, not so much by any real weight which had been spared to the Regal office, as by the power which they derived from their own extensive Fiefs; and the independence of the Crown Vassals may be said to have been gradually broken rather by the preponderance of one Family of their own Order, than by any strength which was vested in the abstract title of Royalty. The contest, in fact, lay far less between the great Feudatories and the House of Capet as Kings, than as Counts of Paris and Orleans.

Its slow revival, In that capacity the Capetian Family, by their very large Feudal possessions, were already, before their seizure of the Crown, more powerful than almost any other single member of the great territorial Aristocracy. Their co-Vassals were the Dukes of Normandy, Burgundy, Aquitaine, and Gascony, the Counts of Flanders, Champagne, Anjou, Poitou, Vermandois, and Toulouse, the Lords of Bourbon, Coucy, and several others, all of whom were considered to hold immediately of the Crown, and in reality divided the Kingdom among them. Of these great Vassals, very few at first condescended to acknowledge an equal, in the founder of the new Royal line, for their Sovereign; and though Hugh Capet succeeded by degrees in obtaining an acquiescence in his usurpation throughout the greater part of Northern France, not only his title but that of his successors, for more than a Century at least, received very slight recognition in any of the Provinces South of the Loire.* The relations of the Crown even with some of the greatest Northern Feudatories, such as the Dukes of Normandy and Counts of Flanders, throughout that Age, remind us more of diplomacy with independent Powers, alternately engaged in friendship and warfare, than of Feudal superiority and allegiance.

But the activity of the Capetian Princes rendered them by degrees superior to any single Feudal opponent; and the extension of the Royal authority became an hereditary object which they naturally pursued with more steadiness and unity of purpose, than it was opposed by carrivals, not less jealous of each other than of their Sovereigns, and incapable of any permanent combination. Of the early Capetian Kings, Philip Augustus, beyond all comparison the most able and enterprising, was also the first who made any decisive progress in breaking down the independence of the Feudal Aristocracy. In this he was mainly assisted by the mingled good fortune and unscrupulous vigour, through which he was enabled to wrest Normandy, Maine, and Anjou from our pusillanimous John. The annexation of these great Fiefs to the French Crown placed the Royal power in a very different condition from that to which it had been limited by simple possession of the Counties of Paris and Orleans; and thenceforward the Kings of France felt themselves sufficiently strong to assert a real as well as nominal Sovereignty over the Feudal Aristocracy. The most powerful of the Crown-Vassals were compelled to render the full measure of allegiance and service required by a system of tenure which had theretofore been no more than a fiction. This is not the place to allude more particularly to the course of events by which several of the remaining great Fiefs, such as Poitou, Toulouse, and in part Guienne, fell successively into the hands of the Crown: so that when the Feudal Aristocracy, awakened to their danger by the rapid progress of the Royal power, availed themselves of the minority of Louis IX. to combine against its encroachments, they experienced, to their cost and humiliation, that it was already, under a Female Regency, strong enough to over-master their united efforts. In the present stage of our inquiry, it is not necessary to follow out the History of the Feudal System in France beyond this point, at which the balance of authority had begun decidedly to turn against the Aristocracy, and in favour of the Royal Authority.

Decline of the Feudal Aristocracy. II. It has been said, that the separation of the States of the Carolingian Empire in the IXth Century, had an opposite and contradictory influence upon the internal structure of the two great Feudal Monarchies which sprang from that event. In Germany, at the outset, though the Crown became elective, a succession of vigorous Princes repressed the usurpations and chastised the revolts of the great Vassals; in France the degenerate weakness of the Carolingian Dynasty, though continuing to reign under an hereditary title, produced the absolute independence of the Feudal Aristocracy. But at a later period, while the Capetian Monarchs of France were reducing that Order into subjection, the great Vassals of Germany were plotting against their Emperors the foundations of sovereign rights, which converted their Fiefs into the most durable establishments of the Feudal System. This contrast of its History in the two Monarchies, is attributable, besides the difference between an hereditary and elective order of succession, on the one hand to the characters of successive races of Emperors, and on the other to their great contests with the Papacy which agitated Germany and Italy, during the XIth and two following Centuries.

Originally, the principal Fiefs in Germany were of very great extent. Being divided according to Nations, as they were called, of distinct origin and governed by different Codes of laws, there were thus formed the five Duchies of Franconia, Swabia, Bavaria, Saxony, and Lorraine; to which were added later, by conquest from the Hungarians, the two Marches, or Marquisates, of Austria and Misnia. Yet, notwithstanding their extent of territorial jurisdiction, the Dukes of these Provinces were by no means independent of their Sovereigns. Against the energy by which Conrad of Franconia, Henry the Fowler, and the three Otthos of his line

* Hugh Capet himself forced Guienne (A. D. 990) to make some submission. De Vie et De Vassette, Hist. de Languedoc, vol. ii. p. 120. But Limousin continued to deny the Sovereignty of the Capets until the commencement of the following Century. Idem, p. 130. And it appears from Velly (Hist. de France, vol. iii. p. 61.) that the Feudal array of the Kingdom, as formally assembled by Louis VI. for a national war against the German Empire, even so late as A. D. 1120, was not joined by any Vassals from the South of the Loire.

The Feudal System.

Acquisition of great Fiefs by the Crown.

Decline of the Feudal Aristocracy.

II. Germany.

Of great extent of Feudal Country.

History. were successively distinguished, these great Vassals of the German Crown found it impossible to establish such privileges as their French neighbours had usurped; and while the Princes of the House of Saxony continued to fill the Imperial throne, notwithstanding that each owed his succession, in form at least,* to the elective voices of his co-Feudatories, they maintained their supremacy no less firmly and successfully against their rebellious Vassals than their foreign enemies. These Saxon Emperors refused even the investiture of the great Fiefs as a matter of hereditary right; and, without, perhaps, disturbing the custom of succession from father to son, they asserted the prerogative of withholding the Feudal inheritance or giving it as a boon, instead of suffering it to be seized as an absolute reversion.† Under the first two Princes of the next, or Franconian line,‡ the Imperial Authority attained its highest point; and Henry III. not only succeeded in abolishing altogether the custom which required the popular assent to the investiture of a Fief, but went so far as to deprive Dukes of their States, by the simple sentence of a few of their co-Vassals without confirmation in any General Assembly or Diet of the Empire, and to bestow their possessions on members of his own House.§

But the scene altogether changed when the death of Henry was followed by the long minority of his heir, the 14th of the same name. The great Feudatories of the Empire, outraged by the arbitrary proceedings of the Father, revenged their injuries, and resolved to build their independence, on the weakness of the Son. First the minority of Henry IV., then the errors of his maturer years, and, above all, the fatal contest with the Papacy, in which his manhood was consumed, favoured the designs of his Vassals; and during his reign the Imperial dignity was shorn of its loftiest prerogatives. His revolted Feudatories availed themselves of his quarrel with Pope Gregory VII. to complete their independence; and by a General Assembly of their party, it was decreed that, in the election to the Crown, an hereditary preference should no longer be given to the son of a reigning Emperor, except upon the ground of personal merit.|| The extinction of the male branch of the House of Franconia in the next generation enabled the Aristocracy to complete their purpose of rendering the succession truly elective. The stages by which the right of suffrage ultimately devolved on an oligarchy of seven Princes, it does not belong to this part of our subject to define: but from that famous resolution may be dated the decline of the Imperial authority.

The subsequent elevation of the Swabian Family, although they obtained the Imperial Crown with some interruption through three generations, served only to confirm the pretensions of the Feudal Order: for the frequent absence of those Emperors in Italy, and the reverses of the long struggle in that Country in which their strength was exhausted, gradually perfected the independence of the German Princes. Frederick II. was too much engrossed in Italian affairs to offer any resistance to pretensions, which indeed he rather confirmed by his sanction. A single Age of anarchy sufficed to destroy the remains of the Imperial authority. During the great interregnum in the middle of the XIIIth Century, which followed the death of Frederick, the Feudatories of the Empire became the real Sovereigns of their States; and thus, from nearly the same Epoch at which the French Kings began to exert a high degree of power over the Vassals of that Crown, the German Emperors sank into the condition of mere Chiefs to the Feudal Confederacy.

III. Notwithstanding the superior antiquity which may with great probability be assigned to the establishment of the Feudal System in Italy, its influence upon the state of Society was less durable in that Country, than in either France or Germany. In producing this difference, two opposite causes had the principal share: the early rise of independence, as well in the Lombard Cities as in the Maritime Republics, and the revival of the study and practice of the Civil Law. The first of these circumstances curbed the Feudal power of the rural Nobility: the second had a natural tendency to introduce a high notion of the extent of the Imperial rights, and to exalt their prerogative at the expense of the Feudal privileges of the Aristocracy. During the long interval, however, between the fall of the Carolingian Dynasty and the first League of the Lombard Cities, neither of these causes had entered into operation; and in the universal anarchy which closed the IXth Century, the power of the Dukes, or Marquesses, and Counts, appeared more unbounded, and better established in Italy, than in any other part of the Empire. Those great Chieftains had already rendered their government of Provinces hereditary and independent of ultramontane Sovereignty; and they proceeded, especially the Dukes of Tuscany and Spoleto, and the Marquesses of Ivrea, Susa, and Friuli, to contend among themselves, sometimes for the possession of the Crown of Italy, and sometimes for the power of bestowing it upon foreign competitors. It was their quarrels which at length gave a foreign Monarch the occasion of interposing as a master; and the submission of Berenger II., a native Prince, to hold the Kingdom of Italy as a Fief of Otto the Great, introduced the Feudal dependence of his Country on the Crown of Germany. The deposition of Berenger, and the revival of the Imperial Dignity in the person of Otto, confirmed that subjection, and gave the sanction of an ancient title to the new dominion which the German Prince exercised.

Thenceforth the Aristocratic Polity of Italy assumed the complete Feudal form, with the Emperor for its Sovereign paramount. Under both the Saxon and Franconian Dynasties, notwithstanding the abeyance in which it was placed between the extinction of the first and the accession of the second of those Families, the Imperial authority received a plenary recognition from the Italian Feudatories. The actual policy of the Saxon Emperors in particular was effectually exerted to lessen the power, and confirm the dependence of that Order, by dismembering districts, either as Governments or Fiefs under rural Nobles, from the great Provinces over which the Dukes were rapidly converting their

The Feudal System.

Complete independence of the German Feudatories.

III. ITALY.

Early independence of Feudal Chieftains; in that Country.

Sovereignty of the Emperors established.

* Until the extinction of the male Saxon line, some degree of hereditary right seems to have been recognised as vested in that Family through the original national election of Henry the Fowler. But the confirmation of this title by an election was not the more dispensed with; and the ceremony was in fact renewed in the case of each heir to the Empire. The 1st and 11d Othos so obtained the election of their sons in childhood. Henry II. was formally chosen after the death of his relative, the 111d Otto. But see Struvius, Corpus Hist. Germ. and the authorities there cited. p. 273. † Schmidt, Hist. des Allemans, vol. ii. p. 393–403. Struvius, p. 233.

‡ In this Family, as in the last, after the election of its founder, Conrad II., the succession was determined by a mixture of hereditary and elective right.

§ Schmidt, vol. iii. p. 25. 27. 207.

|| Struvius, p. 327.

History. delegated jurisdiction into a Feudal dominion.* Another step consolidated the work which the Othos had commenced; and a famous Edict of Conrad II., the founder of the Franconian line, published at Milan in 1037, is usually, although confined in its provisions to Italy, quoted as fixing the maturity of the Feudal System. By this celebrated Instrument, some disputed questions which had arisen in Italy with respect to Subinfeudation were definitively settled. It was declared, among other things, that no Vassal, whether holding a chief or an Arriere-fief, could be deprived of it, "except by the Constitution of the Empire, and the judgment of his peers or equals;" and that all Fiefs were heritable in the male line, and incapable of alienation by the Lord except with the consent of the Vassal.†

Its Decline in that Country,

These provisions, so far as Italy is concerned, certainly mark the complete organization of Feudalism. Yet it is from this epoch also that its decline in the same Country may be dated. The regular administration introduced by the German Emperors favoured the prosperity of the Lombard Cities; and the growth of Republican strength in those communities was fatal to the Feudal Aristocracy. First, the Oppidan Counts were ejected by the citizens; and next, by force of arms, the rural Nobility in the surrounding districts were compelled to submit to the rising Republics, to abandon their Fiefs, and to reside within the same walls with those jealous Democracies.‡ The Regalian Rights which those Cities conquered from the Emperor Frederic I. left only the vain image of Sovereignty to his successors; but at the same time the zeal with which the Italian professors of the Civil Law had successfully laboured to exalt the Imperial prerogative, threw the privileges of the remaining rural Nobility, who were less capable of resistance than the Republics, into general discredit. Thus subjugated by the Democracies on the one hand, and oppressed by the weight of Imperial Sovereignty on the other, the Feudal Aristocracy in its proper relations was rapidly dissolved, and disappeared from the Political stage. Both in the Municipal and Imperial Tribunals, the principles of the Civil were preferred to those of the Feudal Law; and for all effectual purposes or influence on the state of Society, the Feudal System in Northern and Central Italy may be said to have ceased to exist before the end of the XIIIth Century. In the Southern division of that Peninsula it was much longer preserved; for the Norman conquerors, on their establishment of the Kingdom of Naples, naturally perfected the form of Polity to which they were habituated in their own Country, and which in fact had been long rendered familiar in a part of their new possessions by the example of the Lombards of Benevento.§

except in the Kingdom of Naples.

IV. ARAGON.

The structure of Feudalism in those North-Eastern districts of the Spanish March, which afterwards expanded into the Kingdom of Aragon, exhibited some peculiarities worthy of attention. In Catalonia, one of its Provinces, originally governed by the Counts of Barcelona as Vassals of France, who acquired the Crown of Aragon by marriage in the XIIth Century, the custom of Sub-infeudation appears never to have prevailed beyond the first degree. At least, it is asserted by a Native Writer,* that, under the Kingdom of Aragon, Arriere-fiefs were unknown in Catalonia; and we may conclude that the Royal Barons of that Province derived their inheritance from the immediate Vassals of the old Counts of Barcelona. It is probable that the primitive Feudal Constitution of Aragon Proper was similar to that of Catalonia; and the Aragonese Barons, or Ricoshombrs, as they were called, appear to have formed, in the infancy of the Kingdom, a small but powerful Aristocracy, who elected their Sovereign usually out of one Royal line, but invested him with only a very limited Feudal supremacy. The History of the peculiar Regal Constitution of Aragon belongs, however, rather to the Civil Annals of that Kingdom than to our present subject. It was little affected by an extension of the Feudal Institutions which followed the Christian conquests beyond the Ebro. The territories which were wrested from the Saracens, chiefly through the enterprises of the Ricoshombrs, were parcelled out among their Order by the Aragonese Kings on strictly military tenures; and the condition annexed to those Fiefs that the Barons should subdivide them into Knights' fees,† completed the full establishment of the Feudal System in all its gradations throughout Valencia, and at least great part of Aragon. Its existence even survived the Middle Ages; and the Constitution of Aragon, which will claim notice in another place, presents, by the protection which it extended to the rights of every rank of Feudal tenants, the holdest features of Aristocratic liberty which are to be found in the contemporary History of any Country but our own.

And pre-eminence of its System.

V. In England, whatever doubts may be entertained V. ENGLAND. relative to the nature of landed tenures under the Saxon Monarchs, there can be none in dating the sudden and complete establishment of the Feudal System from the Era of the Norman Conquest. The circumstances under which the Kingdom was won by a foreign invasion and a decisive victory, naturally led the Conqueror to invest his followers with estates, on the tenure most congenial to the practice of his own Country, and most conducive to the security of his new Throne. The conditions of Feudal service in all its gradations were therefore rendered by an obvious policy the principle of every grant of land. Upon such terms, by original violence and subsequent confiscations, was nearly the whole soil of the Kingdom divided among the foreign leaders and their retainers; and this forcible settlement is the first remarkable example in the History of Feudalism of its introduction into a State, at an Epoch when that form of Polity had already been fully matured in other parts of Europe. To the means and the lateness of its establishment may be ascribed the peculiar features of the System, as it prevailed in England. In no other Country of Europe, perhaps, were Feudal tenures so universal and so uniform in their obligations; and in none were the Fiefs of the great Vassals so scattered over different Provinces. With the exceptions of the great Earldoms of Chester and Shrewsbury, scarcely any Lordship extended over a continuity of territory; and the Knights' Fees, which formed the component Establishment of Feudalism at the Norman Conquest.

Peculiar features which it here exhibited.

* Muratori, Antiq. Italiane, Diss. viii.

† Libri Feudorum, v. tit. l.

‡ Muratori, Antiq. Italiane, Diss. xlix.

§ Giamouvi, istoria di Napoli, passim.

* Petr. de Marca, De Marca Hisp. p. 1395.

† The highest class of Arriere-vassals thus created were called Infanzones, a title answering, as it is expressly declared in an old law, (Leyes Alfonso xii. en Partida, part ii. tit. 2. lepe 13.) to that of Vassalurs in Italy. See Du Cange, ad vv. Infanzones, et Mainardarii.

History. parts of the same Barony were generally dispersed through different Counties.* Whether this originated in accident or design on the part of the Conqueror, it had a remarkable effect in preventing the growth of any such inordinate power in the Feudal Aristocracy of England, as had long rendered that Order in France so formidable to the Sovereign. Moreover, the difference of the mode in which Fiefs were originally acquired in the two Countries, had a sensible influence upon the relation between King and Vassal. In France, the rise of the Capetian Dynasty had been preceded by the secure establishment of the great Fiefs, whose possessors were strong in their usurping pretensions and real power, rather as rivals than as subjects of their Kings. But in England, the Barons actually owed their possessions to the grants of the Crown; and the Royal superiority was not, as in Countries in which it had often so become through revolutions and anarchy, a mere fiction of Feudal Law, but a reality enforced from the outset by practical obligations, and never interrupted by their desuetude. The supreme power which the King's Court began almost immediately after the Conquest to arrogate to itself as an universal Tribunal of ultimate resort and appeal, also prevented the establishment of that right of territorial jurisdiction in the Feudal Aristocracy, which formed the greatest source of its power in other Countries. But, above all, the independence of the great English Vassals was crushed in its birth by a measure of the Conqueror himself, which certainly violated an essential principle of the Feudal relation. As the System existed on the Continent of Europe, the Sovereign could not claim any direct allegiance from the holders of Arrière-fiefs, whose fealty was due only to their immediate Lords:† but William I. obliged not only his Barons who held in chief of the Crown, but their Vassals also, to take an oath of fealty to himself.‡

History of the Crown. Hence altogether the Royal authority in England assumed from the outset a vigour which was unknown in the Feudal Monarchies of earlier establishment; and its prerogatives were exercised and extended with a tyranny, to which the contemporary Governments of the Continent afford no parallel. The rapacity of the Crown was displayed in the excessive exaction of every Feudal right; and the seizure of lands in wardship and the actual sale of the heiresses of Fiefs in marriage, were usurpations,—as we shall hereafter have occasion to notice,—peculiar, at least in their degree, to the Kings of England. It may thus briefly be defined of the state of Feudalism in England that, while its Institutions were established in all their completeness, and its whole System of customary Law as implicitly followed, the first were so employed as to cement the strength of the Throne by means of a military Aristocracy, without endangering the Royal authority over that Order; and the second so wrested as to give to the Crown all the advantage which in other Countries was engrossed by the great Vassals. Through what process this subjection of the Feudal Order, and its resistance to the tyranny of the Crown, were made instrumental in preparing a foundation for the glorious fabric of English Liberty, will form a future subject of inquiry into the Rise of the Constitutional System.

VI. The Feudal Institutions having prevailed in Scotland as well as England, some separate account of their rise and maturity in the former Kingdom may be expected. But the origin of Feudalism in Scotland is involved in great obscurity; and in the absence of any authentic evidence of the period, the source, and the circumstances of their introduction, it can only be conjectured that Feudal Tenures were adopted in that Country from the example of the Norman conquerors of England, soon after their forcible establishment by those invaders in the Southern division of the Island. Neither does the later History of Feudalism in Scotland throw any special illustration on the great features of the System. For its condition in that Kingdom was so irregular and anarchical, as to exhibit in practice scarcely any of the recognised obligations of Feudatories to their Sovereign; and its aspect and results were even more Aristocratic than in any other Country. The powers usurped and retained by the Scottish Nobles, long after the decline of Feudal privileges in most parts of Europe, were so exorbitant and lawless as to be utterly inconsistent with the legitimate administration of the Royal authority. This extreme preponderance of the Aristocratic Order was principally owing, beyond the usual tendency of the same Institutions elsewhere, to the union of the devoted feelings of Celtic Clanship with the ordinary obligations of Feudal Vassalage. Many of the great Scottish Barons claimed, with successful violence, the unlimited exercise of every Regalian right; and the absolute nature of their territorial jurisdiction is marked by the privilege which they established under the title of repledging, or of removing, any cause wherein their dependents might have been summoned before the King's Court, into their own, and even of punishing the Vassal who sought or obeyed the judgments of the Royal tribunal.*

VII. A third example of the foundation of a State VII. PALESTINE.

upon Feudal principles in the maturity of the System is afforded in the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem. On the conquest of Palestine in the First Crusade, every motive of policy and habit dictated the establishment of a Military Government for the preservation of the new Christian possessions; and the settlement of the Kingdom was therefore effected on a purely Feudal basis. Exposed on all sides to the incessant assaults of Infidel enemies, the scanty army of warriors who remained to defend the Holy Land, needed the closest bond of Feudalism to consolidate their insufficient strength; and through no other Institutions, probably, could the possession of Palestine have been so long maintained by its small resident population of martial colonists. A warfare without remission kept the obligations of tenure by military service in perpetual exercise; and the History of the Latin Monarchy in Palestine exhibits the Feudal Constitution of Society, equally in its original purpose and continued action, under the most appropriate and perfect form. We may, therefore, with some advantage, and at least without inconvenience, * Sir James Craig, Jus Feudale, lib. iii. tit. vii. &c. Robertson, History of Scotland, book i.

* See the examples collected by Mr. Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. ii. p. 432.

† This principle of the exclusive dependence of a Vassal upon his immediate Lord is, perhaps, stated by Mr. Hallam (vol. ii. p. 403.) too absolutely; at least England was not the only Country in the latter Ages of Feudalism in which the practice was different; for in the Latin Kingdom of Palestine, founded, as we shall presently see, on a purely Feudal model, the services of the Arrière-vassal to his immediate Lord were not due without an express reservation of fealty to the King as Seigneur paramount. Annales de Jérusalem, (apud Thaumassiere, folio, Paris, 1690,) c. 222.

‡ Chron. Saxonicum, p. 187.

The Feudal System.

VI. SCOTLAND.

Character of Feudalism in that Kingdom.

Feudal Establishment of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem.

History. introduce a few references to the internal structure of that State, as rather appertaining to our present subject, than demanding a place hereafter in the strictly Chronological series of events.

Its Constitution. Though the Crown of Jerusalem was at first purely elective, the successive elevation of Godfrey of Bouillon, of his brother Baldwin I., and of his relative the IInd of the same name, established a principle of succession in that Family, which was transmitted even through the Female line; and the Kingdom became an hereditary Feudal Monarchy. According to the custom of the European States, the principal Offices of the Crown—such as those of Seneschal, Constable, Marshal, and Chamberlain,—were also hereditary.* The Kingdom was divided into four chief Baronies, of Jaffa, Galilee, Cesarea, and Tripoli, with many Lordships in chief of inferior extent, to all of which were attached the high Feudal privileges of coining money and of territorial jurisdiction. These great Fiefs were held by the Knights' service of about two thousand five hundred fees, and sub-leased accordingly. In these numbers, however, were included the contingents of the four principal Cities of Jerusalem, Tyre, Acre, and Naplousa, which appear to have depended immediately on the Crown; and even the Ecclesiastical and Commercial Communities of the Kingdom were bound to perform military service through Feudal tenants of lower rank than the knightly Vassals of the Baronies and great Cities.† The famous Military Orders of Palestine who served on their Religious obligations were not Feudal Institutions: but their array formed a principal resource in the public defence.

The necessities and danger of the Christian State in Palestine enforced the fullest obligations of Feudal tenure; and in the extant legal Code of the Kingdom under the name of the Assises of Jerusalem, these are defined with a strictness which marks the peculiar exigence of their demand. The unusual amount and extent of the obligations there imposed upon Vassals for the ransom of a captive Lord, bespeak the calamities of an unequal warfare with the Musulmans, in which the occasion for such aids was but too frequent;‡ The alienation of Fiefs, without consent of the Lord, and in any case to minors and females, as incapable of military service, was forbidden§ on pain of forfeiture, with an anxiety to be expected in a State which could not afford to lose the services even of a single Knight. In the same spirit, the heiress of a Fief was compelled to marry, in order that her husband might perform the Feudal duties to which her sex rendered her incompetent;|| and, also, the division by Sub-entfeuding a Fief owing only one Knight's service was positively prohibited: lest, so dismembered, none of its parts should be able to maintain a whole man.¶ And the term of service due to the King by his Vassals, instead of being limited to forty days, was extended to a full year, either within or beyond the realm, whenever required for the public good. Such were some of the provisions in the Assises of Jerusalem, which owing to the peculiar condition of that Kingdom were extended beyond the usual bounds of Feudalism; but, in examining the more common features of the System, we shall find that the general spirit also of the same remarkable Code will throw back several illustrations on those forms of Polity in Europe, from which it was originally borrowed.

After the Historical sketch which has been offered in the few preceding pages, to illustrate the Origin and Growth, the local extent, and varying aspect, of Feudalism in the different Countries wherein it prevailed; we now proceed to attempt some more particular analysis of the principles and features of that memorable System. Here the nature of a Feudal relation; the forms and conditions by which it was attended; the incidents to which it was liable, and the rights which it conferred; will successively claim our attention: and the subject will naturally be concluded by a view of the different Orders of Society which the Feudal System created or recognised; and an estimate of the results which it produced upon the Political and Civil condition of Europe.

It has been already observed that the peculiar principle of the Feudal relation was a mutual compact of protection and fidelity between Lord and Vassal; with a fixed interchange of duties, arising exclusively out of landed tenures by military service. The superior who bestowed, and the follower who accepted, an estate in fief, were alike held to have thereby bound themselves to each other under certain well-known and mutual obligations, which constituted the Laws of Feudalism; and these conditions were equally due, in the male* line of primogeniture, from their respective heirs territorial for ever. That is to say, they were due in respect of the land which was the subject of the compact; and on no other account. Accordingly, the Feudal bond determined and ceased with any transfer of the Fief, the obligations of which fell upon its new holder. But for this reason also, such an alienation, by purchase or in any other manner, was not allowable except with full permission of the Lord;† nor properly could the latter himself alienate his own Sovereignty without the consent of his Vassals;‡ For the Lord having only granted the estate on condition of military service, had a right to be satisfied that it should not be delivered into the hands of a tenant, less competent than his Vassal to discharge such duties, or from any cause obnoxious to him; and, on the other hand, the acceptor of the Fief having bound himself only to one Seigneur and his lineal heirs, should not be compelled to render the same services to a stranger. In this, and in every other regard, the Feudal contract was strictly reciprocal. In proportion to the services which it exacted from the Vassal, were the equivalent duties of protection which it imposed upon the Lord; nor could faith be broken on one side without justifying a release from all obligation on the other. If the Vassal neglected to perform his bounden service, he forfeited the estate itself which he held by such conditions: if the Lord withdrew his protection, he thereby lost his right of sovereignty.§

* Whether females could originally succeed to the inheritance of Fiefs has been doubted. The spirit of Feudal tenures seems opposed to their capability of succession, since they could render no personal military service; but, whatever may have been the original principle, it is certain that (except in Germany) females, in the maturity of the System, were commonly suffered to hold Feudal lands. The Historical instances of this are too numerous for citation: but for the recognised legality of the practice, see Assises de Jerusalem, especially c. 167.

† Libri Feudorum, ii. tit. 9. 52. Beaumanoir, Costumes de Beauvoisis, c. 2. Assises de Jerusalem, c. 272.

‡ Of this, though not always so expressly laid down in the Feudal law books as the same prohibition against the Vassal, there can be as little doubt from the general spirit of the contract. But see Sir Martin Wright on Tenures, c. 40. de Lib. Feudorum.

§ Lib. Feudorum, ii. tit. 26. 47. Beaumanoir, c. 61. Assises de Jerusalem, c. 200, 201. 217. 265. &c. Etablissements de St. Louis, (apud Velly, Hist. de France), c. 49.

* Assises, c. 289.

† Ibid. c. 273.

|| Ibid. c. 193.

† Ibid. c. 324—330.

§ Ibid. c. 198.

¶ Ibid. c. 155.

History. The forms by which the Feudal compact was solemnized, in the bestowing and receiving of a Fief, were simple and expressive. On the part of the tenant, these ceremonies consisted in doing homage and taking an oath of fealty. The first was performed by the Vassal, kneeling, uncovered, and disarmed, before the Lord, in token of his subjection and devotion. In this posture, with his clasped hands between those of his seigneur, he promised, in return for the Fief bestowed or held, to become thenceforth his man loyally and faithfully, and to serve him with life and limb and earthly honour, against all persons whatsoever.* The oath of fealty was to the same effect, and in every case required; but unlike homage, which could only be received by the Lord in person, it might be taken before any officer deputed for the purpose. On the part of the Lord, the exchange of engagement was also twofold: when homage had been rendered, he declared that he accepted the homager for his Vassal; promised to protect him in his lands and person; and kissed him on the mouth in seal of mutual faith. This was followed by an act of investiture in the Fief, varying in its ceremonies. For, either the Lord, in person or by proxy, put the Vassal in possession on the land itself; or else he delivered to him some such type of the property of the soil, as a clod of earth, a stone, or a bough of a tree. The first mode was termed a proper, and the second an improper investiture; and by either, the Vassal was equally declared, in Feudal law language, to have taken seisin of his lands.†

Structure of Feudal tenures. The principal condition of all proper Feudal tenures was, as we have seen, military service on the part of the Vassal and protection on that of the Lord. But the bond further implied so many secondary obligations, endlessly differing in their nature and degree according to local customs and national manners, that in any general view of the System the attempt to classify them would be equally difficult and unprofitable. It will suffice to notice a few of the duties which obtained an universal recognition. In the first place, even the extent of military service due from the tenant varied extremely in different Ages and Countries. In the Latin State of Palestine, a Vassal was bound to serve a full year on the summons of his Lord;‡ which as the demand upon emergency was always renewable, amounted in fact to an obligation without intermission. But this tenure by unlimited service was peculiar to that State; and obviously produced by the incessant dangers, to which the Kingdom was exposed from the Moslem assaults. The tenure by watch and ward in castles on the marches or frontiers in other Countries, and especially on our Scottish Borders, was also in its nature a service, which though sedentary, was without limit of time. But the general usage of Feudalism in Europe restricted the period in the year, during which a Vassal was obliged to keep the field at his own cost in his Lord's service, to forty days. This was the full amount due for a whole Knight's fee, or such extent of land as was held sufficient of itself to maintain a completely equipped man-at-arms and his horse.§ But the length of service was reduced in the same ratio with the extent of the Fief: as, for example, in England, for half a Knight's fee, only twenty, and for a fourth, no more than ten days could be claimed;¶ and in France, probably on the same principle, the duration of service due from Fiefs differed in many degrees. Minors, and men above sixty years of age, as well as women, were exempted from personal service, and bound to provide substitutes; or sometimes, in lieu of such proxies, their Lord might take their horses and arms.† The local extent to which service was due varied, in the custom of different Countries and even of different districts in the same Country, still more than its duration. In some instances and places, Vassals were bound to follow their Lords whithersoever they warred: in others, they owed no service beyond the frontiers of the Lordship.‡

Among the remaining duties of the Vassal, the most usual were those of attendance at the Court of his Lord to assist him in council, in judicial proceedings, and on occasions of pomp and state.§ To betray his confidence, to conceal the designs of his enemy, or to do him injury in any point, were manifest breaches of fealty. In battle he was bound to stand by him to the utterance; to give him his own horse when dismounted; and, if he were taken by the enemy, to go into captivity for him as a hostage. And on all occasions, he was to defend inviolate the honour of his Lord's family. Hence by implication, himself to dishonour him in the person of his female relatives, was the foulest act of treason.¶ For neglect of any of these duties of service, and still more for positive breaches of fidelity, the Vassal incurred the forfeiture of his Fief.

On the other hand, the duties of protection which the Lord owed to his Vassal were no less obligatory, and their dereliction was equally shameful. It was incumbent on the superior to defend his man against all injustice and injury; and especially from such as might be encountered in his own service. If, in the day of battle, the Vassal gave him his horse, or afterwards became hostage for him, or sold any portion of his own Fief to ransom him, then the Lord was bound to the reciprocal duty of redeeming or compensating his faithful dependent. If the Lord failed to do him right in these or any other respects, if he denied him justice, or dishonoured him in his family, the Vassal was released from his allegiance, and might defy, and do war upon, his faithless superior.¶ In short, the Lord and Vassal, to the extent of the value of the Fief in all pecuniary obligations, and to an unlimited degree in all questions of personal honour and fidelity, were reciprocally bound in security and duty towards each other.

In the long descending chain of obligation which the

* In the decline of the Feudal System, when personal service was commuted for money, the rate of this exchange, as it was called in England, was regulated in the same proportions. Wright on Tenures, p. 120.

† Annales de Jérusalem, c. 233. 241.

‡ Du Cange, s. Hostis.—a full and excellent article, in which an immense number of examples on the varieties of service due, both as to time and distance, will be found.

§ This duty extended sometimes to the accompanying of the Lord, or even of his daughter on marriage, as a travelling escort; sometimes to undertaking journeys on his business, in which case, however, the Lord was bound to supply the viaticum. (Coke on Littleton, lib. ii. c. 3. sec. 69. 95. Annales de Jérusalem, c. 230.)

¶ Annales de Jérusalem, c. 265.

¶ Annales de Jérusalem, c. 211. 214. 217. 219. &c. Etablissements de St. Louis, c. 49. 51.

* Deveo homo venter de tenemento quod de vobis tenet, et fideles vestros portabo de vobis et membris et terram honore contra omnes gentes, &c. Bracton, lib. ii. c. 35. So also Littleton, c. 85. both as cited in Du Cange, s. Hominium.

† For the different forms and kinds of homage, fealty, investiture, &c. see Du Cange, s. Hominium, Fidelitas, Investitura.

‡ Annales de Jérusalem, c. 230.

§ Du Cange, s. Feudum Militia.

The Feudal System.

and local extent.

Attendance at the Lord's Court.

Fidelity,

and Dereliction.

Duties of the Lord.

Protection.

Recommendation, peace, and Justice

His. ry.
Question of allegiance due by Arriere-vassals to the Lord Paramount.

Feudal System enforced from the highest, or Royal Sovereign, as Lord Paramount, down to the lowest tenant of a Sub-infeudation, it became a question of disputed right and delicate application, whether a Vassal was bound to serve his immediate Seigneur against the King, or Prince, of whom the latter might hold. In other words, whether the obligations of allegiance by which any Feudatory bound himself, were binding also through him on his Sub-vassals and their tenants. Certainly, in those earlier Ages of Feudalism, when it had reached its maturity without having yet lost the purity—if the phrase may be admitted—of its institutions, the bond in every case existed only between each Lord and his immediate Vassal: so that the tenant of a second or third Sub-infeudation owed no allegiance whatever to the Feudatory who commenced the division, or to the King from whom the whole had been derived. The practical independence of the Royal authority, enjoyed by great Vassals, favoured the maintenance of this principle. In France, for example, as long as such powerful Princes as the Plantagenets held Normandy and other great Fiefs, it would have been vain for the Kings to claim the allegiance of the Vassals of these Feudatories against themselves: but, when the Royal power began to be better established, encroachments were successfully made by the Crown upon an independence so dangerous to its supremacy; and the doctrine that service was due by a Vassal to his immediate Lord against his King, was, in an unconditional sense at least, gradually abrogated. A law of Louis IX. declares that the tenant of an Arriere-fief, if summoned by his Lord to attend him against the King, shall first ascertain whether the Sovereign has denied justice to his immediate superior: in which case only, he is bound to serve him in obtaining redress by arms.* In England, as we have seen, even from the first establishment of Feudalism under the Conqueror, that politic Monarch exacted an oath of allegiance from all Arriere-vassals;† and in the Feudal Law of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem, whose foundation bears date a century later, there is no principle better defined than the obligation of fealty from the Arriere-vassal to the King.‡

Distinction of Fiefs proper and improper.

Nature of each.

Such as we have here described were the conditions of a proper Fief. But there were, also, during the Feudal Ages, tenures of another description, of which some notice is necessary in any view of the general System from whence they derived their origin. When Feudalism had been thoroughly established, its terms and fashions came to be extended by a species of legal fiction to various contracts foreign to its primitive spirit. The marks of a proper Feudal relation were investiture without purchase, and the obligation of military service: but grants of land, of rents, of pensions from Royal treasuries, and even of offices, were often made, for a pecuniary price, or upon condition of civil or domestic services, which by analogous usage were still regarded as Fiefs; while, from being held without martial duties, they were distinguished as in their nature improper. These, however, usually partook inasmuch of the nature of proper Fiefs both as being held by fixed services and received by some sort of investiture and oath of fealty; though it would appear that no homage was required of their possessors, nor were the grants themselves always heritable.* The most dignified among improper Fiefs, however, were those consisting in offices of state or of Royal households; and such, it has been remarked, was the strange constitution of manners which had originated among the free Northern Nations that, under the Feudal Monarchies, the proudest Nobility thought it not derogatory to perform the menial duties of butler, sewer, or chamberlain about the Royal person.† Hence arose many of those titles, primarily of servile signification, which, in the German Empire were claimed as the highest honours by Electoral and other Sovereign Princes, and which are still perpetuated as dignities in every European Court. By the great Feudal Nobility, the appurtenances of regal state were closely limited; and their households were filled with officers who held lands by the performance of domestic services. Another description of tenure was the discharge of those duties at Royal coronations which, in our own Country and Times, we have seen still claimed in an honourable spirit of loyalty and family pride, that has survived the changes of manners, and marks a last lingering attachment to the uses of venerable antiquity.

From all proper Fiefs, besides the primary conditions of fidelity and military service, there accrued to the Lord on certain occasions, rather by the growth of usage than in the original spirit of Beneficiary grants, various emoluments, which became known under the name of Feudal Incidents. The chief of these were Aids, Reliefs, Fines, and Escheats.

1. The first were of all Incidents those which arose most naturally out of the Feudal compact. In their proper restriction, or when not stretched into unreasonable demands by the rapacity of the Crown, these pecuniary payments were of three kinds:—for ransoming the Lord from captivity;‡ for portioning his eldest daughter, and for making his eldest son a Knight.§ To these, in the language of our Great Charter,|| the number of "reasonable Aids" was defined and restricted; and their legality seems also to have been admitted by the Feudal constitutions of every other Country. But the number of Aids was sometimes swelled by local customs, sometimes multiplied as the Monarchical prevailed over the Aristocratic power, by tyrannical exactions, and on various pleas of necessity; and indeed such Feudal Aids altogether, as a distinguished writer has observed, are chiefly worthy of attention from having furnished, first the substitute, and next the pretext, for an arbitrary system of Royal taxation.¶

* Du Cange, vr. Feudum Annuum, Feudum de Camerac.

† Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. i. p. 195.

‡ Of the levying of this Aid, the most remarkable instance in our own History was the ransom of Richard I. for which a tax of twenty shillings was levied on every Knight's fee. Roger Hoveden, p. 414.

§ It is not easy to understand, nor is it explained by writers on Feudalism, why this occasion should demand a pecuniary Aid, for the ceremonial expenses of Knighthood could not be very great: unless it may be supposed that, as Knighthood was conferred on the entrance of the young Prince or Lord into man's estate, this tax upon the Vassals was intended to maintain the separate establishment which became necessary for his dignity. In this view, its principle would be intelligible, as corresponding with that of the Aid for portioning the Sovereign's eldest daughter.

|| Magna Charta, c. 12.

¶ For a fuller account of the variety of Aids than is required in this place, see Du Cange, c. Annuum.

* Etobliuement de St. Louis, c. 49.

† The English forms of homage, given by Du Cange (under the head before cited) from Bracton and Littleton, conclude with a formal reservation of allegiance as due to the King. "Salut fide debitu Domino Regi et haeredibus suis." Salut la fey que j'eo doy a nostre Seigneur le Roy, &c. And the customary law of some parts of the Continent is quoted by Du Cange to the same effect.

‡ Annales de Jerusalem, passim:—but especially 205. 209. 222. &c.

History.
II. Reliefs.

II. Aids were incidents to which the possession of a Fief rendered the Vassal always liable; but even before he could enter upon its inheritance, he was compelled to make a pecuniary payment to the Lord of another kind, under the name of a Relief. Of the origin of a custom which early became universal, opposite explanations have been given. While Benefices were being rendered hereditary only by the slow sanction of time, and by long succession from father to son, it might be natural for the heir on the death of his parent, to obtain the formal confirmation of the Lord in his estate by a pecuniary offering; and the practice, so profitable to Sovereigns, might be continued from long usage, and by the rapacity of Feudal superiors, even after the absolute recognition of hereditary right in Fiefs made it no longer necessary for the security of a doubtful title.* Or, instead of having been first employed to legitimize the seizure by the heir of lands which should in strictness have reverted to the Lord; Reliefs may, on the contrary, have been introduced, after Fiefs had become hereditary, by the injustice and violence of Feudal Sovereigns, who would avail themselves of the death of a Vassal to despoil his helpless son of a free inheritance, and deny him possession of his Lands until he had relieved them, as it was termed, or taken them up anew by a pecuniary composition.† But, whatever was the origin of Reliefs, they were universally established before the maturity of Feudalism; and the uncertainty of their amount was rendered one of the most grievous Incidents of that Polity. Where, as in France and other Countries, the demand was arbitrary at the will of the Sovereign, it was known as a Relief à merci, and contra-distinguished from a reasonable Relief, which it was the object of Vassals to fix at a certain rate. This in England was at length defined by the Great Charter at one hundred pounds for an Earldom, as many marks for an inferior Barony, as many shillings for a Knight's fee, and for smaller Sub-infeudations in proportions regulated by ancient custom. These rates have been estimated at about a fourth of the annual value of each Fief: but in France an old customary law gave the whole fruits of the first year to the Lord; and an Ordinance of Louis IX. in conformity, as it should seem, with this provision, asserted the right of the Lord, in default of payment by the Vassal, to enter on possession of the Fief for the same period.‡

II. Fines
à l'aliénation.

III. Of the same nature with Reliefs, but far less questionable in their original right and the general equity of their principle, were the Fines paid by the Feudal Vassal to his immediate Lord, on every alienation of a Fief. The justice of the demand is obvious: for, as the Fief was granted only upon the condition of personal service, the Vassal was not at liberty either to abdicate or transfer his duties to another; and his Fief became forfeited, when he failed to perform the service, in respect of which he held it. In fact, the Feudal compact was one of such strict mutual and personal obligation, that it could not be dissolved on either side without consent of the other. The Fief by such dissolution lapsing to the Lord, he had a right, before he granted a new investiture of it, to claim any share that he pleased of the price which his Vassal received for alienating it to a purchaser. The amount of Fines in such cases seems to have varied in different Countries; being often arbitrary, sometimes fixed by a law or custom, sometimes regulated even prospectively in particular Fiefs by special terms of investiture. Thus, in one private French Charter of the XIIIth Century, it is provided, that whenever the Feudatories desire to alienate their lands by sale, the Lord should have a denarius for every solidus, or a twelfth of the purchase-money.* Of the conditions under which alienation of Fiefs might take place in England, our knowledge is very uncertain; until a famous Statute of Edward I. fixed the amount of Fine upon which a Vassal might alienate, or sell his lands, at one-third of their annual value.†

The Feudal System.

IV. The principle which required a fine upon every alienation of a Fief with consent of a Lord, was extended with equal justice to a total relapse, or Escheat as it was called, of the estate to the Superior, when the contract had ended by the failure of lineal heirs. For, as the original grant had been limited to one man and his descendants, it was of course determined and ended by the extinction of such posterity; and in this case the Fief reverted to the representative of the original donor. By parity of reasoning, the violation of the original compact, by the treason of the Vassal, produced also an Escheat through forfeiture; and advantage was taken of this conclusion to deduce a second, that the guilt of the traitor attainted or corrupted the blood of his children, and incapacitated his descendants from succession to the Fief. This cruel law of Attainder afforded a ready pretext, and a vicious temptation, in times of violence, for tyrannical Princes to multiply Escheats; and thus a principle, originally just, and founded on the very nature and condition of Feudal grants, was converted into an engine of iniquitous proscription.‡

Besides these four Incidents which were common to Feudalism in every Kingdom where it prevailed, there were three others peculiar to England, or at least prevalent to the same degree in no other State than Normandy, which are equally deserving of notice to the British Student, as illustrating the aspect of the System in his own Country. These were the rights or usurpations of Primer-Seisin, of Wardship, and of Maritag. All these in England were grievous sources of extortion out of Feudal inheritances, discovered or enlarged by our Norman Princes, for indulging their rapacity at the expense of their Vassals. The first was derived from the same claim as that of Relief. At the death of a Vassal, the Sovereign took possession of his lands under pretext of keeping out intruders until the heir should appear for investiture; and during this interval, which was construed by a fiction of fraud to extend to a whole year, he seized the profits of the land. In other words, then, Primer-Seisin, which was confined to the case of lands held immediately of the Crown, was nothing else than the appropriation to the Sovereign of the first fruits, Further Incidents nearly peculiar to England.

V. Primer-Seisin.

* Du Cange, v. Reliquie Feudum.

† Such is the hypothesis of Mr. Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. i. p. 181. But the opinion of Du Cange on the origin of Reliefs, seems, on the whole, in better agreement with the history of Benefices, and their gradual assumption of a strictly hereditary character. The argument adduced by Mr. Hallam, from the fact that a large proportion of Fiefs had been absolute Alodial inheritances never really granted by the superior, possesses no great weight: because, from whatever source Reliefs were introduced, such tenures in becoming Feudal would equally fall under the usual obligations of the general System; and all its Incidents were as foreign as Reliefs to the primitive nature of Alodial property.

‡ Enfaisnement de St. Louis, c. 60. Du Cange, v. Reliquie, Reliquum.

* Du Cange, v. Acceptare.

† Blackstone, Commentaries, vol. ii. c. 5.

‡ Libri Feudorum, ii. tit. 86. Blackstone, ubi supra.

History.
VI. Ward
ship,

or a year's value of the Fief, over and above the Relief demanded on investiture.*

This exaction was confined to England; but the next in our enumeration, the right of Wardship, though no where else so perverted, was not unknown in other Feudal Kingdoms.† Indeed, the claim of the Lord during the minority of a Vassal to have the charge of his Fief, and even the guardianship of his person, does not seem unreasonable: since, while the heir, by reason of infancy, was unable to do Feudal service in person, no one had such a fair interest as the superior to provide a substitute for its performance out of the profits of the estate; or to see that his young Vassal was properly educated for the future discharge of the martial duties which he was bound to render. But, in England, the right of Wardship was shamefully abused by the Crown; and the guardianship of infants in chivalry, as it was called, was often deputed to rapacious favourites, unconnected with the heir by any ties of nature, who, without restraint, or liability to be called to account, enjoyed the fruits, and spoiled the property of his Fief.‡

and VII.
Marriage

The extension of the right of Wardship to the disposal of the heir or heiress in marriage, formed a yet more iniquitous usurpation. In all Feudal Countries, indeed, the consent of the Lord to the marriage of a female Vassal was requisite; and this was only in conformity to the general spirit of the System: since, as a lady was incapable of discharging Feudal services herself, the superior had a right to see that the husband of her choice was competent to perform them for her,§ and still more that she did not marry one of his enemies.¶ In the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem, the same circumstances of the exposure of that State to perpetual attacks, which compelled the rigorous enforcement of Feudal law in other respects, produced in this instance a very remarkable extension of the Lord's authority. He could call equally upon the young heiress of a Fief, or the widow of its last possessor, to choose for her husband one out of any three persons whom he should please, provided only that they were her equals in birth; and no reason was allowed to justify the lady in refusing this selection, except she could urge that she was above sixty years of age: in which case only it was gravely admitted by the Feudal legislators, that it might be "contrary to God and to reason to oblige her to take a husband against her will." If, on any other score, the lady refused to accept one of the presented suitors, or if she married otherwise without consent of the Lord, her lands escheated to him: but, on the other hand, if the Lord omitted to exercise his right, it was hers to require him to produce three eligible suitors; and if he still demurred, she was free to marry without his consent.¶ In England, without the same urgent plea of public necessity, the right of interference claimed by the Crown was carried to a far more tyrannical and outrageous extent: for Royal wards, as well male as female, were absolutely sold in marriage; or compelled, if they refused the tendered consort, to forfeit to their guardian, whether the King or an inferior Lord, the price which would have been obtained by the bargain.

* Blackstone, ubi supra.

† Du Cange, v. Custodia Pupillorum.

‡ Blackstone, ubi supra.

§ Annales de Jérusalem, c. 180. Eubulismena de St. Louis, c. 63.

¶ Du Cange, v. Disparagore, Mariagium.

|| Bracton, l. ii. c. 37.

¶ Annales de Jérusalem, c. 224, &c.

 Blackstone, vol. ii. c. 5, p. 70, 71.

This enumeration of the degree to which three Feudal Incidents were perverted under our English tenures, may convey some idea of the intolerable grievances and burthens of the System as it existed in this Country. Nor were its abuses lessened in the general decline of Feudalism: for the oppression of families by the Royal usurpation of Wardships in chivalry, was never more ruinous than in the last stages of Feudal tenures under the Tudors and Stuarts.* In summing up the practical effects of the whole System, it is impossible to offer a more lively sketch than in the eloquent language of a great legal authority. "The heir, on the death of his ancestor, if of full age, was plundered of the first emoluments arising from his inheritance, by way of relief and primer seisin; and if under age, of the whole of his estate during infancy. And then, as Sir Thomas Smith very feelingly complains, 'when he came to his own, after he was out of wardship, his woods decayed, houses fallen down, stock wasted and gone, lands laid forth and ploughed to be barren;' to reduce him still further, he was yet to pay half a year's profits as a fine for suing out his livery; and also the price or value of his marriage, if he refused such a wife as his Lord or guardian had bartered for, and imposed upon him; or twice that value if he married another woman. Add to this, the untimely and expensive honour of knighthood, to make his poverty more completely splendid. And when by these deductions his fortune was so shattered and ruined, that perhaps he was obliged to sell his patrimony, he had not even that poor privilege allowed him without paying an exorbitant fine for a licence of alienation."†

Having described the Incidents justly enjoyed, or tyrannically usurped by Feudal Sovereigns, we have next to notice the Privileges which, on the other hand, through a similar admixture of right and violence, were asserted and obtained by their Vassals. Of such pretensions, it may in general terms be observed, that they stood highest at the outset in France, and subsequently in Germany; and were always lowest in England. The most important of these Privileges of Vassalage were, the rights of coining Money, of waging Private Wars, of exemption from all other pecuniary burthens than the regular Feudal Aids, and of Territorial Jurisdiction.

I. At what epoch before the complete establishment of Feudalism, the privilege of coining Money was usurped by the Provincial Governors in the Carolingian Empire, it is here not material to inquire: it may suffice to mention, that the practice was sufficiently ancient to have produced a prohibition by Charlemagne against its continuance.‡ If thereby suppressed for a time, it revived during the feeble reigns of his successors; and before the end of the Xth Century, it is asserted, that in France alone, the privilege of coining Money without the Royal mark, and with no other stamp than their own, was assumed by no less than one hundred and fifty Feudatories of all ranks.§ In the same Kingdom, even so late as the middle of the XIIIth Century, the right, now become prescriptive, was still maintained by about half that number of Nobles; and though, as the Kings increased their authority, efforts were successfully made to abridge the privilege into the issuing of copper money only, yet some of the great Feudatories continued to coin their own gold and silver until their Fiefs suc-

* Hallam, vol. i. p. 191.

† Blackstone, vol. ii. c. 2, p. 78.

‡ Baluzi, Cop. Car. Mag. a. d. 808, c. 7.

§ Du Cange, v. Monetæ.

The Feudal
System.
Intolerable grievances of these Incidents in England.

or Rights of Vassalage.

I. Complete

History. cessively lapsed to the Crown. In Germany, the growing independence of the Imperial Vassals extended this, with other rights, in the same ratio in which they were narrowed in France: but in England, though the Barons might sometimes avail themselves, as during the Civil wars in Stephen's reign,* of the suspension of regular government to usurp the lucrative functions of the Royal mint, yet their right to coin their own Money was never recognised, and the practice seldom attempted. This, like all other restrictions upon the power of the great English Vassals, was an effect of the more vigorous and jealous authority possessed by our Norman Princes than by the contemporary Feudal Sovereigns of the Continent. For the Baronial privilege of coining in other States not only intrenched upon the proper prerogative of the Throne, and naturally wounded the pride of Monarchs, but it likewise deprived them of the profits of the exorbitant seigniorages as well as of the scandalous debasements, which in those Ages were levied and practised on the coinage of the precious metals, equally by Paramount Sovereigns and Feudatories.†

II. Private War. Throughout the Countries which had composed the Carlovingian Empire, no Feudal right was better or more universally established and exercised, than the deplorable and fatal custom of Private War. It is not necessary, as some Writers have done, to revert to the Age of Tacitus for the remote origin among the ancient Germans of a practice, the immediate cause and systematic commencement of which are sufficiently to be found in the anarchy of the IXth and Xth Centuries. During the abeyance of all regal or national authority, the great Feudatories were, in fact, in the condition of foreign enemies towards each other; they were without any superior and common jurisdiction to which, even if they had been so inclined, they might appeal for the redress of injuries; and the power of the sword alone remained to decide their quarrels. Their example was naturally followed by their Sub-vassals; and the face of Continental Europe was continually wasted with the ravages of internal hostility. In England alone, of all Feudal Countries, this scourge was little felt; and though it would be inaccurate to say that the practice of Private Wars was unknown under our Norman Kings, yet the right of waging these feuds was never recognised; and on the contrary, their occurrence was denounced and sometimes punished as an offence against the King's peace: that is to say, against the supreme authority and dignity of the Crown.‡

III. extent. By the Feudal customs of the Continent, the right of Private War was extended and confined to all persons of noble quality; or in other words, to all possessors of Fiefs on Knightly tenure. But they must also be equals in the scale of Infefudation with their adversaries; nor was it every civil cause of offence which justified an appeal to arms, but such deadly injuries only as are usually deemed capital crimes in modern jurisprudence, or such outrageous insults as no gentleman might endure.§ When the war was once commenced, it might be legally espoused by the relations of both belligerents, and it was even incumbent on them in some cases to give aid in the quarrel, under pain of forfeiting the claims and inheritance of kindred. Still more were

The Feudal System. the Vassals of each combatant involved in the contest: since, by the very essence of the Feudal obligations, they were bound to defend and assist their Lords.*

Attempts to repress its exercise. The means by which a custom so pernicious to the good order and improvement, and so contrary to the first principles of Civil Society, was finally abrogated, belong for the greatest part to a later period than that before us: but some of the attempts earliest made to restrain its exercise, deserve notice here. The most famous of these was the TRUCE of God, to which we have before alluded:† a pious fraud of the French Church in the beginning of the XIth Century, by which, under a pretended revelation, men were forbidden to assail their adversaries during any of the Holy Festivals; and also during the interval between every Wednesday Evening and Monday Morning, as embracing those days of the week which had been sanctified by the Passion and Resurrection of the Redeemer. At first the Truce of God, extending from France, was adopted throughout Europe, and tolerably well observed: but notwithstanding the laudable anxiety of the Church, and repeated decrees of Popes and Councils to enforce its salutary provisions, they appear in the sequel to have been little regarded.‡ The gradual interposition of Royal authority was necessary to restrain, and finally to extinguish, the sanguinary feuds which the voice of Religion had vainly striven to mitigate; and the first step in this wholesome exercise of power, in France at least, may be dated from an ordinance of Louis IX., by which that benevolent Prince forbade, under penalty of treason, the commencement of any Private War until forty days after the commission of the crime or offence which had originated the quarrel. The opportunities of accommodation between hostile parties given by this edict, which was known under the name of the King's Peace, or Royal Truce, appear to have contributed essentially to diminish the number and frequency of the French Private Wars; and the endeavours of St. Louis being followed up by Philip the Fair, and successfully completed by Charles VI. and Louis XI., led soon after the middle of the XVth Century, to the total abolition of the practice.§ In Spain and in Germany, as we shall hereafter observe, it continued nearly fifty years later.

III. Exemption from all other pecuniary burthens than the Feudal Aids was a condition naturally implied from the granting of a Fief; and this right, though it eventually became a partial and odious immunity of the Aristocratic Order, was in its origin, while national taxation was unknown, founded on reason and justice. For, the special services and aids due by the Feudal tenant were recognised by the compact between him and his Sovereign, as a sufficient return for the beneficiary use of his Fief. Even the rights of toll, custom, and other local exactions from the commonality within the limits of Fiefs, were not possessed by the Sovereign Paramount, but by each immediate Feudatory; and the degrees through which the power of general taxation passed to the Crown are foreign to the Policy and History of Feudalism.

* Costumes de Beauvoisis, c. 19. The IXth Chapter of Beaumanoir here quoted is our best guide on the customs of Private Warfare, and in fact forms a complete body of Jurisprudence for the regulation of this singular right.

† Vide p. 276 of this Volume.

‡ Du Cange, v. Treuga.

§ Du Cange, Diss. sur Joinville, xxix. p. 333—347.

* Roger Hoveden, p. 489.

† Ducange, v. Novus, Monstrum.

‡ See the proofs of this collected by Mr. Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. ii. p. 479, 480.

§ Costumes de Beauvoisis, c. 59.

History.
and IV.
Territorial jurisdiction.

IV. The exclusive right of Territorial jurisdiction was, perhaps, the most important Privilege of Vassalage; and it seems to have been conceded to Provincial Dukes and Counts long before their Governments were converted into Fiefs.* By the Feudal Law it became regarded as inherent in every possessor of a great Fief; and even in some cases descended with the degrees of Sub-infeudation to the rank below that of the Châtelain, or Castellan. It also embraced the exercise of justice both in civil and criminal cases; and in the latter the power of life and death. The nice distinction of ranks was even sometimes implied in the form of the machine of execution; and while the gallows on the Fief of the high Noble stood on four posts, that of the Châtelain was permitted to have only three, and of an inferior Lord no more than two.† This power of life and death, however,—or of la haute justice, as it was called in France,—did not always, even in that Country, descend to the simple Vassor, who was more frequently compelled to send all prisoners charged with capital offences before the Court of his immediate superior. But, in the vigour of the Feudal System on the Continent, the sentence of a Baron or other Seigneur who possessed the right of high justice, was, in all cases, final; and no appeal could be carried from his Court before even the Royal Tribunals;‡ In Aragon, a shocking privilege was granted by an express law to those inferior Lords, who were not invested with the higher jurisdiction: for they might starve to death in prison the convicted criminal whom they could not publicly execute.§ In the Norman Kingdom of Naples, on the other hand, by a remarkable anomaly in Feudal rights, even the great Barons did not acquire the supreme jurisdiction until the middle of the XVth Century, when it had been abolished in other Countries.¶ In England, the territorial jurisdiction of the great Vassals, though originally supreme, was early restrained, except in the Counties Palatine, by the happy institution of itinerant Judges of Assize.¶¶

Connection with Legislative power.

In connection with the territorial jurisdiction of a Feudal Noble, the Legislative power also rested in his hands: for he might, with the consent of his Vassals, enact laws for his own Fief; and without his own permission it was an unquestioned principle of Feudalism that no enactment of his immediate superior, or even Sovereign Paramount could have force within his territory. Neither could he himself introduce any new law into the estates of his Vassors except by their concurrence. We here speak of the rules of the Feudal System in its original seats and pristine vigour; for, even before its visible decline, the absolute ordinances of the French Kings began to be held as possessing authority even in the territories of the great Feudatories:†† the changes wrought in the Feudal power of legislation by peculiar circumstances in our own Country will claim their share of attention elsewhere, in the History of the British Constitution.

This necessity for the concurrence of the Peers of

Royal and Baronial Courts.

* Baluz. Capit. Ludov. Pii ad ann. 814. Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Diss. lib. xx. &c.

† Du Cange, v. Fures.

‡ Etablissements de St. Louis, lib. i. c. 24, 25, &c.

§ Du Cange, v. Feme Necare.

¶ Giannone, istoria di Napoli, lib. xxii. c. 5. &c.

¶¶ Blackstone, vol. iii. p. 78.

 Etablissements de St. Louis, ubi suprà.

†† Costumes de Beauvoisis, c. 34.

both Royal and Baronial Courts in all measures of legislation, was applied as a rule of much greater practical force in the administration of justice; and it served more than any other circumstance to check the spirit of oppression, which the right of jurisdiction must otherwise have encouraged in Feudal Seigneurs. From the highest to the lowest degree of Infeudation, Vassals were to their immediate Lord the Peers of his Court. As were the high Nobles in that of the King, so were the inferior Barons in that of the great Feudatory; and the Castellans, Vassors, and mere Knights in that of the superior, next above them, according to the gradations of their tenures. The Peers of each Court assisted at all trials; they voted in all civil decisions and criminal sentences; and in fact composed the Lord's tribunal. Sometimes the Chieftain himself presided, though in the latter Ages of Feudalism it seems to have been maintained, that the Lord could not with propriety sit in personal judgment; and it was more common, at least, for him to depute his functions to a Bailiff. In some places this officer appears to have given sentence upon advice with the Vassals: in others the decision lay wholly with the latter. Another check upon the jurisdiction of petty Lords was provided in the rule by which, unless he had as many Vassals qualified through military tenure to sit in his Court as enabled him to judge parties by their Peers, an appeal lay to that of his superior; and if a Lord of any rank refused or delayed to render justice, the cause might also be carried before the higher Feudatory, or Sovereign, of whom he immediately held.*

The Feudal
System.

All Feudal jurisdiction, however, was still more narrowed in its exercise, and superseded in its power, by a custom which was originally produced through the mingled influence of savage and superstitious feelings, and ended by becoming universal throughout Europe. This was the well-known mode of Trial by Judicial Combat. On the absurdity and cruelty of this monstrous mode of appeal from doubtful right to superior prowess and strength, which oppressed the weak who had most need of protection and favoured the brutal insolence and triumph of force, we have already remarked in a former Chapter.† But the rules by which it was regulated demand a brief notice in this place. The judicial combat might be awarded in all cases of uncertainty as to fact, and especially on allegations of crime not supported by notorious proof. Thus, in civil suits, if either plaintiff or defendant could no otherwise impugn the evidence of his adversary, he might declare him perjured, and throwing down his gage offer, as appellant, through the judgment of God, to prove the falsehood on his body. In criminal cases, the appellant instituted his charge of murder, treason, or other felony, by a like form. If the appellee refused the combat or failed to appear, he lost the suit, or suffered the penalty of the crime on which he was arraigned. If he accepted the challenge, the Lord appointed the day of public combat; and the parties fought with the arms belonging to their rank, if Noble on horseback, if Plebeian on foot. But if their rank was unequal, the Noble dismounted, and on foot with the arms of Knighthood encountered his Plebeian adversary, who fought with club and buckler. Ecclesiastics, women, and men decrepit or above sixty years of age, were required to combat by proxy, and

Trial by Combat.

Its rule.

* Du Cange, cc. Fures, Defectus Justitiae, &c.

† Vide p. 274 of this Volume.

The Feudal System.

History. allowed champions for the maintenance of their cause. On the day of Trial, the battle endured until one party was either slain, or called for mercy. In the latter case, the recreant, if the combat had been on a civil suit, lost his cause, and further paid a fine: but his fate in a criminal case was variously affected by circumstances. If he had been the appellant, he suffered the punishment due to the crime with which he had charged his adversary. If he had been the person challenged, he was presumed guilty, and of course suffered the consequent penalty of the law. If he had fought as champion, he was liable to have his right hand stricken off; and the principal for whom he had appeared suffered capitally. But the custom of Trial by Combat had an extension, even more singular than its original character, into an appeal against the judges themselves of the Court in which a case had already been fully decided by civil procedure. The unsuccessful suitor, or the convicted criminal, might impeach its members of false judgment and call them into the field. By the Feudal Law of Jerusalem in this case, the appellant was bound to fight all his judges successively; and if he did not vanquish them in one day, he was himself hanged. Those whom he overcame shared the same fate. But the Law of Europe was sometimes more favourable to the appellant: for he might oblige the Peers to declare judgment aloud, and, on the first verdict pronounced against him, give the lie to the utterer. The combat then took place only between that individual judge and the appellant.*

Of the different Orders of Society of which the Feudal System was composed, some were absolutely created by its Institutions: but the greater number had a pre-existence, and were merely engrafted, with modified or additional functions, on its Policy. Thus, the Monarchs of those free military Democracies, which the Barbarian Nations presented in their victorious settlements, were only transmutated into Feudal Sovereigns: not so much Kings of their People, as Chiefs of a great territorial Aristocracy, or Lords Paramount of all the Fiefs whereof their Kingdoms were composed. In the strictness of the System under its original form, allegiance from the mass of the Nation was not due to them immediately; and the different paths by which the Kings of France and England reached the summit of their regal power, were equally departures from the spirit of the Feudal constitutions. But these, if they had separated the Monarch from his People, had drawn the bond more closely between the Lord Paramount and his Vassals in chief; and from the first link in the chain of Feudal obligation is derived that principle of Modern Monarchy, which surrounds the Throne with an hereditary Aristocracy, and renders the Crown the legitimate fountain of Chivalric honour.

The creation of Nobility in Europe as an institution equally distinct from the Patrician dignities of Republican and Imperial Rome, and the splendid slavery of Eastern Palaces, has been already referred to the establishment of territorial Fiefs, and the conversion of Provincial Governments into such tenures. From these sources sprang the highest class of Nobility: the Dukes, Marquesses, and Counts of France, Germany, and Italy, and their corresponding ranks, the Earls and Royal Barons of England and Scotland. These great Feudatories of the Crown, by their Sub-infeudations, created a secondary order of Nobility under the titles, already enumerated, of Vassors, Castellans, and lesser Barons; and, below them again, the continued subdivision of lands produced a third order of Vassals, whose tenure by military obligation, or, as it was familiarly known in England under the title of Knight's service, equally admitted them within the pale of Aristocratic honour. On the Continent, the lowest tenant by military service was fully included in the pretension and privileges of Nobility;† and, in our own language, the comprehensive title of gentleman recalls in its original significance and extent the same participation. The origin of territorial titles of Nobility has been before alluded to; and it need here only be observed that, imitating the example of the Duke or Count who had affixed the name of his Province or Government to his own, the possessor of every Fief assumed the same style from its principal town or village, or the solitary castle which frowned over his demesne. Hence the land which bristled with fortresses afforded as many titles of Nobility; and every County was filled with a numerous order of minor Counts, Barons, and Vassors, the Vassals of the greater Feudatories, the companions of their state, the Peers of their Courts, and themselves each the Chieftain of a train of Knightly dependents. The least of these last, who was bound or entitled to serve his Lord as a horseman or chevalier,—from whence are derived the original distinction, and the very name of CHIVALRY—was a member of the same Aristocracy as the Duke or Count; and the privileges of that rank were extended even lower: for every military tenant was a gentleman, though he held but the smallest portion of a Knight's fee, and contributed no more than a share to the equipment of a single man-at-arms and his horse.

The privileges accorded by the customs of Feudalism in common to this Aristocracy of every degree, were sufficient to form an impassable line between their Order and the body of the People. In Ages of violence, during which the profession of arms was unreasonably exalted above all others, they only were permitted to serve on horseback and in complete armour; except Ecclesiastics, they alone were eligible for any offices of importance and honour in the State; and all intermingling between them and the inferior classes of Society by marriage was followed, to a certain degree, by degradation. In Germany, no individual could claim his inheritance of an Imperial Fief, unless both his parents were strictly noble in the highest Order; and in France, though the exclusion was less rigid, the son of a Nobleman by a Plebeian mother forfeited much of the honours of his paternal rank. The child of a high-born woman by an unequal marriage could not inherit his mother's nobility: for gentility, as it was expressively maintained, could come only through the father; and from the mother no higher birth-right than mere freedom might be derived.‡

Next to the Nobility, ranked the Ecclesiastical Order; or rather the dignified Clergy were themselves held noble by reason of their territorial Fiefs. For all Prelates and heads of Religious Houses were, by the tenure of the lands of their Sees and Monasteries, completely Feudal Lords. For these, they did homage and Privileges of this Aristocracy.

The Clergy,

* For a complete body of the rules of Judicial Combat as here abridged, vide Annales de Jerusalem, c. 104, and Beaumanoir, Coutumes de Beauvoisis, c. 31.

† An exception to this has been found in the case of Imperial Feuds, which were not accounted noble beyond the third degree of Sub-infeudation. Labri Feudorum, ii. tit. 10. But this was contrary to the general rule of Feudalism.

‡ Coutumes de Beauvoisis, c. 45.

History.
as Feudal Nobles.

swore fealty to the Sovereign Paramount; they subinfeudated their estates among Vassals of their own with like ceremonies and upon the usual conditions of military service; they exercised the rights of jurisdiction; and, though not required themselves to perform warlike duties in person, they were under the same obligations as other tenants in chief, to send the stipulated number of men into the field for their Fiefs. Hence, as well as for the defence of their own possessions, arose the common custom for wealthy Monasteries to choose some powerful Nobleman, under the title of Advocate, to protect their lands, and lead their Vassals when summoned to the standard of the Sovereign. The only Church lands not subject to Feudal obligations were those held under the peculiar tenure of Franc-almoigne, which by the saying of masses for the benefit of the souls of the founder and his family, exempted a Chapter or Abbey from all other service.*

Freemen.

Below the Aristocracy the whole population of a Feudal Kingdom may be represented, with sufficient exactitude for our present purpose, as composed of only two classes—the free and the enslaved. By the operation of Feudalism in its pristine state of vigour, it may be suspected that the number of the former underwent a continual diminution. The freemen who escaped the yoke were principally, first, the burghers of chartered towns whose privileges emancipated them from the bonds of Feudalism, and whose condition scarcely belongs to the general System; and, secondly, rural tenants of lands subject only to fixed payments without military service. In France, the freemen of this latter class are not easily recognised in the Feudal law books from amidst the mass of enslaved peasantry: though the distinction of their state is admitted in general terms;† and though it is undoubted that, in the Southern Provinces of that Kingdom, at least, they were numerous. But they were exposed to so many oppressive exactions from the Lords to whose territorial jurisdiction they were subject, that their condition was probably in reality little superior to that of the mere Villeins. Of the same Order, but better circumstanced, were the Arimanni of Italy, who appear to have been either actual proprietors, or renters of small farms on free tenure;‡ But, beyond all comparison, the most respectable class of freemen during the prevalence of Feudalism, not holding lands on condition of military service, were the Socagers§ of England; whose existence may be traced even so far back as the Saxon period of our History; and who constituted in later Ages that bold and independent race of yeomen, the pride and strength of our national population. They held their lands exempt from all Feudal burthens, except a small rent to the Baron, or Lord of the Manor, to whose jurisdiction they belonged, may be considered as such. They were free in their persons, jurors and suitors in the Courts-Baron, and might alienate their property; and to the existence and rights of such a class of freemen, more perhaps than to any other single cause, is to be ascribed that noble front of liberty which was early stamped upon the English character.

and Italy.

Free socagers, or yeomanry,
of England.

But below the worst franchised class of freemen in the Feudal Kingdom, the great majority of the rural population were held in a state of complete bondage to the soil. Into the origin and growth of slavery among the Barbarian Nations who overthrew the Roman Empire, it were to little purpose to attempt any minute inquiry in this place. Having already in a former Chapter* glanced at this subject, we need not here repeat an enumeration of the general causes which tended to throw the mass of the People in every Country of Europe into a condition of servitude. It may be sufficient to observe that, when Feudalism was fully established, two degrees of bondage prevailed. In the Villains, better condition, were the Villeins or cultivators, who though attached to the soil, and compelled to remain on it, owed only fixed payments and duties to their Lord, and might hold property of their own. But the most abject class, under the name of Serfs,† were incapable of any possession whatever, and were equally in their persons and the fruits of their labour at the unlimited disposal of a master. Over them the power of their Lord was so absolute that, in the language of a Feudal law-book, "he might take all they had alive or dead, and imprison them when he pleased, being accountable to none but God." From the higher class of Villeins, on the contrary, the same authority declares that the Lord can take nothing but customary payments, though at their death all they have escheats to him;‡ Yet, if it be true that the Villein had no right of redress against spoliation or ill usage from his Lord,§ it is difficult to conceive wherein his lot could have much practical superiority over that of the complete Serf.

This distinction, even in term, seems to have had existence only in France and in Germany: for in England there was recognised only one degree of servitude, and that the lowest. The English Villein, like the Serf of the Continent, was himself, together with all he might acquire, the absolute property of his Lord; the services or labour which might be demanded of him were uncertain and unbounded; whatever land he bought or inherited, whatever stock or goods he accumulated, might equally be seized by the Lord; and the same state of servitude was inherent in his blood and entailed upon his children. Moreover, his person might be separated from the land and sold to a stranger;¶ while it would appear that the Villein of the Continent could only be conveyed to a new Lord with the Fief and on the land to which he was bound. The nature of the duties rendered by Villeins was regulated only by their ability: for the amount was indeterminate. The services required were those which the agricultural peasant was best competent to perform: such as the ploughing and reaping of the Lord's land, the carrying of manure, repairing of roads, felling of timber for him, and other offices of ignoble labour. On such tenures, also, it is worthy of remark, were lands often possessed by the free and even by the noble;‡ for the quality of

* See chapter xlix.

† Du Cange, vv. Villani, Servus.

‡ Costumes de Beauvoisin, c. 45.

§ Du Cange, ubi supra in voce Villanus.

¶ Co. Littleton, sec. 151.

¶ To such extent was the distinctive quality of lands carried in France that many Noblemen held estates in roture, as it was called, or in ignoble tenure; and roturiers, or plebeians, in the latter Ages of Feudalism, at least, might by purchase, marriage, or bequest, acquire Fiefs on noble tenure. Boammonit, c. 48.

The term Roturier for an ignoble person, or synonymously a peasant, is derived from the Latin Rupitarius, colonus, qui agrum seu terram rumpit, precindit, colit. Du Cange, in voce.

* Du Cange, vv. Advocatus, Elemosynarius, &c.

† Costumes de Beauvoisin, c. 45.

‡ Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Med. Ævi, Diss. xiii.

§ The name of Socages has been variously derived from the Saxon sec, a franchise; and from the same term in French which signifies a ploughshare. Bracton, lib. ii. c. 35. But see Blackstone, vol. ii. c. 6. p. 80. (Christian's Edition,) in which the latter derivation appears satisfactorily inferred.

History. Villeinage appertained to certain estates as well as persons; and the distinction between lands in free and villein tenure existed very early in every Country. There can be little doubt that this difference in the character of lands arose from the condition of the original holders; and as the soil did not change quality with the rank of its occupants, the simple freeman, or the knight, often held estates in Villeinage. In this case, the personal liberty and the movables of the tenant were secure; but he was bound to the performance of arbitrary services in respect of his land; and liable also to be dispossessed by his Lord at pleasure.*

Distinction between Feudal Villeinage and Slavery. Though, during the Middle Ages, domestic was no less common than predial servitude, it is the latter form of bondage alone which belongs to our present subject: for the connection of Villeinage with land is in strictness the only link between Feudalism and slavery. And grievous and degraded as was the condition of Feudal Villeinage, there were not wanting some characteristic distinctions to elevate it above that total deprivation of rights, with which the slave under other systems of Polity, both ancient and modern, has usually been branded. Slavery, in the Feudal sense, was a relative not an absolute condition: for the Villein, though in bondage to his Lord, was free of all other men and in respect to Society at large. He might purchase, inherit, maintain actions in the Courts, and exercise every civil right, saving only the claims of his master upon him. At least such was the law of England;† and though the fact admits not of equal proof, there can be little doubt by the analogy of Feudal customs that it was so in other Countries. In the latter Ages of Feudalism especially, the English law presumed every Villein to be free unless claimed by his Lord;‡ it protected him, as the King's subject, from atrocious injuries even at the hand of his Master; it gave the Nief;§ or female Villein, an appeal against his brutal violence; and it established the freedom of her child if by a free father, or even if the father, as in a case of illegitimate birth, was unrecognised, for in such case it presumed his freedom.¶ This custom of deriving freedom from the father, however, was peculiar to England;|| for in all other Countries the offspring followed the condition of its mother.

Indistinctness of the distinction between Feudal and absolute Villeinage. These distinctions between Feudal and absolute slavery cannot indeed be supposed to have much relieved the unhappy condition of the Villein under a cruel or avaricious Lord; but they facilitated and enlarged the benefits of manumission which was frequently practised by the more humane; and they are chiefly important to notice for their influence on the gradual abolition of Villeinage. Through what means that remarkable change was slowly effected, and the mass of the people raised from utter degradation, will more properly be considered at that later period of History, at which, among other revolutions in the State of Society, it will be our business to consider the Decline of the Feudal System. It here only remains to conclude our present attempt, with some estimate of the advantages and evils which attended the establishment of that System in its origin and maturity.

To this inquiry, it is necessary that we bring a full recollection of the State of Europe during those Ages which immediately preceded the development of Feudalism. The value of any System of Polity should fairly be considered as only relative to the condition of Society unto which it is applied; and in weighing the merits of the Feudal Institutions, we ought to bear in mind the changes which they effected in the previous circumstances, no less than their influence upon the subsequent vicissitudes, of Europe. In this view, it is impossible not to attribute to the Feudal System at the outset the most beneficial effects upon the political and moral constitution of Nations. At the Fall of the Roman Empire, and during the four or five Centuries which followed that event, and preceded the Feudal settlement, with the exception of comparative order during the reign of Charlemagne, Europe presented a picture of the wildest disorder and rapine,* and all the bonds of humanity were perpetually violated by actions of the utmost atrocity and horror.

To the rise and insensible growth of the Feudal Institutions was Europe indebted for the first mitigation of this universal anarchy and misery. Political Society, by the breaking up of its greater masses, might seem, indeed, resolved into its original elements, when the Lord of every petty district exercised the sovereign attributes of warfare and jurisdiction. But amidst this apparent destruction of order, and the certain aggravation of popular suffering through the hostility of Feudal Chieftains, the basis of a strong and lasting form of Polity was in reality laid. The very turbulence of the Feudal Aristocracy suggested the necessity of a close union between themselves and their dependents for mutual safety; and, at the same period when the Monarchical office, through the imbecility of the Carlovingian Dynasty, had fallen into general contempt, a new bond of association, between the King and the highest order of his subjects, was found in the Feudal obligations of homage and allegiance. The descending scale of such duties made it the interest of every great Nobleman to recognise those terms in his compact with his Sovereign, which he desired to enforce upon his own Vassals; and the Feudal principle, becoming interwoven through the whole surface of Society, served to connect and keep together its discordant parts precisely at a juncture, when, in the general and rude dismemberment of the Carlovingian Empire, every other restraint had been violently burst asunder.

Thus, both politically and morally, the establishment of the Feudal System may be regarded, as not the ruin, but the revival of civilization. Politically, because in the universal anarchy of Europe, it was the Feudal Institutions alone which preserved a common relation to the Throne among the Aristocracy of every Country; which inculcated the mutual obligations of men of the same land towards each other; and

* It has been a common inaccuracy with Historians to confound Feudalism with the state of anarchy which preceded its establishment, and to impute to the System the very evils which it served in a great degree to correct. A remarkable proof of this misconception is to be found even in so learned and philosophical a writer as Robertson, who (Charles V. sec. 1.) describing the miseries of Society in the Dark Ages as having proceeded throughout from what he calls "the Feudal anarchy," states, that "the disorders of the Feudal System, which had gone on increasing during a long course of years, seemed to have attained their utmost point of excess towards the close of the eleventh Century." This, in fact, was precisely the period at which, by the complete establishment of Feudalism, the disorders of the previous anarchy began to subside!

* Littleton, sec. 172. Bracton, lib. ii. c. 8. lib. iv. c. 28, &c.

† Littleton, sec. 189.

‡ Nief, a male, Villeins being styled native, or Native, of the soil. Blackstone, vol. ii. c. 6. p. 94.

§ Littleton, sec. 187, 188, 189, 190. 194. &c.

|| Leges Henrici I. c. 75. 77. Littleton, sec. 188.

The Feudal System.

ESTIMATE OF THE ADVANTAGES AND EVILS OF THE FEUDAL SYSTEM.

Its establishment primarily beneficial.

Previous anarchy of Europe, mitigated by its means.

History. which cherished the sense of duty to a common Country and King. But for the influence of these salutary feelings and ties, it would be difficult to find any cause which could have preserved the Monarchies of France and Germany from annihilation; or prevented the whole Continent of Europe from falling under the absolute dominion of the first fortunate conqueror who might have sprung out of the convulsion of Society. So also is it owing solely to the Feudal Institutions, that the spirit of personal freedom was kept alive in the Barbarian Monarchies; and the Feudal Law is the basis of all rational liberty in Modern Europe. Before the foundations of that Jurisprudence were laid, the mass of allodial proprietors had already by desuetude lost their original rights, had ceased to appear in the general assemblies of each Nation, and were capable neither of associated efforts nor collective strength to resist the tyranny of the Throne. Such a popular power, though in an Aristocratic instead of a Democratic form, was created anew by the Feudal System. For, through all its gradations, that Polity breathes the spirit of honourable and mutual obligation between the superior and his free dependents; and it is impossible to peruse the various Feudal law books without recognising, in the careful definition of the limited services which might be claimed from a Vassal, and of the rights which he might assert against his Lord, all the first principles of public liberty and private immunity. Not the least valuable among the received and customary provisions of Feudalism were those which secured to each man the privileges, in judicial matters, of trial by his Peers, and, in legislative affairs, of a voice in every measure of general concernment. It was the existence of these franchises throughout the martial array and long descending ranks of the Feudal Aristocracy, that, while the body of the People were without concert or power, opposed the only barrier to the aggressions of tyranny, and saved Europe equally from exhibiting the aspect either of uncontrolled anarchy or of Oriental despotism.

and moral services to Society.

In a moral point of view, the Feudal Institutions, as engrafted upon the condition of Europe during the Dark Ages, were even more beneficial. The virtues which they inculcated were those, of which the previous state of Society had most need: the crimes which they denounced to infamy were precisely such, as the depravity of the times had most rankly engendered. The Feudal System revived those principles of personal faithfulness and mutual regard between man and man, without which no laws of humanity can be sacred: the Feudal Code of fidelity and honour held in abhorrence all violation of faith and promise, all mean dereliction of engagements, all breaches of truth, duty, and gratitude. And these had been the especial vices of Nations who, in a transitional state of Barbarism, had imbibed the corruptions of half civilized, without losing the ferocity of savage life. The bond of defined and reciprocal obligation between Lord and Vassal in every degree was singularly calculated to instil into each man the consciousness of personal dignity, the jealousy of personal right, and the pride of personal honour. Moreover, from these lofty qualities also flowed more generous and disinterested feelings of duty and devotion to others; and the Feudal relation peculiarly called forth in defence either of a revered superior or a faithful dependant, some of the noblest emotions and energies which nature has implanted in the human breast. Hence arose both the beautiful, the gentler spirit of Chivalry; and the reverential, though manly, sentiment of Loyalty. It is by its fostering influence upon such qualities, in Ages of anarchy when they appeared nearest extinction, that Feudalism bequeathed its most valuable legacy to later Times; and we sum up its best title to estimation when we consider, that the Monarchies of Europe owe primarily to its institutions those principles of Chivalric honour and integrity towards his fellow-citizens, and of loyal devotion to his Sovereign, which distinguish and adorn the character of the Modern Gentleman.

The evils which resulted from the Feudal System are readily exposed. The most odious concomitant to its existence was doubtless the servitude in which the mass of the peasantry were bound. But this, if rightly considered, formed no part of the Feudal tenures. It had only been continued from the Roman constitution of Servitude to Society, and was established among all the Barbarian Nations long before the rise of Feudalism. Under both the Roman and Barbarian jurisprudence, it was a condition of far more hopeless and absolute slavery, than the Villeinage which had relation only to a Feudal superior, and in practice, at least, left the peasant a free labourer towards all other men. The slave who cultivated the soil for the exclusive profit of his master might even consider the change a happy one, which rendered him the Serf of the glebe; and, with the exception of customary services and duties to his Lord, left him the fruits of his toil and the residue of the produce which he raised on his land. Nor should it be forgotten, that Vassalage was the degree by which the lower orders of the People were raised from the servitude of antiquity to modern enfranchisement. A more unquestionable vice of the Feudal System was the unrestrained license of Private War. The desolation, to which not only the border Country of hostile nations, but almost every internal district, was liable from the deadly feuds of so numerous and turbulent an Aristocracy, must have had a most pernicious effect in paralyzing the efforts of agricultural industry. Moreover, by its temptation to habits of rapine in Feudal Chieftains, this scourge interrupted the operations of commerce, prevented the accumulation of wealth, and discouraged the improvement of those peaceful arts, which can flourish only with the security of property and the increase of capital.

In these respects, the continuance of the Feudal System could be no otherwise than adverse to the peace, the civil subordination, and the prosperity of Society. But here, as throughout the Moral Government of the Universe, the inquirer may reverently trace the healing interposition of Omnipotent Wisdom and Goodness. The Feudal System, in the severity of its original aspect, was permitted to exist no longer than was necessary to repair the previous dissolution of Political Order, and the inveterate corruption of National Manners, by a new and symmetrical organization of the Social elements. When Feudalism had thus fulfilled its purposes, it was suffered silently to give way before the birth of better principles of Civilization; and slowly to yield to the simultaneous growth of commercial enterprise and municipal freedom. The secondary causes through which an impulse was given to this salutary course of transition are readily discernible to Human intelligence: the primary design is only generally revealed in the mysterious and benignant operations of a Divine Providence.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXVII.

ANNALS OF ITALY, FRANCE, GERMANY, AND SPAIN, FROM THE DISSOLUTION OF THE CARLOVINGIAN EMPIRE TO THE END OF THE Xth CENTURY.

FROM A. D. 888. TO A. D. 1000.

History.
From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000.
State of Italy at the beginning of Charles
the Fat.

I. DURING the weak rule of the Carlovian dynasty ITALY had been less affected by misgovernment than any other portion of the Empire; and the reign of Louis II., a brave and virtuous Prince, may be considered a season of absolute prosperity. Long, however, before the death of Charles the Fat, the Regal authority had become disregarded, through the imbecility of those by whom it was administered; and on his deposition, the chief Lords of Italy were well prepared to dispute the Crown, according to the measure of their force. The two most powerful Feudatories at that time were Berenger, Marquis of Friuli, and Guido, Duke of Spoleto; no distinction of rank being implied, as in later usage, by their respective titles, but that of the former simply denoting that his possessions lay upon a March or Frontier. Each claimed descent by the female line from Charlemagne; a point of no small moment, on account of the still surviving prestige of that great Monarch's glory, notwithstanding the deterioration of his posterity. Berenger was the issue of a daughter of Louis the Debonnaire; Guido, of a daughter of his elder brother Pepin; so that the two Princes stood in equally near relation to the Imperial House, as Great-grandsons of its founder: a pretension well deserving of respect, amid the crowd of bastard or remote scions who started forward to enrich themselves with some fragment of the shattered Empire. And here, on account of the close intermixture of conflicting interests among the leading European Kingdoms, it may be convenient to state, that at the commencement of the period upon a brief sketch of which we are now entering, Eudes Count of Paris obtained the Crown of France; Arnulf, a natural son of Carloman of Bavaria, that of Germany; Louis, son of Boson, that of Arles; and that a new Kingdom, comprising nearly the modern Switzerland, was formed by Rodolph,* of the same Family as Eudes, under the title of Transjuran Burgundy. The particular Histories of most of these respective States will occupy separate portions of the present Chapter; our attention in the first instance being more especially directed to the Annals of Italy.

reges I.
of 7.

The throne of France was the prize which first allured Guido, we know not with what reasonable chance of success;† and Berenger, during his absence,

* Great-grandson of Conrad, Brother of Judith, Empress of Charles the Bald.

† Abusque Francorum consilio totius Francie unitionem suscepit received the undisputed Crown of Italy from the hands of the Archbishop of Milan;* according to a compact between the two Princes before the death of Charles the Fat. Nor was it till Guido, disappointed in his original hope, returned to Italy, that he avowed himself a competitor for that Kingdom. His ill success in France is ascribed by Luitprand to a petty cause strikingly illustrative of National character; and, however much we may be inclined to treat as fabulous many of the most amusing portions of Secret and Minute History in later times, we see little reason, in this instance, (or indeed in most others, notwithstanding Muratori's bitter antipathy,) to reject the authority of the honest and well-informed Bishop of Cremona. On advancing near Metz, Guido sent before him his Sewer (Dapsifer) to make necessary arrangements for his reception; and the Bishop of that City provided a superb Banquet after the French manner. "Make me a present but of a horse," observed the Sewer upon remarking the costliness of the entertainment, "and I will engage that my Master shall be satisfied with a third part of your preparation." The speech appeared sordid to the Bishop, and judging of the disposition of the Prince by that of his attendant, he answered, "It is not fit that we should have a King who likes a scurvy, tenpenny dinner;"† and spreading abroad an unfavourable representation of the Pretender he stopped all rising in his behalf.

The Trebia witnessed a bloody engagement between Guido and the rivals, which terminated in the defeat of Berenger, who sought refuge in the Court of Germany, while the Conqueror obtained the titular Imperial dignity and Crown, from the fears or the good will of Pope Stephen VI. During two campaigns, Guido baffled the arms of the King of Germany by whom his opponent was supported; and on his death, his sceptre passed to his son Lambert already associated with him in Govern-

Annals of Italy.
From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000.

Lambert
Emperors.

says Luitprand; invenit et innotuit de i suoi Franzesi, come scrive Ercheneperto, writes Muratori in a similar strain.

* On the Iron Crown of Lombardy, a coveted possession even in our own days, the reader may consult a lengthy Dissertation by Muratori at the close of his 11d volume of Anecdota ex Bibliotheca Ambrosiana. Its history is most obscure, and little is to be obtained from Muratori's proverbial diligence; excepting that the Crown is of gold with an inner rim of iron made, as was said, of a nail of the true Cross; that the origin of its usage is unknown; and that it was always placed on the heads of the Kings by the Archbishop of Milan, either at Milan itself, or at Monza, a considerable town on the Lambro. Otto the Great received it at the former place, most of his successors at the latter.

† Non decet talem super nos regnare Regem qui decem draclmis vite tibi obsequium præparat. Luitprand, i. 6.

History.

From
A. D.
889. to
A. D.
1000.
Arnulf invades Italy,
A. D.
896.

is crowned Emperor
at Rome,

is poisoned,

and dies.
A. D.
900.

Death of Lambert.

ment. But the new Emperor was soon disturbed by a fresh invasion from Arnulf; who no longer crossed the Alps to assert the claims of Berenger, but to profit in his own person by the distractions of Rome. The factions of the reigning Pope Formosus, and of Sergius, an ambitious Priest who had been disappointed of the Tiara on the election of his rival, convulsed the Eternal City; and the former of these competitors, seeking strength from foreign alliance, tendered the Imperial Crown to Arnulf as the price of his support. The partisans of Sergius vigorously defended themselves as the Germans approached the Leonine walls; and Arnulf prepared for assault, having first, according to a bold flight of Luitprand, encouraged his rude soldiers by a set speech in Latin hexameters.* His success might have been uncertain but for a singular accident. As the storming party advanced, a hare started from the ditch, and took to the walls, pursued at a rapid pace and with deafening shouts, by the assailants, who were diverted for the moment from the sterner purposes of War. The besieged not perceiving the animal, and unable to account for the sudden enthusiasm kindled in their enemy, were struck with panic and abandoned the ramparts; which were scaled by the Germans, mounting, in defect of ladders, upon their saddles and the panniers of their sumpter mules piled on one another. The capture of the City and the Coronation of Arnulf immediately followed; and one enemy alone remained to be subdued, Ageltrude, the widow of Gnidio, who still defended a Lombard fortress for her son Lambert. Reduced to extremity, she bribed an officer attendant upon the Emperor to drug his cup, not with poison but with a narcotic potion. It is difficult to imagine that this mixture was not intended to produce death, yet all authorities concur in stating it to have been no more than a powerful opiate. If this were really so, Ageltrude may deserve the praise of shrinking from absolute murder, in an Age which regarded bloodshed as a crime of no very deep hue; and she may have cheated herself into a fond belief that she was guiltless of homicide, because her victim instead of perishing immediately, and therefore less painfully, dragged on the protracted miseries of a lifeless existence. The first effect of the soporific draught was to throw Arnulf into a profound sleep of three days' and three nights' continuance; and when he at length opened his eyes, under the application of tormenting stimulants, he could scarcely be said to awaken. His attempts at speech were unintelligible, and he seemed, says the Chronicler, more to bellow as a Brute than to utter words as a man.† Nevertheless under this distressing hebetude of faculties, he survived three years, and fell in the end a victim to a more painful and loathsome disease. Lambert appears to have outlived him but two years, involved in a perpetual struggle with Berenger, and eventually to have perished by a deep laid scheme of assassination executed during a hunting party, by the hand of a Noble‡ whose Father he had put to death.§

On the death of Lambert a new competitor for the Italian Throne was raised by the great Feudatories, ever ready, as we are assured, to serve two masters, in order that they might control one by the terror which the other inspired.* Louis III. King of Arles, the fresh puppet of the Italian Nobles, was unsuccessful in the enterprise to which he had been invited; and owed his freedom to the lenity of Berenger, who dismissed him after exacting a solemn oath that he would never revive his pretensions. Not scrupling to violate this engagement, Louis invaded Italy a second time, advanced to Pavia and received the Crown; but surprised while lying in careless security at Verona, he was punished for his treachery by deprivation of sight. His liberty, however, was again granted; and still retaining some imperfect vision, he continued to possess his hereditary dominions of Arles, and the idle title of Emperor, during the remaining twenty-four years of his life; chiefly intrusting the control of State-affairs to Hugh Count of Provence, a Noble destined afterwards to a more fortunate career in Italy than that of his master.

To the miseries resulting from these Civil wars, by which Italy had been incessantly agitated since the deposition of Charles the Fat, are to be added yet other calamities resulting from the frightful ravages of the Saracens and Hungarians. During the first half of the IXth Century a predatory Tribe of Arabians had wrested Sicily from the sway of the Western Empire; and extending their incursions to the neighbouring continent of Italy, although driven from the walls of Rome, as we have before seen,† by the energy of Leo IV., they permanently established themselves at Naples. About the time of Berenger's accession, these freebooters advanced upon the Garigliano and harassed the surrounding districts; while another band, unconnected with them, crossing from Spain, spread equal consternation over Piedmont. But a far more terrific scourge than that of the Saracens menaced Italy, when the fierce tide of Hungarians, urged on by the pressure of more powerful Savages in its rear, roiled down from the Ural mountains, swept along the banks of the great intervening rivers till it touched the confines of the Eastern and Western Empires, penetrated within the line of the Danube, nor stopped for a moment in its course till it had devastated Southern France, and was gathering strength to burst upon Spain from the Pyrenees, upon Italy from the Alps. The superstition of that Age (and similar events might not be far, perhaps, from exciting a similar belief in our own) connected this overwhelming inroad with the Final Judgment, and the Consummation of all things; and the identity of the Heathen Invaders with the Gog and Magog of Scripture, afforded a subject for the fervour of Theological speculation.‡ Another origin was assigned to them by the terror of the sufferers; and since it increased the panic of their name, the Hungarians themselves were not backward in encouraging a belief which derived them from a foul union between a

* Luitprand, i. 8, where also the incident immediately following is related.

† Mugitum reddere non verba edere videbatur. Luitprand, i. 9. From the same Chapter it appears that Arnulf eventually died of the morbus pediculosus.

‡ Hugh, Count of Milan.

§ Little doubt appears to exist of the assassination of Lambert, although his death was openly attributed to accident.—And so was that of William Rufus under very similar circumstances.

• Luitprand, i. 10.

† Ch. lxxv. p. 434.

‡ Denina mentions a contemporary MS. which he had seen in a Monastery at Novales, recognising the Hungarians as Gog and Magog; (Lib. ix. c. 2. note) personages who, by the specious facility which symbolical interpretation affords, may be, and have been adapted, according to the dreams of an irregular fancy, to signify any given oppressors. Thus the Arabs traced the Northmen instead of the Hungarians to the above origin, calling them Mangogers. Coade, Historia de la Dominacion de los arabes en España, i. 283.

Annals of Italy.
From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000.
Louis III. of Arles reigning in the Crown of Italy, in the period of his sight.
A. D.
902.

Barons of the Saracens

and Huns

History.
From
A. D.
588,
to
A. D.
1000.

Sorcerer and a She-wolf; a tradition said not yet to be wholly extinct on the Austrian borders of Turkey.* Their sanguinary habits of indiscriminate violence and rapine might indeed justify almost any opinion, however wild and exaggerated, respecting their descent. Luitprand had seen a Book relating their customs, in which it was stated, that before the mothers gave the breast to their new-born Babies, they inflicted severe gashes on the Infants' faces, in order that they might teach them to endure pain with fortitude from the earliest moments of life.† In their wars, (and war was their single occupation,) destruction appeared the sole object of hostility, and they pillaged not to enrich themselves but to impoverish their enemies. Expert in horsemanship, and unerring in the deadly use of the bow, they were equally formidable in every species of combat, in attack or retreat, in the foray or the pitched field; and their charge, although irregular and undisciplined, was irresistible from its weight, fury, rapidity, and desperation. Ever on the march, their food was such as accident might provide; and the raw flesh upon which, perhaps, necessity at first compelled them to subsist, might afterwards become the diet of their choice; and might also occasion the accredited popular tale that they drank the blood and feasted on the hearts of the slain.‡ On their first approach to Italy they were met by Berenger with a force thrice exceeding their own; and alarmed at this disproportionate opposition, the Barbarians asked permission to retire. They were disdainfully refused; and in the Battle which ensued on the Brenta, despair on the one part, rashness, presumptuous confidence, and secret jealousy§ on the other, deprived the Italians of their apparent superiority, and they were totally and most bloodily defeated. The Alps now became the permanent fastness of the victorious Barbarians, and the rich plains of Italy were their annual prey. For more than a quarter of a Century after this defeat, we read of scarcely intermitted, merciless visitations. On one occasion, Pavia, at that time the Capital of Lombardy, and second in wealth to no City of the Peninsula excepting Rome, even if Rome herself were superior,|| was burned to the ground: forty-three Churches perished in the flames, and out of her whole population only two hundred Citizens were reserved from general massacre.¶ When the last promontory of Calabria forbade all further progress, the Hungarians refused to abandon their conquests until the head of every native of Italy was ransomed; and it is said that ten bushels of silver were poured at their feet as a capitation tax.

Each successive Pretender to the nominal Crown of the Empire, during the troubled period which we have been considering, had received possession of it according as his sword, his gold, his influence, or his obsequiousness prevailed over the reigning faction at the Vatican. Few portions of the Papal Annals are indeed more flagitiously disgraceful than that which embraces the sixty years following the dismemberment of the Carolingian Empire.* When the party of Sergius triumphed by the elevation of Stephen VII., himself afterwards destined to a violent death, the body of their late opponent Formosus was savagely disinterred, clad in the Pontifical robes, placed in a chair of state, and saluted with a ribald mockery of homage. After these insults, it was wantonly mutilated and cast into the Tiber. Some fishermen, who dragged it to land a few days afterwards, carried it to the Basilica of St. Peter; and the same spirit of party which on one side had prompted base and unmanly outrages upon a lifeless enemy, awakened sufficient credulity on the other to propagate a belief that as the holy Corpse was carried once more to its tomb, the carved Images of the Saints which decorated the Church, stooped from their niches and bowed themselves before the Coffin.† The disposal of the Tiara soon passed from the hands of powerful and profligate Nobles into those of equally powerful and far more profligate Women.‡ The influence which Patrician birth and well-filled coffers bestowed upon the Roman Theodora was greatly heightened by her singular personal beauty, and the facility with which she rendered her charms subservient to her ambition. Her avowed lover, John X., was translated by her intrigues from the Archbishopric of Ravenna to the Chair of St. Peter, in order to relieve the pangs of absence to which she had been exposed by his more distant preference;§ and if that minion did not atone for the scandal to which his unseemly aggrandizement gave birth, by any distinguished exhibition of piety or Priestly virtue, he at least earned the praise of a brave and skilful General by his operations against the Saracens on the Garigliano.¶

Triumphant over all his competitors, it was from John X. that Berenger finally received the Imperial Crown; and he then enjoyed a short period of repose, till the restless turbulence of the Feudal Lords, most of whom were largely indebted to his clemency and forbearance, organized a new conspiracy; the object of which was his death, and the transfer of his Sceptre to Rodolph King of Transjurane Burgundy. The plot was discovered, but the lenity of Berenger only encouraged his ungrateful Vassals to its renewal. A hard fought action near Verona was won by Rodolph; and Berenger, abandoned on the field of Battle, and devoid of all means of escape, threw himself on the ground among the slain, and covering his body with his shield, lay as if he also were a corpse. A soldier of the enemy in pursuit pricked him with his lance; and Berenger having sufficient

Annals of Italy.
From
A. D.
888,
to
A. D.
1000.
A. D.
897.

Theodora.

John X.
A. D.
94.

Berenger
is crowned Emperor.
A. D.
915.

A. D.
921.
Defeated by Rodolph of Burgundy.
A. D.
923.

* Muratori, while reviewing the Xth Century in his Annali, ineffectually attempts to discredit the statements of Luitprand and Baronius. It should be remembered, moreover, that of those writers so damnable of the Pontificate, one was a Bishop, the other a Cardinal.

† Luitprand, i. 8.

‡ Quam fœdissima Romana Ecclesia facies quam Romæ domarentur potentissima æquæ ac sordidissima Meretrices, quarum arbitrio mutarentur sedes, darentur Episcopi, et, quod ædum horrendum et infandum est, intraderentur in sedem Petri eorum amantissimi Pseudo-Pontifices, qui non aut nisi ad consignanda tantum tempora in Catalogo Romanorum Pontificum scripti. Baronius ad ann. 912. n. 14.

§ Theodora autem Glycæi mens preterita, ne amantissimum militiorum interpositione, quibus Ravenna arcestratur a Româ, rarissimo concubitu potiretur, Ravennatis hunc ordem Archiepiscopatus coegit decedere, Romanumque, pro nefas! summum Pontificum usurpare. Luitprand, ii. 13.

¶ Platina, in vita.

* Simonetti, Rep. It. ch. i. p. 39. note.

† ii. 1. It was from a similar fancy of bestowing precocious hardness that Peter the Great (justly the Great notwithstanding his semibarbarous) washed the mouth of the new-born Czarowitz with brandy.

‡ Gibbon, ch. lv. and Regimine in his Cronica. Vicino a guisa di fere e non d'uomini; e fuma e che mangio carne cruda e bevoio sangue.

§ Ad augmentum autem predicationis Christianorum non parva inter eos cur discordia. Luitprand, ii. 6.

|| Luitprand, iii. 11.

¶ Frædoardus, Chronica.

History.

From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000.
A. D.
924.

fortitude to remain without motion, escaped the death-blow which would have followed if he had shown signs of animation. At nightfall, he effected his retreat to Verona, and from that City, ever faithful in allegiance, he might have again advanced to victory, but for an act of unequalled baseness and perfidy. Flambert, a Noble Veronese, was bound to the Emperor by strong ties of private attachment, cemented by the holy rites of the Church, for Berenger had lately held his Vassal's son at the Baptismal font. We are unacquainted with the motives which prompted this traitor to listen to proposals for the assassination of his friend and Sovereign; and to remain unmoved in his foul determination even after Berenger had discovered and forgiven the intended crime. The Emperor having gently expostulated with him on his atrocity, and sought to awaken a remembrance of past affection, accompanied with the following words the presentation of a golden cup of costly price: "Drink the contents to my health and friendship, and keep the container."⁹ In order to prove his generous abandonment of all suspicion after this touching interview, Berenger slept that night, without his customary sentinels, in a summer-house near the Cathedral. Yet unmoved either by remorse, or by these tender manifestations of his Sovereign's confidence, Flambert, accompanied by a retinue of armed followers, met him on the morrow as he repaired to Mass; and approaching with outward marks of respect, as if to receive his embrace, stabbed him to the heart. It was too late to arrest the blow, but the assassin and his accomplices were instantly cut to pieces; and the blood of the murdered Emperor which stained the pavement in front of the Cathedral, was long believed in Verona to be indelible by human art.[†]

Two years of anarchy succeeded this most nefarious conspiracy. The Lombards had despised and cast away a King whose great qualities were tempered by a gentleness neither merited nor understood in the unhappy times upon which he was thrown; and on no occasion has the moral of the well-known Fable of Æsop been more distinctly illustrated than by the reign of his successor. It was during the interregnum which followed the assassination of Berenger that the Hungarians made that disastrous inroad upon Pavia which we have already noticed; and the enemies of the deceased Emperor alleged that, in the first instance, the invaders were set in motion by his wish to employ them against his insurgent subjects. Their ravages were unsuccessfully opposed by Rodolph; and the fickle Lombards, who had invited him to overthrow their late Prince, now abandoned his cause no less suddenly and unreasonably than they had at first espoused it. The vacant Crown was offered to another Pretender, Hugh then King of Provence; who having secured this new prize by the influence of his half-brother Lambert, Duke of Tuscany, and of his sister Hermengarda, the powerful widow of a Marquis of Ivrea, chased Rodolph back to Burgundy; and either at that time, or in a few years afterwards, purchased his future abstinence from Italy, by a cession of the throne of Arles.* The sole views of the new King were directed to the establishment of a secure despotism; and, one by one, his chief Vassals were sacrificed either to his suspicions or his revenge; almost the earliest of his victims being that brother to whom he was indebted for sovereignty. The plundered fiefs of the Italian Nobles were bestowed upon Provençals, implicitly devoted to their master's will; the richest Ecclesiastical benefices were occupied by his Bastards; and more than one of his mistresses received the donation of an Abbey in recompense for her dishonour. Luitprand, who was bred in his Court, and who records his vices with gentleness and palliation, extolling on the other hand the patronage which he bestowed on Learning, admits that his great fault was addiction to women; and he tells us of three favourites, who influenced him at the same time by the possession of widely different characters of beauty, and whom the amorous monarch distinguished, according to their voluptuousness, their ardour, or their dignity, by the names of Venus, Semele, and Juno.†

Eagerly seeking to counterbalance by the contraction of foreign alliances the domestic hatred which he was conscious his tyranny must engender, Hugh, not long after his accession, despatched an embassy to the Greek Emperor Romanus. The mission was attended with a remarkable and somewhat grotesque incident. Among the presents which the Envoy, Luitprand's Father, was instructed to convey, were two powerful dogs of a rare breed. The Eastern Despot on giving audience, was clad in a light, effeminate attire, to which the Dogs had never been accustomed; and probably mistaking the Sovereign for a wild beast, in pursuance of their instinct, they sprang upon him ferociously, and would have torn him to pieces on his very throne, but for the timely intervention of his attendants.‡

The undisputed possession of Lombardy was little

* A Provençal Proverb records the facility with which Hugh obtained the Crown of Lombardy. Il a été reçu comme le Roy Huguet. Blair places the cession of Arles and its union with Transjuran Burgundy in the year retained in the text. By some other authorities it is stated to have taken place in 931, 933, or even 934.

† iii. 5.

‡ Luitprand's Father was sent ambassador, as the Bishop relates with a natural and amiable pride, tum propter morum probitatem, tum propter linguæ urbanitatem. In his account of the attack upon the Greek Emperor by the Dogs, he says, Peto enim quid dum hunc, Græcorum more, christo (therio) apertum, habitus insidit (canes) ridentur indutum, non hominem sed monstrum aliquod putaverunt. (iii. 5.) Theriatrum, which the transcriber or the printer has converted in the above passage into Theriatrum, is explained by Du Cange, on the authority of St. Jerom, Isidore, and Tertullian, to be a sort of female cloak, worn in Summer, in Æge, whence its name. Theriatrum is the word used by the LXX for the vest, as the English Translation gives it, which Rebecca covers herself on Isaac's approach, (Genesis, xxiv. 65.) and again, in like manner, in Canticæ, v. 7. A striking instance of the danger of a single false preconception is afforded by the manner in which the generally most accurate authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates have treated this incident. Romain, they say, parut avec une espèce de pelisse qui le couvrait de manière qu'il n'eût aperçue-on son visage. C'était par conséquent en hiver. (ii. 9.) There can be little doubt that the learned Benedictines imagined that the dogs were most likely to mistake the Emperor for a wild beast in consequence of his being covered with hair. Without looking further, therefore, they converted Theriatrum into a fur pelisse, and regardless of its etymology they deduced from that dress of their own invention that the Embassy must have occurred in Winter; when in fact the Emperor, like the voluptuous Creticus in his transparent matrice at Rome, was perspiring under the thinnest garment which could be thrown over him.

Annals of Italy.
From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000.
1000.

Embassy to Constantinople.

and assassinated.

Hugh of Provence
King of Italy.
A. D.
926.

* These words, which are Luitprand's, are, perhaps, a little too pointedly turned to have been really spoken. Amara Salutiſque mea cuncta quod contineris habito, quod continere habeo. (ii. 19.) But whence does Summorum derive those which he has given? Que cette coupe est entrée sous le gobelet de l'abbé de votre faute et de votre retour à la vérité. Prenez-la et rappelez-vous que votre Empereur est le parrain de votre fils. (Rep. li. ch. i.) Perhaps there is not another instance in which the admirable Historian last mentioned has fallen into the common French error of substituting that which he fancies ought to have been said, for that which a nearly contemporary authority asserts to have been absolutely said.

† Luitprand, ii. 20.

History. calculated, however, to sate the excited ambition of Hugh; and, but for a single act of haughty and intemperate violence, it is probable that a more glittering prize might have fallen to his share. The power and the infamy which Theodora had long enjoyed at Rome were bequeathed by her in due season to her daughter Marozia, a successor well fitted to maintain both those hereditary possessions.* By a first marriage, Marozia had added to her former vast wealth the rich fief of Camerino; and when upon the death of Alberic its Count, she renewed the nuptial contract with Guido, at that time Duke of Tuscany, elder brother of Lambert and half-brother of King Hugh, she obtained sufficient power to surprise the Castle of St. Angelo; to imprison the Pontiff whom the blind passion of her late mother had raised to the Tiara; to put his brother to death before his eyes; to abridge his own days by poison; and to nominate as his successor one of her own Bastards, to whom the public voice ascribed Pope Sergius III. as Father. Tempted, perhaps, by the zest of an illicit and forbidden connection, Marozia, when a second time widowed, tendered her hand to the brother of her late consort; and Hugh, undeterred by the notoriety of her general gallantries, eagerly accepted an invitation which appeared to place both Rome and the Imperial title at his command.† The nuptials were celebrated with a magnificence which did but heighten their infamy; and at a banquet not many days after their conclusion, the young Alberic, son of Marozia by her first husband, was reluctantly compelled to attend and to offer feudal service to his Step-father. It was his duty to present a water-vessel to the King; and either from awkwardness, or not improbably from design, having spilt its contents over the Bridegroom, he was insulted by an angry blow.‡ The high-spirited youth, fired by this great indignity, appealed to his Countrymen, asking "Whether their former Slaves, the Burgundians, should now be their Rulers? whether Rome were indeed so deeply degraded as to submit to the chains of a Strumpet?" The Citizens were roused to arms by these words; Hugh escaped their fury, but Marozia was seized and immured in a Monastery; and Alberic, during the remaining two-and-twenty years of his life, swayed the government of Rome, either as Patrician or Consul; nominated and controlled the Popes; and bequeathed his title and his power to a Son, Octavian, who merged the first in the Pontificate as John XII., and afterwards lost both by his unparalleled enormities.

The tyranny of Hugh was increased by this ignominious failure; but the Lombards shorn of all power did not possess sufficient energy to attempt their own deliverance. One only of their great Feudatories retained his ancient estates; Berenger, a maternal Grandson of the late Emperor, who was permitted to hold nominal dominion over the Marquisate of Ivrea, his Step-mother Hermengarda, Hugh's sister, being invested with the real government during his minority. No sooner, however, had this youth advanced to manhood than his subjects eagerly regarded him as their deliverer from the yoke of the Lombard usurper. The ready suspicion of Hugh awakened him to this danger: and secret orders were already issued to seize Berenger and his Consort, and to tear out the eyes of the former, when the youthful pair, warned of these savage intentions, crossed the glaciers of St. Bernard, in the depth of winter and during the advanced pregnancy of the Marchioness, and threw themselves as suppliants upon the protection of Otho the Great, at that time King of Germany. They were received with courtesy; and although no open assurance of support was immediately offered, it was manifest from the freedom with which Berenger was permitted to assemble round him all discontented fugitives from Italy, that no obstacle would be raised against any enterprise in which the overthrow of Hugh might be contemplated.

Five years elapsed before the projects of the exiled Prince were ripe for execution. Meantime, so skillfully had he negotiated with the Lombards, so secretly had he compassed his designs, and so general was the disaffection from Hugh, that when Berenger entered Italy his ranks were swelled at every step of his advance, and the Tyrant was unable to muster a sufficient force to confront him. Contrary to the most frequent usage in History, Hugh, although deposed, was suffered to live, and he retired to a Monastery of his own erection in Burgundy. The assembled Nobles, acting on their customary policy of weakening the powers of Royalty by a division of prerogative, proclaimed Lothaire, son of Hugh, King, but confided the executive to Berenger. Far, however, from being content with this virtual Sovereignty, the ambition of Berenger stopped not short till he was even in name also a King; and it is to be feared that he played most foully for his prize. Lothaire is believed to have been poisoned by his order; and his murderer then endeavoured to obtain the consent of his widow Adelaide, daughter of Rodolph of Burgundy, to a marriage with his own son Adalbert. The injured Queen, whom virtue no less than beauty had rendered an Idol among her subjects,* indignantly rejected this unnatural union, although urged upon her with brutal severity;† and found means to escape from a prison on the Lago di Garda, into which she had been thrown in consequence of her resistance. Crossing the Lake by night in a small boat, with a single female attendant, she concealed herself for a few days in a neighbouring wood; and when hunger compelled her to look for other refuge, it was opened to her in the Castle of a relation, the Marquis d'Este, at Canozza. Her retreat,

Annals of Italy.
From A. D. 888. to A. D. 1000. Early History of Berenger II. His flight to Germany.
A. D. 940.

He invades Italy.
A. D. 945.

Deposition of Hugh.

Lothaire King.

He is poisoned.

Cruel usage of his widow Adelaide.

* Theodora diras habuit natus, ubi non actum conjugales, verum etiam Venere exortivo promptiores. Luitprand, li. 13.

† Denina has some just remarks upon this disgraceful pandering of Honour to Ambition. Esagone credere ch' in quel tempo l'onesta delle femmine non fosse appresso i grandi d'un pregio incalcolabile, e ch' le donne anche passati i verdi anni non perdessero l'amor de' mariti, e finalmente ch' il desiderio d'aver loro lo stato superasse ogni altro riguardo. Rivol. d'Italia, ix. 4. p. 25. The reader cannot be at a loss for a much more modern application of the above striking words.

‡ Corruzione veramente poco conveniente a usarsi da un Re.

Id. A. p. 26.

§ Luitprand makes Alberic etymologize at some length upon the name of the Burgundians, and he concludes with certain derivations, awakening a suspicion that gourmanderie was among the vices of King Hugh. Ego autem rex germani, i. e. per sapientiam, ex Burgundis quasi quindones appellio; vel quod ex superbiis toto gutture loquenter; vel, quod veritas est, quod edacialis, quæ per gulam exercetur nimis indulgenti. (ii. 12.)

* Dum abnueret, innocens cupia fuit, diversis angustata cruciatibus, capillis coarctis divinitus, frequenter pugni angustia et calceibus. Strevi Corpus Hist. Germ. 245. and the authorities there cited. The above passage is borrowed by Struvius from Odilo, Abbot of Clugny, Vita S. Adalheidis, for the Empress was canonized after her death.

† Regina Dno amabilem, cultu decoram, consilio precidam, morum omni honestate valde præclarum, et regis æorum statorumque prosperis ortam. Annal. Sazo. ad ann. 961.

History.

From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000.
Otho the Great invades Italy,
marries Adelaide, and is crowned King.
A. D.
951.
Grants the feudal Crown of Italy to Berenger II.
A. D.
961.

Otho crowned Emperor
at Rome.
Depose-ment of Berenger II.
Annexation of the Imperial Title to Germany.

State of Rome.

Intrigues of John XII.

A. D.
963.

however, was speedily discovered and invested by Berenger; and she might again have fallen under the grasp of her persecutor, but for the intervention of Otho. The promise of her hand, and of the throne of Italy as her portion, roused the King of Germany to her rescue; and crossing the Alps with a large army, he relieved Canozo, celebrated his nuptials within its towers, and then advanced without resistance to Pavia, where he was crowned, together with his Bride. The troubles of his native dominions, however, recalled him to Germany after a few months devoted to his Italian conquests; and before his departure Berenger, by a cession of the March of Treviso, the German key of Lombardy, obtained confirmation in a feudatory Crown, and did homage to Otho as his Lord.* Ten years of suffering followed under his renewed sway, till the brilliant triumphs achieved by Otho over his nearer enemies enabled him to pay attention to the cry of the oppressed which burst from all Italy; from the Pope, whom Berenger had attempted to despoil, no less than from his own subjects. Again passing the Alps, Otho pressed his march, unopposed, on Milan, where he once more received the Iron Crown; and hastening on to Rome, he was now circled with that of the Empire by John XII. The capture of Berenger soon afterwards, and his transfer to Monastic seclusion at Bamberg, relieved the conqueror from the danger of immediate rivalry; and the permanent annexation to Germany of the Imperial Title, (which, notwithstanding the many Pretenders who assumed it, may be considered to have been virtually in abeyance since the deposition of Charles the Fat,) accompanied the temporary reunion of Italy to that Kingdom, and brought the glories of Otho to their summit. From his time to that of Maximilian I., in 1508, no Sovereign of Germany assumed the style of Emperor until he had been formally crowned by the Pope; and Maximilian gave the first example of partial emancipation from that thralldom by declaring himself Emperor Elect.

Obscure as are the Annals of Rome during the Xth Century, it is plain that the Kings of Italy never established authority within her walls. Some faint gleams of independence shoot across the general darkness, and a misty Image of Republicanism may be occasionally discovered struggling with the Anarchy by which the Eternal City was convulsed. The Popes, although not Sovereigns, were at least great Feudal Lords; and John XII. soon discovered that in Otho he was really mastered by a Conqueror, whom he had invited for his deliverance from thralldom which Berenger had only menaced. Secretly entering into a League with Adelbert, the son of the deposed King, he first stimulated the Roman populace to insurrection; and then, at the approach of Otho with an overpowering force, hastily abandoned the Vatican, and retired to Capua. The Emperor summoned a Council after his flight, and feigning surprise at the Pontiff's absence, inquired in what place the Head of the Church, who ought to preside in that Assembly, was now to be found. He was answered by a Cardinal, who denounced the fugitive as guilty of crimes from which human nature revolts, and which the remarkable language of the times affirms to be so black, that the author of them would blush if he heard even Players accused of their commission.* Every mouth furnished some addition to the hideous catalogue of guilt; and the modern reader may perhaps smile at the mixture of conventional offence with moral atrocity which formed the sum of accusation. One declared that John had celebrated Mass without communicating; that he had ordained a Deacon in a stable, and consecrated as Bishop a Boy ten years of age; another that he had frequently committed Simony, and publicly hunted; a third, that he had girt himself with a sword, and worn a helmet and cuirass; and a fourth that he had neglected Mass, and never signed himself with the Cross. Indecorous, doubtless, as were these several acts, unfitting the exalted and venerable station filled by the delinquent, and involving great and heavy blame, they still can scarcely be thought deserving enumeration among the charges which follow. John had savagely mutilated some of his most dignified Clergy; he had wantonly committed many acts of incendiarism; he had polluted the most holy places with the foulest varieties of lust; and scarcely an altar existed in Rome which had not flowed with blood, and been desecrated by rape and adultery. It might seem unnecessary to accumulate any further charge, when perjury, sacrilege, incest, and murder were sufficiently established; yet one, we are told, still remained; and the universal voice of Ecclesiastics, as well as Seculars, pronounced by acclamation, that the Pope had pledged a health to the Devil; and while amusing himself with a dice-box, had invoked Venus, Jupiter, and other Pagan Deities, for a lucky cast. The Emperor forwarded these accusations to the Pontiff; and in his Letter he appears to have been more deeply impressed with horror at the last two charges than at any of their predecessors.† John boldly denied the authority of the Council, and threatened its members with excommunication; but, on non-appearance after a second summons, he was deposed, and the vacancy supplied by the election of Leo VIII. It was on that occasion that Otho exacted a most important oath from the Conclave; that they would never in future elect a Pope without the previous consent of himself or his successors.‡ No sooner, however, had the Imperial troops withdrawn from the Capital, than the memory of Alberic revived attachment to his undeserving Son; and John, being readmitted into the city in spite of the recent solemn pledge, inflicted barbarous punishments upon his enemies, and prepared the City

* Luitprand tells an amusing story of an intrigue between Walla, Queen of Berenger II., and a Chaplain, to whom the education of her daughter was intrusted. The unfortunate lover, while crossing one night to his Mistress's chamber, was seized in the Palace Court by some watch-dog, and detected in consequence of his cries and struggles. The Queen adroitly persuaded her husband that the Priest's designs were addressed to one of her attendants; and Berenger contented himself by taking some precautions for the Chaplain's future observance of his vow of Chastity. The Historian implies that Walla had good reasons for her attachment; yet from the following description these were assuredly not to be found in the outer man; stature brevis, color fuliginæus, rusticus, setigerus, indolens, egrotans, barbarus, durus, ultimus, peticulus, inanis, relictus, iniquus. (v. 15) "My Mistress with a monvler is in lore!"

† Talis de vobis tamque obscuri protulerunt, ut si de huiusmodi dicerentur vobis verendum ingerebant. Luitprand, vi. 9. Horrorum in this passage probably may be rendered more accurately Murders.

‡ Luitprand was present at this Council, and interpreted Otho's German speech which the Italians did not understand. His vultu are Diaboli in amore vultu bilis omnes tam Clerici quam Laici acclamant. (vi. 8.) and the Emperor, in his Letter afterwards, dwells more forcibly upon that absurd act of profane folly than upon any other charge, dicens et adeo auditu ipso horridum, &c. (vi. 9.)

§ Luitprand, vi. 6. Baroni Annal. Eccl. ad ann. 963.

History: for a vigorous resistance. But his insane career of wickedness was soon terminated by an appropriate death. During an adulterous assignation, he fell by an uncertain hand. Luitprand indeed, without the smallest misgiving, and from reasons which he deemed irrefragable, asserts that the fatal blow was struck by the Devil; who also prevented his victim and disciple from receiving the Viaticum.* If this were really so, it was but an evil and ungrateful return for the singular compliment which John had paid him; and we may be permitted to incline to another and a less marvellous belief, which attributes the stroke to the merited vengeance of the husband whom the Pope was dishonouring.

The death of this monster did not abate the opposition of the Romans to the Antipope, as they termed Leo; and they immediately proceeded to a new election, which terminated in favour of Benedict V. The sword of the Emperor annulled that choice, and the Puppet whom the Church still acknowledges as her legitimate head in the series of the descendants of St. Peter, was compelled to strip himself of his Pontifical habits in the Lateran, to acknowledge his usurpation, to surrender his Pastoral staff to be broken by his successful rival, and to bury himself in exile in the heart of Germany. On the death of both Leo and Benedict the struggle was renewed; and John XIII., nominated by the Emperor while in Germany, was chased from Rome, and passed six months as a wanderer in Campania. Otho, at length, indignant at this fresh disobedience, reentered Italy in arms, severely chastised his refractory subjects, dug from their grave, burned and scattered to the winds the remains of a deceased Roman Prefect, who had authorized the outrages against the Pope, ignominiously paraded the similar reigning Magistrate, mounted with his face to the tail of an ass, through the public streets, then delivered him to scourging and imprisonment, and visited his colleagues, the mock Tribunes and Consuls, with either death or banishment.

The authority of Otho the Great was always more firmly established in Northern Italy than in the Provinces of the South; and his sway therefore was proportionately milder in Lombardy than at Rome. Without dispossessing the Feudal Lords, or even formally regulating their privileges, he counterbalanced their hitherto unrestrained authority by encouraging the Order of Citizens in the great Towns; and he thus sattered the first seeds of municipal government, which, in many instances, after a long struggle, were to germinate into Liberty. Apulia and Calabria meantime were still appendages to the Eastern Empire; but their Nobles submitted with reluctance to that foreign Vassalage; and Otho, willing to profit by their disaffection, and at the same time to establish some appearance of rightful claim to their future allegiance, demanded for his son the hand of Theophania, a step-daughter of the Emperor Nicephorus. The pride of the phantom Cæsars disdained foreign nuptial alliances; and France was the only nation permitted to boast legal exception from this foolish and arrogant policy of the Byzantine Court.† The demand of the Saxon Prince, therefore, who had already given offence by the assumption of the Imperial title, was at first haughtily rejected; and his ambassador, the Historian Luitprand, (who has written a particular and very curious narrative of his mission,*) was imprisoned in violation of all civilized national usages. To these indignities an act of perfidy was added, which roused Otho to arms; for Nicephorus afterwards, feigning consent to the proposal, seized the deputation appointed to receive his daughter in Calabria, and treacherously massacred, or transported in chains to Constantinople, the Nobles of whom it was composed. The ill success of the war in which this needless and impolitic cruelty involved Nicephorus occasioned a conspiracy, which led to his murder; and Theophania was the pledge of Pence by which his successor, John Zimisces, purchased the renewed friendship of the German Court. The marriage and coronation of the younger Otho, now associated in the Empire, were celebrated with great pomp at Rome; and that City, Ravenna, Pavia, or Capua, continued to be the residence of his Great Father till he returned to Germany in the year before his death, which occurred in 973.

was founded, is largely and neatly reviewed by Gibbon, ch. lvi. The remark of the Brother of Nicephorus to Luitprand was very pointed: invidiosa res ut Porphyrogenita Porphyrogeniti gentibus maceretur. (Lepanto ad Nic. p. 130.) Yet it was implied that consent would be granted provided Otho bridled high enough.

* The Vignette by Luitprand, addressed to Otho and Adelaide, is among the most interesting and entertaining memorials of the Middle Ages. The Ambassador was treated with great indignity, and at length strictly confined under a guard during several months, to a most uncomfortable house, which had been allotted rather for his prison than for his residence. Grievous are the murmurs which the Bishop utters relative to the coarseness and scantiness of fare to which he was condemned; and he appears to have quitted Constantinople with a rooted abhorrence of its Cookery. The following are some specimens of his complaints. Accipiet aut substantiam nostram quod Circosorum vinum de pice, talem gypsi compositionem sibi impositibile fuit—putus pro optima vini calicis—cora alto et cepe bene olens, oleo et guro sordida—lenuit dulorem meum Imperator Sanctus munere nungno, mittens mihi, ex delectationis causa vis, hancum pinguem, ex quo ipse comederat, olio, cepe, porri laute suffraginatum, guro delibatum, quem vestrum tum mensas inesse optavi, ut qui dilectus Sancti Imperatoris faustis esse non creditis, talem his perspicere crederitis. The last commendation, no doubt, is ironical; but the Bishop soon reverted to his graver strain. Et cum amorum quidam aromata, panes, vinum, poma mitteret, sed cuncta fundentes montes calaphis odia corrotis dimiserunt; et nisi divina pietas paraverit in conspectu meo mensam adferens cui tribulatio me, una mihi poraret mors foret accepta. Of the Episcopal character among the Greeks he formed, and on good ground, a very lowly estimate. In omni Græci, veritatem dico, non mentior, non repere hospitem Episcopum: soli monasterio audent nudas, passim vestem (sibi vicibus) soli apponentes, balneum tunc vitæ permodum non balneum et utilitatem. The outraged Ambassador revenged himself for his ill usage most characteristically. First, he has transmitted to posterity the following portrait of Nicephorus as he appeared at his audience. Hominem omni monstruorum, pygmaem, capite pinguem atque oculorum parvitate talipum, barbâ curtili, lili, apri et amicaud foliolum, cervicis digluth turpatum, profusitate et drustate comarum totis Jopum (another reading gives hirtum) colore Ethiopum, cui per median nolis occurrere metem, vestre extenuam, nabus aciem, cursu ad monarum ipam brevem longissimum, strabus parvam, calcarea probaque equalem, vestem byzantinam et nimis veterem, vel disturante ipsa ferdito et pulchro ornamento indutem, Sicyonius calcementis calcatum, linguâ procerem, ingruo vulpem, perjurio suo mendacis Ulysses. Secondly, he scrawled on the walls of his chamber, and on a wooden table, which seems to have been his principal furniture, nineteen bald, vituperative hexameters; and, lastly, he turned his back upon Constantinople with the following bitter tale dictum. His conspectus verbas, recto Nonas Octobris, horâ decimâ, ex illâ quondam opulentiâ et florentiâ, nunc funditus, peripit, mendace, dolus, repus, cupidis, acerbis, comolus Civitate cum ducato (quid) non hater agressus? Atque quadragesima et novem, cunando, ambulando, equitando, jejundando, stundendo, suscipiendo, flendo, genendo, Neapactum vni.

Annals of Italy.

From A. D. 888.

A. D. 1000.

Embassy of Luitprand.

Treachery of Nicephorus.

A. D. 969.

Marriage of Otho II. with Theophania.

A. D. 970.

* Quidam nocte extra Romanam dum ex eujusdam viri uxore absterget, in temporibus adeo a Diabolo est percussus, ut ultra diem octo ipse eodem rite ex vulnere mortuus. Sed Eucherius viaticum ipsius unctis per eum permissum non precepit; quomodoam a suis cognatis et familiaribus qui præsentes erant peragere sub attentatione eundem. (vi. cap. ult.)

† The imaginary Law of Constantine upon which this prohibition

History.

From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000.
Otho II. claims Southern Italy.
A. D.
982.
His defeat at Bassentello,

and remarkable escape.

Fresh distractions at Rome.

Boniface
VII.

Death of Otho II.
A. D.
984.

The designs which the late Emperor meditated upon Southern Italy were openly avowed by Otho II. so soon as he was disembarassed from Civil troubles in Germany, which occupied the earlier years of his inglorious reign. He then claimed as the marriage portion of his Consort all the Apulian and Calabrian possessions of the Oriental Crowns, and pouring down with a numerous army, he occupied the whole country to the verge of the sea, and for a while pursued his operations so much to the detriment of his enemy, as to obtain from the ready flattery of his Courtiers the title of the "Pale Death of the Saracens."⁸ Near the village of Bassentello, however, he was encountered by an allied force of Greeks and Saracens; and too incautiously following up a successful charge in the early part of the battle, he was overwhelmed by an unbroken reserve of the enemy, and routed with a bloody slaughter of Noble followers, and the loss of almost his whole army. Abandoned even by his body-guard, and with his horse grievously wounded, the Emperor fled singly to the shore; where preferring captivity under a civilized conqueror to the hazard of massacre by Barbarians, in order to escape the pursuit of the Saracens, he surrendered to the Captain of a Greek vessel lying at anchor within sight. The Greek was not impetrable to a bribe, and being persuaded to make sail to an opportune part of the coast, he permitted the captive Emperor to establish communication with his friends on shore at Rossano. The price of treachery was already on the sands, lading several mules with gold; and a boat under some specious pretext approached the ship, when Otho springing from the deck, swam to the friendly bark, seized an oar with his own hand, and before the Greeks had recovered from their surprise, gained the beach, and drove before him the mules and their rich burden to the mortification of his disappointed captors.†

The Calabrian war diverted the attention of the II^d Otho from the distractions of Rome, in which City, not long after his Father's death, Benedict VI., the Pope reigning under the Imperial sanction, had been treacherously seized by one of his Cardinals, and starved or strangled in a vault of the Castle of St. Angelo. The murderer assumed the Tiara under the name of Boniface VII., and during a short reign of fourteen days, stripped a rich spoil of plate and jewels from the Churches; and then, dreading an insurrection, fled with his booty to Constantinople. Ten years after the commission of these atrocities, when the chagrin consequent upon the defeat of the Emperor at Bassentello had occasioned his death,‡ Boniface, relying upon the weakness of the executive Government during the minority of Otho III., returned to Italy, and renewed his course of crime. A second Pope, John XIV., fell a victim to his cruelty and ambition; and the assassin, thus stained with double homicide, swayed the Church till his sudden death, after nearly a year's tyrannical rule, saved him from a fierce retribution at the hands of the populace of Rome. His corpse was dragged through the streets, subjected to every extremity of outrage and contumely, and in the end ignominiously suspended from the horse of an equestrian statue of Constantine.

The hatred against Ecclesiastical Government which the bloody deeds and oppression of Boniface had excited, contributed to the temporary elevation of Crescentius; one of those ambiguous personages whom our ignorance of details permits to be classed, according to the various prepossessions of his Biographers, either as a Demagogue or a Patriot. The two characters are indeed no less widely remote from each other than are the Antipodes; but, unhappily for the fame of the latter, they may too often appear divided by very thin partitions; unless we are admitted near enough to discern with accuracy to what extent the sordid dregs of personal interest or ambition have been sublimed by the purifying fervour of more generous motives. Under the rule of Crescentius, the Popes were deprived of all Civil power; John XV. was banished and recalled at his pleasure; and on the death of that Pontiff, a Greek Priest under the title of John XVI. was opposed to Gregory V., a member of the Imperial Family, whom Otho had nominated. Crescentius appears to have relied on succours from Constantinople, to which Court he promised the fealty of Rome as the price of alliance. But the Greek Emperor was tardy in his movements, either from distrust of the fidelity of his new ally, or from a growing jealousy of the Western Church. The march of Otho upon the rebellious Capital was, on the other hand, rapid and uninterrupted, and his resentment upon entering its walls was wreaked most deeply and bloodily. The Antipope was put to death after barbarous tortures and mutilations; and the Consul, who had retired to the Mole of Hadrian, long afterwards distinguished, on account of his occupation of it, as the Tower of Crescentius, and now familiar to us as the Castle of St. Angelo, was dragged from his hiding-place either by force or fraud, and hurried to the scaffold.

His death was not long unrevenged; but the motives which prompted his widow Stephania to compass the fall of Otho III. are no less variously and uncertainly represented than is the character of Crescentius himself. It is difficult to believe that after she had been exposed to brutal violation by the German soldiery,* she should succeed in captivating the Emperor; yet such influence obtained after such dishonour, if we trust to some authorities, afforded fit opportunity for perpetrating her designs of vengeance. Nor is our difficulty lessened when we are told elsewhere,† that immediately after her husband's execution, she listened with corresponding ardour to vows of attachment from him by whose command that husband had perished: till roused to fury by the denial on the part of her lover to advance her to the dignity of Empress, she poisoned him either by perfumed gloves or by a medical potion. Otho died without children in his twenty-second year. The German writers speak of him with exaggerated praise as "The Wonder of the World;" a swollen title for the just attainment of which not any voucher is afforded by History, and even sufficient time appears to have been wanting. Perhaps somewhat of this unmerited eulogy, bestowed by Ecclesiastics, the sole Chroniclers of the Age, may be attributed to the devout tenour of his life. He confessed himself to St. Romualdo;‡ at the suggestion of that holy Ascetic he undertook a Pilgrimage barefooted to St.

* Pallida Mors Sarcenorum. Chronicon Laurakense, p. 121. Otho Frisingensis, vi. 26.

† Dittmar, Chronicon, p. 59. Gobelinus Persona, Æt. vi. c. 49.

‡ Some authorities speak of a wound which Otho II. received from a poisoned arrow in that engagement, under which he languished and died: but such a hurt must have incapacitated him from the great bodily exertion necessary for his escape. He might perhaps be so wounded in a subsequent action.

* Arnulphus Mediolanensis, l. 10.

† Reimerus, Vit. S. Walboldus Ludiensis, sec. 9.

History. Michael of Monte Gargaro, he wore a robe on which were embroidered all the symbols of the Apocalypse, and he subscribed himself in one of his Diplomas, "Servant of the Apostles." These were merits of no common order in the estimation of his contemporaries.

We have passed in silence two very tragical tales connected with Italy which will be found in most Histories of Germany, under the reigns of Otho II. and III. One that Otho II., in revenge for the murder of Benedict VI. and the turbulence of the Romans, invited all the Patricians indiscriminately to a splendid Banquet in the Vatican; and that when his guests had taken their places, the Hall was filled with armed men, who commanded the terrified Nobles, on peril of their lives, not to move from their seats, whatever they might hear or see. The chief opponents of the Imperial Government were then cited by name, dragged one by one from the table, and massacred before the eyes of their companions. After this butchery, the entertainment proceeded with much courtesy and festivity. The second story relates to a supposed Empress of Otho III., who, like Phædra, being rejected by an Italian Count whom she solicited, falsely denounced him to her husband as having made illicit advances, and thus procured his death. The widow of the guiltless victim, confident of her deceased Lord's innocence, from his dying asseverations, boldly and successfully underwent the ordeal of Fire in its avowment; and so far convinced the Emperor of the complicated wickedness of his Consort, that he adjudged her to the stake. Muratori* rejects both these narratives as Fables; showing that notwithstanding their great importance they are unnoticed by every contemporary writer; and that they rest upon no better authority than that of some barbarous Latin verses of Godfrey of Viterbo, (who did not flourish till two Centuries afterwards,) rendered into elegant prose by Sigonius.† There can be no doubt, however, that Otho II. used his Italian subjects harshly, and was much disliked by them in return. The loss of the Battle of Bassentello is attributed to their disaffection. The illustrious Gerbert, afterwards Pope as Sylvester II., in one of his Epistles (xii.) states that the Romans instituted a very rude comparison, ipse Cæsar omnium hominum excellentissimus a furciferis asino comparatur; nay yet more that they named him Sanguinaris; and one of the Emperor's Diplomas enjoins, in return for their civilities, that no Italian shall be believed on his oath.

The close of Otho III.'s reign, and the commencement of a new Century, afford a resting place at which we may pause awhile on the Annals of Italy, and direct our attention to those of other portions of Europe.

Observations on the present Annals during the reign of the 11th Century.
II. The Century which contains the remaining acts of the 11th Dynasty of FRANCE, after the dismemberment of the Carolingian Empire, is not only among the most obscure, but also among the least interesting, which the History of that Country presents. The contemporary writers throughout much of its course are few and of little credit; and we are occasionally deprived of all other guidance except that of tradition, reduced to a more enduring form many years after the events which it records had occurred. In this dearth of materials our sketch will of necessity be rapid.

Charles the Simple, who under other circumstances would have been entitled by hereditary right to the Crown of France, was still regarded as illegitimate; and Count Eudes, the heroic defender of Paris, the son of Robert le Fort, and a reputed descendant of Charles Martel, found little difficulty in prevailing upon a Diet assembled at Compiegne, to reward his valour by investiture with the Kingdom which it had preserved. The boundaries of that Kingdom, however, included no more than the comparatively narrow tract between the Meuse and the Loire, the centre of which was occupied, as its coasts and frontiers were ravaged, by the predatory Northmen. Guido Duke of Spoleto unsuccessfully attempted to wring the Crown from Eudes; Aquitaine peremptorily rejected his dominion; Baldwin Count of Flanders braved his power and repulsed his troops; and there was scarcely a feudatory Lord, throughout the dominion which once paid service to the Monarch of France, who did not now assert authority almost equal to that of his nominal Sovereign. Partly by ignominious purchase, partly by force of arms, the Northmen in 889 and 890 were persuaded or compelled to abandon fresh attacks on Paris; and, in the latter year, unable to pass the walls bravely manned by the Citizens, and anxious to continue their retreat to the sea, they dragged their barks from the Seine overland, and when below the Town launched them once more into the river.* Whatever personal valour could achieve, was not likely to be wanting in Eudes; and we read, that, on one occasion, when he unexpectedly fell in with a body of 19,000 Northmen in the Forest of Montfaucon, placing himself in the van of his own few followers, not exceeding 1000 horse, he resolutely charged and overthrew the great multitude opposed to him; and killed with his own hand a chieftain, who during the conflict had dashed his battle-axe with so great violence against the King's head, that but for the good temper of his helmet his life must have been forfeited.† But it was in a war of partisanship that he was most sure of success; for not long afterwards, when in the presence of another Barbarian host on the banks of the Oise, so little confidence did he feel in the attachment, the obedience, the fidelity, or the courage of his own army, that he wisely preferred negotiation to the chance of a pitched battle.

This ignoble Treaty, a defeat which he sustained from another division of the same invaders retiring before the successful arms of Arnulf King of Germany, and the natural jealousy of the great Lords, who ill-brooked the Sovereignty of one whom they reputed but as an equal, diminished the first popularity of Eudes; and encouraged the partisans of Charles the Simple to assert his claim to the throne. Accordingly, during an Assembly held at Rheims in the absence of Eudes, on an expedition against Aquitaine, the young Prince, scarcely then in his fourteenth year, was presented by the Archbishop Foulques to the Nobles, as the legitimate posthumous son of Louis the Stammerer. His personal likeness to his Father was too strong to be denied; Arnulf of Germany supported his cause, and a Civil war ensued between the competitors, which after various fortune terminated to the disadvantage of Charles.

* In the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, 1821, may be found a description of a boat dug out of the banks of the Seine, near the Champ de Mars, in 1805. It was a simple canoe, hewn out of a single tree, and able to contain eight men with baggage and provisions. There seems good reason to believe that it was a Norman bark left on the spot on some such occasion as that noticed above. See Wheaton, Hist. of the Northmen, 230.

† Abbo, l. 2.

Annals of France.
From A. D. 888. to A. D. 1000. Reign of Eudes. A. D. 885. A. D. 892.

Transactions with the Northmen.

A. D. 891.

Charles the Simple asserts his right to the Crown.
A. D. 893.

* Annali d' Italia, ad ann. 981. 996.

† De Regno Italia, vii.

History.

From
A. D.
868.
to
A. D.
1000.

Accession
of Charles
the Simple.
A. D.
898.

Early History of Rollo the Norman.

His banishment.

His vision.

The conduct of Eudes was marked with generosity; he granted his rival a munificent establishment; it is said that he even shared with him some portion of his dominions; and there is little doubt that on his death-bed he earnestly recommended all who approached him to transfer their allegiance to Charles as his successor, and not to agitate any pretensions which might be advanced by his own brother, Robert, the powerful Duke of France.

The first fourteen years of the reign of Charles the Simple who succeeded, are entirely without contemporary record. From the few lights which we are able to collect, there is little doubt that they were passed in continued struggles both with the Northmen, and with the feudatory Lords, who asserted independent rule over many of his Provinces. It is thus we read of Kings of Brittany, of Lorraine, of Provence, and of Burgundy; and so weakened and degraded was their ancient Sovereign, the King of France, that his name is omitted in an enumeration of the Princes who governed Christendom, with which Luitprand begins his History. Nevertheless it was in that forgotten Realm that a great Revolution was to occur, affecting in its ultimate consequences the fortunes of England even more than those of France.

Putting aside the numberless fabulous legends which have been grafted by the later Norman Chroniclers on the history of the founder of their race, we may confine ourselves to the simpler narratives of the Scandinavian writers, against whom no imputation of adulatory falsehood can reasonably be advanced. Rollo, or as he is called in the Norwegian dialect, Hrolf, was the eldest son of Rognwald, Jarl of Møre; a distinguished chieftain of ancient family, to whom Harald King of Norway intrusted the government of the conquered Orkneys. Endowed with great bodily strength, Rollo early addicted himself to nautical enterprises. "Hrolf," says a native Chronicler, "was a famous Fikinger, (Sea-king,) and was so stout that no horse could carry him. He was therefore obliged to go on foot, and thence was called Gaungro Rölfr: (Rollo the Walker:)" he cruised much in the Baltic Sea.[†] A feud between the sons of King Harald and the Jarl of Møre, cost that aged chieftain his life; and his murder was retaliated with circumstances of extraordinary cruelty. While Harald was incensed on that account against the family of his ancient friend, Rollo, on his return from a piratical expedition, yet further exasperated the anger of his King by the violation of one of his most important Laws. A rude and oppressive custom had long existed by which the Vikings seized for their own use the cattle of the unprotected peasantry; and this imprisonment of provision, or Strandlug as it was termed, had been forbidden under strict penalties by the reigning Monarch. Perpetual exile was the sentence passed on Rollo's offence; and thus banished from his home, if a Sea-king can be said to have cultivated any other home than the waves, he pursued with more than former energy his life of piracy. It is not easy to trace his course of wandering with precision, but he is thought to have served in England both for and against Alfred; and while in that Country a vision, as we are assured, foretold his future destiny. In his dream he believed himself to be afflicted with leprosy, while standing on a high mountain washed by a pure spring. He plunged into the water and was cleansed, and he observed that a flock of birds which had bathed in the same fountain, flew away and commenced building their nests. It required little skill in Oneirocritics to annex an appropriate interpretation to this vision; and we may be forgiven for believing that Rollo was persuaded at some after period of his life, rather than, as the Chroniclers avouch, by a Christian prisoner, at the moment, that his leprosy was sin; the mountain, the Church; the water, Baptism; and the flock of birds his warlike comrades, who were ordained, together with himself, to find a sure abiding place after conversion. Be this as it may, the first certain appearance of Rollo in France occurred in 876, when as the commander of no more than six barks, he partook in an incursion which Charles the Bald was compelled to buy off by subsidy. His name does not appear among the Chiefs who, ten years later, assisted in the Siege of Paris; and it is little probable, therefore, (as the ready flattery of the Norman Poets and Chroniclers has affirmed,) that he had before that date attained sufficient power to assist Alfred in the recovery of his Crown,* and to decline the munificent proffer of half his Kingdom, which the gratitude of the restored Monarch sought to bestow as a reward.

In the early part of the reign of Charles the Simple, it is plain from a scene most vividly described by the Norman Poet Robert Wace, that Rollo had not yet acquired that preeminence among his Countrymen which, ere many years, he was to enjoy. The armies of the French and of the Northmen were encamped on the opposite banks of the river Eure; and the former, anxious for pacific negotiation, despatched messengers to ask a parley with the Chief of the Pirates. "We are all equal," was the reply. Being asked what was their design in invading the Country, they answered, "To subdue it;" and in a bloody engagement which followed they made good their boast.[†] Two years afterwards, Rollo having stormed Bayeux, and slain its Governor Count Berenger, proffered his hand;[‡] yet reeking with her father's blood, to Popa, a maiden of distinguished beauty, and contracted with her an ambiguous marriage. It was then that having fortified himself in his strong hold at Rouen, and having been elected their permanent Chief by the free choice of his comrades, he directed his powerful mind to the organization of a band of wandering adventurers into a fixed and well-regulated Colony.

Of his transactions for many years after this settlement we possess few notices; till at length we find him at the head of a general confederation of Northmen who ascended the three great rivers of France, pillaging the intermediate Country. Charles struck with terror earnestly sought to treat, and obtained an armistice of three months' duration. When that time had expired, Rollo again advanced and laid siege to Chartres. The Bishop of that City flung himself upon vengeance against the invading Saracens, as they were named; announced that Paradise would be the immediate reward of those faithful champions who should be slain in opposing them; and having thus kindled an indomitable enthusiasm, fixed on the point of a lance a tunic once belonging to the Virgin, the choicest treasure of the reliquary of his Cathedral; and placed himself at the head of a * i. 2.

† Snoerre, Haralds Soga ens Hrolfsgaga, c. 24. cited in Wheaton's Hist. of the Northmen, p. 240.

• Alfred's restoration took place in 860.
• Roman de Rollo. Wheatman, 243.
• Rolt en a ft sa mie. Ibid.

Annals of France.
From
A. D.
698. to
A. D.
1000.

A. D.
900.
Elect of the North-
men.

A. D.
911.

Delivered Chartres.

History.
From
A. D.
888,
to
A. D.
1000.
Treats with Charles,
and other kisses himself in Narmandy.

gallant troop of Franks and Burgundians, whom Robert, brother of the late King Eudes, and Richard Duke of Burgundy had gathered in his aid. Rollo was totally defeated, but soon recovering his strength he poured down again upon the Country once more left open to him by the disbanding of the recent levy. "What can a single man avail?" was the reply of Charles to the representations of his miserable subjects; "it is a host which gives strength to a King;" and wholly unable to resist, he offered to abandon Neustria, and to cement alliance by the marriage of his natural daughter Giselle with the Norman Chief. The wary conqueror observed that the proffered lands were ruined and desolate; and when Flanders was tendered in addition, he complained of the marshiness of that district. In the end the King agreed that Brittany should be added to the portion; thus somewhat dexterously transferring to a bold warrior a quarrel rather than a possession; not, as may be believed, without a hope that a Province which then denied his supremacy, might be won by the arms of the Norman, to revert subsequently to himself.

Fury brought to Charles.

The Baptism of the Scandinavian Sea-king formed one article of the Treaty; and it was accompanied by the repudiation of Pöpa. It was then requisite that he should do homage, according to Feudal custom, for his great Signory of Normandy. "By my God," exclaimed the rough soldier, "never will I bow my knee before another man nor kiss his foot;" and his well-remembered oath passed into a family name, corrupted afterwards into Bigod, or Bigot.^{*} Then deputed one of his soldiers to comply with the slavish service, he burst into peals of inextinguishable laughter, when the insolent Barbarian seized the foot of the King under the pretext of kissing it, and raised it so high as to throw Charles backward on the ground from his chair of state. The French, powerless to resent this bitter insult, allowed the ceremonial to proceed without a comment, and Rollo condescended to take the oath of fealty by placing his hands between those of his Lord. Such was the first act of that Feudal system in NORMANDY, as the Country became styled from its new owners, which ere long was to be transported to England by one of Rollo's descendants.

His wise government.

The Government of Duke Rollo during the next sixteen years was wise and vigorous; his efforts were successfully directed to the gradual civilization of the 30,000 rude soldiers whom he swayed; and from his accession may be dated the close, unless in a few partial instances, of that rapine and brigandage, which for more than a Century had devastated some of the richest Provinces of Europe. The Normans, unlike most other foreign Colonists, adopted, for the greater part, the Laws, Language, Religion, and usages of the People among whom they settled, infusing into each a portion of new vigour and freshness from their own masculine and independent habits. Strange also it may appear, the establishment of these fierce Pirates in France, contributed greatly to the advancement of Literature. The wild marvels of their own popular superstitions were intermingled with the glowing imagery of the South, and gave rise (if we may venture to pronounce thus boldly on a much controverted subject) to the Romance of Norman Minstrelsy; long the delight of the Palace and of the Baronial Hall, and even yet attractive to the Poet no less than to the Antiquary. Through the sound policy of Rollo, the settlement of strangers within his dominions was encouraged by strict laws for the protection of property; and in illustration of the excellence of his Police, it is asserted of him, as of some of his elder native Princes, and of our own English Alfred also, that he suspended bracelets of gold by the road side without a guard, and that they remained inviolate during the long period of three years. The Clameur de Haro, corresponding with our Anglo-Saxon Hue and Cry, by which the Hundred wherein a crime had been committed was raised in pursuit of the offender, has frequently been referred to Rollo; and although the origin of the term may be traced more satisfactorily through a different etymology, the appropriation of it to the first Norman legislator sufficiently proves the general high repute of his Jurisprudence.^{*} One stain alone appears to tarnish the memory of Rollo after establishment in his Duchy. His marriage with Giselle proved unhappy; the Princess transplanted, if we may so express ourselves, to a coarse soil, and a boisterous climate, languished for scenes better adapted to her gentle spirit, and died of grief. We are ignorant of the details which occasioned the public execution of two officers whom King Charles despatched to inquire concerning the fate of his sister.[†]

The cession of Normandy, although stigmatized as disgraceful, and no doubt extorted by necessity, might have been equally dictated by a sagacious policy. France yielded no more than a Country long since lost to her, and which she was unable to dispute; and by its formal surrender she converted a peridious enemy into a grateful ally. It was otherwise on the vacancy of the German throne, occurring towards the close of the same year which witnessed the creation of the new Duchy; and the most ignominious event in the history of Charles the Simple, is that the great Diet of the Empire rejected him, the last survivor of the stock of Charlemagne, even its bastard branch being now extinct, on account of his proverbial incapacity. Lorraine was the only portion of Germany which transferred to him its allegiance, and its possession involved him in some contests with the native Princes. In the latter years of his reign he weakly surrendered himself to the implicit guidance of a favourite of low origin; and the ancient Lords of his Kingdom regarded with deep indignation their exclusion from the Royal Audience-chamber by the Hagenau. To proud bidding of the Court-minion Hagenon. To escape their murmurs, Charles at length secluded himself in his mountain Palace at Laon; a residence which he had first chosen as affording security from the irruptions of the Hungarians. Meanwhile a conspiracy for

Annals of France.

From
A. D.
888,
to
A. D.
1000.

Rise of the favourite Hagenau.

Discontent
of the Nobles.

^{*} "The Normans," says Minsheu, "had such a pursuit with aerie after offenders, as this is which they called Haro, wherof you may read in the Grand Coutumier, cap. 54. Some call it Harel, the reason wherof they give to be this. That there was a Duke of Normandy called Rot, a man of great justice and severity against grievous offenders; and that thereupon when they follow any in this pursuit they cry Ho-Rot, as if they should say 'Ah Rot, where art thou that wert wont to redress this, or what shouldst thou doe against these wretches if thou wert now living? In which call they which are within hearing must make pursuit or pay a fine.'

Mr. Wheaton, however, decides in favour of the Icelandic herrip, cry of army, compounded of her, or hær, an army, and rip, a whoop or cry; and corresponding with the French sauz l'escort.

[†] Velly, l. 355.

^{*} Much as foreigners, to our shame, have nick-named the English "Goddamns."

[†] The death of Rollo is most generally fixed in 927.

History. his deposition was organized by the discontented Nobles, and Robert Count of Paris and his son Hugh the White, (probably so named from his armour,) the most powerful Vassals of his Realm, on the King's refusal to dismiss his favourite, openly renounced their allegiance by the significant ceremony of breaking and throwing on the ground a straw which they held in their hands;* and Charles abandoned by the troops whom he had summoned to his standard, took refuge in Lorraine. The insurgents treated this flight as a solemn abdication, and Robert, with the consent of the chief Ecclesiastics, was proclaimed King, and crowned at Rheims. But his reign was of short duration. Within twelve months, Charles returned by unexpected marches, surprised his rival near Soissons, and although ultimately defeated, so far triumphed as to leave Robert among the slain.† The fall of their leader but increased the ardour of his followers, and under the guidance of Hugh, they rushed on to complete victory. On his retreat from the field, Charles applied for succour, but in vain, to all his chief Vassals; till his relation Heribert Count of Vermandois at length assisted him of support. The fugitive King gladly hastened to St. Quentin, where his unexpectedly ally prostrated himself at his feet, and observing that his son received the Monarch's salute standing, harshly reproached him for the unseemliness of such a posture before his Sovereign, and accompanied the rebuke with a severe blow. Deeply impressed by so marked a token of personal respect and loyalty, Charles dismissed his suite, and abandoned himself altogether to the protection of Heribert; who repaid this unsuspecting confidence by foul and most perfidious treachery. By night, he secretly conveyed the deluded Prince to confinement in his Castle of Chateau Thierry, and then hastened to receive the price of his treason from the hands of his enemies.‡ When the captivity of her husband was announced to Edgiva his Queen, she lost no time in crossing the seas with Louis their son, and seeking an asylum in the Court of her brother Athelstan, King of the Anglo-Saxons. From that emigration, Louis, then a boy but nine years of age, has become known to us by the title of l'Outremer, a name which, except from a dread of violating the solemnity of History, we should render by its most correspondent English, "the Outlandish."

Hugh the White, the richest and most powerful Feudatory of his time, Lord of Paris and of the entire domain between the Seine and the Loire, might now without difficulty have placed upon his own brows the Crown which had been worn both by his uncle Eudes and his Father Robert. Prompted, however, either by a generous ambition, which preferred the more noble title of King-maker to that of King, or by a shrewd policy which discovered a wider extension of his own influence by bestowing on another a title which would have brought envy on himself, he declined the dazzling offer. The Chroniclers, indeed, assign another motive

* Velly, 388.

† By some authorities Charles is said to have killed the usurper with his own hand. Other, and perhaps more trustworthy, writers attribute the death of Robert to Comte Fulbert, the standard bearer of the King.

‡ The death of Heribert, which occurred in 942, is said to have been attended with circumstances of peculiar horror, arising from the bitterness of his remorse. When reminded of his spiritual welfare, he fixed his eyes on the Priest, and replied, "There were twelve of us who conspired against Charles;" words which he continued to repeat so long as he retained any power of utterance.

which will be more gratifying to the lovers of Minnie History. Rodolph, (or Raoul as he is more generally named by the French writers,) son of Richard Duke of Burgundy, was his brother-in-law; and before Hugh decided upon the disposal of the throne, he is said to have asked his sister Emma whether she would prefer that himself or her husband should be King. The high-minded Dame replied that she was prepared to kiss the knees of her husband in token of homage, but not those of her brother; and the reply obtained Rodolph his Kingdom, which was virtually administered by Hugh. A period of anarchy and confusion succeeded; the prestige of Royalty was diminished by the transfer of nominal sovereignty to private hands; and many of the chief Seigneurs declined recognition of the new King. A fresh band of predatory Northmen also, profiting by the disturbed state of France, made a descent from Denmark, were joined by some few of Rollo's subjects, and contested the Duchy of France both with Hugh and Rodolph. After many alternations of fortune (during which, on one occasion, the King was grievously wounded and nearly captured) the invaders were almost exterminated in a general engagement at Limoges.

A Crown bestowed by Vassals is held also only during their pleasure, and not many years elapsed before Heribert of Vermandois, disgusted by the refusal of a Fief for which he applied, released Charles the Simple from his confinement, and concerted measures for the overthrow of Rodolph. Peace was mediated by Hugh at the expense of the honour of both parties; for Rodolph conceded the demanded Fief, and Heribert recommitted the unhappy Charles to prison. His imbecility had so far increased as to render him a harmless rival, and Rodolph felt able to indulge with security a generous wish for his freedom. He established him in a Palace at Attigny, where surrounded by a mockery of State, the drivelling Prince still believed himself to be a King, and expired happy in his delusion, after a year's enjoyment of his imaginary restoration.

Still, however, the turbulent spirit of Heribert prompted him to fresh enterprises, and the few remaining years of Rodolph's sway were consumed in petty warfare, conducted either by Hugh or by himself against their ambitious rival. After a disturbed reign, Rodolph died without issue.* No member of his family pretended to the Crown of France, and even his hereditary dominions of Burgundy passed away from his natural heirs. In a contest which arose between his brother and his brother-in-law for their possession, Hugh the Great increased the already exorbitant power from which he derived that title by a large appropriation to himself; and thus brought his descendants one step nearer to that Kingship which he rejected in his own person. Once again preferring the secure authority of hereditary Lordship to the unstable tenure of an elective Monarchy, and calculating that he might exercise upon a younger mind, perhaps a yet greater influence than he had maintained even over the pliant Rodolph, he addressed himself to Heribert and William Longsword, (the latter of whom in 927 had succeeded his father Rollo in the Dukedom of Normandy,) to assist in the recall of Louis, the son of * Rodolph, like Arnulf of Germany, is said to have been a victim of that horrible disorder, the morbus pediculorum. Velly, i. 395. The authorities for the reigns of Rodolph, and Charles the Simple, are contained in Bouquet, Recueil, vol. viii. and Pistorius, Script. Rer. Germ. vol. i.

Annals of France.

From A. D. 888. to A. D. 1000. Rodolph proclaimed King.

A. D. 926.

Release of Charles the Simple. A. D. 928.

His death. A. D. 929.

Death of Rodolph. A. D. 936.

Accession of Louis IV P'Outremer.

History. Charles the Simple, from his asylum in England. The throne of France, which that young Prince accordingly ascended, bestowed little more, however, upon its possessor than the sovereignty of the City of Laon.

But Hugh was unacquainted with the character of the youth whom he had elevated for his own purposes. Brave, active, and high-spirited, Louis panted to emancipate himself from an unworthy tutelage; and he was supported in his design by the counsels of his mother Edgiva, who beheld in the Count of Paris rather the detroner of her husband, than the restorer of her Son. While preparing for a future struggle with his powerful Vassals, the young King involved himself in a much more formidable contest with Otho the Great, by accepting homage proffered by the Lorrainers, ever anxious to escape the German yoke. Singularly opposing public to private interests, at the moment in which Louis defied his Barons, and endeavoured to wrest a Province from the King of Germany, he closely allied himself by marriage to the very enemies whom he was creating; and received the hand of Gerberge, widow of the late Duke of Lorraine, sister of Otho, and sister-in-law of Count Hugh.* Otho, as might be expected, united himself with the discontented Lords of France; and although Louis in the first instance overran Alsatia, and was assisted by an English fleet in mastering the ports of Lorraine, the rapid movements of his more skilful opponent soon compelled him to retreat his steps; a defeat by his Barons at Chateau Porcier led to the abandonment of all the Northern districts; and but for the moderation of Otho, to whom the insurgent Seigneurs had already paid homage, his Crown must have been irrecoverably lost. That Prince, to whom the title of Great has been assigned with far more justice than History in general bestows it, was more anxious to promote the tranquillity of the Western World than his own individual aggrandizement; and abandoning all claim upon a sceptre already within his grasp, he pardoned the aggression upon himself, reconciled Louis to his disobedient subjects, and at the same time fully guaranteed the interests which those subjects had intrusted to his protection.

A new object of ambition soon presented itself to the restless spirit of Louis. William Longsword, the son and successor of Duke Rollo in Normandy, inherited little of his Father's eminent qualities, and showed himself far better adapted for the monastic retirement which he long and earnestly coveted, than for the active duties of a Statesman and a Warrior. In the adjustment of a petty feud with Arnulf Count of Flanders, he was assassinated by order of that Chieftain with circumstances of peculiar treachery; and his death appeared to afford Louis an opportunity of strengthening himself by seizure of the vacant Duchy. William had left only one illegitimate son, Richard, then ten years of age, who although he afterwards won by his valour the distinguished title Sans peur, seemed at the time an easy victim to the unprincipled ambition of a more powerful neighbour. The King of France in the first instance proceeded to Rouen to organize a Regency for his great Fief, and he there obtained possession of the person of Richard, under the pretext of qualifying him for his future Dukedom by a suitable education in the Court of Laon. But there was another eye directed not less eagerly than his own towards the fair Province of Normandy; and when the King of France discovered that the Count of Paris meditated designs upon the Duchy, in order to secure some portion of a booty, the entire attainment of which was now manifestly hopeless, he entered into a nefarious treaty of partition by which the ill-gotten spoil when attained was to be divided between the plunderers.

The ingenuity of Osmond, a Norman governor to whom the superintendence of the young Duke had been committed, devised means for his escape from Laon. His confinement had been embittered by much cruelty; and either to terrify him from any attempt at flight, or perhaps really with the intention of rendering him a cripple, and unfit for the active duties of sovereignty, Louis is said to have threatened to sear the sinews of his legs. Osmond, having first instructed his pupil to feign so desperate an illness, that the vigilance of his sentinels became relaxed by his long confinement to bed, from which at length he was never expected to rise again, then concealed him in a truss of hay. Attention to his favourite horse ranked highly among the duties of a brave soldier of that period; and Osmond, carrying on his shoulders a burden apparently by no means unusual, passed the city gates to a spot in which he had secretly provided means of speedy flight; and arrived with his important charge at Coucy, having evaded all pursuit. Meantime the artful representations of Bernard Count of Rouen, who administered the Government of Normandy during the minority of Richard, created a belief in Louis that he should ultimately profit far more by the assistance of the Normans themselves, than by maintaining his alliance with Count Hugh. The whole Duchy, it was said, should become his own in fitting season; why, therefore, should he condescend to share it with a Vassal, whom the Normans were ready to assist him in subduing? Misled by these false hopes, the fickle and faithless Prince abandoned his former League, and even declared certain towns, upon which Hugh was advancing, to be guaranteed by his Royal protection, and therefore to be inviolable.

Bernard by these artifices secured his aim; he effectually divided the two assailants, by whose joint force he must have been overwhelmed, and he also gained time for the arrival of important succours from Denmark, which might be directed against each of them in succession. The King of Denmark, Harald, led his troops in person, and after his landing, the two Monarchs met in conference. The discussion at first was friendly, at least in appearance; and the guardianship of the minor seemed a point of mutual interest. But an unlucky allusion to the murder of Duke William, and the recognition, among the suite of Louis, of Herluin, Count de Montreuil, who had been the unwitting cause of that bloody deed by seeking the Duke's protection from the Count of Flanders, led from angry words to open violence. A fiery-spirited Dane first reproached Montreuil as the source of calamity to his master, and then stretched him dead at his feet by a thrust of his lance. Eighteen French Nobles, and nearly all their attendants, were massacred in the general affray which ensued; and Louis escaped from the scene of blood, the Guc de Herluin, (Herluin's ford,) as it was ever afterwards named, only to be thrown into prison by the Regent Bernard. Even if the quarrel had not been altogether premeditated, the Normans gladly profited by its occurrence to secure the person of the French King.

* Both Hedwige, consort of Hugh the Great, Count of Paris, and Gerberge were sisters of Otho.

* William the Conqueror alluded to this capture of Louis, in his speech to his army before the Battle of Hastings: "Did not your Fathers make captive the King of the Franks, and hold him as a Annals of France.

From A. D. 888, to

A. D. 1000,

Escape of Richard of Normandy

A. D. 944.

Artifices of the Regent Bernard.

Arrival of Danish troops.

Imprisonment of Louis.

History. The affection and activity of his consort, Gerberge, excited powerful interest in behalf of her captive husband; and the Kings of Germany and of England, and the Count of Paris himself solicited his release. The price was the investment of Duke Richard with all the prerogatives of his Father and Grandfather; and even when that unwilling ransom was guaranteed, Louis found that he had only changed his jailer. He was surrendered to the Count of Paris, who placed him again in strict custody, in the hope of extorting a cession of the now sole domain of the Crown, the City of Laon. The King's deliverance was not effected without a solemn promise of the resignation of that territory; a promise which he did not scruple to violate so soon as Otho armed in his favour. In the petty warfare which ensued, and continued during four years, Louis displayed much ability and personal courage; and spiritual no less than secular weapons were raised in his behalf. Twice was Hugh excommunicated by the decrees of an Ecclesiastical Synod confirmed by the Pope; and twice did he regard their denunciations with contempt and carelessness. So low indeed had fallen the power of the Church in the middle of the Xth Century, that neither of the two anathemas fulminated against the Count of Paris deprived him of the services of a single follower; while, on the other hand, he found means to allure numerous partisans from the ranks of his enemy. The persuasions of Otho and of his son-in-law, Conrad of Lorraine, ultimately mediated that accommodation which the arms of Louis and the threats of the Clergy, were equally inefficient to extort; and Hugh, materially strengthened in power, renewed oaths of allegiance to his shadow of a Sovereign.

reconciliation with Hugh.
A. D. 950.

Marriage of Edgiva.
A. D. 951.

Death of Louis IV.
Accession of Lothaire.
A. D. 954.

Death of Hugh the Great.
A. D. 956.

The petty struggles which harassed the conclusion of the reign of Louis IV. merit little attention; but one remarkable occurrence in his family must not be wholly omitted. Three years before his death he was abandoned by his mother Edgiva; who, regardless of her own honour, the wrongs of her former husband, and the disproportion of her years, threw herself into the arms of Heribert II., Count of Vermandois, son of that Noble of the same name, who had so long retained Charles the Simple in imprisonment. Deeply wounded in his domestic peace by this disgraceful misalliance, menaced by a new invasion of the Hungarians, and unable to control his refractory Barons, notwithstanding the display of much talent, valour, and firmness, Louis, after holding a nominal sceptre during eighteen years of anarchy, died in consequence of a fall from his horse, started at a wolf. Of his two surviving children by Gerberge, Lothaire, the elder, in his fourteenth year, was proclaimed his successor.

The support of Hugh the Great secured the accession of the new King, from whose minority the subtle and ambitious Count drew sure hopes of his own further aggrandizement; and the other Lords of France readily followed the example of the chief Feudatory. Aquitaine was at that moment the leading object which Hugh coveted, and he might have been successful had not his projects been arrested by death.* His vast possessions prisoner in Rouen, until he had restored Normandy to Richard your Duke, then a boy? and in that interview did not the young Duke wear his sword, while the King was deprived of his, and even of his dagger?" Wheaton, p. 292, and the authorities there cited.

Hugh the Great, although himself unmarried, was son of King Robert, nephew of King Rudes, brother-in-law of King Rodolph, and father of King Hugh Capet. By his three marriages he was were divided among three sons, but we are interested in the fortunes of only the second, Hugh Capet, who was about ten years of age at his Father's death, and who inherited the County of Paris and Duchy of France. The extreme youth of the King and of his chief Vassal, rendered both of them unfit for personal administration, and the Governments of each fell to the care of their respective mothers, Gerberge and Hedwige, women of vigorous minds, and sisters of the Emperor Otho. The transactions of the reign of Lothaire are among the most obscure in French History, and of the seven years between 966 and 973 not one contemporary record survives. At the conclusion of that dark period we know that a few years after the death of Otho the Great, a war ensued between his successor, Otho II., and Lothaire; and that the latter nearly succeeded in capturing his cousin, surprised and altogether defenceless in his Palace at Aix la Chapelle.* Otho having escaped to Cologne, expressed his resentment by a solemn defiance, in which the Herald assured the King of France that his master would return the unexpected visit before October closed. Punctual to his engagement, the Emperor, early in that month, invaded France at the head of a force which has been magnified to 60,000 men. After ravaging Laon, Rheims, and Soissons, he presented himself before the gates of Paris; and informed Hugh Capet, its Count and Governor, that he would greet him with a louder Litany than ever yet had reached his ears. Accordingly, assembling a great body of Priests upon Montmartre, he mingled his soldiers among them; and this anomalous Choir then chanted at the fullest stretch of their lungs, the Canticle of the Martyrs, "Hallelujah! the holy army of Martyrs praises Thee, O Lord!" There was not a roof in Paris which did not reecho the Hymn.

Satisfied with this idle bravado, the Emperor commenced his retreat; and in the passage of the river Aisne, his baggage and rear-guard being separated for one night from the main battle, were cut off by the French.† On the morrow, Otho despatched the Count of Ardenne with a challenge to Lothaire. It was proposed that the two armies should meet on equal terms, in an open plain, without advantage or artifice; Lothaire might choose the bank of the river on which the engagement should be fought, provided that party which had to cross received hostages from the other for the security of its passage. On hearing this defiance, Geoffroi Count of Anjou, a follower of Lothaire, gave a remarkable proof of the low estimation in which Royalty was held in France. "What need is there," he said, "to hazard the lives of so many brave men for the quarrel of two Kings? Let them descend into the field themselves and decide the combat; we will look on, and acknowledge the Conqueror as our Chief." The chivalrous loyalty of the German Count returned a dignified rebuke to this proposal of the Frenchman. He had respectively brother-in-law of Louis the Stutterer, and of Otho of Germany, and son-in-law of Edward of England.

* The flight of Otho and his Empress was so rapid, that Lothaire sat down to the dinner prepared for their repast; apud Imperatorem et fratrem suum pro prandio paratis refectis eaverunt. Guilelmus Naugius, ad ann.

† A very unusual miracle was worked on this occasion, according to the German Monkish Chronicles, by Udalric, Bishop of Augsberg, who accompanied Otho in his retreat. He led the Emperor and his army dry-shod across the Aisne, the waters standing apart as a wall, like those of the Red Sea. Unluckily, it seems, the good Bishop forgot the rear-guard.

Annals of France.
From
A. D. 686.
to
A. D. 1099.

War between Otho II. and Lothaire.
A. D. 975.

The Germans besieged the French army.

History.
From
A. D.
688. to
A. D.
1000.
950.
Death of Lothaire.
A. D.
968.

often heard, was his answer, that the French but lightly regarded their Kings, and the words just spoken convinced him that the charge was true. "We doubt not," he added, "that our Monarch would be victorious in single combat; but never will we stand by as quiet spectators while our Emperor is fighting; never shall it be said that we shrink from a peril to which he was exposed!"*

No further details of this War have reached us; but we know that Peace was concluded in 980; that on the demise of Otho II. Lothaire endeavoured to profit by the weakness of the minority of his successor and namesake; and that he himself died a few years afterwards. The short reign of his son, Louis V. le Paineant, was, as that title implies,† yet more inglorious than his own, and is equally without trustworthy record. Of the intrigues by which it was agitated no particulars remain, but from their result there can be little doubt that they were mainly directed by Hugh Capet. Louis became embroiled with his mother, Emma, who, even during the lifetime of her husband Lothaire, was openly accused of gallantries with Adalbéron, Bishop of Laon; and her son, a King in nothing but in name, and yet more unhappy in marriage ties than his Father,‡ after a reign of fourteen months, was poisoned by the hands of Blanche his Consort. At this point it will be convenient to pause before we commence the History of a new Dynasty.§

III. THE GERMAN ANNALS, during the period upon which we are about to enter, are so closely and so frequently interwoven with those of Italy, that in treating the History of the latter Country, we have already anticipated much of that of the former also. On the de-thronement of Charles the Fat, the Crown of Germany, as we have seen, was conferred, for the first time by Election, on Arnulf, a Bastard of Carloman of Bavaria, and thus illegitimately descended from Charlemagne. Much of the calamity which Europe afterwards endured from the Hungarians is to be attributed to the rash policy by which that Prince, not long after his accession, invited their hordes into Bohemia, a Duchy which he had granted to the Slavonian Chieftain Zundebold, by whom this increased power had been ungratefully employed to the detriment of his benefactor. The rebellious Vassal was punished; but the outpost into which the Barbarians had been thus incautiously admitted was steadily maintained, and afforded them unhappy facilities for their subsequent destructive inroads. The year following this first success of Arnulf was distinguished by one much greater over the Northmen; when, if the Annals of Fulda may be credited, 120,000 of those fierce invaders were chased into the river Dyle, near Louvain, and two of their Sea-kings were slain in battle.

* Balderici, Chron. l. 97. Meseray seems thoroughly ashamed of this incident by his attempt to pervert it. The Germans, he says, declined single combat for their Emperor, conferant par la tacite-ment qu'ils ne le croioient pas si brave que le Roy de France. Geoffroi of Anjou, known as le Grise-gonelle, from wearing a grey surcoat, notwithstanding his unworthy proposition, was a brave soldier; and had no far distinguished himself in the engagement at the Aisne, as to merit the hereditary dignity of Great Seneschal of France, nearly corresponding with that of Constable in later years.

† The native Historians, however, interpret le Paineant more as Jovencus qui nihil fecit, than as inefficax.

‡ It has been reported nevertheless by some authorities, that Lothaire was poisoned by Emma. Il y eutroit cependant de la tendresse à promettre avec cet infameux mystère, is the cautious remark of Velly.

§ For the reigns of the last three Carolingians, see the scanty materials in Bouquet, Recueil, tom. viii.

The Italian campaigns by which the succeeding years of this reign were occupied, and which led ultimately to Arnulf's death, need not be again related here. Upon his decease, through a reasonable fear lest the integrity of the German Kingdom might suffer by deviation from the natural line of succession, after a short demur, his son Louis III.,* although a child not more than seven years of age, was called to the throne. During his minority, the Government was administered by Otho Duke of Saxony, and Hatto† Archbishop of Mentz; to the latter of whom is attributed a foul act of treachery, for which a Roman Senate would have adjudged deserved retribution.‡ A feud between Conrad Count of Franconia, and Adelbert Marquess of Papenburg, led to the assassination of the former; and the murderer, having disobeyed the Royal citation when summoned to trial for this homicide, was besieged in his strong Castle of Bamberg. As the fortress resisted all efforts of the assailants, Hatto obtaining an interview with Adelbert, assured him of the clemency of the King if he would but solicit it in person, and pledged himself that he should return in safety to his Castle. Adelbert relying upon this promise, accompanied the Prelate on his way to the Royal Camp; but scarcely had they quitted Bamberg when Hatto, pleading fatigue, proposed that they should return awhile for refreshment. The Marquess readily consented without suspicion of his danger; and after entertaining his betrayer with hospitality within the walls of his Castle, renewed his expedition. On their arrival in the Camp of Louis, Adelbert was put in chains, condemned as a rebel and a traitor, and led out to the block. Before the headman performed his duty, the dying Noble expostulated with Hatto on his gross violation of faith; and he was answered, that on the contrary, faith had been kept inviolably, for that he had already been restored in safety to his Castle.§

The reign of Louis III. was principally spent in bloody and unsuccessful contests with the Hungarians; and when in his nineteenth year he died broken-hearted, as is said, by his reiterated defeats, and childless, (thus extinguishing in his person the direct German line of Charlemagne,) the vacant Crown was tendered to the late Regent, Otho. That high-minded and disinterested Prince, instead of accepting the dignified station thus

* Louis the Infant, as he was designated, is sometimes described as Louis IV., but improperly. His only predecessors of the same name on the German Throne, were Louis le Debonnaire I. and Louis le Germanique II.

† Hatto, perhaps, is only another form of Otho. The Etymologists trace it through Avra, which Festus says is a Thebanian word, to the Hebrew ṢṢ, Pater.

‡ Livy relates a perfidious subterfuge, similar to that of Hatto, practised by one of the Deputies whom the Roman prisoners taken at Cannæ despatched to solicit payment of their ransom. Hannibal, it seems, accepted their simple parole that they would return; and after the mission had failed, one of them did return stealthily to the Carthaginian Camp, but without appearing before his conquerors, or again surrendering himself. Having stifled conscience by this sophistical evasion, he took up his abode in Rome. But the Senate deemed more severely of the nature of an oath; and when the breach of faith was discovered, a unanimous vote determined that the virtual perjurer should be recovered to Hannibal in the custody of Public Officers. (xxi. 61.)

§ All the Chroniclers, except Regino and two of his copyists, agree in this disgraceful narrative. Some of them are not content without annexing a fearful judgment to Hatto's great iniquity; and they add, that after he had been killed by lightning, his body was borne away by the Devil to be plunged into the crater of Ætna; while the grisly carrier recited a Pentameter, but enough assuredly to be of his own composition:—

Sic peccata lues, sicque ruenda ruas.

Annals of Germany.
From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000.
Louis III.
A. D.
900.

Treachery of Archbishop Hatto.

History.

From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000.
Disinterested conduct of Otto Duke of Saxony.

Conrad of Franconia.
A. D.
911.

Contests with Henry Duke of Saxony.

offered to him, explained to the German Barons, who now arrogated to themselves the disposal of a Throne no longer hereditary, that the dangers of their Country required in her ruler a younger arm, and more active powers, than belonged to his advanced age; and, casting aside all remembrance of former private feuds which had divided the two families, he pressed upon their choice one of his bravest contemporaries, Conrad, son and successor of the lately-murdered Count of Franconia. The chief Lords of the Five Nations which then composed Germany, assented to this prudent counsel; and the Franks or inhabitants of Franconia and the modern Palatinate, the Suabians, the Bavarians, the Saxons who occupied Westphalia and Lower Saxony, and the Lorrainers on the left bank of the Rhine, elected Conrad their King at a General Assembly.

This elevation, however, of one whom the great Body of Nobility considered only as their peer, was regarded by many of them with no slight jealousy; and the throne which Conrad ascended was but insecurely founded. Not only was he often occupied, and for the most part, with ill success, in endeavouring to repel the Hungarians, but his reign was one continued struggle against the rebellion of his own discontented Feudatories. Charles the Simple, of France, appeared in arms to contest some districts on the Rhine; the Dukes of Bavaria, of Suabia, and of Lorraine were not curbed without open warfare. But his chief and most powerful enemy was Henry of Saxony, who had now succeeded to his Father's Duchy; and who, perhaps, lamented a decision which had transferred to the brows of another a Crown which might otherwise have graced his own. The transactions in the ensuing Civil contests are obscure; but we are told of a great victory won by Henry near Merseburg, in which so bloody was the carnage, that the Saxons, in derision, expressed a doubt whether Hell was large enough to contain the huge number of Franks whom they had sent thither in one day. When open force proved ineffectual to deliver Conrad from this potent rival, it is said that the treacherous arts of Hatto were again employed; and that Henry narrowly escaped destruction from the snares of the wily Prelate.* It is not easy, however, to reconcile the latest acts of Conrad's life with a supposition that he was privy to any treacherous design against Henry. After eight years of turbulent rule, perceiving the approach of death, he summoned his chief Lords about his couch, and earnestly recommended them to choose the Duke of Saxony as his successor; at the same time impressing upon his own brother, Eberhard, the impolicy of advancing any claim for himself; and commissioning him to bear the Regalia, as his last bequest, to Henry.

The German Nobles assented; Eberhard obeyed the dying injunctions of his Brother; and it is probable that the great abilities, the eminent valour, the superior fortunes, and the increasing power of Duke Henry had worked conviction in all parties, that the Saxon predominance could no longer be successfully resisted.

The new King, when he received the announcement of Conrad's death and his own election, was engaged in his favourite amusement of Hawking, a pastime affording him title, The Fowler, by which he is best known in History.† The early years of the reign of this Founder of the Saxon Dynasty were passed in a successful opposition to the claims of Charles the Simple upon Lorraine, a territory which Henry may be considered to have annexed definitively to Germany;‡ and in repressing the turbulent spirit of his own haughty Vassals. A fortunate incident enabled him also to suspend the hostilities of the Hungarians; and in the end he acquired sufficient strength to chastise them with unexampled severity. During one of those overwhelming inroads before which the King, unable to maintain himself in the field, on account of paucity of numbers and want of discipline in his troops, had retreated, or almost fled, into Westphalia, chance threw into his hands a prisoner of distinguished rank and estimation among the Barbarians. To their lavish proffers of ransom Henry perseveringly refused assent; and the liberty of the captive could be purchased on no other terms than a solemn compact of Truce, and a remission of tribute during nine years.‡ The interval of repose thus gained from an enemy too powerful to be resisted at the moment, was employed in wise and most salutary measures. Soldiers were diligently levied and trained; and their military education was so conducted as not to interfere either with Agriculture or other Civil duties. The cares of Henry were next directed to the regulation of internal Police, and to the extinction of a wild banditti which the long disturbed state of Germany had permitted to grow within its bosom, and whose lawless ranks were not unfrequently headed by leaders of

* So states a writer upon whose single authority, as will here be seen in the cases of Otto II. and III., no great reliance is to be placed, Godfrey of Viterbo, (op. Struvii Corque Germ. i. 216.) But he is supported in this instance very generally. The point is scarcely worth inquiry, or other reasons might be produced for this title.

† Lorraine was afterwards divided by the German Emperors into Upper, or the Duchy of Moselle, sometimes known singly as the Duchy of Lorraine; and Lower, or the Duchy of Lothiers, or Brabant.

‡ A remarkable Duel was fought on horseback during this negotiation. Craco, a Goliath among the Hungarians, had repeatedly challenged the whole German Camp without meeting any champion to accept battle for exclusive of his gigantic strength and stature he was reputed to possess magical powers, and by some diabolical agency to have blinded no less than forty opponents before slaying them. At length, a townsman of Ratisbon, Haas Dollinger by name, then lying under sentence for treason, undertook the combat on promise of a free pardon. He was twice unhorsed without being hurt, and in the third encounter, by directing his lance adroitly under the Giant's ear, he wounded him mortally. Of the spoils, which were suspended in the Cathedral at Munster, the helmet weighed 20 lbs., the cuirass was made of an elephant's hide covered with iron scales, and the sword measured 7½ feet in length. Charles V. removed these arms; but a monument attesting Dollinger's victory is said still to exist in his house near the Hôtel de Ville at Ratisbon. (Baize, Hist. d'Allemagne, iii. 313.)

• The story is related by Wittekind, but not by any means clearly. Hatto, he says, invited the Duke of Saxony to a banquet, with the intention of securing his person; and among other presents calculated to disarm his guest's suspicion, he ordered a skilful workman to provide a rich chain of gold. One day the Archbishop, while inspecting the progress of this trinket, sighed deeply; and explained, in return to the inquiry of the goldsmith, that his grief arose from a knowledge that the chain upon which he was employed, when finished, would cost the life of one so excellent and so dear to him as Henry of Saxony. The artist made no observation at the moment, but having finished his task, found an opportunity of relating the occurrence to Duke Henry, who reproached the Archbishop with his intended perfidy, and declined the proposed interview. (Ibid. i. p. 636.) We need not comment upon the inconsistencies and improbabilities of this story. Matthis, without adducing any authority, implies that the chain was to catch and strangle its victim; but how it is by no means easy to conjecture. Henrico vice insidias struere per tergum aureum, quæ sic adornabitur ut et Henricum caperet, cuiusq; occideret. (Theatrum Hist. p. 861.) And the Authors of the Universal History do not diminish the perplexity when they aver that the treachery was to have been executed by means of a poisoned golden bracelet.

Annals of Germany.
From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000.
The Illustration of Saxony
Henry I.
The Fowler
A. D.
911.

True with the illustration.
A. D.
911.

True with d'Ann.

ancient stock and gentle blood. Those bold and daring spirits who either anarchy or necessity had marshalled against their natural Country were now allured by promises of amnesty to become her foremost defenders; and being established, by grants of land, on the frontiers under the government of Marquisses, they raised a powerful bulwark against future invasion. Then, in order to prepare the military population which he had created for the great struggle likely to ensue on the termination of the Hungarian armistice, he instituted martial games, and a species of tournament; and directed numerous expeditions against minor enemies; so that the Poles, the Lorrainers, the Slavonians, the Bohemians, the Danes, and the Abotrites, (a Heathen People on the confines of Bulgaria whom he converted to Christianity,) each in turn afforded employment and encouragement to his armies. Nor were the more peculiar works of Peace neglected; numerous towns were repaired, beautified, or strengthened by fortification, and from this reign may be dated the origin of those distinguished places than Goslar and Quedlinburg.* This prepared on all sides, Henry awaited without alarm the approaching close of the Truce; and when the Hungarian Chiefs sent an embassy demanding renewal of tribute, the assembled Saxons raised their right arms to Heaven, in token of fidelity to their Prince and of indignation against their foe, and the Barbarian Envoys, dismissed not only with refusal but with insult, were instructed to deliver to their Commanders a mangy dog with cropped ears and tail, as the only tribute to be expected for the future. Roused by this unlooked for dishonour, the Hungarians poured in at once upon opposite frontiers, denouncing the extremity of vengeance, and menacing extermination to every Saxon of either sex above ten years of age. But their progress was unexpectedly checked, partly by the sword, partly by rigour of climate, partly by famine; and the host which had entered the Western Provinces, wasted away slowly and miserably, after a short and savage plunder of Alsace and Lorraine. In the East their overthrow was more rapid, complete, and signal. Dispirited by tidings of the ill fortune of their comrades, and alarmed by a vigorous march of Henry to the relief of Merseburg which they had invested, they hastily abandoned their camp, and commenced a straggling and disorderly retreat. The Germans occupied the abandoned position, released such of their fellow-countrymen as were prisoners, and eagerly pressed forward in pursuit. "It was then," says Luitprand,† "that you might hear from the Christian ranks the holy and marvellous shout of 'Lord! Lord!' while on the other side the flying Heathen raised the foul and devilish war-whoop of 'Hui! Hui!'" Henry had instructed his soldiers on no account to break their line till after they had received the first volley of arrows; and this fell harmless on the impenetrable wall presented by their shields, locked together in the foremost rank and covering their whole bodies. So rapid was the charge which instantly succeeded that not a second arrow could be placed on the bowstring; and the Savages were thus deprived of the advantage of their favourite weapon. Forty thousand Hungarians are related to have fallen on the plain of Keuschberg; a name which marks the field of battle to the present hour; and which has been thought to bear no less testimony to the high moral purity, than the victory itself does to the distinguished valour of the Conqueror.*

A solemn Thanksgiving evinced the pious gratitude of Henry for this most splendid triumph, and such Artists as the times afforded were employed to record its memory on the walls of the Banqueting Chamber in his Palace at Merseburg. More than twenty Churches and numerous other Religious establishments are believed to have been founded under the auspices of this great and energetic Prince; who, devout after the manner of his Age, ascribed his victories chiefly to the virtue of a Lance studded with nails from the True Cross. That instimable relic, once possessed by Constantine the Great, had become, we know not how, the property of Rodolph of Burgundy; and from him, as a most coveted prize, Henry had succeeded in wringing it, partly by menaces, partly by solicitations, and yet more by a cession of territory.† At length having freed his Kingdom both from domestic and foreign peril, he resolved to assert his right to the well-earned Crown of the Empire; and for that purpose he mediated an expedition to Rome; but the completion of his design was arrested by death, and reserved for his successor. After a reign of seventeen years, employed no less to the solid benefit of his Country than to the permanent establishment of his own fame, Henry the Fowler was struck by paralysis, and having first secured the approbation of his Nobles to the succession of his eldest son Otho, he expired at Mansleben in the sixtieth year of his age.

The Coronation of Otho I. was celebrated with peculiar solemnity at Aix la Chapelle, and the details of its ceremonial, involving many points curiously illustrative of the Political State of Germany at the time, may be found given with unusual precision in the Chronicle of Wittenburg.‡ Although Otho succeeded to a flourishing Kingdom, not inherited, as his Father's dying words impressed upon him, from a long line of Ancestors, but acquired by that Father, through God's assistance;§ and although the power so delivered to him received at his hands large increase both of strength and glory, his reign presents an almost uninterrupted

Annals of Germany
From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000.

The Lance of Constantine.

Death of Henry the Fowler.

Otho I. the Great.
A. D.
936.

* Dieux Name Keuschberg in dem Berge und Feldlager geboren ex accidentis, nemlich, das der Kaiser in sein castrum dem wälschlich Weib zu sijn leiden wolle, dem zuvor ist derselb Ort des Feld-lagers mit dem Darff darunter gelegen Riede genant. Struvius, who cites the above passage from the Chronicle of Brothum, (i. 15.) is inclined, however, to think Keuschberg is a corruption from Künigberg, (i. 229.)

† Sigebertus, ad ann. 929. Luitprand, iv. 12. Otho the Great is said by Raimulphus to have presented this Lance to Albeistan of England in 963; a fact which may reasonably be doubted, since Otho himself was likely to entertain full belief of its supernatural efficacy, as we shall soon perceive, at Augsburg. But the writers De Cruce express great misgiving respecting the genuineness of the pretended Nails. Not more than four of these are allowed to have existed at any time; and Cornelius Curtius justly remarks, that the Lance of Constantine, as commonly described, would more than exhaust that number; quaternum Clavum matrum numerum exhaustis primis, ut quos in Lanced collocant auctores, plures Cruces componantur. Id. de Cruce Dominici, 99.)

‡ Id. ib.

§ Id. ib.

* The abhorrence of Cities which Tacitus ascribes to the Germans long endured among them. Nullo Germanorum populo Urbes habitari nisi notum est; ne post quidem inter se junctas urbes. Colunt divitiis, atque divitiis. (Germ. 16.) Thus, in a later Age, Ammianus Marcellinus does not notice a single German City; and the names recorded by Ptolemy (ii. 11.) must be considered those of villages only. One of Henry's provisions for increasing the population of his Cities was a stipulation that every ninth peasant should form part of his garrisons, and assist in building. (Annal. Sax. ad ann. 927.)

† Id. ib.

VOL. XI.

History.

From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000

War with his brother,
Henry of Brunswick.

Reconcil
tion.

A. D.
942.

Rebellions of Lasharba

A. D.
951.

A. D.
953.

His death

A. D.
957

War with Bohemia.

A. D.
950 with the Hungarians.

A. D.
955.

series of Civil or Foreign warfare. It would be equally tedious and unprofitable were we to dwell on the numerous contests in which he was involved with the Feudatories of his Crown; and it may suffice to say, that the early part of his reign was disturbed by a long and painful struggle with his Brother, Henry Duke of Brunswick, whom evil advisers persuaded to assert a claim to the throne, on the weak ground that he was born after his Father's accession; an advantage (if it were such) not belonging to Otho, on account of the very primogeniture which had secured his relection. Frustrated in numerous daring attempts, and reduced to extremity, Henry at length threw himself at his Brother's feet, in a mourning habit, and solicited pardon for his rebellion. By the undeviating fidelity of the remainder of his life, he deserved the clemency with which he was received; and his reward was investiture with the Duchy of Bavaria, in which Otho, by a remarkable exercise of prerogative, refused to confirm the sons of a former Duke.

A yet more distressing and unnatural struggle awaited Otho with his eldest son Ludolph. That Prince, the issue of his first marriage with Editha, daughter of Edmund King of England, had been nominated by his Father to the succession; but cherishing, or affecting some idle fear that a second marriage might impeach his right, when Otho received the hand of Adelaide with the Kingdom of Italy as her portion, he retired from Court in disgust, threw himself into the arms of the discontented Bavarians and Lorrainers, and collected round him a knot of conspirators in his residence at Saalfeld. Before the plot which he meditated had ripened, it was suppressed by the vigilance of Otho, whom it recalled from his first successes in Italy. But Ludolph, impenetrable by his Father's gentleness, no sooner gathered strength afresh than he occupied Mentz with a considerable force, and even gave battle to the Royal army, in a spot between that City and Ratibon.* The Rebels were defeated, and Ludolph for a while escaped pursuit and punishment by leaguings with the Hungarians; till, destitute of all hope of further resistance, he found an opportunity for reconciliation, by placing himself unexpectedly in Otho's path, as he was hunting near Saalfeld, and avowing the deepest and most heartfelt penitence. Those protestations, however, were the result more of necessity than of conviction; for ere long he renewed his intrigues, and passing into Italy, either to escape discovery, or to obtain facilities for his treason, he was prevented from a repetition of open violence only by a death which can scarcely be deemed untimely.

Fourteen years of war, conducted with various fortune, were necessary for the entire reduction of Bohemia to obedience. The King, Bodislavus, had wrested the Crown from a murdered Brother, and had defeated the first armies despatched to contest his usurpation; nor was it until Otho found leisure to march against him in person, that he was completely subdued and rendered tributary. The Hungarians also, although awhile restrained by their great defeat in the preceding reign, continued their molestations wherever a point appeared vulnerable; and few years elapsed during which some Province of the Kingdom failed to suffer from their irruptions. At length, fully recruited in strength and burning for revenge, they deluged Bavaria with a mighty host than had ever before taken the field under their Leaders. "Unless the sky shall fall and overwhelm us," was their proud boast as they advanced, "or the Earth shall gape and swallow us up quick, who are they that may compete with us in numbers?" It was on the banks of the Lech, near Augsburg, that Otho encountered the Barbarians. On the first day,† a large Body of the enemy having crossed the river unperceived, fell suddenly on the German baggage and camp stores, and routed three out of the eight battalions into which Otho had distributed his army; till the valour of his son-in-law, Conrad of Franconia, rallied the fugitives, and restored order. Ere sunrise on the following morning, the Festival of St. Laurence, Otho, prostrating himself on the ground, confessed, with many tears, that it was on account of his own sins that the late reverse had been suffered; and he then vowed, if he were successful in the ensuing fight, to endow a Bishopric at Merseburg, and to dedicate as a Religious House a Palace which he had recently commenced building in that City. Then, having heard Mass and communicated, he armed himself with his buckler and the holy Lance of Constantine; and briefly encouraging his followers, plunged into the hostile ranks. The Hungarians fought resolutely, till surprised, wearied, and overpowered by the obstinate fury of the Germans, they betook themselves to indiscriminate flight; and were either drowned in attempting to swim over the Lech, or burned or put to the sword as they sought refuge in the neighbouring villages. No mercy was asked or even expected; none indeed was likely to be accorded to those by whom the exercise of that virtue had been wholly unpractised; and death, without regard to dignity or station, was ultimately the lot of those whom the sword had neglected during the battle and pursuit. Three even of their Princes, who had been taken prisoners, were ignominiously hanged at Ratisbon. Never before had so great a blow been inflicted on the power of the Hungarians, and never afterwards did it recover from this overthrow. On the part of the Germans the field had not been gained without much bloodshed; and among the slain was included the intrepid Conrad, by whom the ill fortune of the first day had been retrieved; he was pierced by an arrow while he raised his vizor for a few moments in order to gain breath. But the spirit of the Hungarians was for ever broken; we hear no more of them as the scourge and the terror of Europe; and thus twice severely taught that they were not irresistible, they subsided into peaceful neighbours, and became gradually imbued with civilization.

Of Otho's chastisement of the Danes, the Sclavonians,

* The threat of the ancient Scythians to Darius, when they sent him the symbolical Bird, Mouse, Frog and Arrows, is somewhat of the same character with this boast of the Hungarians; but, in the former instance, the Scythians were the aggrieved party, in the latter the Hungarians were aggressors. Ἦν ἡ ἀνδρῶν γυναικῶν ἀποκτείνεσθαι ἢ εἰς οὐρανὸν, ἢ ἰσπερ, ἢ καὶ γυναικῶν αὐτῶν καὶ τοὺς πατέρας, εἰ βασιλεὺς γυναικῶν ἢ τοὺς λαοὺς ἐκτελέσειεν, οὐκ ἀντιστάμενοι ἰσίου, οὐδ' εὐθὺς τὸν τελευτῆσαν βαλλόμενοι. Herod. iv. 132.

† All modern accounts which we have seen of the Battle of Augsburg, even that of Gibbon, whom it is not easy to detect in inaccuracy, treat it as only of one day's continuance. Dittmar, however, whom we have followed, (lib. i. p. 332.) plainly distributes it into two days; on the first, the Germans are thrown into confusion and saved by Conrad; on the second—posterior die, id est, in Festivitate Christi Martiris Laurentii—Otho achieves his splendid triumph.

† Sumpit Rex elepeum Lanced cum sacer. Ditmar, ibid.

* Horsedat, or Rossada!, as it is named by the Chroniclers.

History. and the Abotrites, we cannot afford more than a passing mention. His transactions with France and the Greek Empire, and his brilliant career in Italy, which annexed the Imperial dignity for ever to the German Crown, have been sufficiently detailed in former pages; and we hasten to the close of a long, glorious, and beneficial reign,* which has deservedly ranked Otho THE GREAT among those few Sovereigns for whom the voice of an impartial Posterity has retained, in its fullest meaning, a title, in too many instances bestowed solely by the adulation of Contemporaries. Not long after his return from his last expedition to Italy, Otho celebrated the Festival of Easter with unusual magnificence at Quedlinberg; and the list of the Ambassadors who on that occasion were present at his Court, furnishes no inadequate estimate of his extensive power and reputation. Among the splendid train which surrounded his throne, were counted Envoys from Greece, Rome and most other Italian Cities, Denmark, Hungary, Schlonia, Bulgaria, Poland, Russia, and Bohemia. A few weeks afterwards he died tranquilly, and with marks of the most sincere devotion, after an illness of a few hours, with which he was attacked while attending Vespers. His remains were interred by those of his English Consort Editha, in the Cathedral of Magdeburg; where the original tomb, having survived even the fury of Tilly, still notifies the spot in which reposes the First, and one of the best and wisest Emperors by whom the single sceptre of Germany has been swayed.

Otho II. But little interest attaches to domestic transactions in the reign of Otho II. He maintained a successful struggle with his cousin, Henry of Bavaria, known in History by the title of the Quarreller, and son of that Henry of Brunswick who had similarly contested the throne with his Father; and he was engaged in other Civil dissensions and petty struggles during the five years which preceded his inglorious War with France. With his still more inglorious Calabrian expedition and his subsequent death,† the Reader is already acquainted.

Otho III. During the minority of Otho III., who on his Father's death succeeded to the Empire, in the twelfth year of his age, Henry of Bavaria renewed his ambitious designs upon the Crown, obtained possession of the Infant's person, and claimed the Regency, till a strong effort of the other German Princes released their Sovereign from this thralldom. A brief quarrel with Lothaire King of France, who seemed willing to revive his pretensions to the long-contested territory of Lorraine, and successful expeditions against the Danes and Slavonians, are the sole Political incidents of this reign unconnected with Italy. To the devout spirit by which,

* The discovery of the gold and silver mines of Goslar, from which Saxony derived great wealth and importance, is usually referred to the year 968.

† The death of Otho II. is sometimes attributed to a far more marvellous cause than those which we have before mentioned; namely, either a wound received in battle, or the chagrin consequent upon his defeat by the Greeks, and the sarcastic triumph of his Empress Theophania at that victory of her Countrymen. He is said to have heard that, on Mount Gangara, a nightly service was celebrated by Angels, who forbade the presence of any mortal. His curiosity being greatly excited, he consulted the Pope, who advised him by no means to tempt the prohibited Assembly. In spite of that sage counsel he rashly hazarded the adventure. The Angels forgave the intrusion; but, for the omission of some rite which he had neglected to perform, they bent him so severely, that he died a few days after his return to Rome. (Fragmentum Urbinianum, tom. ii. p. 32. cited by Struvius, i. 260.)

as we have already intimated, Otho III. was imbued, the discovery of the Tomb of Charlemagne is attributed by the Chroniclers. In the first year of the XIth Century, the Emperor was warned by a dream to disinter the remains of the great Carolingian Prince, which were known to be buried somewhere in Aix la Chapelle, although the precise spot was forgotten. After three days' preparation by Fasting, Otho pointed to a stone in the pavement of the Church of the Virgin, as resembling that which had been shown him in his vision; and on its removal, within a vaulted crypt which it concealed, the body of Charlemagne was desecrated. It was wholly uncorrupted, sitting on a golden throne, girt with a sword of the same precious metal, the head circled with a jewelled diadem, the right hand bearing a golden sceptre. This gorgeous figure having been publicly exhibited, was deposited, with much pomp, in a magnificent shrine erected for the purpose, in the body of the Church; which soon, as may be readily imagined, obtained considerable repute for miracles.* Such is the meagre record of Otho III., whose early death without issue transferred the Imperial Crown, as we shall perceive on renewing its Annals, to a junior branch of the Saxon Family.

IV. The intricate and perplexed Annals of SPAIN during its possession by the Arabs, have been left by us in greater arrear than those of any other leading European State, and we revert to them with little hope of presenting any distinct and lucid narrative. So obscure indeed and beset with difficulties is this subject, that the Jesuit Abarca, one of the most esteemed native writers, has not hesitated to confess, that although he had laboured indefatigably, during forty years, in the dark labyrinth of Controversial Divinity, he had trodden no path in that tortuous and mazy pursuit from which he felt so hopeless of extrication, as from the one presented to him by early Spanish History.†

The point at which our narrative recommences is the elevation of the fugitive Ommeidan Abdalrahman, the 1st of that name, (Addikhil, or The Enterer, as he is termed,) to the Khalifate of Cordova. A few years enabled him to reduce the whole of Andalusia under his dominion, by the overthrow of the Abassidan Emir Jusuf; to procure the recognition of his Sovereignty by all the districts of Spain which had hitherto submitted to the Moslem arms; and even to render Froila King of Asturias his tributary. The title Emir-al-moumenin, or as it has been corrupted, Miramamol, or Miramotin, Commander of the Faithful, which he assumed,‡ evinced his claim no less to the Spiritual than to the Temporal prerogative of the Khalifs, the true Vicars of the Prophet; and in his magnificence he fully equalled any even of his Oriental predecessors. Harassed by perpetual revolts of his Mohammedan subjects; defeated at Pontumo by Froila, with the loss of more than 50,000 men, whom he had despatched under Omar, one of his

* Ditmar, iv. p. 357. The Authors of the Universal History reject the above incident as fabulous; and ask how so rich a booty, if it really existed, could have escaped the pillage of the Northmen, by whom Aix la Chapelle had been sacked since the burial of Charlemagne? To that objection Ditmar affords a very sufficient answer; velut ante oblitiscantur ignorabatur locus certus ubi quiescerat.

† L'Art de vérifier les Dates, i. 734.
‡ Id. i. 736. IV Hævel, et c. And. states, that this title was not assumed by the Khalifs of Cordova till the reign of Abdalrahman III.

Annals of Spain.

From A. D. 883. to A. D. 1000.

Discovery of the remains of Charlemagne. A. D. 1000.

A. D. 1002.

IV. Inadequacy of early Spanish History

A. D. 756. Abdalrahman I.

A. D. 760

History.

From
A. D.
889. to
A. D.
1000.
778.

His magnificent embellishment of Cordova.

Generals, for the reduction of Galicia; and invaded by Charlemagne, who wrested from him the Spanish March between the Ebro and the Pyrenees; Abdalrahman nevertheless has perpetuated his memory by the sumptuous embellishment of Cordova, and by numerous useful Public works, for the construction of which a long period of profound tranquillity would scarcely have sufficed under a less energetic Prince. The embankments which he raised in order to restrain those frequent inundations by which the Guadalquivir devastated the level neighbourhood of his Capital, were ornamented with extensive and luxuriant gardens; and in some measure to gratify the longing appetite for objects to which his youth had been accustomed in far distant climes, a passion clearly indicating a generous and affectionate temper, he planted in the centre of those pleasant walks the first Palm tree known in Spain, the parent stock of the many similar groves which now adorn it.† Eulonis of the devotion with which the Abasides had rivalled in Bagdad the splendour of the Mosque of Damascus, and of the Alakea at Jerusalem, he founded also in Cordova that Mezquita which, from the vastness of its extent, the costliness of its materials, and the beauty of their workmanship, after the lapse of ten Centuries, cannot be viewed, even in the moiety still existing as a Christian Church, without delight and admiration. The plan of that magnificent edifice is said to have been designed by the pencil of its founder; who in order both to evince his proud or pious humility, and to stimulate the diligence of the workmen, personally laboured among them for an hour every day. Police, Education, the due administration of Justice and the equitable collection of revenue, occupied other portions of the care of this great Prince, who after a reign of more than thirty years of glory transmitted to his son, Al Hakem I., a Kingdom which derived from himself almost all its power, its splendour, and its opulence.

Al Hakem I.
A. D.
796.

Alfonso II.
the Chaste.
A. D.
791.

The feeble successors of Froila on the throne of Oviedo, Aurelio, Silo, Mauregato, and Bermudo I.,—scarcely deserve record, and we pass on to the reign of Alfonso II., or the CHASTE as he is called, more per-

* Mariana states that it was Jomif who was defeated by Froila at Pontorno, and that he was so far weakened by his losses on that occasion, as to be compelled to submit to Abdalrahman. (vil. 4.) But Roderic of Toledo, (ix.) and other authorities more to be trusted than Mariana, consider the Battle to have been fought with Omar. Froila employed the greater part of the spoil of this victory in the construction of the City of Oviedo, which he founded as a bulwark for the plain country. It soon became the Capital of the Spanish Christian Kingdom, which thenceforward is known more generally as the Kingdom of Oviedo than of ASTURIAS.

† Conde, Historia de la Dominacion de los Arabes en España, i. p. 147. Partie II. cap. 9. has translated from the Arabic (unhappily he has thought it necessary to torture them into his own Spanish versification) some very touching lines upon this Palm, written by the Khalif himself. Much as they must suffer by a second translation, and that into Prose, we give them below, borrowing our version, as we believe, from the pen of an accomplished Poet, more conversant than any other contemporary with Spanish Literature. "Fair Palm tree, thou also art a stranger here! The gentle air of Algarbe court and kiss thee. Thy roots are fixed in a fertile soil; thy head is erected towards Heaven; but thou too wouldst shed tears of bitterness, if, like me, thou couldst look back! But thou feelest not, as I do, the calamities of Fortune. I wept under the Palms which the Furiat waters, when my unhappy fate and the cruelty of the Abasides compelled me to forsake what I so dearly loved. The Trees and the Rivers have forgotten my sorrows, and thou, my beloved Country, retainest no remembrance of me! but never shall I cease to lament for thee." Foreign Quarterly Review, No. I. p. 24. On Conde's History.

haps in derision than in honour.* It was in his time that Louis the Debonnaire, then King of Aquitaine, gathered his first laurels under the walls of Barcelona. His chief opponent in that long and perilous siege, if we believe the Chroniclers, was a leader immortalized in Romance, Marsilio King of Saragossa: yet it must not be dissembled that the existence of any such personage is reasonably mistrusted; and that Abilemelec, the son of Omar, upon whom Abdalrahman had bestowed the Government of Saragossa and of all Eastern Spain, the most probable type of the Hero of Ariosto, was dead long before the expedition of Louis.† The general and almost unvarying texture of the Annals both of Christian and Moslem Spain during many succeeding years, consists of destructive but inconclusive conflicts between the rival Kingdoms; in which losses are extenuated and advantages exaggerated, according to the National prejudices of the particular writer. Exclusive of this savage and uninteresting warfare, the reign of Al Hakem I. is unhappily distinguished also by unintermitted revolt in the Khalifate; the suppression of which compelled him to numerous acts of frightful severity, and entailed upon his memory the title of The Cruel. Under his successor Abdalrahman II. (Alausat, The Middle, as he is distinguished from his son II. a common enemy hitherto unknown either to Spaniards or Arabians, interrupted their mutual discord; and the Northmen, little regarding whom they ravaged so as booty was obtained, appeared with a Fleet of sixty vessels off the coast of Portugal, occupied Lisbon, penetrated the Guadalquivir, and advancing to the walls of Seville, plundered and destroyed its suburbs.‡ No sooner had that tempest passed away, than Abdalrahman, affecting to attribute it to the intrigues of Ramiro, King of Oviedo, marched with a vast army upon the modern Provinces of Burgos and Soria. The Battle which ensued is memorable in Spanish History, on account of its connection with a long-enduring superstition. On the first day, the hasty levies of the Christian host withstood the more numerous and better disciplined Arabs, not without much loss and difficulty; and during the following night, Ramiro, occupying a rising ground, prepared his shattered forces for combat on the morrow with little hope of escaping destruction. A well-timed stratagem, however, fired the Spaniards with invincible enthusiasm. Waking from a brief sleep snatched on the field, the King declared to his astonished followers that he had been visited by St. Jago in a dream, who bade him be of good cheer, since he might calculate upon certain victory. The rumour of this supernatural warning spread rapidly and joyously through the lines; and while the fervour of his troops was still freshly kindled by the marvellous announcement, Ramiro gave the signal for attack, and led them to the charge, under the war-cry so well known afterwards in the History of Spain, Santiago y cierra España!§ Imaginations thus exalted by belief in a pro-

Amich of Spain.
From
A. D.
985. to
A. D.
1000.
King of Biscaya.
A. D.
801.

Abbasid.
A. D.
621.
Invasion
of the Northmen.
A. D.
843.

Ramiro I.
A. D.
820.

Battle of Covadonga.
A. D.
844.
Miracle of St. Jago.

* Voltaire, who never cites any authority, differs from most other writers in the reason which he assigns for this title. Mauregato, he says, had consented to pay an annual tribute of a hundred Spanish maidens for the Scraggle of Abdalrahman; and Alfonso refused this cruel and dishonourable mark of servitude. Sur les Maures, ch. xxvii. † Conde, i. p. 198. note. Partie II. cap. 12.
‡ The Arabs declared that these Magicres, or sons of Magic, (see note, p. 470.) did not spare old men, women, children, or even domestic animals. Conde, i. p. 283. Partie II. cap. 46.
§ St. James and close Spain! The body of St. Jago had been discovered in 808. It was found in a tomb under a small hermitage in the depths of a wood, upon the site of which now stands the History. digy, and yet further stimulated by the heat and tumult of Battle, were little likely to reject any further invention however gross and palpable: and it was readily credited, when once asserted, that the Apostle James himself, mounted on a white steed, and waving a white banner blazoned with a red Cross, headed the onset, and personally combated for his votaries. Sixty thousand Moslems perished on the field or in flight; and the spoil of this brilliant and most unexpected Victory of Clavijo, so named from a town of which it ensured the capture, was devoted to the erection of two Churches at Oviedo. In those structures the Apostle was without share; but Ramiro further subjected every acre of land throughout his dominions to a yearly tribute of wine and oil for St. Jago; and he vowed also a horseman's portion in every future booty, as an offering to the Holy Champion under whose auspices none but a Heretic would refuse to believe that he had been miraculously delivered and triumphant.*

From A. D. 888. to A. D. 1000. The frequent victories of Alfonso III., the next but one Asturian King in succession to Ramiro, during a rule extending over nearly fifty years, obtained for him the title of The Great. The City of Toledo, perpetually in revolt from its Moslem Lords, was often bloodily contested by the Christians, and more than one Lieutenant of the Khalifs endeavoured to establish himself independently within its walls. Notwithstanding the general success of Alfonso's arms, it was during his reign that the Khalif Mohammed was sufficiently powerful to extort by Treaty from the imbecility of Charles the Bald of France a cession of the Spanish March, which had been held by his Crown for nearly a Century. The rivalry which endured for more than twenty-five years between Mohammed and Alfonso terminated but with the death of the former, and the high deserts of the Great Asturian Monarch were evilly rewarded in his latter days. A rebellion of his son Garcia was suppressed only by the imprisonment of the offender; and so great was the consequent disaffection of the Spaniards, that the aged King, in order to satisfy his fickle and thankless subjects, abdicated in favour of the ambitious youth. No higher testimony need be offered of Alfonso's unstained honour, of his wisdom, valour, and generosity, than is afforded by the remarkable fact that, two years after his resignation of the Crown, he was intrusted by the King his son with the command of a powerful army; and returning from his expedition with his customary success and laden with spoil, he died full of glory and of years while wintering at Zamora. His memory is perpetuated by a better title to the knowledge and the gratitude of Posterity than could arise from any slaughter of the Mohammedans; and one of the best of the few guides which we possess through the dark period of the two Centuries preceding his reign, is a Chronicle from his pen, commencing at the death of Wamba and terminating at his own accession.

The splendour of the Khalifate of Cordova was raised to its height by Abdalrahman III., (Annâsir Lidinillâh, or The Defender of the true Faith.) a Prince upon whose heroic qualities the Arabian writers delight to dwell. When a boy he gave ample promise of his future greatness; at eight years of age, he could repeat the Koran by heart; (that favourite attainment, as it would seem, of every Moslem youth destined to eminence in after life; for there are few of their Worthies concerning whom a similar feat is not recorded;) he knew all the traditions of the Sunnites, the Proverbs of the Arabians, and the best pieces of his National Poetry; he managed a horse with unrivalled dexterity, was fleet beyond all competition in the race, threw the javelin with unerring aim, and excelled in every other manly exercise. Ascending the throne in the flower of his age, he speedily plunged into contest both with the Asturian Princes, (who, in the reign of Ordonno II., assumed the title of Kings of Leon, in consequence of a transfer of their Court from Oviedo to that City,) and with those of Navarre; a State now rising into considerable power. The hardy mountaineers of that Country, reduced by Charlemagne, had asserted their independence under the weak rule of Charles the Bald, when they first advanced their Counts of Pampeluna to the dignity of Kings, in the person, as is generally believed, of Garcia Jimenes. Over the joint forces of these two Powers, Abdalrahman obtained a signal victory near the Gold mines in the valley at Junquera; and during the few years not of repose, but of superiority, which that Battle won for him in Spain, he directed his arms to the invasion of Africa. The possession of Fez for a few short months was gained with difficulty; and the Fatimites took full vengeance for that dishonour by a bloody massacre on its recovery. To the prosecution of Abdalrahman's ambitious hopes in another Continent, the Christian Monarchies of Spain were indebted for preservation; and the force, which if concentrated against Leon and Navarre might have rendered them for ever tributary to the Khalifate, perhaps have incorporated them with its dominion, was exhausted by unavailing struggles on the opposite shores of the Mediterranean. Yet in spite of that great waste of life, not less than 100,000 men, veterans, well armed and disciplined, were gathered at Salamanca when the Khalif undertook the siege of Zamora. Seven circles of walls, a double fosse, and the bravery of an adequate garrison, enabled that City to maintain itself till King Ramiro II. descended from the mountains to its relief, with a force not unequal to that of the Arabians. Abdalrahman broke up with his main body to prevent the approach of the enemy, and in the plain of Simancas, on the banks of a small tributary of the Douro, was fought a murderous and fiercely contested engagement of two days' continuance, (one having intervened between them in consequence of a panic occasioned in both armies by an Eclipse of the Sun, which occurred on the first,) in which the Christians assert a complete victory, and the Muslims admit a drawn battle. Zamora was taken and retaken; and in a second action on the Douro, the Chroniclers on each Annals of Spain.

From A. D. 858. to A. D. 1000.

Abdalrahman III.

A. D. 912.

A. D. 914.

Erection of the Kingdom of Navarre.
A. D. 857.

Defeat of the Spaniards at Junquera.
A. D. 921.

Abdalrahman invades Africa.
A. D. 938.

Battle of Simancas, August 8.
A. D. 938.

City of Compostella; and the spot was revealed by the nightly descent of lights and Angels. Herreiras relates the fact with most unflinching gravity. (Part iv. sec. 9. ad ann.)

* The miracle belonging to the Battle of Clavijo is avouched by Mariana, (vil. 6.) but it appears to have been exhibited on several other occasions also. By the learned Benedictines it is attributed to the Battle of Simancas in 938. (L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, i. 739.) These repetitions have not escaped the eye satiric of Cervantes, who makes Don Quixote explain as follows to Sancho the origin of the invocation of St. Jago. Mira que este gran Caballero de la Cruz brameja hávalo dado Dios á España por Patron y amparo suyo, especialmente en los rigorosos trances que con los Moros los Españoles han tenido; y así le invocan, y llaman, como á defensor suyo, en todas las batallas que acómeten; y muchos veces le han visto visiblemente en ellas, derribando, ahogando, destruyendo, y matando los Agarenos Espugnados; y de esta verdad te pudiera traer muchos exemplos, que en las verdaderas Historias Españolas se cuentan, cap. 111.

History.

From
A. D.
888.
to
A. D.
1000.
A. D.
950.

Alliance between Ab-dalahman
and Sancho I.

A. D.
956.

A. D.
967.

Embassy from Constantinople
A. D.
967.

Splendour of the Khalifate under Abdalah-man III.

The Medina Azahra.

side, according to their custom, claim the victory for their own Countrymen.

Upon the death of Ramiro II., a feud arose between his two sons, and Sancho, the younger of them, asserting a right to some portion of his paternal Kingdom, endeavoured to obtain the dismemberment of a Province in his favour. The troubles consequent upon resistance to that most impolitic claim, compelled Sancho to secrete himself for a while in Navarre; and it is believed that during his exile, while labouring under a dangerous illness, he asked and obtained from Abdalahman a safe-conduct, and permission to reside at Cordova, then celebrated for the skill of its Physicians.* Gratitude for that kindness on the one hand, and esteem generated by its recognition on the other, produced a close friendship between these Princes of opposite Faith: and when a favourable opportunity occurred for the elevation of Sancho to the throne of Leon, Spain witnessed with astonishment the singular spectacle of the union of Christian and Moslem banners in the same host, for the accomplishment of the same purpose. By the aid of Abdalahman, and of his uncle, Garcia of Navarre, Sancho established himself in his Kingdom, and maintained his power and his alliance with the Khalifs, till he was poisoned, as is affirmed, by his chief opponent, Count Ferdinand Gonzalez of Castile.

Nor was it by the Christian Powers of the Peninsula only that Abdalahman was courted. A few years before his alliance with Sancho, a magnificent embassy had been despatched from Constantinople by the Emperors Constantine VII. and Romanus, in which no pains were spared to conciliate the good will of the Khalif. The Envoys were instructed to offer the most costly presents. Their letter of credence was written in characters of gold upon an azure ground, the seal by which it was closed was of massive gold, engraven on one side with a likeness of our Saviour, on the other with those of Constantine and of his Imperial Father Leo. It was then deposited in a box of carved silver, and that again was enclosed in another of gold, embellished with a portrait of Constantine on stained glass. The whole was placed in a case shaped like a quiver, enveloped in a cloth of silk and gold tissue. The style with which the letter commenced sufficiently evinced the wishes of the writers to cultivate close alliance. "Constantine and Romanus, Believers in the Messiah, the two Emperors, Sovereigns of Rome, to the Great in the rightful possession of Glory, the Noble in descent, Abdalahman the Khalif ruling over the Arabs in Spain, may God prolong his life!"†

These peaceful relations with Christendom permit us to turn awhile from less grateful themes to a brief review of the internal state of the Khalifate. In the magnificence of his Court, and the costliness of his Public works and monuments, Abdalahman III. more than rivalled the founder of his dominion. Under his reign the Mosquita was finished; and a Palace, less durable indeed, but, if descriptions are to be trusted, more superb, was erected above five miles from Cordova. The Medina Azahra, or City of the Flower,—so named from one of the Khalif's slaves whom he passionately loved, and whose statue, notwithstanding the prohibition* of the Koran, was placed over the principal Gate,—was originally no more than a favourite Retreat in Spring and Autumn; gradual additions rendered it a Mansion; from a Mansion, the necessities of a Court-establishment increased it to a Palace; till, as a settlement grew around, it was in the end transformed into a City. Four thousand three hundred columns of variegated marble supported the gilded arches and sculptured vaults of the Khalif's own residence. Rich, tessellated pavements and mosaic walls; fountains of jasper, amid which mimic swans of gold were seen disporting under canopies of inestimable gems,† or which flung back the glittering sunbeams from floods of quicksilver; aviaries, menageries, cool waters, luscious fruits, myrtle alleys, laurel groves, and odoriferous shades, are among the delights upon which the Arabian lovers of the picturesque expatiate. A Mosque and a Mint adjoined the Palace; the construction of the City, of which it formed the nucleus, occupied the incessant toil of twenty years, and 6000 blocks of heavy stone were raised every day during its progress. Even if we grant that these marvellous accounts partake in no small measure of the spirit of Oriental exaggeration, the very fact that accounts so marvellous were hazarded avouches Medina Azahra to have been a work of consummate magnificence: and yet so utterly has it past away, that not even a ruin, since its demolition during a Civil struggle in the year 1008, attests its former existence. Nor was it on that single spot, nor for his own private pleasures only that the coffers of Abdalahman poured forth their measureless contents. An Aqueduct at Ecija, a noble Mosque at Segovia, a Miskra, or Sanctuary appended to that of Tarragona, Baths, Fountains, and Hospitals almost beyond number in each of his principal Cities, in Cordova a long range of quays, and an Arsenal commensurate with the wants of his vast military establishment, announced the unceasing attention of the Prince to the Public welfare. His Body-guard consisted of 4000 Andalusian and 4000 Moorish Horse, superbly mounted and equipped, and chiefly officered by members of the Royal Blood; and to half that number of Selavonian Infantry was intrusted the custody of the Palace. He frequently maintained at the same moment, armies sufficiently strong to command victory in Africa, in Galicia, and in Catalonia; fleets adequate to protect his coasts, and to support communication with his most distant expeditions. The Ports, or depots of Seville, Cadiz, Tarragona, and Almeria were restored, or rather created, at his command; and through the latter, especially, was opened a boundless source of commercial opulence to his subjects.

* This prohibition had been already violated in the Cottage of the Omniads of Cordova, which bears the impress of their heads. But the account of the statue may be apocryphal; it is not noticed by Conde. A characteristic anecdote of the Lady, however, is recorded by other authorities. On first viewing the Palace she was struck by the contrast between its fairness and the dark hue of a neighbouring mountain, and observed to her lover, "See you not, my Lord, the beauty of this fair damsel in the embrace of that Negro?" Abdalahman gave immediate orders that the mountain should be levelled; but the task exceeded even his power, and eventually its complexion was changed by covering it with rich blossoming figs and almonds. (Ibn Halyan, as given by Mr. Shakespeare, 173.)

† A pearl of extraordinary value presented by the Emperor Leo VI. is especially noticed as ornamenting this fountain. But as Leo died in the very year of Abdalahman's accession, we are inclined to believe that this pearl formed a portion of the offerings in the embassy from his son Constantine, which we have just mentioned.

* Mariana (viii. 4.) says that the visit to Cordova was paid by Sancho in the hope of diminishing his jealousy; or in the homely words of Captain John Stephens, the translator of the Spanish Livy, "to bring down his fat." Other authorities maintain that Drup was the Prince's device.

† Conde, i. 439. Parte II. cap. 84. History of the Mohammedan Empire in Spain, &c. designed as an introduction to the Arabian Antiquities of Spain, by J. C. Murphy, 98.

History. In his Court were found the most learned men of the East, invited and established by his liberal patronage; so that among other Sciences, Poetry, Medicine, and Natural Philosophy were professed and taught; and the gems of that celebrated School, which within two Centuries boasted no less a name than that of Averroes, were planted by the fostering hand of Abdalrahman. The warehouses of Syria, Egypt, and Constantinople were piled with merchandise from Spain; and in the manufacture of leather, cotton, linen, and especially of silk, the Saracenic marts scarcely admitted a rival. Among the other exports we are told of all the metals, cochineal, ambergris, yellow amber, load-stone, antimony, talc, marcasites, rock-crystal, oil, olives, saffron, ginger, and myrrh; corals gathered on the coast of Andalusia, pearls on that of Catalonia, rubies dug from the mines of Beja and Malaga, and amethysts from that of Carthage. To the dominion of the Muslims, Spain is indebted for the culture of rice, of the fig, and of the sugar-cane; the choicest plants of Africa and the Levant were intermingled with those of Europe; the soil was meliorated, and an unknown fertility developed by the general practice of irrigation; so that not a step can be trodden even at this day in the rich Provinces of Granada or Valencia, in which the remains of some canal or watercourse, of some huge basin or reservoir, or of some subterranean drainage do not proclaim the superior skill and the gigantic labours of the Saracens in Agriculture. It has been calculated that Cordova, under the sway of Abdalrahman III., contained 290,000 houses, 600 Mosques, 900 Baths, 50 Hospitals, and 80 Schools, and the adjacent Country 12,000 villages. The annual revenue of the Khalif exceeded six millions sterling, a sum probably surpassing the united receipts of all the contemporary Princes of Christendom.*

But this great benefactor of others was far from enjoying in his own person the happiness which he distributed around him with a hand so lavish and unclosed: and the domestic History of Abdalrahman affords one among the countless examples how little enviable is "the head that wears a Crown." A son, Abdallah, listened to the evil prompting of interested advisers, and conspired against his Father. The plot was betrayed; and the unhappy Prince, who, but for this one fault of ambition, appears to have deserved esteem and attachment, was seized and imprisoned. The proofs of treason were distinct; and Abdalrahman, obedient to that which he considered Public duty, and maintaining an inflexible sternness not exhibited in other portions of his History, enacted that unnatural part in which he had been preceded by the elder Brutus, and was himself to be the forerunner of more than one European Sovereign. The wound thus self-inflicted was never healed; and the Khalif, unless roused to action, was absorbed in profound melancholy. His Poetry, for Abdalrahman was no mean Poet, was deeply tinged with this inward bitterness of spirit. In some lines, abounding with Oriental imagery, and addressed to one of his Vizirs who had remonstrated, in verse also, upon his Master's indulgence of painful remembrances, he thus vents his immediate grief. "The keen breath of sorrow has tarnished the freshness of the roses of my youth, and I tremble lest the lilies of more advanced age should be blasted by the hurricane. The brightness of my days has passed away, and a gloomy night has overspread me with shadows, which no future morning can dissipate!" To a friend who possessed his confidence he admitted that during his nearly fifty years of sovereignty, he had tasted but forty days of happiness; and, perhaps, the largest addition which this scanty stock of felicity could receive was added, when Death closed the eyes of one adored by his subjects, dreaded by his enemies, surrounded with every appliance ministering to human pomp or pleasure, a Lord of inexhaustible treasures; and a Despot with unlimited prerogative.†

Few successors could have been found more amply qualified to continue, and even to increase the benefits of Abdalrahman's rule than his son Abul Abbas Al Hakem II., who mounted the throne on his decease. The fifteen years of that Prince's reign, with a single short exception, were passed in friendship with the Kings of Leon; and that unusual period of repose was dedicated by the Khalif to the tranquil furtherance of the noble projects of his Father, and the advancement of Literature, his own ruling passion. Fresh impulses

Annals of Spain.
From A. D. 888. to A. D. 1000.

His death. A. D. 961.

* Conde, i. 453. Parte II. cap. 87.

† Cardonne states that this declaration was found after his death in a paper written by his own hand, Hist. de l'Afrique et d'Espagne sur la Domination des Arabes, i. 329. Conde gives the anecdote as it is found above. The number of days is greatly reduced by Mr. Shakespear, who translates as follows from the Arabic of Ibn Khaldun. "Note this, thou man of understanding, and mark how small a portion of real happiness the world affords even in the most favourable circumstances. The Khalif Anasir, the heir of generosity, whose eminence in the World and whose ascension in the Empire are proverbial, found in a reign of fifty years seven months and three days, only fourteen days of undisturbed enjoyment. Praise to Him who possesses eternal glory and ever-during sway! There is no God but he!" (ut sup. p. 105.)

‡ The enchanted offerings with which the Slave of the Lamp provided Alaladdin when he demanded the Sultan's daughter in marriage, scarcely exceeded in magnitude a present which Abdalrahman's chief Minister, Ahmed, laid at his master's feet, after a successful expedition to the banks of the Douro. Exclusive of this voluntary gift, the Khalif was entitled also to a fifth of the whole spoil. Ahmed's donation consisted of 400 pounds of virgin gold, 420,000 sequins in ingots, 400 pounds of aloes, 500 ounces of amber, 300 ounces of camphor of the first quality, 30 pieces of cloth of gold and silk, 110 furs from Khurasan, 45 housings reaching to the ground, of gold and silk manufactured at Bagdad, 4000 pounds of spun silk, 30 Persian carpets, 800 suits of fur, 4000 pounds of polished steel, 1000 bucklers, 100,000 arrows, 15 Arabian armour of polished steel, 1000 harts and Spanish horses also horses superbly harnessed, 20 mules with rich trappings, 40 slaves, and 20 beautiful young women all sumptuously attired. The whole was accompanied by a panegyric in verse. (Cardonne, i. 326. DeMairé, i. 441.) Mr. Shakespear gives a yet more marvellous version of this present, in making which the Vizir did any thing but impoverish himself; for the Khalif in return doubled his salary, making it 80,000 dinars, gave him precedence of every other State Officer, and, as if fairly exhausted in his efforts to aggrandize the favourite, bestowed upon him the inflated and unmeaning title Emir des Emirs, or Lord of the double Vizier. (p. 102.)

§ We have omitted all notice of a Persecution (if it can be so called) which the Christians resident at Cordova brought down upon themselves during the reign of Abdalrahman III. It would have been far too long for our pages. But many interesting particulars of the insane fanatism, which, under the stimulus furnished by Saint Eulogius, exalted martyrdom, as it was termed, from a mild and reluctant Prince, may be found in an able Criticism (to which we have before referred) on Conde's Work in the 1st No. of the Foreign Quarterly Review. A Criticism which from internal evidence we ascribe to very high authority.

* The above calculations are borrowed from Conde, i. 487. Parte II. cap. 94, and may be found also in Gibbon, Outlines of the History of the World, Macul. Works, iii. 6. Bro. For the rest we have relied upon De Maré, and yet more upon Mr. Foster in his Mohometanism Unveiled. In that learned and most remarkable Work is given a masterly survey of the benefits conferred on Europe by the Arabs, of which we can here attempt no more than a slight, rapid, and most inadequate sketch.

History.

From
A. D.
888,
to
A. D.
1000.

Account of his Library.

were given to Agriculture; and not only was Earth's more barren surface compelled into fruitfulness, but new wealth was discovered and raised from mines within her bosom. By a general diffusion of useful labour, all Orders were made contributors to the well being of the State; and those fierce classes of the population, hitherto accustomed to wield only the sword or the lance, were insensibly converted into peaceful tillers of the ground or industrious artificers.

"The Library of Al Hakem," says Mr. Forster, "according to original authorities, conveys an idea of the state of this Art (Bibliography) among the Arabians in the Xth Century, which may well moderate the pretensions of the most scientific modern collector. Even in the life-time of his father, the great Abdalrahman, Al Hakem maintained agents in Africa, Egypt, Syria, and Persia, whose sole office it was to purchase for their Royal master, the best books in every branch of Learning. Men of letters, from all Countries, frequented his Palace of Mervan; and these also he engaged, by the most liberal promises and rewards, to procure copies for him of the most rare, curious, or instructive Works within their reach or knowledge. He wrote himself to all the more distinguished Authors of the Age, desiring copies of their Works, for which he paid with his wonted generosity. At the same time he employed the most accomplished copyists to transcribe for him such books of price as he could not otherwise obtain. In the arrangement and classification of the splendid collection formed by these worthy arts, Al Hakem displayed no less taste and judgment, than he had before discovered zeal and munificence in their acquisition. With his own hand, he catalogued and classed his Library; which was skillfully subdivided into various compartments, each several compartment containing the books which treated on some particular Science. Each bookcase, each shelf was furnished with its Table of contents; and these particular Tables, again, were incorporated into one general catalogue; which according to Ebn Hayan, a contemporary writer, in its unfinished state, occupied forty-four volumes of fifty pages each. In this seemingly and scientific order was disposed the Royal Library of Cordova; a collection which, in the reign of Al Hakem II., already comprised all the standard Treatises on the Arts and Sciences; all the then known Works on Eloquence or Poetry; and a rich accumulation of Histories, both ancient and contemporary."^a

^a Mohametanism Unveiled, ii. 337. A few of the Works contained in Al Hakem's Library as given by Conde, may be accepted as a specimen of the Literature of his time. He possessed all the Genealogies of the Arabian Khalifs, together with narratives of

One instance of the equity of Al Hakem's government may be cited from among the many which his Chroniclers have preserved. The Khalif wishing to enlarge his Gardens at Medina Azhara, offered a liberal price for some adjoining ground; and notwithstanding the refusal of the owner to sell a patrimony to which he was attached, the Royal agents forcibly occupied the plot, and erected upon it a Pavilion. The ejected proprietor appealed to the Cadi of Cordova; and that Magistrate repairing on the moment to Azhara, with a mule and an empty sack, prostrated himself at Al Hakem's feet, and requested permission to fill the sack with earth. The Khalif, although surprised, readily granted leave; and when the sack was filled, he was again asked to assist in placing it on the mule. Al Hakem, smiling at the jest, as he considered it, tried to raise the sack, but staggered under its weight; and was thus addressed by the Cadi in a tone of severity: "Commander of the Faithful, that sack which you are unable to lift contains but a very small portion of the ground which you have unjustly appropriated from another. How will you be able to support the burden of the whole field when you stand before the judgment-seat of Allah?" The sublime moral lesson contained in these few searching words was received with no less gratitude than it merited; the field was restored to its owner, and in order to atone for the brief wrong which he had suffered, he was presented with the Pavilion just built upon it, together with its costly furniture.*

With the close of Al Hakem's reign, we may pause awhile on the Spanish Annals. The scenes of blood and turbulence which ensued would offer but a painful contrast, if placed in too close apposition with the mild glories and benevolent sway of the Son of Abdalrahman.

their acts and expeditions. For the purchase of a copy of El Agni, a very precious collection of Songs, he gave his agent in the first instance 1000 crowns of gold, and in case these were not sufficient an unlimited letter of credit. The desired Work was obtained, together with a complete and circumstantial pedigree of the Omniades, and a most elegant copy of verses eulogizing the Princes of that race. A considerable number of Books were bequeathed to him by the Omniadian Abdulfarag, whom he had largely patronized; they were principally Genealogical and Poetical. The testator's own chief production, Kiteb el Agni, a volume of Songs with their music which had cost the labour of forty years, had been already presented by him to the Sultan of Aleppo. (i. 458. 466.)

* The reader will, perhaps, call to mind the long existence of the Blacksmith's forge in the outskirts of the Palace at Brighton. The balancet of that nuisance, although voluntary, is almost a matter of National regret; for never could be exhibited a prouder or more practical illustration of the freedom of our institutions, and the impartiality with which our Law throws its protection over the property even of the meanest individual.

Annals of Spain.
Ebn
A. D.
888,
to
A. D.
1000.

A. D.
976.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

THE ANGLO-SAXON ANNALS, FROM THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE IXth CENTURY, TO THE NORMAN CONQUEST.

FROM A. D. 800 TO A. D. 1066.

History
From
A. D.
800. to
A. D.
1066.
Reign of Egbert,
King of Wessex.
His objection of the Cornish Britons.
A. D.
823.
Bravery of Wessex and Mercia.

THE first nine years of the reign of Egbert over Wessex were peacefully consumed in regulating the domestic Government, improving the internal condition, and increasing the military strength of his Kingdom. It was not until the expiration of this period, that he entered on a successful career of ambition, which had been silently prepared by the wisdom of his policy. His earliest enterprise was the subjugation of the Cornish Britons; and a series of invasions, in which he repeatedly overthrew their forces in the field, and ravaged their territory with fire and sword even to the Land's End, finally compelled that unfortunate race to yield to his yoke. But the struggle, though unequal, was long and obstinately maintained; and the obscure record of a sanguinary encounter between the forces of Wessex and the Britons, so late as the twenty-third year of Egbert's reign, marks the duration of a brave though fruitless resistance to the conqueror.*

In the rival pretensions of Mercia, an effectual counterpoise had hitherto been presented to the growing power of Wessex; and the two Kingdoms had so equally advanced in strength and importance, as to make it obvious that the ultimate struggle for the general supremacy over the Anglo-Saxon States must lie between these two. So nicely balanced were the resources of both, that the first accident of succession which should consign either to a disturbed or feeble administration, must infallibly give the ascendancy to the other. As long, therefore, as the sceptre of Mercia was wielded by the vigorous arm of Kenwulf, Egbert cautiously abstained from provoking a hazardous contest. But the death of Kenwulf, the murder of his infant heir, and the subsequent disorders of a usurpation, destroyed the equilibrium between the two States, and afforded the King of Wessex an occasion, too tempting to be overlooked, for securing the preponderance of his power. His interference was invited by the people of East Anglia, who still thirsted to revenge the Mercian treachery, which had first murdered their young Monarch and then overthrown their independence. At their suggestion, or on their behalf, Egbert was led, in the twenty-third year of his reign, into a war against Mercia; and encountering Beornwulf, the usurping King of that State, at Wilton, he there closed a bloody conflict by a complete victory over the Mercian army. Beornwulf sought safety in a precipitate flight; and Egbert, instead of pursuing him into Mercia, prudently avoided to provoke to extremity

Disorders of the latter State.
A. D.
819. taken advantage of
by Egbert.
A. D.
823.

the warlike population of that Country, and preferred to turn his arms against its more feeble tributary Provinces. Detaching his son, Ethelwulf, with a strong body of forces into Kent, he at once separated both that petty Kingdom and Essex from the Mercian dominion, and finally annexed them both to the Crown of Wessex. At the same time, by encouraging the revolt of the East Anglians, he left the Mercians to exhaust their remaining strength in unavailing efforts to reduce the insurgents to obedience. In one expedition into East Anglia, Beornwulf lost at the same time a great battle and his own life; in a second invasion, his successor Ludecan shared a similar fate; and Wiglaf, the Ealdorman of Worcester, who next seized the Mercian Crown, found his Kingdom reduced by this series of reverses to a condition of helpless debility.*

This was the opportunity which Egbert had probably lain in patient expectation. By the intestine troubles which followed the death of Kenwulf, and the imprudent, or at least calamitous, enterprises of the two usurpers who succeeded him, the military power of Mercia, lately so formidable, had been completely destroyed; and the King of Wessex chose the moment of confusion, as well as exhaustion, caused by the death of Ludecan and the accession of Wiglaf, to pour his forces into the Mercian territory. The new King, totally unable to draw together an army for the defence of his crown, or even to oppose the slightest resistance to the invaders, was only successful in eluding their pursuit. During three years he lurked a fugitive and a wanderer among the morasses and woods of his dominions; and the feelings of a superstitious Age might not unnaturally receive, as the retributive judgment of Heaven, the reverse of fortune which conducted a King of Mercia for refuge to the cell of Ethelburga, the daughter whom Offa had widowed in her marriage hour, by that same crime which the East Anglians had now deeply revenged upon his Country. In her retreat at the monastery of Croyland, the Princess sheltered the royal fugitive for several months; and it was by the intercession of the Abbot of that sanctuary that Egbert was at length induced to consent that Wiglaf should retain the Crown of Mercia on the degrading conditions of swearing allegiance and rendering a yearly tribute to the Throne of Wessex. The submission of Mercia was followed by that of East Anglia.†

By the establishment of his supremacy over these

Anglo-
Saxon Annals.
From
A. D.
800. to
A. D.
1066.
A. D.
825.

He sub-jugates Mer-cia.

* Chron. Sax. p. 69, 70. Malmesbury, p. 36.

• Chron. Sax. p. 70. Ingulfus, Hist. p. 7.
† Ingulf. p. 7, 3.

History.

From
A. D.
500. to
A. D.
1066.

Northumbria,
and Wales,

and establishes his supremacy over all South Britain.

A. D.
828.

Commencement of the invasions of the North-men, or Danes.

Origin of that people.

The Sea
kings.

States, the dominion of Egbert was extended to the frontiers of Northumbria; and his successful ambition could no longer brook the independence of any portion of the old Saxon Octarchy. But the dread of his arms had preceded their course; and the Northumbrian King and Chieftains meeting him at Dore beyond the Humber, offered a peaceful recognition of his superiority, and gave hostages for their fidelity. From Northumbria, Egbert next directed his power against the Cambrian Britons; and penetrating into the remotest fastnesses of Wales, finished by carrying his triumphant arms into the Island of Anglesey. Thus victorious in every quarter of South Britain, Egbert had compelled the universal recognition of a paramount sovereignty; and though he never assumed the general title of King of all England, which modern writers have erroneously conferred upon him, the contemporary acknowledgment of his supremacy is sufficiently expressed in the dignity which is associated with his name, as the eighth and last Bretwalda of the Saxon Octarchy.*

At this epoch, however, when the genius and fortune of Egbert had prevailed over every native rival, and permanently established the superiority of the Throne of Wessex over all the Anglo-Saxon States, their common safety was assailed by a new and most dangerous foreign enemy. This was that ferocious race of Scandinavian pirates, whose ravages on the shores of Continental Europe have already been described in the calamitous annals of the Carolingian Empire; but who, instead of their more usual name of Northmen or Normans, are in our own History better known under the appellation of Danes. In its modern sense, at least, this last title was improperly bestowed: for not the Peninsula of Jutland and the Isles of the Baltic alone, but the whole sea-coasts of the great Scandinavian Continent, contributed to send forth those piratical swarms, which inflicted in common the work of devastation upon the more Southern shores of Europe.

These ferocious invaders, whose very name inspired horror among the more civilized Anglo-Saxons, had probably sprung from the remains of their own stock in Scandinavia. They claimed a common descent from Woden; and were certainly distinguished by similar qualities, manners, and Religion with the original Saxon invaders of Britain. Like them, the Northmen, spurning every pacific occupation and employment, made the stormy Ocean their home, piracy and rapine their business and means of subsistence, bloodshed and fiery destruction their pleasures, and human captives the propitiatory sacrifices to their Gods or Demons. By the dim and uncertain light of the Northern legends, the common addition of the Northmen to a life of piratical adventure may be traced to the existence of a law or custom which the scanty produce of a stern climate and sterile soil might have rendered originally necessary, and which became so extensively prevalent as to entitle it to be considered universal throughout the Scandinavian shores. This was a rule of succession by which the younger sons of every Chieftain left to their elder brother the whole patrimonial territory; received for their share of inheritance only arms and shipping; and with such associates and followers as were disposed to join their fortune, betook themselves to a life of roving and predatory enterprise. The most successful and renowned of such adventurous leaders attracted inferior Chieftains to their banners by the fame of their exploits; and without a foot of territory, without other possessions than their war-ships, or other subjects than their numerous crews, these Sea-kings or Vikings, as they were called, rivalled national Princes in power, and filled every region of Europe, which their navies could approach, with the terror of their name.*

The peculiar circumstances in the internal condition of Scandinavia, which, towards the close of the VIIIth Century, enlarged the ravages of these scourges of the North, and first precipitated their fury on the more civilized portions of Europe, would be vainly sought in the fabulous History of the regions which produced them: but, as we have formerly observed, the earliest appearance of their piratical fleets beyond their own coasts coincides in point of time with the subjugation of Northern Germany by Charlemaigne; and it is highly probable that the hordes of Saxon exiles who fled before the arms of that conqueror to the shores of the Baltic, swelled the numbers of the Scandinavian Pirates, and gave a new impulse to the extension of their enterprises. The coasts of England, and next of France, attracted their ravages. Their earliest recorded descent on our own Country is placed in the year 787, when they landed from three ships on the Isle of Thanet, and put to the sword the Saxon Governor of the district, who went out to view their strange armament.† This first apparition was followed by similar desultory assaults on other parts of the coast, which served only to excite a transient alarm. But, in the thirty-second year of the reign of Egbert, a fleet of the Pirates in more formidable force arrived off the Kentish shores; after plundering the Isle of Sheppey they retreated in safety; and from this epoch, the descents of the Northmen were yearly renewed with increasing violence. In the very next summer, they landed from thirty-five vessels on the coast of Wessex itself; defeated a body of West Saxons under Egbert in person, at Charmouth, in Dorsetshire; and carried off their spoil in triumph.‡

This disaster taught the Saxon Monarch the necessity of systematic preparation for the repulse and chastisement of such persevering invaders; and his measures on this occasion are strikingly characterised by the ability and vigour in which his administration seems always to have risen superior to the spirit of the Age. Assembling his Nobles in Council at London, he explained and concerted his arrangements for the public defence; and though uncertain at what point to expect the next invasion, waited in anxious readiness for the event. It avouched the efficacy of his plans. For though the enemy, whether from policy or accident, chose the Cornish coast for the new scene of invasion, and persuaded the subjugated Britons to revolt and join them, he was able promptly to oppose their dangerous union with the assembled forces of Wessex; and in a sanguinary encounter at Hengstone Hill, in Cornwall, in which he again commanded in person, he revenged his former defeat by a decisive victory; totally suppressed the rebellion of the Britons; and after an immense followed by a decisive victory over the invaders.

His preparations to repel their future assaults.

A. D. 833.

† Chron. Sax. p. 64.

‡ Ibid. p. 72.

* Chron. Sax. p. 71, 72.

Anglo-Saxon Annals.
From
A. D.
800,
to
A. D.
1066.

Their first descent on England.

A. D.
833.

Defeat of Egbert.
A. D.
833.

His preparations to repel their future assaults.

followed by a decisive victory over the invaders.

A. D.
833.

History. slaughter, drove the remains of their invading confederates to the refuge of their ships. With this success Egbert completed the achievements of a protracted and fortunate reign of thirty-six years, during which, equally by policy and arms, he had subdued every domestic opponent, securely established the paramount authority of his House over the Anglo-Saxon States, and, finally, taken a signal vengeance upon the only foreign enemies, and those the most formidable of the Age, who had dared to insult his dominions. He died within twelve months after his victory, at Hengstone, full of years and glory.*

Egbert was succeeded by his son Ethelwulf, who is said to have been destined, during the life of an elder brother, to the Monastic profession. He assumed only the Crown of Wessex, and the general supremacy of the Anglo-Saxon States; while the conquered Provinces of Kent and Essex were united into a subordinate Kingdom under Athelstan, who was either (and it is uncertain which) his son or his brother. The genius of Ethelwulf was inferior to that of his father; and one ancient writer has represented him of a feeble and indolent character;† but the actions of his reign display no want of energy or courage; and some share at least of the merit of his Government may be imputed to a Prince, who is admitted to have selected men of vigour and ability for his Ministers. These were two Prelates, Alstan and Swithin, Bishops of Sherborne and Winchester: the first distinguished for his martial and political activity; and the second for more becoming attributes of pacific wisdom. The exigencies of the times, indeed, were such as to demand rather the stirring qualities of a warlike spirit, than the milder virtues of Cloistered or even of Civil life; and the talents of Alstan are said to have been beneficially exercised in providing financial supplies, and in establishing a permanent military array of the People, for the public defence against the invasions of the Northmen.‡

These were now becoming so incessant on all points of the coast that, for effectually repelling them, it was found necessary to adopt the expedient of appointing Royal officers in every maritime district to assemble and lead the inhabitants against the common enemy, in whatever quarter they should attempt to land. Their piratical swarms hovered in fact over the whole extent of the English shore from Northumbria to Wessex, and harassed the Island with desultory assaults. It was their custom, each Summer after landing and desolating the country, to return home laden with spoil before the Winter, and to renew their depredations upon some other part of the coast in the following season. In the year after Ethelwulf's accession, his immediate territories alone were simultaneously invaded in three quarters, from as many squadrons, with various success. In the ensuing Spring, a more numerous body of Northmen made a descent upon East Anglia, and, after defeating the Ealdorman of the district, penetrated Southward to the Thames before they retired. In the following campaign, the progress of these merciless invaders was marked by four obstinate and bloody encounters; and though in one of these actions, Ethelwulf himself was defeated at Charmouth, the successes of the Northmen were followed by an almost total cessation of their enterprises, so far as England was concerned, for the next twelve years. This interval was occupied, as we have seen,* by a series of ravages on the coasts of France: in which, encountering a less determined resistance, or allured by a richer booty, they successively sacked Rouen, Paris, Bourdeaux, and other principal Cities of that Kingdom. But at length they again assaulted England by so many simultaneous invasions, and in such formidable numbers, as seemed to indicate a concerted design of general and durable conquest. The unusual operations of one army which, debarking in the Isle of Thanet, there for the first time ventured to winter in England instead of returning to their own Country, might well awaken the gloomiest apprehensions of the Saxons, who remembered that the district thus occupied by Pagan enemies of the same race with themselves, had also been the earliest permanent settlement of their common progenitors.†

Accordingly, the imminence of the danger seems to have roused all the Anglo-Saxon States of the South to a sense of the necessity of united efforts for expelling the invaders. A general Congress of the Nobles and Prelates of Wessex and Mercia was therefore held at Kingsbury, in Oxfordshire, at which measures were concerted for the public defence. These were soon called into action: for the ensuing Spring witnessed the most tremendous invasion which had yet afflicted the Island. A fleet of no less than three hundred and fifty sail entered the Thames; and the host of Northmen disembarking from their vessels, sacked both London and Canterbury, before Bertulf, King of Mercia, to whom the defence of that part of the Country had been allotted, could march to its relief. He arrived only to encounter a total defeat; and the victorious invaders advanced into Surrey, where Ethelwulf himself, and his son Ethelbald, at the head of the assembled forces of Wessex, now awaited their approach. At Atea, or the Field of Oaks, in that County, the two armies met in a long and deadly struggle; at the close of which the Saxons prevailed with so dreadful a slaughter of the invaders, that their loss is declared, by a Chronicler of the next Age, to have exceeded any which they had before or since sustained. Nor was this the only triumph of a season which became emphatically distinguished, from the subsequent disasters of the Saxon Annals, as the happy or fortunate year. At Weubury, the Ealdorman of Devonshire had inflicted a decisive defeat upon another body of the Northmen; and, on the coast of the Kent, King Athelstan routed a third army of invaders, and captured nine of their ships. Discouraged by so many repulses, the Northmen abandoned their hopes of conquest; and after a single predatory descent in the following year, they desisted, during the remainder of Ethelwulf's reign, from further assaults upon the shores of England.‡

No other warlike achievements distinguished the life of this Prince, if we except a successful expedition into Wales, which he undertook, after the expulsion of the Northmen, to assist his tributary, the King of Mercia, in punishing the Britons for some incursions into that State, and compelling them to recognise its superiority.§ The domestic circumstances of Ethelwulf's reign, however, are invested with a superior interest from their

Anglo-Saxon Annals.

From A. D. 800, to A. D. 1066. They winter for the first time in the Isle of Thanet. A. D. 851.

Union of the Saxon States to repel the invaders.

Decisive victory of Ethelwulf. A. D. 852.

Temporary cessation of the Northman descents.

Domestic events of the reign of Ethelwulf.

* Chron. Sax. p. 72, 73. Ingulf. p. 10.

† Malmsbury, p. 37. Helm, De Gest. Pontif. p. 257.

‡ Chron. Sax. p. 73.

* Vide p. 434 of this volume.

† Chron. Sax. p. 74. Asser, p. 5.

‡ Chron. Sax. p. 74, 75. Ingulf. p. 11. Asser, p. 5, 6.

§ Chron. Sax. p. 75. Asser, p. 6, 7.

History.

From
A. D.
800,
to
A. D.
1066.

Birth of Alfred the Great.

Pilgrimage of Ethelwulf to Rome.

A. D.
855.

Revolt of his eldest son Ethel-
bald.

A. D.
856 connection with the youthful fortunes of his fourth son, the illustrious ALFRED, who was born at Wantage in Berkshire, in the year 849. The indications of a superior nature, which are said to have appeared even in his childhood, or some less excusable caprice of parental fondness, rendered him the best-beloved son of Ethelwulf; and there is evidence of his father's early design to prefer him in the succession to the throne before his elder brothers. It could be with no other purpose that the King sent him, when only five years old, to Rome in charge of the Bishop of Winchester, with a request that the Pope would solemnly bestow the Regal unction upon him; and this ceremony, which was evidently intended to establish the Royal dignity in his person by a sacred and inviolable authority, was accordingly performed by the reigning Pontiff Leo IV.* Two years later, the tranquillity in which his dominions had been left by the cessation of the Northman invasions, induced Ethelwulf himself to gratify the same pious impulse which, according to the mistaken ideas of the times, had led so many earlier Saxon Princes to undertake the pilgrimage to Rome. In this expedition, also, he led Alfred with him to revisit the Papal Capital; and crossing through France, where he was royally entertained by Charles the Bald, he performed the long and toilsome journey in safety. On his return, a second visit to the Frankish Monarch produced the disproportioned union of the aged Ethelwulf with Judith, the youthful daughter of his Royal host; and immediately after their nuptials, the Princess, being crowned as Queen with great ceremony by the Archbishop of Rheims, accompanied her husband to England.†

This foreign journey of Ethelwulf proved in every respect injurious to the peace of his Kingdom. The preference which he showed to his youngest son had excited the jealousy of the eldest, Ethelbald, whose temper was violent and ambitious; the absence of the King favoured the unnatural machinations into which the Prince entered to seize his Crown; and, above all, the West Saxons were filled with discontent at the elevation of Judith to a participation in the Regal dignity, which by the law passed, as we have formerly recorded,‡ in consequence of the crimes of Eadburga, was denied to the Consorts of their Monarchs. Favoured by the general disgust at this measure, Ethelbald, before his father's return, had succeeded in raising a powerful party, to prevent his resumption of the sceptre. The malecontents included many of the West Saxon Thegns; and Alstan himself, the famous Bishop of Sherborne and Minister of Ethelwulf, together with the Ealdorman of Somerset, were the principal advisers of the young Prince. Assembling their forces in the Forest of Selwood, the conspirators prepared, with Ethelbald at their head, to complete their project; when the arrival of Ethelwulf in England arrested its consummation. His appearance recalled the waning affections of his subjects; the greater number of the Nobles and People of Wessex, though displeased at his absence and marriage, were still more shocked at the wicked violation of filial duty in Ethelbald; and the division of feeling threatened the State with the calamities of a Civil war between the father and son. The mild disposition of the old King, his desire of repose, or perhaps his fears, induced him to avert this catastrophe by a compromise with the revolted. He consented to abandon the Crown of Wessex, with only a nominal reservation of his own supremacy, to his rebellious son; and he was satisfied with retaining under his immediate administration the Eastern dependencies of the Monarchy, consisting of Kent, Sussex, Surrey, and Essex, which Athelstan, who was now dead, had formerly governed with a subordinate Royal title. Ethelwulf survived this accommodation only two years; and by his Will bequeathing this Eastern Kingdom to Ethelbert, his second son, he directed that the third and fourth, Ethelred and Alfred, should severally succeed Ethelbald, in the order of seniority, on the throne of Wessex.*

Ethelwulf was no sooner dead than Ethelbald, who had been loudest in reproaching his father's marriage with Judith, himself espoused his blooming step-mother. This incestuous union, which deservedly excited the indignation and horror of his subjects, is the only recorded event of his brief reign. By the spiritual admonition of Swithin, Bishop of Winchester, or the menaces of his People, Ethelbald was persuaded or compelled to dissolve the guilty connection; and within two years, he followed Ethelwulf to the grave. On his demise, the Crown of Wessex should by the paternal testament have devolved upon Ethelred, the third of the brothers; but the second, Ethelbert, already King of Kent, now asserted his prior title, and easily obtaining its recognition by the Witenagemot of Wessex, united the whole inheritance of Egbert in his person. He enjoyed it but six years; and his reign, though his warlike qualities are praised in general terms by the Chroniclers of the Age, appears to have been as undistinguished as that of his immediate predecessor, except by one disastrous circumstance; the renewal of the Northman descents on England.†

In the fifth year after his accession to the Throne of Wessex, Winchester, the ancient Capital of that Kingdom, was sacked and burned to the ground by an army of these invaders; who, however, in retreating with their booty to their vessels at Southampton, were overtaken and routed with retributive slaughter by the forces of Berkshire and Hampshire, under their respective Ealdormen. In the same year, another piratical squadron, assailing the Kentish coast, repeated with impunity the experiment of wintering in the Isle of Thanet; and the inhabitants of Kent, instead of vigorously attempting to repel them, gave the first fatal and shameful example of purchasing their retreat by gold. But the credulity and cowardice of these degenerate "Men of Kent" were only derided by the perfidious barbarians; who after receiving the price of forbearance, broke from their maritime camp into the Province, and plundered and desolated all the Eastern parts of it. At the same time, another fleet appeared off the Northumbrian shore, and from thence Southward, the whole coast was again menaced with a gathering storm of invasion.‡

On the death of Ethelbert, amidst this ominous and cheerless prospect, Ethelred, his next brother, ascended the Throne of Wessex under his father's Will, although the late King had left several children. His accession was immediately followed by a new and a more appalling than any preceding descent of the Northmen: of which

* Chron. Sax. p. 76, 77. Asser, De Gestis Eilfredi, p. 3, 7.
† Asser, p. 8, 9. Annales Bertiniani, (in the Benedictine Collection of French Historians,) p. 71, 72, &c.
‡ Vide p. 391 of this Volume.

* Asser, p. 9—13. Chron. Sax. p. 77.
† Idem, 14, 15. Bed. p. 78.
‡ Idem. Ibid.

Anglo-Saxon Annals.
From
A. D.
800,
to
A. D.
1066.

Death of Ethelwulf.

A. D.
858.

and Ethelbert.

A. D.
860.

Revol. of the North-men pro-prios.

A. D.
861.

A. D.
863.

Accession
of Ethelred.
A. D.
866.

History.
From
A. D.
500,
to
A. D.
1066.
Story of Ragnar Lodbrog.

the particular origin has been sought, and perhaps discovered, in the wildest legends of Scandinavia. According to them, this expedition was undertaken on a vow of filial vengeance, by the sons of Ragnar Lodbrog, one of the most famous Sea-kings of the Age. We gather, indeed, from authentic History, that, shortly previous to the epoch before us, this bold leader of the Northmen, ascending the Seine with his piratical squadron, spreading flames and devastation along its banks, and obliging Charles the Bald to save Paris by ransom from sharing the same fate, had already rendered his name terribly familiar in France.* That he had now, twenty years later, perished in a descent on the coast of England, is obscurely intimated by the Saxon Chroniclers.† Of the actions and fate of this renowned Sea-king, so much only is certain; but if we receive the tale of Scandinavian Romance, having been shipwrecked in a predatory expedition on the coast of Northumbria, he was made captive, and by order of Ella, King of that Country, consigned to a dungeon filled with vipers, until he was stung to death. In his Quida, or Death-song, as it has been believed,‡ he alleviated the lingering torments of his last moments with the conviction that his brave and numerous offspring would avenge his sufferings; and the imaginary prophecy was not unfulfilled. Some of his sons, who were in Scandinavia when the intelligence of his fate reached them, swore to inflict a signal vengeance on the land of his murderers; and the numerous adherents and admirers of a Chieftain, whose exploits had rendered him so illustrious, sympathized in the stern emotions, and embraced the sanguinary resolve of his children. A formidable armament, in which were eight Sea-kings, and twenty Jarls or Earls of the Northmen, all relations or associates of Ragnar, was rapidly assembled under the chief command of five of his sons, Ingwar, Halfden, Bascg, Guthrun, and Ubbra; and, in the year after his death, the whole Navy of destruction, conveying twenty thousand warriors, steered for the English shores. Being by stress of weather, or whatever other cause, carried beyond the Northumbrian coast, the fleet first made the land of East Anglia.

With the descent of the ferocious host on that Province, we recover the thread of genuine History. Though they encountered no opposition on their landing, they did not at once advance into the country; but contented themselves with fortifying a camp, in which they determined to pass the Winter. This season of repose was occupied in collecting horses for their warriors; in still further swelling their numbers by reinforcements from Scandinavia; and in gaining over to their alliance some of the Nobles of Northumbria. Their designs in this latter respect were suggested and promoted by the state of that Kingdom. For, having thrown off the dependence upon Wessex, to which Egbert had subjected it, the whole Province was now distracted by the rival pretensions of two claimants, Osbert and Ella, to its independent and ancient Crown. If the Saxon States at this fatal juncture had cordially united against the invaders, the latter might have been overpowered: but the East Anglians, from fear or selfish blindness, basely suffered them to winter unmolested, and even supplied them with horses to mount their cavalry; the Northumbrians were betrayed by internal treason; and the principal power of Wessex was, by some strange infatuation, held aloof from the impending contest.*

In the Spring, the invading host, abandoning East Anglia, burst in their vengeful career upon Northumbria: fresh from the grim repose of their Winter's camp; led by the ruthless Sons of Ragnar; and guided by the Raven, or enchanted banner, which his daughters were believed to have woven in a single noontide, and which derived its name from the sacred bird of Woden, depicted on its texture. They had already possessed themselves of York, before the rivals, Ella and Osbert, awakening too late to the danger of their Country, and agreeing to suspend the settlement of their opposing claims, marched with united forces to surprise them in their quarters near that City. In their sudden and furious assault, the Northumbrian Princes were at first successful; the Northmen were driven into the place for refuge; a passage through the city walls was forced; and the death-struggle was renewed in the streets. But here the desperation of the invaders, to whom the power of flight was denied, prevailed over the ardour of their assailants; after an obstinate conflict the latter were repulsed; Osbert himself was slain; and the Northumbrians were finally routed with a merciless slaughter. The fate of Ella was less happy than that of his rival: he survived the defeat only to fall alive into the hands of the victors; and the sons of Ragnar are said to have inflicted an agonizing death upon the slayer of their Father. They divided and stretched open his ribs from the spine, drew out the lungs, and strewed salt upon the quivering members.† This mode of execution, termed the Spread Eagle, from the similarity of the victim's appearance to the figure of that bird, was not uncommonly practised among the Northmen upon enemies who had signally provoked their hate. The performance of the operation was the privilege of the Sea-king or other Chieftain;‡ and this atrocious custom, like the tortures inflicted by the Indian warriors of North America, marks the fendlike and wanton excess of cruelty, of which human nature in its savage state is capable. This shocking catastrophe put a period to the Anglo-Saxon dynasty of Northumbria; for the conquerors, after permitting the ephemeral and tributary reigns of three native Chieftains, seized the Country in full occupation. Ingwar, the son of Ragnar, was raised by his

Anglo-Saxon Annals.
From
A. D.
500,
to
A. D.
1066.

Conquest of Northumbria,
A. D.
567.

Appalling invasion of England by his sons.
A. D.
566.

Their first
descent.

* Chron. Fontenai. p. 41. (In the great Benedictine Collection, vol. vii.) So also Vezel, p. 271. Aimon, p. 350. &c.

† Brompton, p. 502. Matthew Westminster, p. 314. &c.

‡ Although an English translation of the Lodbrok Quida, or supposed death-song of Lodbrog, appeared half a Century ago, to Mr. Turner, as we have already observed, belongs the credit of the first attempt to connect that and other traditions of Scandinavian Romance with our genuine Anglo-Saxon History. But it is necessary to receive the evidence of such wild Northern legends with great suspicion. Though the Quida is probably a production of high antiquity, it is impossible to ascertain its exact Age. As the composition of Ragnar himself, it would seem almost needless to remark, that it cannot be authentic; yet it is strange that the obvious and puerile absurdity of attributing it to that Chieftain has passed without comment. If sung in his solitary dungeon, how was it heard and preserved? The mode of his death is so plainly fabulous or allegorical; and the only value of the Poem consists in the probability that it was composed by some Northern Scald or Bard soon after the event of which it is the subject. As such, it would illustrate the origin of the invasion conducted by his sons in a natural motive of vengeance; and it is at least a very spirited Ode, and a curious picture of Scandinavian sentiments and manners.

* Asser, p. 15. 18.

† Saxo Grammaticus, Hist. Dan. p. 177.

‡ Snorre, Hist. Regum Norveg. (Ed. Havais, 1777,) p. 108.

and foundation of the first Danish Kingdom in England.

History.
From
A. D.
800. to
A. D.
1066.
Ravage of Mercia.
A. D.
868.

followers to its Sovereignty; and Northumbria thenceforth became permanently a Northman or Danish Principality.*

After this decisive victory, the invaders proceeded to execute the plan which they had now evidently formed for the general and durable conquest of the Island; nor were their designs wanting in a more regular and systematic policy, than had hitherto characterised their predatory and transient descents. Whilst one division of their army remained under Ingwar to occupy Northumbria, their principal force, passing the Humber, advanced Southward into Mercia, and took possession of Nottingham. The Mercian King, Burhred, then imploring the succour of Wessex, Ethelred, with his Brother Alfred, and the forces of the paramount Saxon Kingdom, marched to his aid, and succeeded for a time in repelling the progress of the invaders. But they, full of the fierce energy of conquest, were united and persevering: the Saxon Powers, from whatever cause, seem to have been at this epoch incapable of an earnest and sincere confederation; and suffered themselves to be overpowered in succession without any hearty and combined effort for their common defence. After a deceitful appearance of inaction, the host of the Northmen, again advancing from the Humber, but varying the scene of attack, poured into Lincolnshire. All the unspeakable horrors of fire and pillage, bloodshed and violation, attended their destroying course. A heroic but unavailing defence was here made by the brave Ealdorman Algar, and the youth of the Country; for being unsupported by their King, they were overwhelmed by the numbers of the Northmen, and slaughtered to a man. Some of the most famous and opulent of the Saxon Monasteries, situated in this part of England, Bardene, Croyland, Medeshamstede, (the modern Peterborough), and Ely, were successively pillaged and burnt; and the Religious of both sexes were murdered, after undergoing every atrocity, by these inhuman Pagans.† They next entered East Anglia. Edmund, the King of that Country, the memory of whose pious and gentle virtues was long consecrated in the hearts of his People, but who appears to have wanted the more energetic qualities which the crisis demanded, either attempted no resistance, or resisted ineffectually. Falling into the hands of the Barbarians, and steadfastly refusing, as it is said, obedience to the command of their leader to renounce his Christian Faith, he was tortured to death. His remains were privately interred by some faithful domestics; a splendid Monastery was in a later Age erected over his tomb; and the modern town of St. Edmund's Bury still marks the place of his sepulture and preserves the name of the canonized Martyr. A single Winter sufficed to establish the Northmen in their new conquests; the Throne of St. Edmund was occupied by Guthrum, another of the sons of Ragnar; and East Anglia was converted from this epoch into the second Danish Kingdom in England.‡

Invasion of Wessex.
A. D.
871

But the remaining sons of Ragnar and their followers were still unprovided with English settlements; and in the following Summer, pursuing their projects of spoliation, these Chieftains led their ferocious bands into Wessex, penetrated to Reading, and surprising that place, began to intrench themselves in the vicinity. Their superiority, indeed, to the Saxons in the Art of War, however rude was still their knowledge of its elements, is remarkably evinced throughout the History of these invasions. No sooner had they obtained possession of the important post of Reading, than they proceeded to strengthen their position by a line of works connecting the Thames and the Kennet. Their labours were interrupted by the assaults of the Ealdorman, Ethelwulf, at the head of the armed population of the district; and in the skirmishes which ensued, the Saxons gained the advantage. The King of Wessex was now at last startled to the conviction that no alternative remained for him but to expel the invaders or perish in the struggle; and summoning the whole force of his Kingdom to his aid, he approached with his brother Alfred to encounter their power. Elated with the partial success which they had recently obtained, the Saxons made a bold and vigorous assault upon the Danish intrenchments; but they were repulsed with great slaughter. A few days later, at a Council place in the same vicinity, termed by the Saxon Chroniclers, Æscedun, of which the exact position has been much controverted, the two armies came to a more open and equal encounter. In the outset, the safety of the Saxons was endangered by the fiery impetuosity of Alfred, and the superior skill of the Northman army; but the reasonable advance of Ethelred, with the main body of his host, turned the scale of victory. After a long and dreadful conflict, the Northmen gave way; one of their Kings, Baesege a son of Ragnar, several Jarls, and a multitude of warriors were slain in the battle and pursuit, which reached to the gates of Reading; and the daring bought victory of the Saxons was purchased by a scarcely inferior loss. But even this success proved unavailing: for it was counterbalanced by a defeat which the Saxons sustained at Basing, before a fortnight had expired since their victory; and the Northmen were further, almost immediately after this, reinforced by the junction of a fresh army which had recently landed from the Baltic. It is useless to particularize the encounters which followed; and sufficient to record that, in a general conflict of doubtful issue at Morton in Berkshire, Ethelred, who, though too tardily, had in the close of his reign exhibited the spirit of a hero, and sustained the sinking fortunes of his Kingdom with a courage worthy of a happier fate, received his mortal wound. He survived the battle only a few days; and the invaders withdrew to Reading, to rejoice over his death and to revel in their spoils.*

At such a dismal epoch, and by such a catastrophe, was it that the broken sceptre of Wessex devolved upon a Prince, who of all Monarchs in a half-civilized state of Society has, perhaps, best deserved that distinctive appellation of the Great, which History has linked to his name. Either despairing of the fortunes of his afflicted Country, or influenced by the more commendable distrust, which his friend and biographer has attributed to him, of his own sufficiency for the arduous duties of the Regal office, without the special aid of Providence, Alfred, then only in his twenty-second year, at first hesitated to ascend the vacant throne. But he was summoned to the perilous station by the unanimous entreaties of the Nobles and People of Wessex, to whom the reputation of his talents and valour had

* Asser, p. 18. Simon Dunelm, p. 14. Chron. Sax. p. 79.
† Asser, p. 19, 20. Ingulf, p. 18. 24. Chron. Sax. p. 79, 80.
‡ Asser, p. 20. Ingulf, p. 24.

* Asser, p. 21. 24. Chron. Sax. p. 80, 81.

History. already endeared him; the sense of public duty, or of gratitude for the public confidence, prevailed over his feelings of despondency, and he suffered the Crown to be placed on his head by the Archbishop of Canterbury.*

The aspect of affairs was indeed such as might rationally excite the worst apprehensions. An enemy, whose superior martial skill and activity were rendered more appalling by their merciless ferocity, had already securely established themselves in the Island with overwhelming numbers; and continual reinforcements of new swarms from their Northern seats, rendered their repeated defeat unavailing, and their ultimate expulsion hopeless. Conducting their operations with a systematic policy, of which their leaders never lost sight, even whilst the wildest and most horrid devastation marked their course, the invaders had already subjugated two of the Anglo-Saxon Kingdoms, Northumbria and East Anglia; insulted, overawed, and paralyzed the power of a third, Mercia; and penetrated into the heart of the predominant Monarchy of Wessex. Consolidating their conquests, as they proceeded, into durable occupation, they had expanded their possessions in one unbroken line over all the Eastern part of the Island from the Tyne to the Thames, and were in fact masters of one half of Saxon England. The conflict had now in fact become a national struggle between the Northman and Saxon, as it had formerly been between the latter and the Briton, for the dominion of the whole land. Not mere detached bands of Pirates, but whole races of men, with their women and children, had again, at the distance of four centuries, precipitated themselves from the Scandinavian upon the British shores. The rapacious passion for transient plunder had been superseded in the Northern mind by the steady desire of permanent settlement, under a climate and on a soil more inviting and plentiful than their own bleak and hungry regions; and thenceforth nothing less than the total seizure and subjugation of England could satiate the cupidity of this new Scandinavian immigration.†

If Alfred had assumed the Crown of his Fathers with reluctance, he prepared not the less to defend it with vigour. Almost immediately after the interment of his brother, his presence was demanded in the field to resist the progress of invasion. The main army of the Northmen, whose numbers were again reinforced by a new debarkation of their Countrymen, advancing from Reading, had penetrated into Wiltshire; and intrenching themselves, according to their practice, on the heights above the Willy, they extended their ravages along the fertile banks of that stream. Alfred met them with inferior numbers; and after a gallant, and for some time successful, effort to compensate for want of strength by the vigour of his attack, was ultimately defeated. This was the ninth general action, besides innumerable skirmishes, in which the West Saxons had encountered the invaders since the commencement of the year. It was followed by a hollow pacification. The Northmen, arrested by the obstinacy of the defence, might deem it their interest to temporize; Alfred, his Kingdom exhausted by so many sanguinary conflicts, and himself discouraged by so many unavailing exertions, might find it necessary to afford his harassed people a season of repose; and these motives probably induced him to offer, and the invaders to accept, a sum of gold as the price of their retreat from his dominions.*

The dangerous, as well as disgraceful, character of this policy on the part of the Saxons, was almost immediately visible. The invading host withdrew only to London; where having wintered and concentrated their forces, their leaders prepared to complete the subjugation of Mercia. Burhred, who still reigned over that Kingdom, instead of opposing them courageously in arms, followed only the weaker part of Alfred's conduct, by negotiating and twice purchasing a Peace from the most barbarous and faithless of enemies. After receiving his second donative of gold, the Northmen threw off the mask; made a jest of his reliance on their promises; and perfidiously entering Mercia, ravaged the whole country with fire and sword. The pusillanimous Burhred, now hopeless of purchasing their forbearance, knew no other alternative than flight; and disgracefully abandoning his Throne and his People he escaped over sea, made the usual pilgrimage to Rome, and ended his worthless existence in that City. With him passed away another of the fleeting dynasties of the Anglo-Saxons; and the Northmen committed the temporary charge of his sceptre to Ceolwulf, one of his Thegns, who had the baseness to receive it upon the ignominious condition of tribute. He was permitted to hold it only so long as his cruelty and violence could wring sufficient gold from his wretched People to satisfy the craving of his masters. When he had exhausted every expedient of tyranny to gratify their rapacity, this pageant of Royalty was overthrown; and the despicable traitor to his own honour and that of his Country, being unceremoniously deposed, received a cruel death from the hands of the Barbarians, who had mocked his cupidity with the gift of a Crown. From this epoch, Mercia, as a separate Kingdom, existed no more; but following the fortune of conquest, first sank into subjection to the Danish power, and was ultimately annexed to the West Saxon dominions.†

By the subjugation of Mercia, the Northmen divided the possession of all England South of the Tyne with the only remaining Saxon State of Wessex. Their measures were now directed to complete the conquest of the Island. For this purpose, they separated their forces into two armies. One, under Halfden, their Northumbrian King, returning by sea to that Province, landed on the Northern bank of the Tyne, and extended its devastating career over every part of Deiro, which had yet escaped their visitation. From thence penetrating into the territories of the Cumbrian, or Strathclyde Britons, of the Picts, and of the Scots, Halfden filled all those regions with the terror of his victorious arms; and then, withdrawing into Northumbria, divided the conquered lands among his followers, and induced them permanently to occupy and cultivate the country which they had previously desolated.‡ Meanwhile, the main host of the Northmen, under Guthrin, their East-Englian King, after one of their deceitful periods of inaction, suddenly broke up from their quarters at Cambridge, made a rapid embarkation on the Eastern shore, and were heard of no more, until their appearance in the Channel revealed their purpose of invading Anglo-Saxon Annals.

From

A. D. 800,

to

A. D. 1066.

Invasion of Mercia by the Northmen.

A. D. 872.

A. D. 873.

A. D. 874.

Their conquest;

and extinction of the Mercian Kingdom.

A. D. 875.

Half of England now possessed by the Northmen.

Their final settlement in Northumbria.

A. D. 876.

* Asser, p. 24. Simon Dunelm, p. 126, 127. Ingulf, p. 25.

† Turner, vol. ii. p. 97.

* Asser, p. 25. Chron. Sax. p. 82.

† Asser, p. 26, 27. Ingulf, p. 26, 27. Chron. Sax. p. 83.

‡ Asser, p. 27. Simon Dunelm, p. 95. Chron. Sax. p. 83.

History.
From
A. D.
800,
to
A. D.
1066.
New invasion of Wessex.

Wessex anew. Landing on the coast of Dorsetshire, they surprised the strong fortress of Wareham, and as usual intrenched themselves so formidably in their position, that Alfred, who, hastily assembling an army, had advanced to repel their descent, found the attempt to dislodge them impracticable. Despairing of success by arms, he had again recourse to negotiation; and on the receipt of a large sum of money, Guthrun agreed to evacuate Wessex. The experience of their perfidy to the imbecile Sovereign of Mercia, which should have deterred Alfred from all compromise with the Barbarians, only actuated him to show his distrust of their faith. For the observation of the Treaty, he desired an exchange of hostages; he required the oaths of their leaders upon their bracelets, the most sacred pledge which a Northman could offer; and he had the simplicity to believe that he should exact an additional security by inducing them to swear also upon the relics of Christian Saints. The perfidious Pagans, regardless alike of all obligations, readily complied with each of these demands; but no sooner was Alfred, in the confidence that he had now effectually bound them to depart, thrown off his guard, than a detachment of their army rallying by night from their camp, surprised his cavalry; mounted themselves on the captured horses; and by a rapid march obtained possession of Exeter, before he had leisure to recover from his astonishment or intercept their movements.*

Attempts of Alfred to create a Navy.

The disgrace of having suffered himself to be thus duped by the Northmen, seems for a time to have stimulated Alfred to more energetic exertions. He had previously conceived some idea of the necessity of opposing the invaders on their favourite element; and for this purpose had fitted out a few ships, and manned them with such practical foreigners as he could induce to enter his service. Some advantage which this squadron obtained in an encounter with a small fleet of the Northmen, encouraged him to extend his plan; long war-galleys were built in all his ports; and though unable to force the enemy from their posts either at Wareham or Exeter, he now found himself in a situation to combat them successfully on the sea. The fleet of the invaders, on its passage down the Channel, encountered a violent tempest, which wrecked or disabled half its number of vessels; the remainder were furiously attacked and signally defeated by the Saxon squadron; and, by the previous storm and in the battle, the Northmen are said to have lost no fewer than a hundred and twenty sail. These disasters induced Guthrun to temporize again over proposals of Peace, which Alfred had the strange infatuation once more to entertain. Similar interchange of hostages was made, similar oaths were repeated, a similar Treaty was concluded as before. But on this occasion the Northman King, finding it necessary to suspend his designs, withdrew with his army from the territory of Wessex; and, crossing from Exeter into Mercia, fixed his quarters on the frontiers of the latter Province at Gloucester and its vicinity. There appearing desirous only of peacefully settling with his followers, he divided lands among them; and by this new artifice succeeded in lulling Alfred into a delusive and fatal security.†

Defeat of the North-
man fleet.
A. D.
877.

Alfred again concludes a Peace.

Treachery
of the Northmen.

The success of the Northman's wily policy is the least intelligible circumstance in the reign of Alfred, and equally difficult to be reconciled with the preceding and subsequent activity by which his Government was characterised. The unusual season which Guthrun selected for his next attack seems to offer the only rational explanation of its results: for, contrary to the custom of the Northmen, it was made in the depth of Winter. Early in the month of January, Guthrun and his host suddenly sprang from their perfidious repose on the frontiers of Wessex, and poured like a deluge into the Kingdom. Alfred was so totally unprepared for their approach, that he had barely time to escape, almost unattended, before they entered his Palace at Chippenham; and without a battle, without even a recorded effort to assemble his forces, or to resist the progress of the invaders, we find him a deserted and wandering fugitive through his own dominions. In the expressive words of the Saxon Chronicle, the Danish host rode over the West Saxon land, and therein seated themselves; much of the people they drove over sea, and the rest they put in subjection; save only King Alfred; and he with a little band went uneasily to the woods and fastnesses of the wilds.* The flight of Alfred, after a temporary dismissal of his few followers, he found a secure concealment, was in the heart of Somersetshire, where a morass, formed by the confluence of the Parret and Thone, surrounded about two acres of dry land, which became afterwards celebrated under the name of Ethelingey, or the Prince's Island. Here, alone and disguised, he was sheltered in the cabin of a poor cowherd, who, in ignorance of his real dignity, was taught to believe him at most some fugitive Theng; and a picture, at once lively and affecting, of the condition to which he was reduced is preserved in the well-known and authentic anecdote—for he himself delighted to relate it in happier hour—of the chiding which he patiently received from the herdsmen's shrewish wife for suffering her cakes to be burned. To this retreat he gradually summoned a few of his most faithful retainers, fortified its only accessible point of approach; and began to make successful excursions upon straggling parties of the Northmen. While the enemy were ignorant of the quarter from which they proceeded, these enterprises revealed his existence to his own subjects, revived their despairing spirits, and awakened their native courage. But the first sure ray of hope broke from another quarter. About four months had elapsed since the invasion of the principal army under Guthrun, when another division of Northmen, landing under the ferocious Ubba in Devonshire, laid siege to the castle of Kynwith, into which the brave Ealdorman Odun, with a few Thengs, had hastily thrown themselves. In a desperate sally, the Saxon garrison succeeded in surprising the camp of the Northmen; and slaying Ubba himself, they struck such terror into his followers, that they were routed with great slaughter, and left their enchanted standard, the Raven of Woden, in the hands of the victors.†

Alfred hailed the intelligence of this success as the signal for issuing from his retreat, and placing himself again at the head of his subjects; who, from all sides, were now eagerly awaiting their hour of vengeance against

* Chron. Sax. p. 84.

† Asser, p. 30, 31. It is pleasing to record a circumstance which is not always appended to this tale by our Historians, that Alfred subsequently evinced his gratitude in a very munificent manner to the poor herdsmen who had sheltered him. For, observing his capacity to be good, the King caused him to be instructed in letters, placed him in the Church, and ultimately bestowed the See of Winchester upon him. Malmesbury, p. 242. Chron. Sax. p. 102.

‡ Asser, p. 30, 32. Chron. Sax. p. 84.

* Asser, p. 29. Chron. Sax. p. 83.
† Idem, p. 29. Ibid. p. 83, 84.

Anglo-Saxon Annals.
From
A. D.
800,
to
A. D.
1066. who discover the true Wes-sex war, and crop his invasion.
1. B.
575.

The flight of Alfred.

the invaders. The summons which he privately circulated received a ready obedience; and great numbers of the men of three Counties, Somerset, Wilts, and Hants, met him in arms at the appointed place of assembly—the "Stone of Egbert," on the Eastern confines of Selwood Forest. His presence among his subjects was welcomed with their enthusiastic acclamations; his gathering force was hourly swelled by new arrivals; and emerging from the forest, the Saxon army once more displayed the royal standard of Wessex with the confidence of victory. By the appearance of Alfred in the field, the host of the Northmen were startled from their dream of conquest. But Guthruu was an antagonist too wily to be surprised; and concentrating his forces, he rapidly advanced to encounter his enemy. At Edendune, near Westbury, the two armies engaged in a general and furious conflict, which terminated in the total overthrow of the Northmen. They were pursued by the Saxons with merciless slaughter to a strong camp which they had entrenched in the vicinity: but here Alfred, instead of rashly venturing to provoke their despair by an assault, surrounded them in their works, threw up lines to prevent their egress, and with patient vigilance awaited the sure effect of hunger and weakness. On the fourteenth day of the blockade, the remains of the Northmen host were reduced to extremity, and Guthruu made an offer of capitulation. We may believe that the last vicissitude of fortune had completely humbled his ambition, and disgusted him from further projects of rapine or conquest; for he readily subscribed, and faithfully observed the conditions of peace which Alfred dictated. He consented, for himself and his principal Chieftains, to embrace Christianity; and the new converts were accordingly baptized with much solemnity, Alfred himself becoming their sponsor. He agreed to evacuate Wessex, and left hostages for his fidelity, without receiving any in return; and he finally retired, after some amicable intercourse with his conqueror, to his own Kingdom of East Angia. Two subsequent treaties, which are still extant, were concluded between him and Alfred to define the limits of their respective States, and perpetuate the late pacification. The boundary between the Saxon and Danish possessions was traced by the course of the Thames, the Lea, the old Roman road of Wailing Street, and the Ouse. By this division Mercia was thus surrendered to Alfred: but East Angia, including Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Cambridgeshire, and parts of Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire, was assigned to Guthruu and his followers; and all this portion of England, together with the old Kingdom of Northumbria, being henceforth possessed and gradually filled by a population of Northmen, was contra-distinguished from the Saxon Provinces, under the general term of the DANELAGH, or territory subject to the Danish law.†

It was on this settlement that Alfred, during a subsequent peace of fifteen years, founded those pacific glories of his reign, which, far more than his warlike achievements, have perpetuated the lustre of his name. He had recovered his patrimonial dominions of Wessex and Kent, and acquired the full sovereignty of Mercia, which he committed to the immediate government of his daughter Ethelfleda, and her husband the Ealdorman Ethelred. The Danes of East Angia and Northumbria, nominally at least, recognised his general supremacy; and even the British Princes of Wales, exhausted by their incessant feuds with each other, were glad to terminate their struggle for ascendancy, by placing themselves under his protection, and acknowledging their common allegiance to his Throne.* He had thus acquired a more signal preeminence over all the States of the Island than had been enjoyed by his grandsire Egbert; and he employed his power even more honourably, in promoting the security, happiness, and civilization of his People: in organizing the means of national defence and public order, in improving both the construction and the administration of the laws, and, above all, in the restoration and encouragement of learning and piety.

The experience of the Northman descents had woefully proved the inadequacy of the ordinary Saxon means of defence. Their fortresses were few in number and contemptible in strength; and the first care of Alfred's policy was to secure all the most assailable and inviting points of debarkation. After instituting a diligent survey of the coasts, he selected the best positions of defence, and in the course of his reign covered the entrance into the principal harbours and navigable rivers of his dominions by no less than fifty strong castles. He also followed up his early plan for the creation of a navy; caused vessels to be constructed of superior magnitude, both in their length and the height of their decks, to those of the Northmen; and to encourage the improvement of his mariners by his own presence, often led his squadrons in the cruises against the pirates in which he continually employed them for the security of the coast. Nor did he suffer his people to depend only for their defence upon his maritime fortresses and navy; for the whole male population of every Province were enrolled into a militia, of which, by rotation, one-half was always held in readiness, under their Ealdorman, to march to any part of the coast which might be threatened with attack, while the other moiety remained to cultivate the soil.†

The restoration of internal order in the State, out of the universal confusion and ruin into which the ravages of the Northmen had broken the whole frame of civil government, was even a more difficult task than to organize a system of defence against external enemies. Wherever the Northmen had penetrated, the tribunals had been overthrown; all legal restraints were dissolved; and the retreat of the invaders left the natives almost as fierce, barbarous, and lawless as themselves. Alfred hastened to reclaim them to habits of peace and subordination, by reestablishing the regular courts of judicature; and he laboured incessantly not only to secure the enforcement, but to purify the administration of justice. Many of the judges whom he found in office were ignorant, tyrannical, and corrupt: but the readiness with which the King received appeals from their courts, and the close attention with which he scrutinized their judgments, soon taught them that they could no longer

Anglo-Saxon Annals.

From A. D. 800, to A. D. 1066.

General recognition of his supremacy in England and Wales. Virtues of his civil government.

Care of the national defence.

His fortifications,

navy,

and militia.

Administration of justice.

* The oft-repeated tale that Alfred visited the camp of the Northmen disguised as a harper, and observing their careless security, afterwards fell upon them by surprise, rests only on the authority of Ingulfus, (who did not live until a Century later,) and is uncorroborated by Asser, who must have heard the story from his royal master if it had been true, and could not have failed to relate so remarkable an occurrence if he had heard it.

† Asser, p. 35. Chron. Sax. p. 86. Leges Sax. (quod Wilkins,) p. 47, 51.

* Asser, p. 49, 50.

† Asser, ubi supra. Chron. Sax. p. 92, 93.

History.

From
A. D.
800. to
A. D.
1066.

And compilation of Laws.

His encouragement
of learning.

oppress the lowest of the People with impunity. For simple incompetence or negligence, they were removed from their offices; but their intentional delinquencies were visited with condign punishment; and the tradition which imputed to Alfred the execution of above forty magistrates for their iniquitous or illegal conduct in a single year,* even if unfounded, attests the popular belief of his stern and impartial justice against his own Officers. To guide them in the correct exercise of duties which he thus rigidly exacted, he methodized and amended the laws of his predecessors; and, with the consent of his Witeana, as he was careful to declare, published the collection for the national observance. This code does not indeed, as it has sometimes erroneously been assumed, entitle him to any peculiar merit as an original legislator: for its provisions, as well as the earlier laws from which it was chiefly compiled, are still extant, and differ little from each other. But with a true wisdom, adapted to his position and his times, Alfred was more solicitous to retain and renovate institutions which he might know to be defective, than to hazard new experiments which might prove unsuitable to the character and wants of his people.† Even many regulations which have been vulgarly ascribed to his policy, such as the division of England into Counties, Hundreds, and Tythings, the law of Frank-pledge, or mutual responsibility of the men of a Tything for each other's appearance to answer criminal charges, and the establishment of Trial by Jury, were all either of earlier or later origin than his Age; and the veneration which the real benefits of his government deservedly gained for his memory, is in nothing more emphatically marked than in this disposition of posterity to refer every useful institution of police and judicature to his reign.

The paternal benevolence and justice of his administration were naturally the qualities most affectionately appreciated by his People: but the respect in which the scholars of every subsequent Age have gratefully united to cherish his fame, is, perhaps, chiefly due to his efforts for the encouragement of learning. The destruction of the Monasteries by the Northmen had almost extinguished in England the few sparks of literature which, during the Dark Ages, were kept alive only in those retreats; the libraries which they contained were burnt; and the learned recluses, the sole instructors of the times, were either murdered or dispersed in beggary. Hence the very Clergy had become as illiterate as the Laity; and we have the declaration of Alfred himself, that at the period of his accession to the throne, scarcely a person could be found in his own Kingdom South of the Thames able to translate a Latin book into his vernacular tongue.§ To correct this lamentable state of ignorance, he invited learned men from other parts of England and from foreign Countries to his Court, and loaded them with favours; he established schools in various parts of his dominions, at which he compelled his unlettered Nobles and Officers to place their children, and even to receive instruction themselves under pain of losing their employments in the State; and he required every candidate for Civil or Ecclesiastical preferment to gain a knowledge of the Latin language. But it was further his desire that the children of every freeman in his dominions, in a condition above penury, should be taught, in their native English, the elements of reading and writing; and so anxious was he to extend the scanty stores of Saxon literature for the national benefit, that he himself undertook and accomplished the translation of several Latin works of useful entertainment and piety avowedly for this purpose. An illustrious example, and perhaps the only one to be found in the History of the World, of a Prince, amidst the manifold cares of Empire, applying his mind to the literary, moral, and religious instruction of his People.‡

The long and prosperous interval of tranquillity, which Alfred had employed in these benevolent exertions, was suddenly terminated by a renewal of the same calamities of foreign invasion which, in the commencement of his Reign, had brought his Kingdom to the verge of destruction. After having, as we have seen, made France the prey of incessant devastation, the Northmen, led by Hastings, the most renowned and dreaded of their Sea-kings, now abandoned for a season their desultory assaults upon that exhausted Country, to attempt once more the permanent conquest of England. Throughout this new contest, in which Alfred had the affliction to witness the ravage of his Kingdom, and the dismal interruption of his plans of social improvement, the utility of his systematic preparations for the public defence was strikingly evinced; and his activity and conduct in the field were no less admirable than the foresight and wisdom of his previous arrangements. Yet it cost him three years of almost uninterrupted action to repel the furious and indefatigable assaults of the invaders; and the duration and danger of the struggle, so difficultly supported in the meridian of his power, prove that it must have been undertaken by the enemy with more formidable resources, and maintained with greater obstinacy and skill, than any of their former enterprises. But the stern details of barbarous and fruitless invasions are little worthy of remembrance; and we shall dismiss, as briefly as possible, the events of four bloody and destructive campaigns.

In the first, Hastings, having collected his fleet to the number of above three hundred sail in the port of Boulogne, landed his forces in two divisions on the Kentish shore; where, according to their usage, they immediately secured themselves by entrenchments. Alfred, as soon as he could assemble the militia of his Kingdom, advanced to the coast, and selected a strong position with so much judgment between the points of descent, that he for some time paralyzed the movements of both the invading armies. With the characteristic perfidy of his race, Hastings endeavoured to extricate himself from his difficulties by offers of peace; and while on his part he amused Alfred with negotiations, his confederates, secretly breaking up from their camp, penetrated by forced marches into Wessex, before the King could intercept them. But Alfred, being joined by his son Edward and the reserves of the Wessex Militia, pursued the route of the Northmen with so much celerity that he overtook them at Farnham in Surrey; and there by a complete and sanguinary victory inflicted a signal vengeance for their devastations. The remains of their host which escaped the slaughter, were compelled to capitulate on condition of quitting the Kingdom.†

* These instances are given at length in Horac's Miroir des Justices, (p. 296–300.) written in the XIVth Century.

† Leges Sax. p. 28–46. Auser, p. 69.

‡ This is proved by the best authorities; but see Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. ii. p. 390–402.

§ Alfred, Prof. ad Greg. Post. Wisc's Auser, p. 82.

* Auser, p. 43. 49. 60. 67. 71. &c. Prof. ad Post. p. 84, 85.

† Chron. Sax. p. 91. 93.

Anglo-Saxon
Annals.
From
A. D.
800. to
A. D.
1066.

Renewal of the Northmen invasions under Hastings.
A. D.
881.

Alfred's conduct of Alfred.

Obituary of this war.

First and last campaigns of Hastings.

Defeat
of the Northmen.

While Alfred was thus engaged, he was summoned to repel a new danger from the restless and treacherous spirit of the Danish colonists of East Anglia and Northumbria. Guthrun, who since his conversion to Christianity and his settlement in the former Province, had religiously maintained his obligations to his conqueror, had now been some years dead; and no longer restrained by his influence, his former subjects eagerly availed themselves of this critical juncture to break off their fealty to Alfred, and began to cooperate with their countrymen. Doubling the Forelands of Kent, a fleet of East-Anglian Danes, consisting of one hundred sail, proceeded down the Channel and attacked the Southern coast of Devonshire; while a squadron of smaller force, equipped in Northumbria, and circumnavigating Scotland, appeared simultaneously on the Northern shores of the same County. Hastings also, now temporizing no longer, revealed the full extent of his faithless designs; for instead of evacuating England altogether, according to a treaty which he had concluded, he had only withdrawn from his obstructed position in Kent to land on the coast of Essex. Alfred met these redoubled attacks with wonderful promptitude. Leaving his infantry in the East to watch the motions of Hastings, he traversed Wessex with his horse to Exeter which the Anglian Danes were already besieging; and fell upon them with such furious slaughter, that he drove them in confusion to their ships. In his absence, and while Hastings had quitted his works on the coast to ravage Mercia, the Saxon troops surprised the Danish encroachments at Bemfist in Essex, and captured the shipping, treasures, and family of the Sea-king. In an age of cruelty, and in opposition to the counsel of his officers, Alfred had the magnanimity to restore the wife and children of Hastings unharmed and unransomed; and the Northman, humbled by these repeated discomfures, again sued for peace, and obtained it on the former condition of quitting England. It is uncertain whether he fulfilled this treaty better than the last. The hosts of Northmen, whose ravages still continued to afflict the Island, seem to have been the same which he had commanded: but it is remarkable that the name of Hastings himself is, from this epoch, no longer distinguished as their leader by the Saxon Chronicle; and a few years later he reappears in French History on the theatre of his former exploits.*

During the subsequent conduct of the war, the order and combination which Alfred had introduced into the employment of the national force, enabled him every where to present a superiority to the invaders; but all his efforts could not protect different parts of his Kingdom from exposure to the inroads of the Northmen, through the rapidity with which their movements were always executed. The remains of the invading bands of Hastings, joined by numerous bodies of their East-Anglian and Northumbrian countrymen, bursting out of Essex, twice crossed the Island to the banks of the Severn and the Dee; and though each time besieged and defeated in the West, they effected their return to their Eastern quarters. From thence, embarking and entering the Thames, they narrowly failed of success in an attempt to surprise London; and ascending the river Lea with their fleet, they fortified a position in which they passed the winter. But here Alfred once more besieging them, so completely prevented the egress of their fleet by ingeniously diverting the course of the waters, that to avoid being starved in their camp, they abandoned their useless shipping, and again broke away into the interior of the Country. They had reached the banks of the Severn before the King could arrest their progress; nor could he prevent their wintering in a new fortified position at Bridgenorth on that river. But thus constantly pursued, harassed, and besieged, with a perseverance and courage equal to their own, and with resources which the activity of Alfred and the national union of his subjects had now rendered superior; the spirit of the Northmen was at length exhausted and broken. From Bridgenorth they dispersed in small bodies; those who evaded the Saxon sword effected their return to East Anglia and Northumbria, where some finally settled; and the residue embarking joined the marauding squadrons of their countrymen on the French shores. From thence they still continued at intervals to infest the Channel and the English coasts with their piracies; but the navy which Alfred had created frequently eluded their attempts, and captured so many of their vessels, that they were soon deterred from the prosecution of these barren enterprises.*

Alfred survived this second deliverance of his Kingdom only about three years; and the horrors of a pestilence, the consequence perhaps of the devastations of warfare, clouded the last triumphs of his reign. His days closed prematurely, for he expired before the completion of his fifty-second year: † so short was that life of brilliant and virtuous action, by which, in the midst of violence and barbarism, he deservedly won an immortality of renown. That his martial constancy and genius twice rescued his people from the scourge of destructive invasions, might alone have sufficed to enrol him in the catalogue of Royal Heroes; but the qualities on which the vulgar greatness of conquest is founded, constitute the least part of his merit. The fame of Alfred rests on the sure basis of intellectual, moral, and religious excellence. His generous thirst of universal knowledge, his zeal for the restoration of learning, and his anxiety for the instruction of his people, attest his immeasurable superiority to the times which produced him; his deep sense of responsibility in the just and beneficent discharge of his duties as a Monarch, has seldom been equalled, and never surpassed, at any epoch; and his sincere and rational piety as a Man, which was habitual in his mind, and conspicuous alike in his writings and conduct, would have adorned the purest Ages of Christian faith and practice.

To believe, as some writers in their just admiration of the character of Alfred have too fondly imagined, that his great qualities were without alloy, would be to falsify not only all experience of human nature, but the positive evidence of his contemporaries and friends. Though the fair promise of his youthful virtues had won the national love even before his accession to the Throne, yet it is certain that the first years of his Reign were disgraced by some neglects of duty, and some immoralities of personal conduct. For his friend and biographer Asser, writing under his eye, confesses of his expulsion from his Throne, that this adversity overtook him "not undeservedly;" because in the insolence of youth he had

Anglo-Saxon Annals.

From A. D. 800. to A. D. 1066.

Alfred blocks up their fleet.

Final dispersion of the Northmen, and close of the war. A. D. 897.

Death of Alfred. A. D. 900.

His character.

His merits, and defects.

* Chron. Sax. p. 93, 94. Recueil des Hist. Français, vol. vii. p. 221.

* Chron. Sax. p. 94. 99.

† Alfred's death is placed by some Chroniclers in 900, by others a year later. Ingulf. p. 28. Chron. Sax. p. 99. &c.

History. failed to render justice to his subjects, and haughtily turned a deaf ear to their complaints.* Asser further declares that St. Neot, the kinsman of Alfred, had deplored these errors, and forebode their punishment;† and an ancient life of that virtuous recluse expressly repeats,‡ though still in general terms, the good man's ineffectual remonstrance against those vices of conduct in his young Sovereign, which Asser, while regard to truth compelled him to record, was restrained by delicacy or partiality towards a Royal Patron from more plainly particularizing. But whatever had been these errors, they were nobly redeemed, and the spirit of Alfred was chastened in that adversity which he himself believed to have been inflicted as the penalty of his sins§. In his later life, indeed, some faults of temper are equally discernible: but these were of an opposite nature from the irregularities of youth; and may be said to have had their origin only in the very virtues of his character. His zeal for the good order and improvement of society sometimes betrayed him into harsh and arbitrary regulations for the promotion of his laudable objects: even his severe love of justice degenerated too often into a stern and cruel persecution of offenders. Yet these were but the excesses of good intentions and principles; and, if not defensible in themselves, are scarcely to be weighed in the balance against the immense concomitant benefits of intellectual knowledge and moral discipline to a rude and disorderly Age.

Estimate of his literary genius and attainments.

To estimate minutely the mental accomplishments of this great and good King, is the business rather of Literary than Political History. But when, on a general view of his qualities, it is considered that his early education had been defective even for his times, and that his acquisition of the Latin Language was not gained until he was near forty years of age, the knowledge of letters which he displays in his writings cannot fail to excite our surprise; and the enlargement of mind evinced in his reflections is still more admirable. His desire of information was particularly shown in geographical inquiries; and the mission on which he sent one of his Bishops, Swithelm, with alms to the Christians of Malabar,‡ from a mixed feeling of pious benevolence and curiosity, has been justly regarded as not only a strong proof of his well-informed and inquisitive spirit, but as the most memorable enterprise of its kind in that Age. The existence of no scholar, in a private station or a lettered epoch, was ever marked by more intense devotion to the acquisition of learning, than the busy and distracted life of this Sovereign of a semi-barbarous People; and while diligently attending to the occupations of State, Alfred contrived by the methodical division of his time to find leisure for the cultivation of his favourite studies. It wonderfully enhances the merit of these intellectual exertions that they were pursued throughout a public life, not only of mental anxiety and active labour, but of almost incessant corporeal agony: for he was afflicted with a malady, which is conjectured, from the description of its symptoms, to have been an internal cancer, and which from his twentieth year to the hour of his death scarcely permitted him any respite from excruciating torture.*

The striking vicissitudes which distinguished the Reign of Alfred, and the pleasing interest with which his character is invested, have deserved some extended detail, even in the closest abridgement of our National Annals: the inferior merits and actions of his descendants may be dismissed with more brevity. He was succeeded by his eldest son, Edward, to the exclusion of the children of King Ethelred, whose claims to the Throne, though well founded according to our modern laws of inheritance, were rejected by the Witenagemot. This exclusion was no more than a repetition of that departure from the strict order of succession, which had procured the election of Alfred himself to the Crown, in preference to the same right in the family of his elder brother; but it now produced a Civil war. Ethelwold, the son of Ethelred, after an ineffectual attempt to maintain his pretensions against his cousin in Wessex, fled to the restless Danes of Northumbria and East Anglia; by whom his cause was readily espoused, and his title to the paramount Sovereignty of England admitted. At the head of these turbulent partisans, aided by their roving countrymen from the Baltic and France, the exile Ethelwold carried on a harassing contest against his own Nation for several years: until his death, in a battle which his Danish auxiliaries gained against the men of Kent, relieved Edward from a dangerous competitor. His fall was followed by a pacification between the King and the Northumbrian and East Anglian Danes.†

Edward, who has been distinguished from later Kings of his line and name as the Elder, was a Prince of warlike and politic genius; and in the sequel of his Reign he accomplished two important steps towards the consolidation of the Saxon Monarchy. These were the final incorporation of Mercia into Wessex; and the curbing of the Danish independence in the Eastern and Northern Provinces. The first of these objects he suspended during the life of his sister, Ethelfleda, a woman of masculine spirit and talent, who, as we have seen, jointly with her less energetic husband the Ealdorman Ethelred, had long governed Mercia, under a commission from her father Alfred. After the death of her consort, the "Lady of Mercia," as she was called, essentially aided her brother in his wars with the Danes, by her own martial exploits against the common enemy: yet, on her decease, the services which she had rendered to him did not prevent Edward from seizing the person and inheritance of her hapless daughter, on the plea of her treasonable intention to marry a Danish Prince; and thenceforth Mercia became an integral part of the West Saxon Kingdom. With a more justifiable policy, Edward had availed himself of the disunion of the numerous petty States into which the Danish Provinces were now divided, to restrain and break their power. He built or seized, in conjunction with Ethelfleda, a strong line of frontier fortresses to protect his own dominions and overawe the possessions of the enemy; he

* Asser, p. 31.

† Ibid., p. 32.

‡ Vita Sancti Neoti, in Act. SS. Ben. vol. ii. p. 330. &c.

§ Attempts have been made, by straining some expressions in the text of Asser and others, to prove that the success of the Northmen in expelling Alfred from his Throne was favoured by the disgust which his misconduct had excited among his own subjects. But this hypothesis is unsupported by the account given in the Saxon Chronicle, as before cited; by which it appears clearly that both Alfred and his West Saxons were surprised by the winter expedition of Guthrun; nor is the previous disaffection of his people very reconcilable with the enthusiasm with which they hailed his reappearance only four months later.

|| Chron. Sax. p. 86. Hunt. p. 350.

* Asser, p. 40. 42.

† Chron. Sax. p. 99—101. Hunt. p. 352.

Anglo-Saxon Annals.

From A. D. 800. to A. D. 1066. Reign of Edward the Elder.

A. D. 903.

His successful projects.

He finally annexes Mercia to Wessex.

A. D. 910.

Anglo-Saxon Annals.
From A. D. 800, to A. D. 1066.

Great Battle of Brunanburgh.
A. D. 934.

Victory of Athelstan,

thenceforth the FIRST MONARCH OF ALL ENGLAND.

His protection of Foreign Princes.
Haco of Norway,

Saxon yoke. The operations of the confederacy display a degree of concert very remarkable for that Age. Anlaf, the son of the late King of Northumbria, who had retired to Ireland, and conquered a Principality for himself on its coast, was instigated by the King of the Scots to attempt the recovery of his paternal inheritance. He collected so enormous a force, as to fill above six hundred sail of shipping; and entering the Humber, he had no sooner landed on the Northumbrian shores with a mixed and formidable host, composed of Anglo-Danes, Irish, and levies of Northmen from the Baltic, than he was immediately joined, not only by the army of his Scottish ally, but bands of the Cumbrian and Welsh Britons under their respective Princes. Athelstan prepared to encounter this tremendous invasion with firmness and activity; by publishing offers of high reward to such foreign warriors as would enter his service, he allured several roving Sea-kings to his standard; and he succeeded in amusing the confederates with negotiations until his forces were assembled. At length, near some unascertained place in the North of England, named Brunanburgh, the hostile armies closed in a fierce and memorable encounter of Nations, the events of which have been equally renowned in Saxon and Scandinavian song. After a battle more obstinate, and a slaughter more terrific, as it is declared, than had ever been known since Briton and Saxon, Saxon and Northman, had striven for the mastery, the victory remained with Athelstan. Of the five confederate Nations, as they are enumerated, Danes, Norwegians, Britons, Scots, and Irish, immense multitudes fell: the son of the King of Scots, five Sea-kings, and many Jarls, were numbered with the slain; and Anlaf himself and his Scottish ally only escaped, the former to Ireland and the latter to his own Country, with a miserable remnant of their followers. This great victory secured the domestic dominion of Athelstan, and even extended his fame to foreign lands. The Princes of the old British race in Wales and Cumbria, hopeless of further resistance, thenceforth tamely submitted to his sway; those of Northman blood throughout the Danelagh had either perished, or were compelled to sink into the same dependent rank with his own Nobles; and blending the whole of the Saxon and Danish Provinces, of which the Octarchy had originally been composed, into one Kingdom, Athelstan became, in reality as in title, the FIRST MONARCH OF ALL ENGLAND.*

The remainder of his reign was undisturbed and glorious; and the high reputation which his personal virtues, even more than his successes and power, had obtained for him, not only in his own Kingdom but throughout Europe, is remarkably expressed in several transactions. Such was the respect in which he was held, that three foreign Princes were committed in infancy to his care; received their education at his Court; and were ultimately placed on their Thrones by his aid. These were Haco, King of Norway, whose virtues ob-

* Chron. Sax. p. 111—114. Ingulfus, p. 29—37. Malmshury, p. 49—52. Egilli Saga, (Johnston, Celtic Scandinavia;) p. 31.

† The amiable qualities as well as the talents of Athelstan are celebrated by all the Chroniclers of his Reign. The story which attributes to him the death of his eldest legitimate brother, Edwin, who perished at sea, has not seemed to deserve a place in the text, for it is at variance with every recorded trait of his benevolent character; Malmshury, in repeating it from a talled, seems to doubt its truth. (p. 48. fcc.) and the Saxons Chronicle merely states (p. 111.) the fact of the Prince's being lost at sea.

repeatedly defeated them in conflicts which he probably provoked; and, before his death, he had compelled all their Princes to acknowledge him for their lord, and to swear allegiance to his person.*

By these achievements, Edward prepared the foundation for the greatness of his more distinguished son and successor, Athelstan. This Prince, notwithstanding the probable disgrace of his birth,—for there is reason to conclude that his mother was only the concubine of Edward,—was preferred by his father's will to his legitimate brothers; and the choice of the Witenagemot confirmed the Royal testament. If the title of Athelstan to the Throne was really defective, his personal merit justified his elevation. Even in infancy he had given such indications of superior intelligence, as to have been the delight of his grandsire Alfred, who prematurely invested the child with the highest National insignia of princely and martial honour; a purple mantle, a jewelled belt, and a short sword—the seax, or proper weapon of the Saxon—in a golden scabbard. As Athelstan grew to man's estate, he enjoyed the good fortune to be placed under the care of his celebrated aunt, Ethelfleda, by whom he was probably instructed with characteristic ability in public affairs; and as he had reached the age of thirty years before he ascended the Throne, he commenced his reign with the advantage of a matured judgment and experience. These acquirements, founded upon an excellent understanding, enabled him to complete the successful designs of his father for the effectual reduction of all England under one sceptre. His first enterprise was to extinguish the remains of Danish independence in Northumbria. For this he found an opportunity, in the year after his accession, on the death of Sihtric, the Northman Sovereign, to whom he had shortly before given his sister in marriage; and invading that Province, he put the sons of the deceased Chieftain to flight, and annexed the whole territory to his immediate dominions. This success stimulated the ambition of Athelstan; and the dread of his power ensured its universal recognition. The Prince of Cumbria, and the King of the Scots, acknowledged themselves his subjects; and the latter, in a subsequent attempt to assert his independence, was reduced to witness the ravage of his territories, and to surrender his son as a hostage for his fidelity. Over the Britons of Cornwall and Wales, Athelstan equally extended his dominion. Hitherto the former had still continued to maintain some degree of independence of the Crown of Wessex. They possessed all the Cornish peninsula from the Land's End to the Exe, and held one half of Exeter. From that city Athelstan now expelled them; strongly fortified the place to command the surrounding territory; and obliging all its inhabitants of British race to retire beyond the Tamar, reduced them into complete subjection to the Government of Wessex. Leading his forces into Wales, he compelled all its Princes to do homage, and become tributary to him; and permanently annexing the whole of the border country, as far as the right bank of the Wye, to Mercia, he confined the future limits of Wales within that river.†

The apprehension excited by the ambitious encroachments of Athelstan among the Danish, British, and Scottish Chieftains, produced the uncommon spectacle of a general union of these rude powers to throw off the

* Chron. Sax. p. 101—110. Hunt. p. 353, 354.

† Chron. Sax. p. 111. Malmshury; p. 46—50.

History.

From
A. D.
900,
to
A. D.
1066.

Alan of Brittany,

and Louis
IV. of France.

Reigns of Edmund I.
A. D.
941.

trained for him the surname of the Good; Alan of Brittany; and Louis IV. of France. The Norwegian Prince had been sent to Athelstan by his father, Harold Harfagre, renowned among the Scandinavian Sovereigns of the Age for his power and his suppression of the piracies of the Sea-kings. On the death of this Monarch, the tyranny of his eldest son induced the Norwegians to invite the younger, Haco, to the Throne; and Athelstan supplied his pupil with forces to undertake the expedition, which was crowned with success.* The ravage of Brittany by the Northmen under Rollo had occasioned the flight of many of the inhabitants to England; and among them was one of their Princes, with his infant son Alan. Athelstan undertook the education of the boy, and on his attaining the age of manhood sent him back to his Country attended by the Breton exiles and a body of Saxon warriors. By the aid of these retainers, and the native population of his race, young Alan by degrees recovered his patrimony, and became the founder of the Ducal House of Brittany.† This History of Louis IV. will be found in the Annals of France; and it may here suffice to record that the succour of Athelstan was mainly instrumental in restoring his exiled nephew and ward to his Throne.‡ Nor were the foreign relations of the English Monarch confined to these instances of protection: for the Emperor Henry the Fowler was induced by his fame to seek a family alliance with him; and obtained the sister of Athelstan for the bride of his son Otho.§

On the death of Athelstan without issue, the Crown of England devolved upon his brother Edmund. The commencement of this Prince's Reign was disturbed by a new invasion of Northumbria under Aulaf, who since his disastrous defeat at Brunanburgh, had been intimidated from any renewal of hostilities against Athelstan, but was now encouraged by the decease of that powerful Monarch to attempt the recovery of his Northumbrian patrimony. Landing from the Humber with a powerful army, he not only established himself in the North of England, but reduced Edmund, after a series of hostilities, to conclude a treaty by which the possession of the Kingdom was divided between them. The particulars of this enterprise of Aulaf are even more obscurely than briefly related in the Chronicles of the Age: but its success offers so strange a contradiction to the strength which was recently apparent in the Saxon Monarchy, that it can only be explained by the suspicion of some national disunion, or disaffection to the youthful government of Edmund. But whatever were the causes which had produced an accommodation so disgraceful to the English King, the death of his rival soon relieved him from its ignominy; and Edmund immediately seized the fortunate occasion to reestablish his dominion over the Northern Provinces. The complete restoration of his authority is proved by his subsequent conquest of the British Principality of Cumbria or Strathclyde, which, after deposing its Sovereign, he bestowed upon Malcolm, King of Scots, subject to the condition that he should hold it under the Crown of England, and render aid in opposing all future invasions of the Northmen. The short Reign of Edmund was closed by a tragical event, of which the details are involved in much uncertainty. He was murdered during a banquet, probably in some drunken brawl; but, according to the tale usually received, by a notorious robber named Leof, who, having some years before been banished for his crimes, audaciously forced himself into the Royal presence. Enraged at the intrusion, the King is said to have started from his seat and seized him by the hair, when the outlaw plunged a dagger into his breast. The King expired on the spot; and the murderer was immediately put to death by his attendants. There are other versions of the story differing essentially in their details. But in all, the single, indisputable circumstance most worthy of observation is that which betrays the barbarous state of manners: the casual murder of the King in an hour of festivity.*

Although Edmund left two infant sons, the Crown was bestowed by a Saxon Witenagemot, at which some of the Welsh Princes appear to have assisted, upon his brother Edred. The only event worthy of record in the brief reign of this Prince was the final reduction of the Northumbrian Danes into immediate dependence on the English Crown, and the complete annexation of their State to the Saxon Kingdom. Availing himself of the provocation afforded by their repeated revolts, and the weakness engendered by the rivalry of their contending Chiefs, Edred led a large army into their Country; punished their rebellion by the cruel devastation of many of its finest districts; and carried off all the principal Nobles as captives or hostages. To consolidate his authority, he parcelled the whole of the North of England into Counties with subdivisions similar to those of the Saxon Provinces; committed the administration of each district to an officer of his own appointment; and for ever abolishing the regal title which the Danish Chieftains had arrogated, placed the whole of Northumbria under the superintendence of a single Nobleman with the title of Earl. These measures were effectual; and with the settlement imposed by Edred, terminated the long struggle of the Northmen for independence in those seats, which they had originally won from the Anglo-Saxons.†

After wearing the Crown no more than nine years, Edred, whose whole life had been a prey to disease, died without leaving any children, and was succeeded by Edwin, or Edwy, the eldest of his two nephews, who appears to have been, at the epoch of his accession, scarcely eighteen years of age. Inglorious in its political relations, and unfortunate in its domestic occurrences, the reign of Edwin might claim little notice, if its principal incident had not alternately afforded a subject for popular romance and controversial zeal. In our own times, at the distance of nine centuries, the insignificant quarrel of a Saxon Prince and a Romish Saint has been revived in a spirit which betrays at least as much polemical virulence as anxiety for Historical truth; and modern research into so unimportant a part of our annals has been busily occupied with the character and actions of the canonized Monk. This was the famous Dunstan, first Abbot of Glastonbury, and afterwards

* Malmesbury, p. 51. Snorre, p. 121—159.

† Chron. Nantecense, in Recueil des Hist. Franç. vol. viii. p. 276.

‡ Chron. Flodoardi, (in eodem opere,) vol. viii. p. 184. 193, &c.

§ Ingulf, p. 39. Hrosvida, de Gestis Oddonis, p. 165, &c.

* Chron. Sar. p. 114, 115. Ingulf, p. 29, 30. Malmesbury, p. 53.

† Chron. Sar. p. 115. Ingulf, p. 30—41.

‡ Among the extant lives of Dunstan most usually consulted, are those by Osborne, (published in Wharton's Anglia Sacra, vol. ii.) by Eadmer, (of which extracts are printed in the same volume.)

Anglo-Saxon Annals
From
A. D.
502,
to
A. D.
1066.

and Earl
J. B.
946.

Final observation [unclear]
[unclear]
J. B.
946.

Annals of 1270
J. B.
946.

Life of Dunstan

Anglo-Saxon Annals.

From
A. D.
800
to
A. D.
1066.

Rise of Ecclesiastical and Political influence.

His quarrel with Edwin,

History. Archbishop of Canterbury; whose genius constituted him the most remarkable man of his Country and Age; and whose ambitious ascendancy in Civil and Ecclesiastical affairs renders him the most prominent actor in the reigns of Edwin and his successor. The birth of Dunstan was noble; and the care of his education having been intrusted to the Clergy of Glastonbury, the most celebrated seat of learning in the Kingdom, he was early initiated into all the Sciences and accomplishments, such as they were, of which the times could boast. His youth was already distinguished by these acquirements, when his intense application to study produced a violent illness, which seems to have had a remarkable effect upon his subsequent character and conduct in life. His disorder terminated in delirium; and it is recorded that, during its paroxysm, he leapt from his couch, wandered to the roof of the Church of Glastonbury, and fell unhurt into the aisle. After this providential escape, which was magnified into a miracle, he was introduced by his uncle, Athelm, Archbishop of Canterbury, at the Court of Athelstan, where his general talents, and especially his proficiency in music, at first excited the interest and amused the leisure of the King. But the envious whispers of rivals poisoned the Royal ear; a suspicion, the honourable evidence of his superiority, that he was indebted for his accomplishments to magical practices, or some other charge less absurd, was employed to alienate the growing favour of Athelstan; and the young aspirant being driven from the Court, withdrew to the protection of his uncle. At this epoch he formed an attachment to a young maiden of his own rank, and would have wedded her: but the Archbishop opposed the union, and earnestly exhorted him to embrace the Monastic profession. His refusal was followed by a second violent illness, caused probably by mental anxiety and the twofold disappointment of youthful ambition and love; the suggestions of his Ecclesiastical friends taught him to consider the sufferings and the hallucinations of disease as special signs of the Divine Will; and when he arose from a sick bed, he was an altered man. Renouncing the world, he returned to the place of his education; took the Monastic vows; and for some years served the church of Glastonbury. But his ardent spirit, wounded by blighted passions and darkened by fanaticism, was incapable of the calmness of true devotion. Not contented with observing the usual obligations of cloistered discipline, he imposed on himself the most extravagant severities, and in a life of seclusion and penance, fed the malady of an afflicted heart and a disturbed imagination. It need not be doubted that these austerities increased the mental disorder to which he had already been subject. He fancied himself assailed by the powers of darkness; he related both his combats with the Evil One, and the celestial visions which comforted his victorious faith; and the particulars of these spiritual encounters were probably at first detailed by himself, and received by his superstitious auditory, with equal sincerity.*

and a MS. in the British Museum (Cleopatra, B 13.) quoted by Mr. Turner.

* Osborn, Vita Dunstani, (p. 88. 97.) It is this Writer who relates the well-known tale of St. Dunstan's conflict with the Devil. While the Saint was busily engaged during the night in his favourite exercise of working metals, the tempter thrust his head in at the window of the lonely cell; and his sturdy antagonist immediately seized him by the nose with a pair of red-hot pincers,

Up to this epoch, the conduct of Dunstan is readily explicable without any presumption of intentional fraud. It is evident from the repeated effects of illness that he had that unhappy constitutional predisposition to enthusiasm, which is not unfrequently found in conjunction with the most acute intellectual powers, and perfectly compatible with their vigorous exercise. It was the misfortune of his early years to be thwarted in the pursuit of honourable distinction and the indulgence of virtuous affection; and under the temporary pressure of the agonizing struggles and consequent derangement of his mind, he became a victim to a mistaken sense of duty and a prey to the fatal illusions of solitude. His imaginative genius misled his feelings; and his ardent piety degenerated into fanaticism. But, in the history of the human mind, from fanaticism, when allied to great and ambitious talents, there has ever been found a sure stage of progression to recovered judgment and final imposture. At that period in the life of Dunstan this change was wrought, it is not difficult to conjecture. The fame of his trials and his sanctity quickly spread from the vicinity of his cell to the remotest parts of the Kingdom; and Edmund, the successor of Athelstan, invited the holy recluse to that Court, from which the young and accomplished Thegn had been ignominiously driven. Dunstan eagerly obeyed the call; for his ambition had slumbered not died, its objects were partially changed not its impulses extinguished; and emerging from his narrow cell, the Monk, now aspiring to establish his own power on the aggrandizement of his Order, by degrees acquired the greatest influence over the Ecclesiastical and Civil administration of the Kingdom. By Edmund he was made Abbot of Glastonbury, and treated with much veneration; and Edred not only took him for the spiritual director of his conscience, but surrendered to him the charge of all his earthly treasures, and the virtual government of the State.*

From this elevation Dunstan sustained a temporary fall on the death of his Royal patron. Edwin, who had been taught to consider himself wrongfully excluded from the possession of his Crown by the usurpation of his uncle, no sooner ascended the throne than he rashly began to betray his distrust and hatred towards all the favourites of the late reign, and especially towards Dunstan. The ministers of Edred were expelled from their offices; and the Clergy, who had received many rich endowments through the influence of the Abbot of Glastonbury, were violently dispossessed. It is not safe to receive implicitly the odious portrait which the Monkish Chroniclers, with no unnatural zeal for their outraged Order, have drawn of the vices of Edwin; but amidst their probable exaggerations it may be discerned that in the young King, with a beauty of person which obtained for him the surname of the Fair, were united many mental deformities: he was vain and debauched, passionate and tyrannical. These qualities might excite the indignation of the austere Abbot of Glastonbury: it is certain that they were shortly rendered a pretext for the most audacious attack of a subject upon the personal dignity of a Sovereign, of which History has any example. On the day of his coronation, Edwin retired early from the banquet, while which it chanced that he was using. The Devil roared lustily with the pain; and the fact was indisputable, for his bellows were heard by all the neighbourhood in the midnight stillness.

* Osborn, p. 97. 103.

History.

From

A. D.

800.

to

A. D.

1066.

and personal outrage on the King.Story of Elgiva.Banishment of Dunstan
and the Monks.Rivalry of the Monastic and Secular Clergy.

his Nobles were yet indulging that habit of deep carousal to which the Saxon, like all the Teutonic races, were too much addicted. The absence of the King displeased the company; and Dunstan and a Bishop undertook to bring him back to the hall. They are reported to have found him, in an inner chamber of the Palace, seated with two ladies, mother and daughter, to one of whom, Ethelgiva, or Elgiva, he was tenderly attached. The exact nature of their union has been a disputed point: by the Monkish Writers she is called his mistress; but being also his kinswoman, and, as some authorities make her, his wife, it is altogether most probable that the reproach of concubinage was directed only against a marriage within the degrees of affinity prohibited by the Canon Law. But however this may have been, Dunstan and his associate, bursting upon the privacy of the King, and loading both ladies with every coarse invective, dragged their Sovereign by force from their society into the revelling assembly of his Nobles. Thus ignominiously insulted and exposed to contempt before all the Peers of his Realm, we need not wonder that the Royal youth impetuously revenged the indignity which had been offered to him as a Man and a King. He sent an armed force to Glastonbury to seize on the property of Dunstan and expel him from his Monastery; banished him from England; and inflicted the same proscription on the Monks throughout the Kingdom, of whom the great Abbot had been the principal protector.*

In the prosecution of these violent measures, there was involved a far wider subject of hostility than the personal quarrel of Dunstan and the King. This was no less than the rivalry of the Secular and Monastic Clergy. The History of the establishment and growth of the famous Rule of St. Benedict belongs to the Ecclesiastical Division of these pages; but it is here necessary to observe that Dunstan, in concert with Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury, had ardently advocated that system of Monastic government, and enjoined its observance on the Religious Houses in England. In introducing the many real reforms of the Benedictine discipline, there is no reason to doubt that he acted in sincere consistency with those stern principles of abstinence, which he imposed in his own case upon every passion but ambition. But his efforts to enforce and extend the Monastic vow of celibacy drew him and his followers into collision with the Secular Clergy, who appear to have been generally married; and they naturally regarded the banishment of Dunstan and his Monks as the triumph of their party in the Church.

By this act, indeed, the King had proclaimed himself the patron of the Secular Clergy; but he soon found that their influence was inferior to that of their rivals. The sanctity of Dunstan, and the reformations of discipline which he had introduced, had rendered him and the Monks equally popular with the Nation; and they were scarcely banished before a general insurrection, instigated, or at least headed, by the Archbishop Odo, broke out in various parts of England. A sentence of divorce or separation, to which the young King was compelled to yield, was passed by Odo against Elgiva; and after being torn from her Royal husband, or lover, and cruelly branded in the face with hot iron, she was banished, or, as it is said, sold for a slave, into Ireland. The horrible sequel of her fate has given a still more touching interest to her romantic story: having contrived to rejoin the King, she was seized, barbarously hamstringed by the command of Odo, and expired under this miserable torture. The calamities which terminated the life and reign of Edwin himself are only obscurely intimated. The insurgents having set up his younger brother Edgar against him with the Royal title, he was first reduced, after a short and ineffectual struggle, to and of Ed consent to a partition of the Kingdom, and soon after perished prematurely and wretchedly, the victim either of assassination or grief.*

On the death of Edwin, the possession of the whole Kingdom devolved upon Edgar, whose fortunate reign of sixteen years offers a singular interval of undisturbed peace in the troubled series of the Anglo-Saxon Annals. For this career of prosperity, it is probable that the young Monarch was originally in a great measure indebted to the talents of Dunstan. Immediately after the success of the rebellion against Edwin, the Abbot of Glastonbury had been recalled from exile by his party; and Edgar resigned himself entirely to the counsels of his brother's enemy. Dunstan was shortly promoted, first to the See of Worcester, next to that of London, and finally to the Archbishopric of Canterbury. The circumstances of his elevation to this last dignity are illustrative both of the boundless influence which he had acquired, and of the unscrupulous spirit in which he had learnt to indulge his ambition. At an earlier stage in his career, whether with sincere or affected humility, he had refused a Bishopric; he now not only held a plurality of Sees, but caused the Primate Brithelm, a man of acknowledged piety and meekness, to be displaced to make room for himself. The pretext was Brithelm's want of energy in the enforcement of Ecclesiastical discipline; and the authority of the Witenagemot was obtained for his removal: but it can scarcely be doubted that the instigator of his deprivation was the powerful minister who reaped the advantage of his fall. Thus invested with the highest functions both of Civil and Ecclesiastical government, Dunstan proceeded vigorously in the exaltation of his Order; and he certainly appears, while he augmented their wealth and power, to have reformed the disorders of the Anglo-Saxon Church, which had suffered equally in its tem-

* Osborne, p. 104, 105. Malmesbury, p. 55, &c. It would be foreign to the purpose of this Work to enter minutely into the merits of the modern controversy on the circumstances of Edwin's reign, which have been related in the text. In his zeal for the honour of a Romish Saint, Dr. Lingard has laboured to expose the views of Edwin and the criminality of his union with Elgiva; and it may be conceded to his arguments that our Historians, with an opposite bias, had too positively assumed the innocence of a dubious connection. But the settlement of a question, at once so obscure in itself and so utterly inconsequential in a Historical point of view, will scarcely be received by any decent reader as an excuse for introducing those gross obsecrations from the Monkish Chronicles with which he has defiled his pages; nor, whatever might be the demerits of the lady, could they justify the insolent intrusion of the Monk upon the privacy of his Sovereign, or the revolting cruelties which his party subsequently inflicted upon the unhappy Elgiva. The favourable portrait of Dunstan, which he found in the Monkish Writers, it was natural that the Roman Catholic Historian should copy; the miracles of the Saint, which are attested on precisely the same authority with his virtues, it was discreet to reject: but that the outrage of Dunstan upon the Royal person should seem an occasion for applause is strange; and it is not easy to refuse assent to the conclusion of Mr. Turner, that "as an Ecclesiastic he should not have compelled Edwin to a scene of inebriety; as a subject it was treasonable to offer violence to his Prince."

* Ingulf, p. 41. Malmesbury, p. 55. Vide also a note (No. 67. by Mr. Turner, Hist. of Anglo-Saxons, vol. ii. p. 409.

poralities and discipline amidst the long calamities of the Danish invasions. The plans of Dunstan were zealously supported by the authority and munificence of Edgar; and in the numerous Monasteries for which the Archbishop obtained large endowments from the King, the provisions of the Benedictine rule were introduced in all their strictness.*

These measures were not effected without some persecuting violence against the Secular Clergy: but the efforts of Dunstan were seconded by the ability of two dependents, Oswald and Athelwold, whom he raised to the Episcopal dignity, and also associated with himself in the Civil government of the State. His own sagacity was proved in the selection of these men, who served his views with equal talent and fidelity; and to the wisdom and activity of their joint administration may with great probability be ascribed the uninterrupted prosperity of Edgar's reign. Under a guidance, indeed, to which he appears to have implicitly submitted, that young Monarch acquired and enjoyed a degree of security and power unknown to the greatest of his predecessors. Not only was the tranquillity of his Kingdom undisturbed, but his Sovereignty was acknowledged by all the minor Princes of the Island. For the protection of the coasts of the Kingdom, large fleets were maintained in different stations, from which the King, annually embarking in succession, cruised round the Island; and by this display of maritime strength and preparation, deterred the Northman pirates from any attempt to renew their invasions.† By affecting a partiality for his own Danish subjects in East Anglia and Northumbria, he secured their attachment to his government and person, while he not the less effectually curbed their independence; and he especially gratified their national pride by permitting them to choose their own laws.‡ Other examples of the legislation of this reign, which have been preserved in the Saxon Codes, are favourable to the memory of Edgar and his ministers: such as the restoration of the debased coinage to a purer standard; and some provisions for the equal and secure administration of justice against robberies and outrages on the public peace.§ One act of useful policy has often been quoted in favour of Edgar: in lieu of the tribute exacted by his predecessors from the Welsh, he is said to have required an annual offering of the heads of three hundred wolves; and the extirpation of those ravenous animals is attributed to this salutary measure.]

Notwithstanding the recorded merits of his government, however, and although the Monkish Chroniclers have laboured to eulogize their patron as assiduously as they have exaggerated the vices of his brother, there are not wanting proofs that the successful life of Edgar was more licentious than the unfortunate career of Edwinn. It is acknowledged that he carried off a lady from a Nunnery by force, and made her the victim of his brutal violence; for which Dunstan indeed subjected him to a long and apparently severe penance, since it required him to fast twice a week for seven years and to abstain from wearing his Crown: but its chief obligation was artfully converted into an expedient for increasing the power and wealth of the Monastic Order, by new religious foundations.* Other tales, also, resting on inferior evidence but still attesting the popular opinion of his immorality, have been preserved: but their details are unfit for these pages.† The well-known story of his second marriage with the beautiful Elfrieda should perhaps be received with some suspicion, because its circumstances are unnoticed by the Writers who lived nearest to the event, by whom it is merely said that the King married Elfrieda after the death of her husband: but the union, whether guiltless or otherwise, proved equally calamitous in its fruits. Edgar died at an early age, leaving two sons, Edward by a former Queen, and Ethelred by the second marriage, the first still a minor, and the other a child; and the ambition of Elfrieda was immediately excited to obtain the succession to the throne for her own offspring, that she might herself rule in his name.‡

Her machinations were at first unsuccessful. Although she placed herself, for the attainment of her ends, at the head of a party in opposition to Dunstan, she could neither overthrow the power of that Prelate in the State, nor prevent him from securing the suffrages of a Witenagemot in favour of the rightful claim of her step-son to the Crown. The accession of young Edward confirmed the authority of Dunstan: but the arts of Elfrieda had revived the contest between the Secular and Monastic Clergy for the temporalities of the Church; and the peace of the Kingdom was disturbed by a struggle between the two factions which maintained those conflicting interests. But the good fortune or dexterity of Dunstan finally triumphed; and his opponents were confounded by two events, which the superstition of the Age attributed to the miraculous interposition of Heaven. During a stormy Synod held in the Cathedral at Winchester, a crucifix in the wall is said, by the Biographers of the Saint, to have received the gift of speech, and to have pronounced the Divine Will in favour of the Monastic Order. If this venacious oracle did not silence the pretensions of the Secular Clergy, their supporters were shortly warned to renounce their cause by a more tragical occurrence. In a Witenagemot, summoned at Calne in Wiltshire, where the claims of the rival Orders were violently debated, Dunstan had just declared that he committed the protection of the Church to Christ, when the floor of the council-chamber suddenly gave way at the end on which the opponents of the Monastic Order were collected; and being precipitated to the earth below, they were all either killed or dangerously hurt: while the Archbishop and his friends remained on their side of the apartment unmoved and uninjured. Modern writers have not hesitated to ascribe this catastrophe to the deliberate preparation of Dunstan: but the obvious difficulties of such a contrivance may be received as a sufficient reason for at least refusing to affix the reproach of so diabolical a plot with positiveness on his memory.§ It is more probable that he dexterously

Anglo-Saxon Annals.

From A. D. 800, to A. D. 1066,

His death. A. D. 975.

Accession of Edward II. (the Martyr.)

* Osberne, Vita Dunstani, p. 111. Malmbury, p. 60.

† Malmbury, ubi supra.

‡ Chron. Sax. p. 122. Ingulf, p. 54. Osberne, p. 112.

§ Osberne, p. 113—114. Radmer, Vita Dunstani, p. 219—220. Chron. Sax. p. 123, 124. Ingulf, p. 54. Malmbury, p. 61. Dr. Lingard has made a bold effort to discard the tales of the miracles attributed to Dunstan, at Winchester and Calne, by the two Writers first quoted above. Yet these are the very authorities on which, in other respects, he rests his defence of the conduct of the Saint; and, in fact, as almost all we know of Dunstan is gathered from his Monkish eulogists, it is precisely from their panegyrics that the most suspicious circumstances of his conduct have been exposed, and that the most unfavourable conclusions against him are deducible.

* Osberne, Vita Dunstani, p. 108—111. Ingulf, p. 45—47. Chron. Sax. p. 117.

† Chron. Sax. p. 121. Malmbury, p. 59. Matt. West. p. 375.

‡ Chron. Sax. p. 116. Leges Sax. (apud Wilkins) p. 80. 82.

§ Chron. Sax. ubi supra. Leges, p. 77. 80.

|| Malmbury, p. 59.

History. improved an accident, as beneficial to his own party as it was calamitous for his opponents; and this supposition, which still leaves him chargeable with the secondary guilt of counterfeiting a miracle to impose upon the credulity of a superstitious People, is in perfect agreement with other events of his life.

From Foiled in her intrigues by the superior artifice of Dunstan, Elfrida had now recourse to assassination; and before he had completed the fourth year of his Reign, her step-son became the victim of her wicked ambition. It chanced, as the young King was hunting in the vicinity of Corfe Castle in Dorsetshire, her residence, that he unsuspectingly and unattended stopped at her gate to see her and his brother. She went out to receive him with a smiling countenance; but he declined to alight, and having requested a cup of mead, was in the act of raising the goblet to his lips, when he was treacherously stabbed in the back by one of her retainers. Feeling himself wounded, he had just strength to give the spur to his steed, before he fell from his saddle, and was dragged by the stirrup, until his attendants, tracking his course in his blood, overtook his lifeless body, and privately buried it.* The authoress of this foul tragedy was not only suffered to escape the punishment of her atrocious guilt, but in a great measure reaped its expected fruits. As her son, Ethelred, was now become, by the murder of his brother, the last scion of the House of Cerdic, Dunstan could not prevent his elevation to the vacant Throne; and during his minority, Elfrida, although covered with the public execration, succeeded in usurping a large share of the administration of government. As Ethelred, however, advanced towards manhood, her influence visibly declined; and probably that of Dunstan again acquired the ascendancy. For, a few years after the murder of Edward, we find the Archbishop ostentatiously taking up his remains to inter them with regal honours at Shaftesbury; while Elfrida, withdrawing from the Court of her son, sought a shelter from the abhorrence of the Nation in Monastic seclusion, and there, in mortified pride or penitence, terminated her flagitious existence. The close of Dunstan's ambitious and busy career offers a contrast of undiminished prosperity. That the last years of his life are little recorded, is the surest proof that they were undisturbed; and he ended his long and fortunate life just in time to escape the worst calamities of foreign war and domestic disunion, with which his devoted Country was on the eve of being overwhelmed.†

Accession of Ethelred 11.

Last years of Dunstan.

Disastrous reign of Ethelred, "the Unready."

We now enter upon the most disgraceful and calamitous epoch in the Anglo-Saxon Annals. The personal character of Ethelred perhaps produced, and certainly aggravated, the miseries of his Reign. It is said that his spirit had been broken in childhood by the tyranny of his mother; and the national Chroniclers have preserved an anecdote as creditable to his youthful feelings as it is expressive of her barbarous temper. When the boy King wept at the murder of a beloved brother which had produced his untimely and inauspicious accession to the Throne, Elfrida chastised his reproachful tears with so much severity that his life was endangered. The pusillanimity which marked his conduct in after life has apparently, not without reason, been ascribed to the influence exercised over his dawning character by the perpetual terror, through which so unnatural a mother may have endeavoured to bend his temper into object submission to her will.‡ He indeed was delivered from her yoke before he attained the maturity of his age; but he early displayed an insensibility of spirit to ought save pleasure, which presented an ignoble contrast with the commanding dignity and gracefulness of person for which he was distinguished; and the appropriate surname of "The Unready" which his subjects, in the quaint language of the times, learned to bestow upon him, marks their appreciation of the prevailing indolence of his character. Although himself innocent of the murder of his brother, the circumstances of his accession had been originally associated in the minds of the People with his mother's guilt; their affection was withheld from his youth; and in his later years their indifference was changed into contempt and hatred by his slothful neglect of public duties, the voluptuous indulgence of his private life, and his utter disregard for the opinions and feelings, the wants and sufferings of the Nation.¶

England had now for almost a Century enjoyed an intermission from the ancient ravages of the Northmen; and it cannot be doubted that this long interval of security had produced its natural fruits of increasing prosperity and civilization. While the watchfulness with which, during this period, the coasts of the Island were guarded, had deterred or discouraged the Northern Pirates from continuing their assaults, the state of Scandinavia itself had become less favourable for such enterprises. There had appeared more than one race of Princes whose increasing and permanent dominion over the shores of the Baltic, rendered it their interest to suppress piracy; the cruel profession of the Sea-kings was gradually proscribed; and the benign influence of Christianity, the parent and harbinger of every social good, began slowly to penetrate into the original seats of the most ferocious idolatry. The spirit of piratical adventure, however, though in its last stage, was not yet finally extirpated; a few Sea-kings still roved the Ocean; and it was during the minority of Ethelred, in the third year after his accession, that one of these Chiefs, with a small squadron ventured the first attempt to renew the predatory descents of his forefathers on the English shores. Landing near Southampton, he plundered that place, and encouraged by impunity, repeated his assaults in the same and the following season, on the coasts of Thanet, Devon, and Cornwall. The success of these and other marauding assaults by which they were immediately followed, although conducted on a small scale, and for no other object than desultory pillage, were of fatal importance in revivifying the careless imbecility of Ethelred's government, and the defenceless condition to which it exposed his Kingdom. In a few years after the first descent of the pirates, the effects of this discovery were fully developed. A far more numerous fleet appeared on the East Anglian coast; and a formidable body of Northmen, disembarking from their ships, surprised Ipswich, penetrated through the country to Malden, and there, after an obstinate conflict, defeated and slew the Ealdorman, Britnoth. The King, started from his indolent repose, was terrified at this first approach of real danger; and instead of opposing the * Chron. Sax. p. 124. Ingulf. p. 54. Malmesbury. p. 61.

† Chron. Sax. p. 125, 126. Malmesbury. p. 62. Ingulf. p. 56.

¶ Turner, Hist. of Anglo-Saxons, vol. ii. p. 468.

‡ Ingulf. p. 55, 56. Malmesbury. p. 63. Matt. West. p. 378.

History. invaders in the field, he had the pusillanimity, on the
From counsel of Archbishop Siric, the successor of Dunstan,
A. D. to purchase their retreat by a payment of ten thousand 500. pounds of silver.*

to This disgraceful expedient was not indeed the first
A. D. example of its kind; but it had never before been used 1066. under circumstances so little justifiable: since the Kingdom was not, as in the time of Alfred, exhausted by a long and devastating contest. The contribution now levied to supply the demand of the invaders was long remembered by the Nation as the precedent for that odious impost, under the title of Danegelt, which was continued for Ages after all pretext for its appropriation had ceased; and the very origin of direct taxation in this Country is referred, by our ancient Annalists, to this ignominious source.† It need not be said that a procedure at once cowardly and impolitic, so far from obtaining a cessation of the Northman assaults, only served to entail their rapid and audacious repetition. The condition of the devoted Kingdom soon became really desperate; and as often as the Witegenmot were roused to more manly counsels, the public preparations were rendered abortive by the sloth or timidity of the King,
the vices of his government, the treason of the Nobles, and the general disaffection of the People. Among the worst traitors to the national cause at this shameful and misera- ble period, the name of Elfric, Ealdorman of Mercia, has obtained an infamous distinction. In some vicissitudes of faction, which are only obscurely intimated, this man had been first driven into banishment, but afterwards reinstated in his Government; and was now imprudently intrusted with a principal command against the enemy. In this situation, under some impulse of revenge, or in the mere wantonness of treachery, he seized the critical moment at which a Danish naval armament might have been surprised in port, to give timely intelligence of their danger and to join their standard with his retainers. He shared their flight, and escaped the pursuit of the Anglo-Saxon fleet: but his son being captured, Ethelred took a barbarous and dastardly vengeance for the crimes of the father by causing the youth to be deprived of his eyes. The North-men shortly transferring the scene of invasion from the Southern shores of the Kingdom to the banks of the Humber, the three principal Chieftains who were charged with the defence of the district imitated the example of Elfric, and went over to the enemy.‡

But such desultory hostilities were but the prelude to more systematic plans of invasion; and when a confederate armament, led in person by Sweyn and Olave, the Kings of Denmark and Norway, entered the Thames, the war assumed the aspect, as of old, of a national contest between the Saxon and Northman races. An attack made by the two Scandinavian Kings upon London was repelled: but they ravaged the surrounding Counties with impunity; and Ethelred a second time had recourse to money instead of arms. For sixteen thousand pounds of silver, he purchased a Peace from the invaders, upon the further condition of providing them winter quarters at Southampton. By the desertion of Olave, who had already embraced Christianity, and now, on receiving the rite of confirmation from two of the English Bishops, swore never again to draw his sword against their Nation, Sweyn was compelled also to retire with his diminished forces: but for the next seven years the coasts of the Island were not the less a prey to perpetual ravages; and at length, when a new Danish host had landed in Hampshire, and extended its devastations throughout the West of England, its retreat was again purchased by a third, and still more enormous tribute, of twenty-four thousand pounds of silver.*

It is a trite observation that the cowardly are ever cruel; and if any act were now wanting to complete the degradation of the English Nation, it was supplied by the next measure to which the feeble Ethelred was stimulated by his perfidious and pusillanimous counsellors. The last ignominious pacification was followed by the most atrocious transaction in the Anglo-Saxon Annals. This was the memorable massacre of the Danish residents in England. The precise nature of the instigation to this revolting deed, the extent of the slaughter, and the description and number of its victims, are points involved in much uncertainty: the perpetra-tion of the crime is historically indisputable, and its enormity can neither be mitigated nor increased by any computation of the slain. It is evident from the recorded facts that numbers of Northmen, under whatever circumstances, were living indiscriminately among the natives in every City, Burgh, and County; and it has been plausibly conjectured, that these foreigners were mercenaries in the pay of Ethelred, who were quartered upon the inhabitants, and whose fidelity had become as suspicious as their insolence was insupportable. It has also been justly argued that the proscription could not have embraced all families of Northman descent in the Island: since they filled the North-Eastern Provinces, and composed a third part of the whole population.†
But it is equally incontrovertible that, not merely the foreign stipendiaries, but many distinguished personages of Northman blood who were allied by the dearest ties with Saxon families, were inhumanly included in the bloody catastrophe. On St. Brice's Eve, every city throughout the Kingdom received secret instructions from Ethelred for a simultaneous massacre of the foreigners on the morrow of the Festival. These orders were executed by a ferocious populace with every aggravation of brutality and horror which national hate could inspire or devise; men, women, and even infants at the breast, were remorselessly butchered; neither the bonds of intermarriage nor friendship between individuals of the two races were respected; nor did even a community of Religion obtain mercy for those Christian Danes, who having taken refuge in the Churches, were slain around the Altars to which they clung. Among these victims was a Princess, whose rank and character have preserved a particular record of her sufferings, and drew down a signal vengeance upon the whole Kingdom. Gunhilda, the sister of Sweyn, a woman of remarkable beauty and talents, had embraced Christianity, and wedded a Chieftain of Danish race, who had settled in England and been intrusted with a high command. He is accused of having acted treacherously in the last invasion of his Countrymen; and Gunhilda, after being made the eyewitness of his murder and that of her innocent children, by order of Edric, the infamous favourite of Ethelred,

Anglo-
Saxon Annals.
From.
A. D.
890. to
A. D.
1066.
General massacre of the Danes in England.
A. D.
1002.

in the ann.
i. ii.
992.

i. ii.
998.

note of King Edward
i. ii.
991.

in the ann.
i. ii.
992.

* Chron. Sax. p. 125, 126. Malmesbury, p. 62.

† Hunt, p. 357. Chron. Sax. and Malmesbury, ubi supra.

‡ Chron. Sax. p. 127. Malmesbury, p. 62.

* Chron. Sax. p. 128—132. Malmesbury, p. 63.

† Lingard, Hist. of England, vol. i. p. 346. Turner, Anglo-Saxons, vol. ii. p. 473. note.

History.

From
A. D.
860.to
A. D.
1066.Rerenged by a new invasion under Sweyn of Denmark.

A. D.

1003.

Frightful desolation
of England.

A. D.

1007.

A. D.

1009.

Final invasion and conquest of England by Sweyn.

A. D.

1013.

was herself beheaded. In the bitterness of death she is said to have foreboded the stern vengeance which her brother would one day exact from the whole English Nation; and the event soon abundantly realized her prediction.*

In the Summer after the massacre of St. Brice's Day, the Danish Monarch and his host, burning to revenge the fate of their Countrymen, landed near Exeter, and commenced a career of retributive and frightful devastation, which continued with little cessation for above four years. The invaders successively penetrated into every part of the Kingdom; each city which they captured was reduced to ashes; each district which they overran was uniformly desolated with fire and the sword; and all the wretched inhabitants who fell into their hands suffered death in dreadful varieties of torture. As often as despair nerved the People to resistance, treason and imbecility nerved the efforts of their native courage; and one instance of infatuation, in the employment of the convicted traitor Elfric, who had recovered the favour of Ethelred only to repeat his treason, may sufficiently exemplify the whole conduct of the war. It was at length terminated, when the vengeance of Sweyn was satiated in blood and conflagration, by his acceptance of thirty-six thousand pounds of silver as the price of Peace: an immense sum to be levied on the Kingdom in that Age, and after the previous exactions and desolation. To complete the wretchedness of the People, the ravages of the merciless invaders produced several seasons of grievous famine; a contagious distemper raged among the cattle; and to sum up the catalogue of horrors, this murrain was followed by a pestilence equally destructive to human life.†

These afflictions produced little respite from the calamities of warfare. The retirement of the Danish Sovereign himself was followed by a new and equally formidable invasion of another Northman host under the Sea-king Thurkill; and the same scenes of ruin were renewed. A vigorous national exertion was now made to repel the enemy: but a great armament thus collected was, as usual, rendered useless and disorganized by the deadly feuds of the Nobles, and the misconduct of Edric, whom we have before mentioned, a man of low birth and infamous character, but of eminent ability, whom the favour of Ethelred had elevated to the highest authority in the State. He was now created Ealdorman of Mercia; and the same perfidious ambition and traitorous machinations, by which had been caused many of the past, were now employed to deepen the subsequent, calamities of his Country. But the patience of the reader would only be wearied, and his attention disgusted, by an attempt to pursue the details of the incessant ravages and treasons, of which the History of this disgraceful Reign is compounded. A third invasion of Sweyn, with an army more numerous and better appointed than in either of his preceding expeditions, was followed by the conquest of great part of the Kingdom; and so completely was the spirit of the Nation now broken, that, according to the confession of the Saxon Chronicle, one Dane was accounted equal in battle to ten Englishmen. Ethelred fled in despair to the Court of Richard Duke of Normandy, whose sister, Emma, he had married; and the victorious Sweyn became the first Northman King of England.*

From this epoch, therefore, may be dated the establishment of their Dynasty in our Island. This strange and sudden revolution was not wholly the effect of conquest: for there are many proofs that the misgovernment of Ethelred had produced a general disaffection and alienation among his People; and that finding themselves left by their own unworthy Monarch a prey to the invaders, they at length sought safety and repose by a voluntary transference of their allegiance to a foreign sceptre. But the unexpected death of Sweyn, only a few weeks after the flight of Ethelred, revived the hope of national independence; and the Saxon Nobles obtaining an oath from the fugitive King that he would govern more justly than heretofore, his return upon this condition was welcomed with acclamations. Sweyn, by his last testament, had appointed his son Canute to succeed him: but that Prince was at first unable to maintain his power, and compelled to desert his adherents and retire to Denmark. He soon, however, reappeared in greater force, and acquired new strength by the continued misconduct and tyranny of Ethelred. The death of that Monarch at this juncture relieved the Kingdom from the burthen of his useless and mischievous existence; and the sinking cause of the House of Cerdic was, for a few months, nobly though ineffectually sustained by the gallantry of his eldest son and successor, Edmund:—whose martial prowess obtained for him the surname of "Ironside," and the memory of whose deeds, exaggerated by popular romance, was long cherished in affectionate admiration by the English. After an obstinate and indecisive struggle, throughout which the efforts of Edmund were rendered abortive by the perfidy of Edric, the Saxon Prince was compelled to conclude a pacification with the Northman, whereby they divided England between them. To Canute, whose partisans probably were most numerous in the old Danish Provinces, Edmund resigned all the Kingdom Northward of the Thames: but he survived this afflictive Treaty no more than a month; and on his premature death, of which the mode and the cause are left by contemporary writers in suspicious obscurity, his rival was elected King of all England by the universal consent or fears of the Nation.†

The character of Canute, not undeservedly surnamed the Great, was compounded of Barbarian violence and grandeur; and the events of his reign exhibit him to us at different epochs as the ferocious tyrant, and the beneficent protector of his subjects. This apparently strange opposition of qualities is explained by the different circumstances of his position, and by the influence of Religion in taming the original fierceness of a magnanimous though intemperate spirit. During the first years after his undisputed enjoyment of the throne of England, as well as throughout his previous struggle to maintain his father's conquests, he displayed all the savage and perfidious cruelty of the more ancient Sea-kings. His earliest efforts, after his seizure of the undivided sovereignty of England, were directed to secure his Crown against the pretensions of the brothers and infant children of Edmund Ironside. He obtained the assassination of * Chron. Sax. p. 133. Malmesbury, p. 64. Hunt p. 360. Matt. West. p. 391.

† Chron. Sax. p. 133—136. Malmesbury, p. 59.

* Chron. Sax. p. 137—144. Malmesbury, p. 70.

† Chron. Sax. p. 144—150. Encomium Emmae, p. 171. Ingulf. p. 57. Malmesbury, p. 72.

Edwin, the eldest surviving son of the imbecile Ethelred; he bribed the Duke of Normandy to abandon the support of his two young nephews, Edward and Alfred, by a proposal of marriage to their mother Emma; and the youthful vanity of that Princess induced her to renege the English Throne by this unnatural union with the deadly enemy of her first husband, the reputed murderer of one or both of her step-sons, and the usurper of the rights of her own children. With a policy, of which the murderous design is open to the heaviest suspicion, Canute had also sent the two infant sons of Ironside, Edmund and Edward, out of the Kingdom, to the charge of his relative or dependent, the King of Sweden. Whatever were his intentions respecting these orphans, the Scandiavian Prince was probably impelled by a humane regard for their safety, when he transferred them into the hands of Stephen^{*} King of Hungary, who educated them as if they had been his own offspring. At the Court of that good Prince, the elder died in his youth: but Edward married a daughter of the Imperial House of Saxony, who bore him three children, Edgar Etheling, Christina, and Margaret: the first, destined in a life of vicissitude to survive ingloriously the fortunes of his race; and the last, through her marriage with the King of Scots, to commingle the blood of the line of Cerdic with that of the posterity of our Norman Conqueror. While Canute was thus removing the progeny of their native Princes from the eyes of the English, he rivetted his yoke on their necks by measures equally oppressive and sanguinary. To gratify the rapacity of his Danish followers, the most grievous exactions were levied on the People, who found themselves treated in every respect as a conquered Nation; many Nobles were summarily put to death on real or pretended suspicions of treason; and their lands were bestowed on Chieftains of Northman blood. Among these victims to the fury or policy of Canute, was the infamous Edric, whose murder, unlike that of the rest, was hailed by the People as a just retribution for a life of perfidious and manifold treasons against his original Sovereigns and benefactors.†

Having founded a despotic dominion upon the terror of these examples, the first evidence of the better resolve of Canute to gain the hearts of his subjugated People by a more benignant rule, is shown in the dismissal of his Northman followers, who treated the English with intolerable oppression. With the exception of a body of three thousand warriors, whom under the name of Huscarles, or Thingmanni, he retained as the Household Guards of his throne; his farewell donatives of gold encouraged the departure of the host of adventurers by whose aid he had conquered the Kingdom; and his Saxon subjects gratefully hailed their deliverance from the presence of those hateful foreigners. The frequent visits which Canute himself subsequently paid to his Scandinavian dominions are still stronger indications of his well-founded security in the loyalty of the Nation during his absence; and in more than one victorious expedition to the North, he was indebted for success to the courage and fidelity of the English forces by which he was attended. The equity of his Government, in fact, soon rendered him deservedly popular, while its vigour commanded respect and severely punished disorder. In cultivating the attachment and establishing the happiness of his subjects, he, perhaps unconsciously, learned to subdue and humanize the violence of his own passions; he at last publicly and spontaneously expressed his repentance for the cruelties of his early reign; and he proved the sincerity of his self-reproaches by his efforts to atone to his People for the miseries which his ambition had inflicted. The laws which he published breathe a noble spirit of equity and mercy; and his administration of justice was impartially balanced between his Danish and English subjects.*

Canute left three sons, Sweyn, Harold, (surnamed Harefoot, from his fleetness,) and Hardicanute, (or Canute the Hardy;) the two eldest the offspring of an illegitimate union, the last of his marriage with Emma. On Sweyn, during his own life, he had already bestowed the Crown of Norway; and, according to the condition of his marriage-treaty with Emma, Hardicanute, as her issue, should have inherited the throne of England. But at the moment of his father's death, that Prince was employed in the Government of Denmark; and his absence encouraged his brother Harold to attempt the seizure of the English Crown. His pretensions were supported by the Danish Guards, and in general by the population of both races North of the Thames. On the other hand, the people of Wessex, who were much attached to Queen Emma, faithfully maintained the cause of her absent son: and the whole Kingdom was threatened anew with the horrors of Civil war.†

These impending calamities were averted by an accommodation between the parties of the two Princes. In a general Witenagemot convened at Oxford, it was agreed that the Kingdom should be partitioned between the brothers, with the Thames for the boundary: the Northern division, including London, being assigned to Harold, and the Southern to Hardicanute, until whose return its administration was intrusted to the Queen Mother, assisted by the Ealdorman Godwin. The rise of Earl Godwin had been rapid; and before the death of Canute, he had become the most influential among the Nobles of Wessex. His administration of that Kingdom as co-Regent with Emma for Hardicanute, was shortly disturbed by an invasion which Edward, the eldest of her sons by Ethelred, undertook from Normandy as soon as he learnt the death of Canute. But the Queen Mother preferred the interest of her offspring by the Northman to those of the children of her first marriage; and the attempt of Edward being promptly repelled, he was driven back to his asylum at the Court of Normandy. His flight was followed by the appearance in England of his younger brother, Alfred, who, being lured into the power of his enemies, was murdered, with his followers, under circumstances of horrible barbarity. By the Chroniclers of the Age, this crime is most generally attributed to a perfidious scheme of Harold, of which Earl Godwin was the suspected accomplice.‡ Harold,

Anglo-Saxon Annals.

From A. D. 800. to A. D. 1066.

His death. A. D. 1035.

Reigns of Harold (Harefoot), and Canute II. (Hardicanute).

Rise of Earl Godwin.

A. D. 1036.

* Chron. Sax. p. 151. Ingulf. p. 58. Flor. Wig. p. 390, 391. Dr. Lingard (History of England, vol. i. p. 372.) has shown that it seems have been Stephen, and not Solomon of Hungary, by whom the children of Ironside were educated.

† Chron. Sax. et Ingulf ubi supra. Flor. p. 391. Nalmsbury, p. 73.

* Chron. Sax. p. 151—154. Ingulf. p. 58. Leges Sax. (apud Wilkins,) p. 135—135. 143—146. In 1030, the party of Canute induced him to make a pilgrimage to Rome; and it was, probably, after his return that the well-known tale of his rebuke to his flatterers occurred. Encomium Emmae, p. 173. Ingulf. p. 59—61. Nalmsbury, p. 74, 75. Flor. Wig. p. 394—397. Matt. West. p. 407—409. Hunt. p. 364.

† Chron. Sax. p. 155. Ingulf. p. 61.

‡ Encomium Emmae, p. 175. Flor. Wig. p. 399. Hoveden, p. 438. Matt. West. p. 410.

History.

From
A. D.
800. to
A. D.
1066.

A. D.
1040.

A. D.
1042.

Reign of Edward III.
(the Confessor.)

Feebleness of his character.

Power of Earl Godwin and his family.

availing himself of the continued and unexplained absence of Hardicanute in Denmark, had now extended his authority into Wessex; and the flight of Emma into Flanders, on learning the tragical fate of her neglected son, removed every obstacle to his blood-stained triumph. Prevailing upon the Nobles of Wessex to desert the cause of Hardicanute, he was elected King of all England; and, after a show of some reluctance on the part of the Archbishop of Canterbury, finally received the Crown. But his reign lasted only five years, and on his death, Hardicanute, who had just joined his mother in Flanders, was unanimously called by the Nation to the Throne. His first act was to indulge a brutal and impotent feeling of revenge against his deceased brother for his injurious treatment of himself and the Queen Mother, as well as his murder of Alfred. The remains of Harold were disinterred and decapitated. If Earl Godwin had been really guilty, that powerful Nobleman contrived not the less to propitiate the new King by splendid presents; and he was not only allowed to clear himself from the charge of having participated in the murder of Alfred by his own oath and that of his peers, according to the singular forms of Saxon jurisprudence, but was admitted to a large share in the administration of the Kingdom. The reign of Hardicanute was even shorter than that of Harold; his constitution was weakly; and his death was caused by a fit of intoxication during the nuptial revels of one of his Nobles. He left no issue; and by his decease, the union of the two Crowns of England and Denmark was dissolved. The King of Norway immediately seated himself on the Danish throne; and the English joyfully restored the line of their native Sovereigns.*

The character of Hardicanute has been variously represented: but his memory deserves the honour of at least one generous and magnanimous act. Notwithstanding the dangerous pretensions of Edward, the surviving Son of Ethelred by Emma, to the English Crown, he had invited him to his Court; and not only treated him with warm fraternal affection, but seems to have regarded him as his heir. Immediately on his death, therefore, Edward, supported as well by the powerful influence of Godwin, as by the ancient affection of the English for the House of Cerdic, which had been rekindled by their hatred of the Danish ascendancy, was placed on the throne without opposition. Edward, whose canonization in the subsequent Century has caused him to be distinguished by the surname of "the Confessor," was a Prince of excellent intentions, but totally deficient in capacity or energy for the vigorous administration of affairs. All his personal virtues were of an inactive cast; the piety for which his private life became famed was allied to superstitious weakness; and his gentle or indolent disposition fitted him rather for a Cloister than a Throne. It was, doubtless, from an insight into these traits of his character, that the ambitious Godwin was induced to take an active share in promoting his election to the Crown; and, in effect, he was no sooner enthroned, than the Earl and his family began to reign in his name. Although a vow, by which the King had bound himself, rendered the marriage only nominal, he was persuaded to make Editha, the fair daughter of Godwin, the partner of his throne; and while that Nobleman himself held the extensive Government of Wessex, Kent, and Sussex, two other Earldoms, one comprising the Western Provinces between the Severn and the Thames, and the other all the Eastern Counties, were bestowed upon Sweyn and Harold, his eldest sons. The whole of the South of England was thus immediately subject to the House of Godwin; and its power was imperfectly counterbalanced by that of two other great Chieftains, Siward and Leofric, who in the previous reigns had acquired the administration of Northumbria and Mercia, with the same title of Earls; a designation borrowed from the Northern term Jars, which, under the Danish Dynasty, had silently superseded the old Saxon dignity of Ealdorman.*

Notwithstanding the ascendancy acquired by Godwin and his family over the feeble will of Edward, the King had some strong feelings which rendered him not wholly passive in their hands. His resentment against the Danish party was shown in his conduct towards his mother, whose unnatural hostility to himself and his murdered brother in support of her son by Canute, had certainly not increased her maternal title to his affection. He seized her treasures, and treated her otherwise with a severity, as unbecoming towards a parent, as it was foreign to his usual disposition.† In these measures he was willingly supported by Godwin and his sons; but they were less disposed to gratify his opposite prepossession for the Countrymen of Emma. His education in Normandy, and the protection which, throughout the exile of his youth, he had received in that Duchy, had singularly endeared its natives to him; and his Court was soon filled with Norman adventurers, upon whom he bestowed many of the richest Bishoprics and offices of State. The growing influence and power of the Norman courtiers were for some years regarded by the family of Godwin with brooding jealousy; while partly from opposition to their House, the foreign party was supported by Earls Siward and Leofric. The arrogant demeanour of the Earl of Wessex and his five sons had already alienated the favour of Edward, when a brutal outrage of Sweyn, the eldest of the brothers, on the person of the Abbess of Leominster, provoked the just indignation of the religious Monarch to banish him from the Realm. But although the outlay afterwards aggravated his guilt by the murder of his own cousin, Edward had, some time afterwards, the inconceivable weakness to pardon and reinstate him in his possessions; and not long after his return his family repaid this clemency by an open rebellion. A murderous affray between the townsmen of Dover and the retinue of Eustace, Earl of Boulogne, who had married the King's sister, and had arrived in England on a visit to the Court, afforded them the pretext which they desired for rousing popular indignation against the insolence of the foreign favourites of Edward. On the complaint of Eustace, the King ordered Godwin, to whom the town of Dover belonged, to punish his burghers; and the haughty Earl not only refused, but, joined by his sons, took up arms to support his disobedience. Edward, who seems to have acted with hasty partiality towards the foreigners, gave a solitary instance of determination in their cause. Summoning Earls Siward and Leofric to his aid, he was soon enabled to assemble an army sufficiently powerful to overawe the insurgents; and Godwin was compelled to accept a temperate or politic

Anglo-Saxon Annals.
From
A. D.
800. to
A. D.
1066.

Parity of Eustace for the Normans.

Rebellion of Godwin and his sons.
A. D.
1051.

* Chron. Sax. p. 155, 156. Encomium Emmae, p. 176, &c. Ingulf. p. 61, 62. Flor. Wig. p. 400—403.

* Chron. Sax. p. 157. Ingulf. p. 62. Malmabury, p. 79, 80.
† Chron. Sax. ubi supra. Flor. Wig. p. 404.

History. offer of the royal party to submit the cause of dispute to the judgment of a Witenagemot. Some delay in the assembling of that Body in London was fatal to the cause of the insurgents; their forces dwindled away; and fearing to commit themselves into the hands of their enemies, the father and his five sons took flight, and were all solemnly outlawed by a sentence of their peers. Godwin and three of them escaped to Flanders; Harold and the fifth obtained refuge in Ireland; and even Queen Editha as their sister, whose beauty, virtue, and mental accomplishments are equally extolled by her contemporaries, shared their disgrace, and was placed under confinement in a Monastery.*

Vail of William, Duke of Normandy, to Edward. At this critical juncture, the King received a visit, which subsequent events rendered memorable for his cousin, William Duke of Normandy, whose illegitimate birth had not prevented his succession to his father's States, and whose vigorous government had already marked him for one of the most able Princes of the time. The fears of the foreign courtiers of Edward had urged him to entreat the assistance of the Duke in the late emergency; and although his succour was no longer needed, the future Conqueror of England landed with an imposing train, and was received with great distinction by the King. The Norman party, however, did not long enjoy their triumph. In the following year, Earl Godwin, by the negligent disbandment of the Royal squadron appointed to watch his motions, was encouraged to return in force from Flanders; and being joined by his son Harold from Ireland, he entered the Thames, and boldly ascended the river to London. The return of the outlawed Earls was enthusiastically welcomed by their party, now swelled in numbers by the increasing popular aversion to the strangers; and the King, although at the head of an army in the Capital, was compelled by his Nobles to accept the submission of Godwin. The great Earl and his sons were restored to their dignities and possessions; and the foreign Chieftains and Prelates, in their turn outlawed by the fickle judgment of a Witenagemot, fled in all quarters, and with difficulty effected their escape from the Kingdom.†

Retraction of the Godwins. The family of Godwin now became again all powerful; the Queen was restored from her Monastic seclusion to the Throne; and Edward resigned himself helplessly to the dominion of her relatives. The death of Godwin, which soon followed, served rather to exalt than diminish the fortunes of his House. Sweyn, the eldest son, died during a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, which he had undertaken through remorse for his crimes; and Harold, whose reputation was untainted with the suspected or notorious guilt of his father or brother, and who possessed many generous qualities which rendered him the popular idol, now united in his person the chief power and honours of the family. His superior influence, and his jealousy of the great rival House of Leofric Earl of Mercia, were shown by a sentence of banishment which he obtained from the Witenagemot against Algar, the son of Leofric, on some unreasonable charge. The outlaw, indeed, with the aid of the Welsh, excited a rebellion which was terminated in a compromise; and Algar, on the decease of his father, by alternate negotiation and force, made good his succession to the Mercian Earldom. But on the death of Algar, Harold took a signal vengeance on his Welsh allies, and leading the Royal forces into their Country, penetrated its remotest fastnesses, and obliged the natives to seek the mercy of Edward by delivering up the head of Griffith their Prince, and renewing their ancient oaths of allegiance and tribute.*

By the glory of this expedition, Harold much enhanced his reputation and popularity; and from his compelling the Welsh Princes to swear fealty to himself as well as to the King, it may be suspected that he already aspired to the Throne. But this triumph was followed by two events, each in a different degree unfavourable to his hopes. The King invited his nephew the Etheling Edward, son of Edmund Ironside, from Hungary to reside in England; and the arrival of the Princely exile with his wife and family, was hailed with popular acclamation. As the design of the childless Monarch in recalling this sole remaining branch of the House of Cerdic was evidently to nominate the Etheling his successor, the landing of that Prince on his native shores was an ominous event for the fortunes of Harold; and the sudden death of so dangerous a rival, even before he could obtain admission into the presence of his Royal uncle, cast some dark suspicions on the powerful and ambitious Noble, whose elevation to the Throne would have been obstructed by his existence. Whether guilty or innocent, Harold was a gainer by the event; and the youth of Edgar, the eldest son of the Etheling, equally with the feebleness of spirit which his dawning manhood betrayed, rendered him the most harmless of rivals. But Harold was soon afterwards thrown into the power of a competitor of far other character. While at sea in the British Channel, on some excursion of business or pleasure, of which the uncertain object is variously related, Harold had the misfortune to be wrecked on the French coast; and being made captive, according to the barbarous local custom, was delivered up by the Count of Ponthieu to William Duke of Normandy. That Prince, ungenerously using his power over the person of his prisoner, compelled him to purchase his release by doing homage and swearing allegiance to him, in presence of the assembled Barons of Normandy, as the appointed successor to the English Crown; and Harold returned home oppressed with the burthen of these solemn oaths of fealty, which notwithstanding they had been extorted, rendered him, according to the superstitious ideas of the times, not the less the liegeman of the Duke.†

The truth of the assertions by which William of Normandy claimed the succession to the Crown of England, was doubtful to his contemporaries; and modern controversy has vainly presumed to resolve the uncertainty. According to the statement of the Duke himself, or of the Norman Chroniclers, his pretensions rested on no more than verbal declarations of Edward, that he designed to make him his heir; and these announcements, if made before the Royal invitation to the Etheling Edward, must have been revoked by the arrival of that Prince in England, and renewed after his death. Of hereditary right, the Norman of course had not a shadow; but, by universal, although tacit, consent, the personal incapacity of the young Etheling Edgar, the true legal

Anglo-Saxon Annals.

From A. D. 800, to A. D. 1066. His conquest of Wales. A. D. 1063.

Harold in Normandy. A. D. 1065.

Claim of William of Normandy to the English Throne.

* Chron. Sax. p. 157—164. Ingulf. p. 62. Flor. Wig. p. 405—412. Malmesbury, p. 80.

† Ingulf. p. 65. Chron. Sax. p. 165, 168. Flor. Wig. p. 412, 414.

* Ingulf. p. 66—68. Chron. Sax. p. 168, 169. Malmesbury, p. 81. Flor. Wig. p. 414—424.

† Guillelmus Pictaviensis, p. 77—85. Matt. Paris p. 2. Matt. West. p. 426. Ingulf. p. 68.

History.
From
A. D.
800,
to
A. D.
1066.

Death of Edward.
A. D.
1066.

Features of his reign.

Remission of Danegelt.

heir to the Crown, excluded all idea of his succession; and the dubious bequest of the aged King was to form the contested title of two Pretenders, who, although both connected with him by marriage, were equally aliens from his blood. Harold from his presence at the Court was enabled to obtain the last testament of his Sovereign. On his return from his ill-omened detention in Normandy, he found the Northumbrians driven to insurrection by the sanguinary tyranny of his brother Tostig, who had been invested with the great Northern Earldom on the death of Siward. He hastened to the scene of revolt: but the strength of the insurgents was already too formidable to be subdued by force; and Harold, either convinced of the justice of their cause, or induced by a politic regard for his own interests, abandoned the support of his brother, and acquiesced in the choice of the Northumbrians, who had raised Morcar, the son of Algar of Mercia, to their Earldom in his place. Tostig, thus converted into the inveterate enemy both of his brother and his Country, retired to Flanders; and Harold returned to London, to await the death of the King, who had been long declining in health, and who breathed his last a few weeks afterwards.*

The memory of this Prince, the last Sovereign of the ancient Saxon line, was long afterwards affectionately cherished by the English, who too partially contrasted the mildness or rather imbecility of his government with the iron oppression of their Norman conquerors. But the only real benefit which he conferred upon his subjects was the remission of the oppressive tax of the Danegelt; and as this appears to have been the spontaneous and immediate boon of his own humane temper, it is the most praiseworthy action of his reign.† His judicial government has been praised: but it is difficult to reconcile any belief in his authority to enforce the due administration of the laws, with our knowledge of the irregular power which he suffered his Nobles to wrest from his hands; and the traditionary veneration which the English entertained for the laws and customs of "the good King Edward," may with more reason be referred to that attachment to the forms of the Saxon polity, which led them to associate the fondest recollections with his reign, merely because it was the last under which their ancient institutions existed. Some portion also of the popular affection in which the memory of Edward was held, may be attributed to the freedom of the Kingdom, during his life, from those miseries of foreign domination which had preceded his accession, and which followed his death. Although at the outset of his reign the Country was threatened with invasion by Magnus King of Denmark, who claimed the English Crown as the successor of Hardicanute, the project of the Scandinavian Prince was arrested by death; and the only foreign hostilities in which the pacific Edward was ever involved, were directed against Macbeth, the guilty usurper of the Scottish Throne,—whose name and story the mighty Master of the English Drama has rendered as imperishable as its Language. But even this was scarcely either a Royal or a National war. Duncan King of Scots, whom Macbeth had murdered, was the brother-in-law of Siward Earl of Northumberland; and Malcolm, his eldest son, took refuge with his uncle. For fifteen years the usurper held possession of the Scottish Throne, until Siward, taking advantage of a revolt raised by Macduff, Thegn of Fife, obtained permission of Edward to support the cause of his nephew with an English army, and defeating Macbeth, who was slain in the conflict, restored Malcolm to his father's Throne.*

Whatever intentions Edward had expressed in favour of the Duke of Normandy, Harold prevailed upon the King, when on his death-bed, to nominate him as his successor; and immediately after the Royal demise, he procured his own proclamation as King, by a mixed assembly of Nobles and London citizens. The claims of the Etheling Edgar to the succession were wholly disregarded; and the Coronation of the new Sovereign was hastily celebrated on the following day, on which the obsequies of Edward were also performed. But the transient festivities of this ill-omened ceremony were destined to be immediately interrupted by foreign ambition and fraternal hatred; and we may appropriately pause at an event which, ushering in the shifting vicissitudes of a brief and bloody struggle, produced the NORMAN CONQUEST OF ENGLAND.†

* Chron. Sax. p. 169—171. Flor. Wig. p. 424—427. Malmesbury. p. 91. Ingulf. p. 69.

† Flor. Wig. p. 410. Ingulf. p. 65. Hoveden, p. 441.

* Flor. Wig. 409—416. Saxon. Dunelm. p. 184—187.

† Chron. Sax. p. 172. Malmesbury, p. 93. Ingulf. p. 68.

Anglo-Saxon Annals.
From
A. D.
800,
to
A. D.
1066.

We omit Macbeth, except in Scotland.

Harold (1), was the Crown of England.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXIX.

ANNALS OF FRANCE, GERMANY, ITALY, AND SPAIN, DURING THE Xth CENTURY.

FROM A. D. 987 TO A. D. 1108.

I. THE Revolution which placed a new and third Dynasty on the throne of FRANCE, was the natural result of the increased power of the Feudal Lords, who, during the imbecile sway of the Carolingians, had wrung from their Kings almost every prerogative of Royalty. New privileges extorted by the Nobles demanded a new measure of power in their Sovereign; and the Crown was no longer to be transmitted as the natural inheritance of the nearest descendants of its Founder, but to be bestowed, by the free gift* of Feudatories, on one of their own Body; by the voluntary homage of Counts, Barons, and Knights on a common Lord: before whom they deemed it expedient, for the sake of general security, to pledge their Vassalage and allegiance. The superior opulence, the large possessions, and yet more the extensive influence acquired for his Family by the dexterous policy of Hugh the Great, pointed to his successor in the County of Paris and Dukedom of France as the fittest Chief of the Feudal Confederation. The Duke of Burgundy was his Brother; the Duke of Normandy his Nephew; and there were personal qualities also in the individual himself which, doubtless, availed not a little in promoting his titular aggrandizement. It is but rarely that the Founder of a line of Kings can be indebted for his elevation to negative merits: nevertheless, in the instance now before us, it is most probable that mediocrity of talent and freedom from ambition disarmed the Nobles of jealousy, and thus powerfully contributed to induce them to unite in permitting the vacant throne to be occupied by Hugh Capet.

Charles of Lorraine, Uncle to the late King, was the sole competitor whom Hugh, thus supported by the main Body of the Aristocracy of France,† was likely to encounter; and the pretensions of that Prince seemed but little formidable, notwithstanding they were equally well founded with those of any of his predecessors. The pride of his Countrymen had been offended, and doubts had arisen among some of them whether his claim of hereditary right had not been altogether forfeited, by his acceptance of a Fief from the Emperor Otho, to whom he had consequently performed homage. His character was no less feeble than his resources; he was remote from the scene of action at the critical moment of his Nephew's decease; and his scanty revenues, and the small population of his narrow dominion were inadequate to the provision of a force sufficient to ensure success in a distant expedition. Ten months accordingly elapsed from the death of Louis V. before Charles entered France; and meanwhile Hugh Capet had strengthened himself by solemnizing his Coronation at Rheims, with the sanction of his chief Ecclesiastics; and not long afterwards by associating his son Robert in his Royal dignity, by similar rites and under similar auspices. This ceremony, in the reign of Hugh Capet, and in those of his immediate posterity, is to be considered more as a nominal investiture, than as a bestowal of real power; as the formal admission of a successor rather than of a partner in the throne.

Charles, however, had not ventured upon invasion without assurance of recognition by several French Nobles and Prelates; and, among the most influential of the latter class, was the successor of that Archbishop of Rheims from whose hands his Rival had so lately received the Crown. It is probable that Hugh Capet was permitted little freedom of choice in his appointment to that important See; since we find it conferred on one whom ties of birth, independently of other considerations, must have rendered friendly to his opponent; and it must have been with no slight misgiving of his fidelity that he demanded from Arnulf (a bastard of the late King Lothaire, and consequently a nephew of Charles of Lorraine) a written pledge of inviolable adherence, under all circumstances, to himself and his son, as a preliminary to consecration. The forfeiture of his Archbishopric was the penalty annexed to disobedience; and how lightly both that hazard and his own promised faith were estimated by Arnulf was soon to be evinced. Charles, assisted by the Counts of Flanders and of Vermandois, (the latter his father-in-law,) surprised Laon, the abode of many of his Royal Ancestors, and was proclaimed King within its walls. No sooner also did he advance to Rheims, than its gates were opened to him by the intrigues of his Nephew, who for a short time concealed his abandonment of Hugh Capet by

France.
From
A. D.
987. to
A. D.
1108.

Coronation of Hugh Capet.
Association
of Robert.

Treachery of Archbishop Arnulf,

and first successor of Charles,
A. D.
988.

* The accession of Hugh Capet is usually called a usurpation, and it does not appear that his title was acknowledged by any General Assembly, nevertheless, since it is plain the Feudal Lords, if they had so chosen, might have prevented it, it may be termed their free gift by tacit consent.

† The six paramount Feudatories at the accession of Hugh Capet, who afterwards became exclusively Peers of France, were the Count of Flanders, whose Fief stretched from the Scheldt to the Somme; the Count of Champagne; the Duke of Normandy, who received homage from Brittany also; the Duke of Burgundy, with his Vassal the Count of Nivernois; the Duke of Aquitaine; and the Count of Toulouse. To these may be added, as possessing large domains and influence, the Duke of Gascony; the Counts of Anjou, Poitou, and Vermandois; the Viscount of Bourges, and the Lords of Bourbon and Coucy.—Hallam, Middle Ages, i. 21.

History.

From
A. D.
987,
to -A. D.
1108.
Facts between Hugh and his Vassals

excommunicating the pillagers of his Episcopal City, and by affecting to be conveyed to Laon under compulsion, and as a prisoner. In proportion, however, as his Uncle gained strength, so did the Archbishop drop the mask, till at length he openly ordered the troops of his Diocese to enrol themselves among those of Lorraine.

Little other proof need be required of the shadowy nature of that authority which Hugh Capet was permitted to enjoy, than that an enemy so insignificant as Charles was able to maintain for two years undisturbed possession of the important Cities of Rheims and Laon. During that period, indeed, Hugh was engaged in combating some of his refractory Vassals; he was driven from the walls of Poitiers by William Fier-a-bras, Duke of Aquitaine; and in a subsequent bloody action, on the banks of the Loire, the sole advantage which he won was an unmolested continuance of retreat. Even when a feud with a brother Noble, Adalbert, Count of Perigucux, induced Fier-a-bras to seek accommodation with his Sovereign, Hugh dared not assist that Vassal to whom he was reconciled, lest he might thereby provoke hostility from another equally powerful. If he had doubted respecting the prudence of neutrality, his hesitation might have been terminated by the treatment of a Herald whom he despatched to Adalbert on his assumption of the title of Count of Poitiers and Tours. "Who has made you Count?" was the question; and "Who has made you King?" was the no less laconic reply.*

Story of Fier-a-bras and his Courtiers.

The domestic History of Fier-a-bras affords a singular picture of the ferocity of his times. He had married Emmeline, a daughter of Thibault, Count of Blois, a Lady whose chief cares were directed to the superintendence of a Convent at Maillelais; and who is described by one of its Monks to have been not less distinguished by her magnanimity than by her Religious zeal. How far she merited such a eulogium may be decided by the following incident. Stung with jealous, and perhaps not unfounded suspicions of the fidelity of her husband, she determined to revenge her nuptial wrongs on the Vicomtesse de Thouars, from whom they originated. One day, having encountered the offending Lady, she dispersed her retinue, and seized her person; and during the whole of the following night exposed her to brutal and repeated violence from each of her own followers in succession. Then, in order to secure herself from the anger of her husband, which she was conscious must follow this atrocity, she retired to a neighbouring castle, from which during two years she carried on a petty war against Fier-a-bras. The intercession of the Ecclesiastics at length prevailed upon the Count to seek peace by concession; he tendered a restitution of conjugal rights, and confessed that he had sinned grievously against his consort. The happy pair were affectionately reunited, and the Monk who relates the tale, concludes by stating that this "Lady of rare discretion, having reassumed all her authority," consecrated her wealth and power to the completion of the Church of Maillelais.†

Siege of Laon.A. D.
990.

Freed from all apprehension of Fier-a-bras, Hugh Capet commenced the siege of Laon, and, in the second month of its investment, he was repulsed with the destruction of his camp by a sortie. Nor was it by force of arms that he eventually triumphed. Adalberton, Bishop of the City, the reputed minion of Emma, Queen of the deceased Lothaire,* had been severely visited by the invading Prince, in consequence of that scandalous imputation; and smarting under his ill treatment, and allured by the brilliant promises of Hugh Capet, he surprised and secured the persons of Charles, of his consort, and of Arnulf. The unhappy Prince was imprisoned at Orleans, where he died after little more than a year's confinement; and the Metropolitane was degraded from his Archbishopric, which was bestowed upon Gerbert, the most remarkable personage of his time, and one whose history therefore demands some more extended notice.

From
A. D.
987,
to
A. D.
1108.
Captivity and death
of Charles of Blois
A. D.
991.

Born of obscure parentage in Aquitaine, Gerbert early life had obtained charitable admission to a Monastery, in which he ardently devoted himself to the cultivation of Letters, and more especially of Science. By permission of his Superior,‡ his education was completed in the University of Cordova, the chief, if not the only School of Knowledge in those days of ignorance. So rapid was his progress during his residence in Spain, and so profoundly enlightened were his Countrymen to whom he returned, that his acquaintance with the mysteries of Chemistry, and his employment of the Arabic numerals were regarded not without a misgiving that he had studied occult and unhallowed lore while abiding with the Infidels; and that he was leagued with and protected by the Powers of Darkness. By prudent abstinence from an idle parade of those acquirements in which he so far exceeded his generation, and which, consequently, if exhibited too freely, might have increased the dangerous suspicions, not indeed to be wholly avoided even by this exercise of discretion, he escaped persecution. Not long subsequently to his return home, the Emperor of Germany intrusted him with the distinguished charge of the tuition of his son, afterwards Otho III.; and on completing that task, he was employed as Secretary by the Archbishop of Rheims, who preceded Arnulf, and afterwards by Arnulf himself. Gerbert originally engaged with the latter in the cause of Lorraine; but an offer from Hugh Capet to commit to him the superintendence of the final education of his son Robert, (who although associated with his father, had not yet attained his sixteenth year,) produced an opportune change in the Monk's allegiance, and materially forwarded him on the path to brilliant fortune, already opened by his connection with the Imperial Court.

The succession to the Archbishopric of Rheims, how-

* Ch. lxxii. p. 483.

† The Dominican Beovius, the indefatigable continuator of the Annals of Baronius, and the writer of an express Life of Gerbert, has discovered for him a most illustrious genealogy. He pretends that the Family is derived from Temenus, King of Argos, one of the Heracleidae engaged in the expedition by which they recovered Peloponnesus. (Vita Gerberti, ed. ant.) Perhaps Gerbert, on his final elevation, would not have been solicitous to verify his descent in right line from one of the most portentous adulteries committed by the Heathen Thunderer.

‡ William of Malmesbury, who represents Gerbert most unfavourably, and deals largely in the marvels related of him, denies that permission was given for this visit to Spain. Suo tardo Monachatus, seu gloria cupidine captus, nocte prefligit Hispaniam; cum principis intendens ut Astrologium et octorem id genus Artes a Seneca ediceret. (De Gestis Regum Anglorum, lib. ii. p. 36. 4. Seneca.) Of his progress, the same Author writes, He used scientific Preliminary in Astrology, Alexander in Astrorum interitibus, Juliano Firmicum in Astro; qui quid cantus et volatus Avium portendit dulced; the exerce trances ex inferno figuras; qui quosvis vel noxium vel salubre curiosis humana deprehendit. (Ibid.)

* Chronicon Ademari Cabanensis ap. Bouquet, t. 146.

† Petrus Mallesensis, i. 2. ap. Bouquet, t. 179.

History. ever, was neither obtained without opposition, nor long preserved. The Carlovingian party was by no means extinguished in France by the fall of Charles; and yet more, it had powerful supporters at Rome; where John XV. was won by the prayers and the presents of the Count of Vermandois to resist the degradation of Arnulf. The Cause, after lingering through the tedious processes of the Vatican, was formally adjudged by a Legate; who, in spite of an eloquent Apology for the liberties of the Gallican Church delivered by Gerbert, and still remaining to us, pronounced in favour of Arnulf, and declared him to be legitimate Archbishop. This decision failed in procuring the captive's liberty; but it rendered the further abode of Gerbert in France unseemable and perhaps unsafe; for the Nobles, unused to withstand a solemn judgment of the Holy See, refused submission to the Spiritual authority of a Prelate whose appointment rested on no better support than the nomination of their King, a layman. Gerbert, therefore, after a short and unavailing struggle, retired to the Court of Germany, where he was received with distinguished favour. So well did he improve the golden opportunities there placed in his way, that he was soon consecrated Archbishop of Ravenna, and shortly after ascended the chair of St. Peter, under the title of Sylvester II.; being the first Frenchman who had attained the Triple Crown.

Gerbert did not long enjoy the Pontificate, and his acts during its possession were few and unimportant. He died in 1103, not however before he had generously confirmed the restoration of his former opponent Arnulf; and had also published abroad an Epistle, which was considered as the earliest harbinger of the Crusades. It was written in consequence of outrages perpetrated against the Christians in the Holy Land by the Fatimite Khalif Hakem; and it exhorted all Europe to form that confederacy for the deliverance of Palestine, which was not organized till nearly a Century after this awakening summons. The genius of this extraordinary man embraced every branch of then existing knowledge. In his Epistles he cites the names of several Classical authors whose Works he possessed, and by whose style it is evident that his own composition had greatly profited. His skill in Mechanics, like that of Roger Bacon, anticipated many discoveries which were not promulgated as such till a far later period; he constructed spheres; observed the stars through tubes; invented a clock regulated by a balance, which continued in use till superseded by the pendulum of Huygens, towards the middle of the XVIIIth century; and brought a Hydraulic Organ to perfection by the employment of steam.* After his manner he was a Poet also. The Ars Musica, which is generally believed to have proceeded from his pen, is no contemptible specimen of the Latin rhyme, known afterwards under the name of Leonine; and the Rhythymomachia, a Battle of Numbers and Figures, a Prose Tract in the same volume, describing a kind of Game, for which the author delivers the Rules, appears to justify the tradition that it is to Gerbert that we are indebted for the introduction of Arabic Numerals.†

It cannot be a matter of surprise that the envy or the ignorance of contemporaries persisted even during his Pontificate to stigmatize this great Philosopher as a Magician; and a Historian of the Papacy, writing three Centuries after Gerbert's decease, has contributed to preserve the calumny. Sylvester, says Platina,‡ attained the Triple Crown by evil arts. Quitting his Monastery in early life he made himself over to the Devil, by whose aid he became Vicar of Christ, on condition of a surrender of his Soul. When he inquired of the Fiend how long he should continue in power? the juggling Demon replied that he should live long provided he forebore from visiting Jerusalem. It was after four years, one month, and ten days' enjoyment of the Throne that, having said Mass in a particular Church, he asked to what Saint it was dedicated? and upon learning that it was named the Holy Cross in Jerusalem, he knew his end to be approaching. Straightway he confessed his manifold sins, acknowledged the Diabolical compact, and became absorbed in penitence. In conformity with his last request, so soon as he had expired, his trunk, mutilated of the limbs, was placed on a car drawn by two horses; and the spot at which they should voluntarily stop was to be that of his entombment. The gate of the Lateran was their resting place; and there, accordingly, the remains of Sylvester were interred; and the rattling of his bones beneath ground, and the supernatural sweating of his gravestone still notify, agreeably to the warning of his Epitaph, that the death of the Pope for the time being is near at hand.‡ This tissue of Fables has been sagaciously exposed by Naude;§ and without entering upon the particulars which that learned

* Abacum cerei primus a Saracenis rapimus, regulus dedit quo a sudanibus abacta via intelligitur. (Will. Malmshury, ut sup.) A copy of the Ars Musica and of the Rhythymomachia exists among the Rawlinson MSS. in the Bodleian, and is described by Dr. Burney, (ii. 129.) It is on vellum, and the former occupies about twenty duodecimo pages. The latter Tract, which is undoubtedly written by Gerbert, has been translated into German, and may be found in the Opera de Iussu Svecchorum, 1616, really edited by Augustus Duke of Brunswick, under the name of Gustavus Selenus. A single line from the pen of Gerbert may be found in Oleric Vitellius, (i. rep. Duchesne, Normannicus, p. 371.) It alludes to his translation from Rheims to Ravenna, and afterwards from Ravenna to Rome, and however roughly it may sound to modern ears, it was considered smooth and musical by those of contemporaries:

Transit ab R. Gerbertus in R. post Papa vigens R.

The line, had as it is, has undergone various readings. Baronius (ed. rom. 999.) gives auduit and vixit—and elsewhere we have men regit instead of vixit, which, by increasing the alliteration, at the same time increases the only species of merit to which the verse can lay claim.

† In Vit. The hostility which the Romish Writers for the most part cherish against Gerbert, may arise from his horrenda blasphemia, (as Baronius terms it,) that the Pope was the Anti-Christ and man of Sin. A remarkable opinion, as Mr. Sharon Turner justly styles it, for the Xth Century, and still more remarkable, he might have added, for one who himself was to become a Pope. See more concerning Gerbert in Mr. Turner's England, Middle Ages, iv. 434.

‡ This assertion, made on the authority of Martinus Polonus, is the sole point concerning which Platina appears to hesitate; re-rumque sit an verus ipse Pontifex videtur ad quos pertinet.

§ Apologie pour les grands hommes soupçonnés de Magie, ch. xiv.

Appointed Pope at Sylvester II.
A. D.
999.
Pontificate and change of Sylvester II.

France.
From
A. D.
987. to
A. D.
1108.
His Legendary
History.
Platina.

* Organo hydraulica ubi mirum in modum per aque ostentum videtur, ventus emergens impet convulsione barbit, et per multiformes transitus arena fatidat modulatos clamores emittit. (Will. Malmshury, ut supra, b.) It is impossible to interpret these words otherwise than of steam; yet Dr. Burney, (ii. 130.) appears only to express surprise at the use of "warm" water; and Mr. Berington, in an account of Gerbert, in the Literary History of the Middle Ages, noticing this Hydraulic Organ, and wholly omitting the important word calida, thinks perhaps that he has fully explained the process employed, when he states that the sounds were produced "by means of wind pressed forward by a strong current of water." (204.) The professed Historians of Steam-engines, probably, never heard of Gerbert, and their silence therefore cannot be a matter of surprise. But the passage in William of Malmshury is very remarkable, and deserves more attention than it has as yet received.

History.

From
A. D.
997.
to
A. D.
1109.

and most pleasing writer furnishes in defence of the injured Pope, it may be sufficient to notice two facts which few, probably, will deny; that no one ever observed the prodigy asserted to belong to his tomb; and that his Epitaph, instead of making the declaration attributed to it, is a glowing testimony to the piety, the integrity, and the holiness of life of the deceased, written almost at the moment of his death, by one of his successors, Sergius IV.* who had ample opportunities of intimate acquaintance with his character, and who himself possessed undisputed claims to similar excellent qualities.

The Legends concerning Sylvester have received various additions from many very competent hands.

William of Malmsbury.

Among others are some recorded by William of Malm-sbury, under whose treatment they were not likely to lose any of their supernatural tone. That Writer accordingly informs us that Gerbert in his youth, when at Seville, lodged with a Saracen under whom he studied Magic; and that not being able to obtain from his Preceptor a certain necromantic volume, containing the sum of his whole Art, he made him drunk, and by the assistance of his daughter, with whom he entertained some love passages, stole it from under his pillow, and fled away with the treasure. His Host awakening, and discovering his loss, tracked the fugitive by his skill in Astrology; and Gerbert, aware of his pursuit by like science, took refuge under a wooden bridge, hanging from its beams without fear of discovery so long as he should touch neither Earth nor Water. Escaping afterwards to the sea-shore, he made his bargain with the Devil for conveyance home;† and the Fiend from that hour took especial charge of his fortunes, and among other advantageous Arts, taught his votary how to discover hidden treasures. The Monk then recites a Legend, which has been often repeated, concerning a Statue in the Campus Martius at Rome, with the fore-finger of the right hand extended, and bearing an inscription, "Strike here!" Sylvester, prompted by his wily counsellor, perceived the mistake into which numbers had been betrayed, who, falsely interpreting these words, had belaboured the unhappy Image unmercifully but unprofitably; and marking the precise spot on which the shadow of the finger was thrown at the moment at which the Sun passed the meridian, he excavated the ground beneath, at nightfall, in company with a single attendant, and opened a souterrain which might be considered the Palace of Midas. It was built, furnished, and (if we may so express ourselves) peopled by gold. The structure, its Royal army, and its inhabitants were alike framed of that costly metal. But an ill-advised attempt made by the Pope's servant to appropriate some of its precious contents to his own use, was frustrated by a general alarm among the golden and ghostly crew; and by the total darkness which ensued when an archer, standing with his arrow ready on the string, shivered to pieces a caruncule whose intrinsic light illuminated the wonderous cavern. Strange to say, on this occasion, it was by other advice than that of 'the Devil—Dei monitu—that the daring Pope,‡ sum-moning up his presence of mind, escaped without paying the price of his follower's rashness. The Evil Spirit indeed might not be within call at the moment of danger, for his responses were generally obtained from a metallic head cast with due regard to the position of the Stars;* and it was from that Oracle that Sylvester received information of the period of his death, concerning which William of Malm-sbury writes much in the same manner as Platina. After the above fearful narratives, the reader may derive some consolation respecting the Pope's final destiny, from a Chapter in Wier's singular Work, De Præstigiis Demonum,† in which we are assured that Sylvester's repentance was availing, so that he defrauded the Devil of his due. In another place;‡ the same Writer informs us that the Pope shut up a Dragon in the Capitol; and we learn from Naudé also;§ that the monster so incarcerated was said to devour the huge allowance of 6000 human victims daily.

Idle as these stories are in themselves, they are not without their value in the eye of the Historian; for they belong to the creed of the times in which they were promulgated, and a knowledge of them is consequently essential to all who seek just acquaintance with the character of those times. But we must not delay longer on this Episode. Little interest attaches to the remainder of the obscure reign of Hugh Capet; or, as may be more properly said, little more can be related on account of that obscurity. Some rebellious acts of his son Robert are darkly implied; and we are more openly told of incessant petty struggles among his Nobles, and of much bloodshed without glory. After the example of Clovis, neglected by the Fainéants of the 1st, and by all the Kings of the 11th Race, Hugh Capet established his Court at Paris; he is represented to have been eminently devout, and two proofs of his pious temper are greatly extolled; one that he converted his Palace into a Church still existing, and dedicated to St. Bartholomew; another, that after his unition at Rheims, he never again, during the remainder of his life, placed the Crown upon his brows. This abstinence was attributed by his enemies to a consciousness of his usurpation; by his friends to humility; or to belief in a revelation made to him by St. Valerius, that the Kingdom should abide in his Family during seven Generations. The discreet King imagined therefore that, by surrendering the Regalia in his own person, he might steal a march upon Fortune and Prophecy; and by escaping count among the descents, might add one to their number. Mezeray, with that fervid loyalty which is a necessary qualification for a Historiographer Royal,¶ remarks that Hugh Capet either did not know, or else had forgotten, that "seven generations," in Scriptural language, is equivalent to "all Ages," and consequently that the Dynasty which he founded will never be extinct. Hugh died in his fifty-fifth year, leaving one son and three daughters, and was buried in St. Denis.¶

France.

From
A. D.
997.
to
A. D.
1109.

Obscurity of the reign of Hugh Capet.

His death.
A. D.
996.

* Certe inspectione egerunt, cum videlicet omnes Platinæ exordia curis suis includerentur. Will. of Malm-sbury, p. 37.

† vi. 5.

‡ v. 37.

§ ut supra.

¶ It is but just, however, to Mezeray to remark, that he lost his pension of 4000 livres in consequence of some bold expressions in his History. It was a wretched act in Colbert to deprive him, and yet more so in Louis XIV. to permit the deprivation.

¶ The laborious and very useful authors of the Universal History, are sometimes amusing from their blunt and literal homeliness. Thus, determining the surname Capet to be originally a soubriquet, they interpret it Jolthead; and they add that Hugh's Consort,

* Pope A. D. 1109.

† William of Malm-sbury is here a little doubtful whether he shall obtain credit; and hec vulgariter facta credentur whimsi, et quod voluit Populus literatorum fuisse laedere, dicere illum laevi cum Demone, but he expresses his own entire conviction from the circumstances attendant upon the Pope's death-bed.

‡ This tale is related in the Gesta Romanorum, cvii. not of Sylvester by name, but of quidam Clericus subditis.

History. The Reigns of Hugh Capet and of his son and successor Robert, belong to one of the darkest periods not only of French, but of general European History; and the causes of this obscurity may be found partly in the want of communication between men of different Countries, and even of different Provinces in the same Country, and the consequent absence of mutual curiosity as to their respective transactions: partly in the nature of those transactions themselves, in which countless petty interests, and scarcely one that is paramount and predominant, are the objects to be contemplated.* National History, in truth, did not exist during this dark period. Each Feudal Lord maintained a stern, separate dominion, seldom in amicable contact, often in ferocious collision with surrounding Chieftains: and the King, no more than one, and not always the most powerful of their Body, is to be considered as their titular Head, not as the Monarch of a great People. From this confusion, not bright but turbid, we must be content to glean such few personal anecdotes of the Prince as have been recorded by Monkish diligence; and they must be accepted as illustrations not so much of the History as of the manners of the times.

libert II. The first years after the accession of Robert II. were occupied in differences with the Church, which proved that the little authority he was permitted to retain by his imperious Vassals could be still more closely and painfully curtailed by a foreign Spiritual domination. The Holy See continued peremptorily to demand the release and restoration of Arnulf, the deposed Archbishop, still detained in prison as the bitterest enemy of the House of Capet. At the same time, a marriage which Robert had contracted exposed him in his domestic relations also to the wrath of the Papacy. The real motive which induced the violent opposition of Gregory V. to Robert's connection with Bertha, widow of Eudes, Count of Blois, may probably be found in the King's omission to seek dispensation from the Holy See, after he had received it from the Gallican Bishops. The pretext urged was the grievous sin of transgressing the forbidden Canonical degrees; for the King had held as Sponsor, at the Baptismal Font, one of Bertha's children by her former husband; thus contracting a tie, at that time absurdly esteemed no less an impediment to wedlock than positive consanguinity. This marriage, probably, was one of affection, for it was solemnized at the earliest moment after the widow's hand became free; and no sooner did the Bridegroom hear that his engagement had been pronounced incestuous by the Pope, than he hastened to propitiate him by partial abandonment of the first point in dispute; restoring Arnulf to freedom (although not to his See) as the price of the hoped for retention of Bertha. But the Pontiff was not thus easily to be conciliated. Assembling a Council at Rome, in the presence of his relation, the IIIrd Otho, from whose sanction, no doubt, he derived increased boldness, Gregory pronounced that Robert must separate himself from Bertha; that both must perform penance during seven years under pain of excommunication; and that the Archbishop of Tours who gave the nuptial blessing, and the Bishops who assisted, should be suspended till they had tendered personal satisfaction to the Apostolic See. Notwithstanding the general timidity and the overweening devotion which signally marked the character of Robert, he continued firm in resistance to this most oppressive mandate; and three years at least, if not twice that number, are generally believed to have elapsed, before he was so far worn down by the sufferings consequent upon the excommunication of himself and the Interdict of his Kingdom, as to consent to the surrender of the object of his affections. In spite of the discredit sometimes thrown upon the nearly contemporary authorities which relate the fearful effects of the Papal Bulls, we think they receive confirmation from similar passages in History; and although we may hesitate to believe that Bertha, horror-stricken at the Pontifical anathemas, was delivered of a Babe whose head and neck in all points resembled that of a Goose,† we are still far from rejecting that part of the statement by Cardinal Damiano, which affirms that Robert was shunned as one accused by his subjects; that he was abandoned by all but two attendants, who provided his food; and that even these menials, whom fear, bribes, or unconquerable attachment detained near his person, purified every vessel from which the King and Queen had eaten or drunk by passing it through the fire.‡

The King at length submitted; the wife of his bosom was wrung from him; and the beautiful Constance, (it is doubted whether of Toulouse or Provence,) whom he next espoused, was not of a disposition likely to retain his love. Nevertheless, although by no means increasing the personal happiness of the Monarch, this connection with the South largely contributed to refine the manners of his hitherto rude Court. Languedoc and

France.
From
A. D.
987. to
A. D.
1108.

Consequences of the Interdict of France.

Robert separates from Bertha and marries Constance.

* Vaissette, who is followed in L'Art de Versifier les Dates, contrary to the great mass of authorities, restricts the opposition of Robert within one year.

† Et quod suscepit filium, anserinum per annis collum et caput habentem; (Damiani Epist. ii. 15.) a story wholly unnoticed by contemporaries. Il n'y eut rien de monstrueux dans toute cette affaire, is the well known and witty remark of Voltaire, que l'auteur du Pape, et la follesse du Roi. (Sur les Mœurs, ch. 39.)

‡ Damiano, ut supra. M. de Simondi rejects this narrative of Damiano, who wrote within fifty years of the occurrences which he relates; and he thinks the privations of Robert were crassly heightened by the Cardinal in order to strike terror into the Emperor Henry IV., whom in a future page of this Chapter we shall perceive engaged in a struggle with Rome. Strange to say, the most improbable part of the story, the monstrous birth imputed to the Queen, is not equally doubted by M. de Simondi; who supposes that fear might really produce some such effect upon a sensitive mother. But if the Babe be once admitted, we think the argument in favour of the utter destitution of the Royal Pair is strengthened a thousand fold; for surely it must have been punished so powerfully as Bertha's imagination. The most learned and acute Historian of the Italian Republics has not to be told, that 300 years after the Interdict of France during the reign of King Robert, a similar Bull issued by Clement V. annihilated for the time the entire Commerce of Venice, utterly proscribed her from communion with the rest of Europe, exposed her mariners and foreign residents to assassination, and reduced her Citizens to despair; till the iron collar and the unparalleled self-denial of Francesco Dandolo, (Il Cene), procured remission of the Pontifical Censures. It was easy for the Senate of that great Republic to defy the similar thunders of the Vatican, launched afterwards in the more enlightened days of the XVIIIth Century; but those bolts were sufficiently terrible to quell their courage and drive them to submission in the XIVth; and therefore, a fortiori, to overpower a superstitious King of France in the XIIIth.

Adelaide, was daughter of Guillaume Teste d'Estoupe, or Aupate? What third form would be the result of such a conjunction? Velly assigns a more honourable source to this Family name, qui signifie au propre une grosse tête, et au figuré un bon esprit; others, he adds, derive it from a particular cap worn by Hugh. In the Chronicon Francorum (ap. Bouquet, p. 302.) it is said, ac detrusa est quia dum juvenis caputale audire per tadam.

* These causes are very ably followed out by M. de Simondi, Hist. des Français, part xxx. ch. lii.

History.

From
A. D.
987. to
A. D.
1108.

His domestic pastimes.

His strategy to prevent perjury.

Weakness of his benevolence.

Provence were the chief schools of that chivalrous devotion to the Fair, which sheds grace over the otherwise stern and repulsive features of these iron Ages; and Music and Poetry, and whatever else was then known of the Arts and the elegances of life, were cherished in those districts, by frequent intercourse, through the Mediterranean ports, with the polished Saracens of Spain. Even amid the hoarse murmurs of the ascetic Monks, we may discover that Northern France reaped unnumbered benefits from intermixture with those more cultivated regions; and the bitter reproofs and reprimands of Glabrus afford a lively picture of the Barbarism endeared to him by long habit, the invasion of which he therefore witnessed with anger and reluctance.*

The rude proofs to which the patience of the gentle Robert was exposed by the capricious violence of his new Consort left it unimpaired; and some of the Anecdotes recorded of his meekness place him, so far as that quality is regarded, quite on a level with even the enduring and philosophic husband of the Athenian Xantippe. Some of the little trickeries to which the effervescence of the Queen's temper reduced him are amusingly related. He was lavish, as it seems, in almsgiving, and whenever he bestowed a disproportionate bounty on a beggar, it was accompanied with a discreet caution, "Take care that Constance does not see you!"† On one occasion, when she had studded his lance with silver nails, he employed a mendicant to pull them out again, giving them to him for his trouble, and advising him to make the best of his way out of the Queen's clutches; and when Constance afterwards observed that the lance had been stripped of its ornaments, the King did not hesitate to call God to witness that he knew nothing whatever of the matter. A ready subterfuge on all occasions, indeed, relieved the conscience of this simple and confiding Prince from the burden of perjury, whether committed by himself or by others; although it is but just to add, that the singular precaution by which he guarded against the evil consequences of that crime, had far more reference to the welfare of other men's souls than of his own. Whenever any of his Vassals approached to pay homage and tender the oath of allegiance, with a reasonable distrust of the fidelity which experience had taught him was too likely to be violated, he presented to him a rich crystal reliquary, as it seemed, enchased with gold, upon which he was to be sworn. Especial care, however, had previously been taken not to inclose any holy remains within that costly receptacle; and the sagacious Casuist believed that all who perjured themselves upon his empty casket, did so without sin, and consequently without hazard.

The easiness of this Prince's temper too often degenerated into weakness. The Poor were admitted to his banqueting chamber as partakers of the broken meats, and they did not always requite this charity with gratitude. One beggar who had crept under the table, and who, crouching like a dog at Robert's feet, was fed from his plate, succeeded in detaching from the Royal mantle an ornament of gold weighing six ounces. The King perceived the theft, dissembled his knowledge, permitted the escape of the pilferer, and replied to the angry remarks of Constance when she discovered the robbery, that the poor offender doubtless had more need of the gold than himself. In a similarly mistaken temper, he concealed the theft of a consecrated silver candelabrum, which a priest, in his very presence, carried off from the Altar; and when Constance swore by the soul of her Father that she would pluck out the robber's eyes if he were detected, the King privately furnished him with money from his own purse, to remove himself beyond all hazard of her vengeance.

Qualities thus soft in their nature were ill adapted to the maintenance of a throne founded upon recent usurpation, or for the restraint of fierce and turbulent Vassals; and it is without surprise, therefore, that we hear of a lingering war in which Robert was engaged for establishment in a possession, his legitimate right to which could not be denied. His uncle, Henry Duke of Burgundy, dying childless, bequeathed to him that territory, which, even without such bequest, according to Feudal usage, would have reverted to the Crown. The Fief, however, was perseveringly contested by two other claimants; and notwithstanding an important aid which the King obtained from Richard II. of Normandy, the most faithful and powerful of his kinsmen and allies, who at one time joined him with more than 20,000 men, thirteen years elapsed before he was fully acknowledged Lord of the disputed Province.* Two incidents during this protracted struggle are characteristic of the spirit of the Age. The Convent of St. Germain might be considered the key and citadel of Auxerre, which the Royal army was on one occasion besieging; and notwithstanding the remonstrances of all the Ecclesiastics in his Camp, Robert, as if inspired with sudden and most unusual martial ardour, gave orders for its assault. At the moment of the advance of the storming party, a thick haze arose from the river, and enveloped the holy walls in its folds, so as altogether to interrupt the operations of the besiegers, while the garrison, as was affirmed, retained the full benefit of clear day. The soldiers, struck with a belief that the darkness proceeded from miraculous intervention, betook themselves to hasty flight, and abandoned their camp.† In another instance, a more fortunate event was attributed to a supernatural agency, which the Monks probably borrowed from the downfall of Jericho before the rams' horns of Joshua. The King was an accomplished Musician, and no small portion of his time was devoted to the composition of Hymns, which were regularly performed in the Church Service under his own immediate superintendence. Having invested the Castle of Avalon without success for more than three months, on the morning of the Feast of St. Hippolytus, for whom

* Caperunt confuere gratia ejusdem Regum in Franciam aliquo Burgundum ab Arvernâ et Aquitanâ (Provence was sometimes called Aquitaine, Mezeray, ii. 477.) homines omni trepide cunctis, moribus et veste distorti, armis et equorum phaleris incompositi, a multis capitulis conis nodati, Austrorum more barbâ rasi, caligis et cervicis tergentibus. (Glabrus Rodolphus, iii. ed. An. op. Bouquet, x.) The reader cannot fail to observe that the crying enormities of dress are here the chief objects of complaint; and he may find abundant parallels in the denunciations of our own Puritan Stubbs.

† This anecdote and those which follow relating to King Robert's facility of temper, are borrowed from Helgaudus Furiacensis, Vita Roberti Regis, c. 8. &c. op. Bouquet, x.

* The Fief of Burgundy was bestowed on Robert's second son, Henry; and subsequently, on the accession of that Prince to the Throne, it was given by him to his younger brother, Robert, the founder of the first Royal line in the Duchy, which endured no less than 360 years. King John committed the Duchy to the Crown in 1361, and afterwards granted it to his fourth son, Philip the Hardy, founder of the second Royal House of Burgundy, which terminated in 1477.

† Glabrus Rodolphus, (ii. 8.) the authority for this incident, probably was unacquainted with the Real, and knew nothing of Ajix and De in paxi et duxerit.

he professed distinguished esteem, he withdrew to St. Denis, in order, as was his wont, to direct the Choir during the celebration of Mass. The Monks raised the Hymn Agnus Dei, da nobis pacem! and while the King was devoutly leading the solemn chant, the walls of the Castle, which doubtless had been sufficiently undermined beforehand, fell to the ground, as was said, spontaneously; and the besiegers entered without further resistance.* The Queen, however, was not altogether pleased that her husband's metrical powers should be restricted to the service of the Saints, and she one day playfully begged him to make herself his theme. Not long afterwards he presented her with a slave commencing O Constantia Martyrum! and her eye resting upon her own name, she asked no further, and felt satisfied that she was the object whom he had celebrated.†

Happy would it have been if her jealousy had not extended beyond the canonized dead! But in order to free herself from the growing influence which a Favourite was establishing with the King, she recklessly perpetrated a foul and most atrocious murder. Hugh de Beauvais, of whom little more is known beyond his name, by a studious compliance with the fancies of his weak master, which were seldom used to meet deference elsewhere, had won his entire confidence; and secretly encouraged him in an intention which he cherished of shaking off the domestic tyranny of Constance, and recalling the gentle Bertha, in spite of the remembered wrath of the Vatican. It is by no means certain that during a short absence of the Queen, Bertha was not actually readmitted to the Palace and her former rights. Be this as it may, Constance, stung either by the knowledge that she had been thus really injured, or by the apprehension that such injury was impending, armed twelve trusty retainers of her uncle, the Count of Anjou, surprised the King while hunting in company with his Favourite, and laid the unhappy Hugh de Beauvais dead at his feet. Robert, says the Chronicler Glabrus, was rendered melancholy for a short time by this occurrence; but he soon reconciled himself to the Queen, as was his duty.‡

The mutual outrages of the Feudal Lords were by no means circumscribed by the limits of France, and a seizure of the City of Valenciennes from the Count of Hainault, by Baldwin, Count of Flanders, might have involved Robert in hostility with the Crown of Germany, to which the former of those Nobles was Vassal, if the disposition of the reigning Emperor, Henry II., had not been governed by moderation equal to his own. An interview to terminate the dispute was arranged between the two Princes, and a spot near Yboi, in Luxembourg, on the bank of the Meuse, was appointed for rendezvous. But the narrow-minded jealousy of Court etiquette, on this, as on many other similar occasions, endeavoured to prevent cordial intercourse; by whispering suspicions of probable bad faith; and by implying that the Sovereign who should first cross the river would thus make a virtual acknowledgment of inferiority. A boat moored in the mid current was proposed therefore as the scene of conference. All mistrust, however, was speedily removed by the frank and generous confidence displayed by Henry. Passing the river one morning, with too few attendants to excite alarm, or even notice, he appeared unexpectedly in the French Camp, cordially embraced the King, assisted with him at Mass, and partook of his repast. This confidential visit was returned on the morrow; the Sovereigns interchanged presents,* testified great marks of sincere mutual esteem, and agreed to unite their arms in order to do justice between their Vassals; an enterprise the completion of which demanded no less than two campaigns. It was perhaps by a remembrance of the chivalrous conduct of Henry on this occasion, which was not the only one in which he met Robert in personal conference, that Francis I. was guided, when, in later times, he displayed a similarly noble and confiding spirit on the Field of Cloth of Gold.

But we must turn to less grateful incidents. During the concluding years of the Xth and the early part of the XIth century, the Church was making rapid strides to that unlimited dominion of which ere long she became so fully possessed. One of the reigning follies of the first-mentioned period was a belief in the approaching end of the world at the completion of the first Millennium of the Christian Era. During the second portion, men's minds were fantastically imbued with overweening and superstitious reverence for every relic, the genuineness of which was asserted by the crafty, and admitted by the credulous. It seemed, we are told by Glabrus,† as if there were a general resurrection of those holy pledges which after long concealment were simultaneously revealed to the Faithful. Every shrine which announced its possession of a dry bone, a withered limb, a tattered rag, or a splintered chip, to which the blindness of zeal could attach imaginary sanctity, was visited, worshipped, and enriched by the powerful of the Earth; and Robert and his Queen were among the most active who traversed Europe in pilgrimages. During one of his devout journeys to Rome, the King placed a sealed packet upon the Altar of St. Peter and St. Paul in the Vatican, on the Eve of the Festival of those Apostles. The mysterious offering excited great expectation among the Monks, whose eager curiosity scarcely restrained itself till the morrow; and their disappointment was proportionate when the donation was found to consist of nothing more than a Hymn, "Cornelius Centurio," in both words and music a composition from the Royal pen, assisted by Guido d'Arezzo, who about that time had invented his gamut.‡

The weakness of this otherwise good and gentle Prince was gradually diverted from harmless follies to purposes of blood, by the intolerance of his Ecclesiastics; and that spirit which had at first devoted itself to indiscriminate almsgiving and ambiguous benevolence, was ultimately stimulated to the detestable excesses of a fierce Religious Persecution. Were it not for the many similar anomalies in human character which daily experience presents, it would scarcely be credited that the same Prince could condemn those who differed from him in France.

From
A. D.
987. to
A. D.
1108.

Superstition of the times.

Robert's offering in the Vatican.

Contradictions in the character of Robert.

* Chronicon Salernitanum, c. 32. apud Bouquet, x.

† Id. lib. Mathereusement il n'y avoit rien de bon à dire de cette Princesse, says Velly, with greater truth than gallantry.

‡ Ipsa vero Rex, hec aliquando tempore tali facto tratu effectus, postea tamen, ut decebat, concors Regina fuit. iii. 2.

* Out of the numerous and very costly gifts mutually tendered, Henry contented himself by accepting a Copy of the Gospels enriched with gold and precious stones, and a similarly ornamented Reliquary containing a tooth of the Martyr Vincentius. His Consort took a pair of golden censers, pares curi lanternas novae. Glabrus Rodolphus, iii. 3.

† Lib. iii. c. 6. ap. Bouquet, x. p. 32.

‡ Chronique de St. Denis, ad inst. ap. Bouquet, x.

History.
From
A. D.
987. to
A. D.
1108.

merely speculative opinions, to the most execrating of all deaths, in his own presence, who, at an earlier period of his reign, had defrauded, if we may so say, the scaffold of criminals justly due to its vengeance. It is related that twelve traitors had been convicted on the plainest evidence of plotting his assassination. While awaiting the order for execution, they were admitted to the Eucharist, and pardoned immediately after its administration; the King at the same time informing their Judges, that he could not consent to put any one to death, whom his and their common master had thought worthy to be admitted to his table.*

General
Persecution of the Jews.
A. D.
1009.

The first cruelties which Bigotry perpetrated were, perhaps, beyond the control of a Government so feeble as that of Robert, and indeed received countenance from similar outrages throughout the whole of Europe. In consequence of a false rumour that a profanation of the Holy Sepulchre by the Khalif Hakem had been occasioned by the Jews, that unhappy race of outcasts was subjected to every variety of death by torture which ingenious cruelty could suggest; and which in many instances was escaped but by suicide.† All Christians were interdicted from trafficking with Hebrew merchants; and Rainard, Count of Sens, the single Noble in France who afforded them protection, was himself denounced as an apostate, scoffingly and irreverently taunted as King of the Jews, and proscribed as one accused, whose assassination would be meritorious. Even after the fury which hunted this rejected race to the death had partially subsided, they were still held up as objects of public scorn, contumely, and abomination; and among the established customs which marked their degraded lot was one long retained at Toulouse. Every Easter, some Jew was placed under the chief porch of the Cathedral, and there, in the presence of the whole assembled and exulting populace, he was compelled to stand defenceless and unresisting, while he received a blow on the cheek; for the perpetration of which cowardly outrage it was usual to select one of the most vigorous among the townsmen. It is recorded that on one of these occasions, during a visit from the Viscomte de Rochechouart, the Civic authorities, in order to do honour to their noble guest, appointed his Chaplain, a brawny and muscular Priest, to perform the unmanly office of striker; and so furious was the blow directed, that the eyes and brains of the victim were dashed out, and he fell dead on the pavement of the Cathedral.‡

Brutal custom at Toulouse.

A. D.
1020.

Not many years after this Persecution of the Jews, a Heresy was detected at Orleans, in which the notions inculcated appear to have differed from the received doctrines of the Church, mainly on some obscure points relative to the precise nature of our Lord during his Incarnation; and other similar, dark questions equally transcending the powers of Reason. They were represented, however, to the ignorant and open-eared populace in far more odious colours; and the new Manicheans or Gnostics, as the Heretics were termed, were accused of practising secret enormities like those

Heresy at Orleans.
A. D.
1022.

from the evil report of which even the Agapæ of the Primitive Christians did not escape; of casting into the flames the infant produce of their incestuous orgies; and of feeding their neophytes upon the ashes of those unhallowed sacrifices; which were believed by some hidden virtue and mysterious potency to bind all who partook of them, indissolubly and for ever, to their damnable profession.

Maddened by the dissemination of calumnies thus atrocious, the Citizens of Orleans were preparing to burst the gates of the prison to which some of these Sectaries had been committed, when the opportune arrival of Robert and his Queen interrupted their violence. The death by popular fury which the miserable victims did but narrowly escape, was now exchanged for the legalized and regulated torture of the stake; and thirteen human beings were burned alive in the presence of the Court assembled as to a Festival. Among the sufferers was a venerable Monk who had once filled the high office of Confessor to the Queen; and Constance, forgetful alike of the gentleness of her sex, of the majesty of her exalted station, of the close Spiritual ties which had formerly linked her to the dying Ecclesiastic, and of the promptings of ordinary pity, stood up when the devoted band moved forward to execution, and aiming at the aged Stephen, as he passed her, with the ornamented knob of a cane which it was the fashion of the time for ladies to carry, struck out one of his eyes, and vaunted the ferocious act as a triumph of Religion over natural affection.*

It was not likely that a spirit so stirring and ambitious as that of Constance would allow her husband to omit in her own Family an important ceremonial for which prescription might now almost be pleaded; and, accordingly, at her instance, Robert associated his eldest son Hugh in government with himself. The youth at the time of his Coronation had scarcely completed his tenth year; yet before he had passed five more, the avarice of his mother, and the general neglect which he encountered at Court, drove him into open outrages. His Kingship, he said, produced nothing to him but meat and clothing;† he demanded a partition of power as well as of titles; and putting himself at the head of a turbulent band of followers he pillaged the estates of his Royal Parents. Robert in the first instance turned to his Ecclesiastics for advice and consolation; and he received with his wonted meekness a bitter reproof which brought to remembrance his own past breaches of filial duty, and warned him that the similar acts under which he was now suffering were no more than retributive.‡

* Gesta Synodi Aurelianensis, ap. Bouquet, x. 539, where occurs the following quæ note; culpanda sunt in hoc Constantia Regina. Velly also passes by the savage deed of Constance without reprobation, and contents herself with explaining, as Bouquet does also in a note, the fashion of her case: Telle étoit alors la mode parmi les Dames de qualité; toutes portaient de petites cuisses légères, dont la jeunesse pour l'ordinaire étoit ornée de la figure de quelque serpent. (i. 450.) If the instrument were no more than a small cane or stick, the blow must have been inflicted with no small fury, and it is not possible that its fatal effect could exceed the brutal intention of the striker.

† Cærenæ ac nil domini rei pecularia præter victum et vestitum ex regno unde coronatus fuit posse mundare, caput corde trahere, alique apud Patrem ut ei quippiam domini largiretur conquiri. Quod quæ Mater compersa, ut erat avarissima, maritumque magistrum, furi vocatus, inasper conatus atque maledictus juvenem lacessere. Glabrus Rodolphus, iii. 9.

‡ See p. 520. It was an Abbot of Dijon who thus awakened Robert's conscience, Mémorial te, O Rex, conceit injuriam approbaturusque Patri ac Matræ te testatorem in tali juvenete; quoniam talis tibi.

* Helgaldus, Vita Roberti Regis, ap. Bouquet, x. p. 64.

† Communio omnium Christianorum consensus decretum est ut omnes Judæi ab ultionem terris vel civitatibus funditus pellerentur. Sicque universi odio habiti, expulsi de civitatibus, aliis gladiis trucidati, aliis flammis necati, diversisque mortuum generibus interempti, nonnulli etiam ex diversis caedibus intererunt. Ita scilicet ut digni de eis ultione præcedat via præci coram in orbem reperiretur Romano. (Glabrus Rodolphus, iii. 7.)

‡ Chronicon Ademari Cabanensis, ad ann. ap. Bouquet, x. 154.

History. It was, perhaps, on account of this unworthy conduct that on the demise of the Emperor Henry II. Robert declined not only for himself, but for his son also, the Crown of Italy tendered to his acceptance by the restless Lombards. However greatly tempted by a prospect of the recovery of Lorraine, if he embarrassed Conrad II. whom the Germanic Body had already chosen as their King, by a struggle in Italy, he had sufficient discretion to refuse the glittering offer; and the activity soon exhibited by the new Monarch proved the wisdom of the determination. Hugh died in the following year;* of the three remaining sons of the King of France, Eudes was too imbecile for public functions; and the wishes of Constance opposed the legitimate claims of Henry, in order to secure the advancement of her favourite and younger son Robert. Henry, as she declared with little regard to the feelings of her husband, and as most of the Bishops uncourteously repeated after her, was perfidious, indolent, and effeminate, and in his neglect of the Laws strongly resembled his Father.† For the first time in his life, Robert persevered in opposition to the wishes of his Queen, and Henry received the Regal title; the possession of which he soon abused not less disgracefully than his predecessor. So grievous were the outrages committed by himself and his brother, (who, in spite of their recent opposition, were now leagued together for purposes of violence, and to curb, as they affirmed, the insolence of their Mother,) that Robert was compelled to take the field and repress them by a more than Civil War.‡ The afflicted Monarch did not long survive this unnatural struggle; he died at Melun, while on a Pilgrimage, leaving behind him a far juster claim to the title of the Gentle than to that of the Wise, by which he is sometimes not very appropriately distinguished.§

The unnatural enmity of Constance against her son Henry displayed itself with fresh vehemence after his accession; and so formidable was the opposition which she at first succeeded in exciting, that the young King was compelled to take refuge with a handful of attendants in the Court of Robert, Duke of Normandy, at Fescamp. That faithful ally was prompt in affording succour; Henry reentered his Kingdom triumphantly, chased his opponent at every point of attack, and obliged Constance to negotiate. The proud spirit of the Queen sank under disappointment and humiliation, and her death,* within a month after the signature of this compulsory Treaty, confirmed Henry on his throne, at the price of no inconsiderable portion of territory in return for the Norman assistance.† During this struggle, and for some time after its termination, France was afflicted with a hideous and most overwhelming calamity, the horrors of which are minutely and painfully detailed by a contemporary writer. For a year before the death of Robert, the Kingdom had been alarmed by continually repeated menaces of approaching Scarcity, and the total failure of the harvest in 1032 at length brought Famine to extremity. Precautionary measures, even if they had been understood, or could have been practised during the infancy of French commerce, would now have been unavailing, for all Europe was, in various degrees, similarly visited. The facts which Glabrus records are probably exaggerated; for the theme of misery was too well suited to the false eloquence of a Monastic Chronicler to escape without Rhetorical engravings; still he would not have ventured upon the extraordinary narrative which he presents, without much authority to support him; and we are justified in believing, that the main texture of his story is woven from truth.

All classes indifferently, we are told, were exposed to similar and equal privations, and the price of food, if any scanty portion of it could be found, depended upon the caprice of the vendor. Herbs, weeds, and roots gave but little relief to the pangs of hunger, they were quickly exhausted, and Nature, raging for sustenance, preyed on diet the most unnatural. The strong seized the weak, tore them piecemeal, and devoured their limbs. The sacredness of hospitality was violated, and the entertainer stole the life of the guest beneath his roof, in the hope of supporting his own. Children were enticed by toys and caresses to remote spots in which no eye could witness their massacre; the graves themselves were ransacked for their foul and mouldering contents; and, as if the revolting traffic had been publicly authorized, human flesh was exposed for sale in the market of Tonnerre. Those who would have purchased and partaken secretly, dared not forgive the open commission of this execrable crime; the perpetrator was condemned to the flames, and the stock on his shambles was buried; but a famishing wretch disinterred the treasure by night, was seized during his horrible banquet, and perished at the same stake. Near a Church in the Forest of Maçon, stood a small and solitary cottage, by the road side, presenting itself opportunely for travellers. It could admit but very few at once, yet seldom did a night pass that its lodging was unoccupied. Two visitors, one evening, a man and his wife, were preparing for repose, when the attention of the latter was attracted by that which seemed a human head, partially concealed in a dark corner of their chamber. Further examination revealed yet greater horrors; till apprehensive of some danger, although they scarcely understood its precise nature, the terrified pair attempted escape from the slaughter-house; and were nearly overpowered by its

France.
From
A. D.
987. to
A. D.
1108.
Great Famine.
A. D.
1032.

Narrative
by Glabrus Rodolphus.

justo iudicio Deo permittente a flamma ingeruntur quoniam ita ipse generibus ingratiss. Id. ibid.

* In some epicedial lines on the death of Hugh, preserved by Glabrus Rodolphus, (ut sup.) the wishes of the Italians are strongly expressed: if by themselves, altogether without knowledge; if by a Frenchman, certainly with adulation.

Omnis quem prona poscebat Italia Censur ut jura promeret regala.

Velly also is very dolorous on the loss of Hugh; who no doubt obtained from the Monks, but with small appearance of desert, the title of le Grand? We know little more of him than that he died at eighteen years of age, having spent between three and four in robbing his Father and Mother; and that latterly he became devoted.

† Simulatore, regem, mollem, in negligendo jure patriarum. Odo Ricus Episc. Aurelianensis, ap. Bouquet, t. 504.

‡ Bellum plagaum Civile. Glabrus Rodolphus, iii. 9. Had the Monk read Lucan?

§ Before his death, Robert visited many holy places, and as Glabrus affirms, performed numerous cures, especially on lepers. This is the first record of the virtue of the Royal touch, absurdly claimed for the Kings of France no less than for those of England. Philip I. is said to have lost that gift on account of his incontinence, but happily it was restored to his successor. Velly, i. 544.

VOL. XI.

* Elle fut interrée à St. Denis auprès du Roi son mari dont elle avoit continuellement trouble le repos, says Velly; not as it seems quite without a misgiving that she would not even then be altogether quiet.

† Henry ceded the Vexin as a Fief to Robert; it embraced the country between the Oise and the Epte, thus bringing the Normans within six leagues of Paris.

3 v

History.

From
A. D.
987. to
A. D.
1109.

master, who already deemed them his prey. When the Officers of Justice searched the premises, various mutilated remains of no less than eight and forty bodies were discovered. Men, women, and children had been murdered, and partially devoured by this Cannibal, who was instantly hurried to execution.* Such is a small portion of the extraordinary recital of Glabrus, who adds, that the crop of the year 1033, as if to atone for recent failures, produced a return fivefold greater than that of ordinary harvests; and thus terminated the long sufferings of the starving population. If we have expressed any suspicion as to the veracity of the above particulars, our doubts have arisen solely from their astounding nature; for the general good faith of the Chronicler by whom they are avouched is unimpeached. It may be remembered, also, that our own times and our own Country have produced a trade in wholesale slaughter, probably exceeding in its fearful and unknown extent that of the Forest of Maçon; that the commission of some of these murders has been substantiated in a Court of Justice; and that the men of blood by whom they were enacted, were prompted, not by the intolerable gnawings of exhausted Nature, but by a sordid and miserable thirst for gold.

Establishment of

It was about this time that the most salutary institution of the Middle Ages was established by the activity of the Clergy. So early as the year 994, after the ravages of a Pestilence in Limousin and Aquitaine, the chief Feudal Lords had engaged to abstain from private warfare; and this Peace of God, as it was called, although hourly violated after the first terror of the calamity from which it arose had subsided, continued to be sedulously and earnestly preached by the Ecclesiastics. The late Famine awakened its remembrance among the Laity; and Provincial Councils were held in which the Prelates solemnly anathematized all its transgressors, and declared that their everlasting portion should be with Cain, Judas, Dathan, and Abiram. But the terrors of Excommunication passed away from memory even sooner than those of Famine; and in a few years the effect of the Councils was seen far more in an increase of perjury among those who had sworn to observe the Peace, than in a diminution of violence or wrong. By a dexterous modification of the too powerful curb which they had at first attempted to impose upon human passions, the Clergy ultimately attained their object; and the Peace of God, which had become a dead letter, assumed vigour, extent, and somewhat of permanency when exchanged for the Truce of God. By this compact it was not pretended that War should be abolished, but it was regulated and humanized. The chief provisions forbade every military operation and every deed of blood, either public or private, between sunset on Wednesday and sunrise on Monday; thus allotting no more than three days and two nights in each week to the passion of destructiveness. Certain Festivals and Holy Seasons, according to the several usages of particular Provinces, increased the sum of tranquillity; Churches and Cemeteries with a precinct of thirty paces around them, provided they were neither fortified, nor prostituted to any abuses of sanctuary, were held inviolable; so also were the persons of Religious of both sexes and of labourers in husbandry; and fire and pillage were averted from flocks, herds, standing crops, stacks, granaries, and implements of Agriculture. These enactments were enforced not only by a denunciation of Spiritual censures, but, in some instances, by the establishment of an armed Police—Papata, or Parade—supported by contribution; and a belief was diligently inculcated that infraction of the Truce would be visited by a most terrific disease, le mal des Ardents, or le feu sacré; which is said to have racked the joints and entrails as by fire, or to have dismembered the limbs, according to the part of the body upon which it seized. The independent Provinces of France readily acceded to this Pacific Code. But Henry deemed it an infraction of his prerogative, and declared that his Vassals needed no other protection than that afforded by the authority of their Sovereign. Seldom has any Sovereign reigned in whom authority was less respected!

* Glabrus Rodolphus, iv. 4.

The characters, indeed, of Henry I. and of the ally by whom he had regained his Crown were most strongly contrasted. While the former slumbered gloriously on the throne of France, Robert of Normandy exhibited an undaunted valour, an unbounded liberality, and a romantic spirit of enterprise well denoted by either of the titles which History has annexed to his name, le Diable or le Magnifique.† He had already restored to their dominions a Count of Flanders and a King of France; and his protection was afterwards extended to his kinsmen, the Anglo-Saxon Princes, expelled from their throne by Canute the Dane. The armament, however, destined for the invasion of Britain was dispersed by a storm, and in the year after that failure, his restless spirit, exchanging the enthusiasm of arms for that of devotion, prompted him to join the herd of Pilgrims thronging to Jerusalem. It is not impossible that secret stings of conscience furnished an additional stimulus to that exercise of piety; and that the sudden death of Richard III., his Brother and predecessor, may be ascribed with truth to the poisoned cup which it was whispered that Robert had administered. His Barons viewed the proposed departure with alarm, and complained that he would leave them without a head. "By my faith," replied the Duke, "I will not leave you without a head. I have a little Bastard who, by God's blessing, will grow up in due season; and if you will now make choice of him, I will associate him in the Duchy as my successor." Harlette, daughter of a Tanner at Falaise, had borne to Robert a child, at that time seven years of age; and the Normans, because, as they said, it suited them so to do, took the oath of fealty to this boy, William, the future Conqueror of England. His Father, having accomplished his vow, died, while on his return, at Nice in Bithynia, leaving his possessions to the doubly uncertain rule of a Bastard and a Minor.

The claims of the Tanner's grandson‡ to the Norman

* For the Truce of God, see pp. 276. 463. of this volume; Du Cange, Gloss. ad v. Trece; and M. de Sismondi, Hist. des Français, vol. iv. part iii. ch. v. p. 246.

† Velly thinks the first of these names was given on account of the severity with which he refused quarter during his expedition in favour of Henry II.

‡ Robert struck with the beauty of the daughter of his Châtelain at Falaise, with whom he had dined at an entertainment in her Father's Castle, signified to his host a wish that the partnership of the evening should not terminate with the Ball; a request which, according to the gross fashion of the times, a Vassal esteemed a compliment from his Lord. The Father, however, willing to preserve his Daughter's honour, substituted in her place the fair Harlette, nothing loth at the exchange; and who so far mastered the Duke's affections, as not to feel alarm at the revelation which morning brought with it, and to banish all rivalry for the future.

France.

From
A. D.
987. to
A. D.
1109.

Affairs of Normandy.

Interests of William
the Bastard.

A. D.
1033.

July 1.

the Truce of God.
A. D.
1041.

History.
From
1. D.
957. to
A. D.
1108.
Talbot marriage of William.

Denise Baron of Val de Dunes.
A. D.
1053.

William's marriage with Matilda of Flanders.

Revolutions between France and Normandy.
A. D.
1034.

were resisted, as might be expected; and many of the Chieftains threw off their recently vowed allegiance. From his eightieth to his twentieth year William maintained an incessant struggle for his rights, deriving advantage far more from the mutual jealousy of his Barons, which prevented union and co-operation, than from the attachment of any of them to his own person. But his great talents and activity developed themselves with increasing years. The King of France, at first uncertain what course to pursue, and temporizing in order to profit by the distractions of Normandy, at length assisted the son of his former tried and faithful friend, and led his succours in person to the field. Some early successes and a few severe examples struck terror among the insurgents, and this was increased by a decisive victory at Val de Dunes, in which Henry is said by some authorities to have been unhorsed. The Burgesses of Alençon, who had refused the young Duke's summons, and suspended raw hides from their ramparts in mockery of his birth, paid in blood for that insult after their capture; and few other towns opposed his progress. Gleams bright with future hope now dawned upon William from England, where the marked attachment of the childless Confessor seemed to assure his own adoption; and in looking round for a Consort, his chief design was to render his present established power in his hereditary dominions more available for the great foreign enterprise which he could not fail to see was near at hand. The daughter of the opulent Count of Flanders had openly avowed that she never would dishonour herself by a union with a Bastard; but when William awaited her at the Church-door of Bruges on her return from Mass, and wooed her in true Muscovite fashion, with fists, heels, and spur-rowels, so as to occasion confinement to her bed, the tender-hearted or terror-stricken Matilda no longer refused consent, and the Duke of Normandy by marriage with her became nephew of the King of France.*

But a fresh dispute with one of his Vassals, to whom Henry granted protection, involved William in hostilities with his ancient ally and new kinsman. The Duke, a staunch Feudalist at heart, led no means untired to avoid personal encounter with his Sovereign; and in the first campaign he so manoeuvred as to defeat single (Chronicon Alberici Trum Fontium ad ann. 1035, ap. Bouquet, xi. 350.) William of Malmshbury says, that it was the dancing of Harlette herself which enchanted the Duke; and adds, that the Bastard of Normandy early manifested his warlike propensities. At the very moment of his birth, he caught up one of the rushes with which the apartment was strewed, and grasped and brandished it like a sword. The Gosspies hailed the omen, and the Midwife prophesied that the Child would hereafter be a King. (De Gestis Reg. Ang. iii. 1.) It has been left to Etymology to revenge the Conjugal wrongs of the sister of Canute, the lawful wife of Duke Robert; and it has been sometimes thought, although incorrectly, that Harlette, by a slight change, has been corrupted into the English generic term Harlot.

* Adèle, the Mother of Matilda, was a sister of Henry I. William's courtship is thus related in the Chronicon Thomeasque (ap. Bouquet, xi. 348.) Tunc Guillelmus, Dux Normannie, Matildam, filiam Baldvini Comitis Flandrie duxit in uxorem in hunc modum. Cum ipse a Patre suo de sponso recipiendo apertus rogaretur, eique Guillelmus Normannicus a Patre, qui cum longo tempore nutritus, præ aliis laudaretur, respondit, nunquam Notum recipere ac maritum. Quo audito, Guillelmus Dux clam apud Bruggis, ubi pacis morabatur, cum paucis accedens, eamque regredientem ad Ecclesiam pergit, ostendit, atque coloribus verberet atque cingit, atque sacras eam in pellicum trahit. Quo facto, perla dolens ad lectum decubuit; ad quem Patre suum filiam de sponso recipiendo interrogat et requirit; quæ respondens dixit se nunquam habere maritum nisi Guillelmum Ducem Normannie; quod et factum est.

divisions of the Royal army, and to compel Henry to retire without a general engagement. Four years afterwards the King of France renewed his irruption with similar ill success; and when in the following Spring, on proceeding to associate his eldest son with himself in the Crown, he felt anxious for a reconciliation with his closest, his most powerful, and therefore his most dangerous neighbour, he was cheerfully met half-way in his amicable propositions.

The son for whom Henry thus anxiously prepared succession was his issue by Anne, daughter of Jerroslaus, Czar of Russia, a Prince of eminent distinction among Barbarians, whose existence had become known to the Court of France through the rejection of the proffered hand of this very Princess by the Emperor Henry III. The King of France had already lost one Bride to whom he was affianced, and another with whom his nuptials had been completed; and beginning to decline in years he was still childless. Attributing his former domestic sorrows to the wrath of Heaven on account of engagements contracted within the prohibited degrees, he resolved to espouse a Princess so remote that all hazard of consanguinity must be escaped. Three sons were the produce of this union; and Philip, now crowned, had attained only his seventh year. But the ceremony was by no means premature, for Henry died in the following Summer. His Physician had given him medicine for slight indisposition, with strict injunctions not to drink while under its influence; he disobeyed, and lie was the forfeit of his rashness.*

The reign of Philip I., longer than that of any King of France who preceded him except Clotaire, than that of any of his successors except Louis XIV., however prolific in great men, was eminently inglorious so far as regarded himself. But it is of himself chiefly that it is our business to treat in this place; for both the commencement of the long struggle between the Emperors and the Holy See, and the establishment of the Normans in England, demand a separate notice. Of the two Brothers of the late King, Eudes, if still living, was forgotten in imbecility, Robert passed an obscure and inactive existence in his Duchy of Burgundy. The widowed Queen, born in a far distant Country, and without connections in France, was consequently without influence also; and still in the flower of her youth, she seemed likely to contract (as she soon did contract) new relations, which might diminish her paramount interest for the welfare of her son. Among his nearest kindred, therefore, no fit guardian could be provided for the infant King, and the long minority of a Boy, scarcely in his eighth year at the time of his accession, required a prudent and powerful tutelage. Henry accordingly, before his death, had named to that office a Prince of unblemished faith, valour, and discretion, Baldwin Count of Flanders, his Brother in law; with the manifest intention, in case of the demise of his own

France.
From
A. D.
987. to
A. D.
1108.
Reconciliation.
A. D.
1059.
Association
of Philip.

Death of Henry I.
A. D.
1060.

Accession
of Philip. I.

Regency of Count
Baldwin.

* The writer of the Chronicon Andegavense, from which an extract is given by Bouquet, (x. 176.) tells the truth of Robert II. and Henry I., which is much disguised by other contemporaries, and even by some later Historians. Rex (Hugo) nuptum cum Roberto, filio suo, quem viduam ipsi inermis regnumque, a cuius gravibus neque preterea Henricus Regulus, filius eius decesserat, Labbe, who first edited this Chronicle from the MS., calls the above statement a calumny.

† She married in 1062 Raoul Count of Crepy and Valois, who, in order to clear the way for her alliance, repudiated his first wife. He survived no more than four years, after which Anne returned to her native Country.

History. children, that the Crown should pass to those of his sister Adele by the Regent.

From A. D. 987. to A. D. 1108. The minority of Philip I. is one entire blank, unbroken by a single event of Historical importance in which France was partaker. In its course, William of Normandy completed his Conquest of England; but the advantages which the Crown of France was ultimately to derive from that brilliant exploit of its great Vassal were not developed till many years after the achievement. When the Royal Infant attained his fourteenth year he was emancipated from the guardianship of Count Baldwin by death; and no successor being appointed, the young King unhappily abandoned himself to uncontrolled licentiousness; so that the first Historical notoriety which he attained was by a denunciation from the furious Hildebrand, at the very commencement of his Pontificate. "Your King," wrote the proud and impetuous Gregory VII. to the Bishop of Chalons, "takes the lead among all Princes of our time in selling the Church of God, scattering her possessions, and enslaving and trampling under foot a Mother whom he is bound to honour and respect."^{*} A reasonable humiliation averted the anathema which the Pope menaced; but since Philip, save for the moment, made no change in his practical disobedience, the complaints were renewed a few months afterwards in louder and less measured terms. The Letter of Gregory to the French Bishops is an average specimen of the tone employed by him towards offending Princes. "Your King," he repeats, "or rather your Tyrant, following the suggestions of the Devil, is the source of all the calamities which I have enumerated. He has defiled his youth by crime and infamy. Not less weak than he is miserable, he uselessly holds the reins of the Kingdom intrusted to his charge; not only licensing his subjects to the perpetration of all atrocity by relaxing the bonds of discipline, but exciting them also by his own avowed tastes and actions to the commission of every foulness which is forbidden either to do or even to name. Not content with having incurred the wrath of God by pillaging Churches, by adulteries, by detestable plunderings, by perjuries, by frauds of every kind with which we have oftentimes reproached him, he now, like a Brigand, extorts huge sums of money from certain Merchants who from every quarter of the Globe attend the Fairs in France."[†] The climax here is not a little remarkable. Who can doubt that those universal Merchants, the robbery of whom is more grievous in the Holy Father's sight than perjury, sacrifice, adultery, and other crimes ineffable, were subjects of the Apostolic See? And so indeed they are afterwards declared to be in another Letter, similarly vituperative of Philip, addressed to the Duke of Aquitaine. Excommunication, Interdict, and Deposition were the mildest penalties, with menaces of which these truly Christian and Pastoral Epistles concluded.

Complaints of Gregory
VII. against Philip.

A. D.
1073.

Dissensions in Flanders.

These manifestations of Papal wrath remain to us because the Holy See had not any interest in their suppression; but of their effects, nothing can be affirmed; for the Chroniclers, reluctant to preserve a memorial of the vices of their King or of the penalties which they induced, are, for the most part, profoundly silent relative to his dissensions with Rome. Philip's first enterprise in arms, although rash and ill-weighted, was prompted by generous feeling. His guardian, the late Baldwin V., had been succeeded in his Flemish dominions by a son bearing the same name. A younger brother, at the close of an adventurous and enterprising youth, partly by dint of valour, partly by a fortunate marriage with the widow of a Count of Friesland and Holland, had established himself in virtual Sovereignty of those Countries, from the possession of which he became known as Robert le Frison.^{*} The brothers quarrelled; Baldwin invaded Holland, and fell in battle, and his widow Richilde, with her son Arnulf, upon whom the succession devolved, took refuge in France, and implored protection and assistance from Philip. The youthful Monarch, fired with the ardour of eighteen, readily promised aid; and believing that the mere presence of a King of France would suffice to strike terror into a Count of Holland, rode to Flanders, as to a Banquet or a Triumph, with few other followers besides the young Nobles of his Court. A similar error was committed by William Fitz-Osborne, who governed Normandy in the absence of the Conqueror; and he joined the gay pavilions of Philip, with a retinue of no more than ten Knights, harnessed as if for a Tournament. The Frison, pretending alarm, retired, till he had inextricably entangled the thoughtless and confident invaders in an unknown Country, intersected at every step by dikes and canals; then surprising and utterly routing them near Cassel, he slew Fitz-Osborne and the young Count Arnulf in the field, and chased Philip back disgracefully to France. A second attempt two years afterwards was equally unsuccessful; negotiations and a partition of territory terminated the quarrel among the Flemings; and Philip, in order to cement the Peace, demanded and received the hand of Bertha, daughter of Gertrude, Consort of Robert le Frison, by her first husband.[†]

After this brief episode of exertion, Philip relapsed into his former indolence and love of pleasure; interrupted only by occasional bursts of petty jealousy against his great and most dissimilar Norman Vassal, now ranking, like himself, as a King. Too weak for open war, Philip was content to harbour all the fugitives and exiles who crossed to him from the newly conquered realm of England; and at first, William either consented to be blind, or perhaps, deeply occupied with remote and more important cares, failed to observe the protection and encouragement afforded to a numerous band of his discontented subjects. Even when Philip manifestly fomented the hostile intentions of William's rebellious son Robert Courthouses, the injured Prince could not forget the allegiance which his Feudal Oath had bound him to maintain towards his Lord: nor was it till Philip denied reparation for long-continued outrages committed by the borderers of France upon the Norman frontiers, and added a bitter sarcasm to those injuries, that the King of England sought revenge by arms. The two Kings rivalled each other in unwieldy corpulence; and Philip hearing that William kept his bed, on account of some indisposition,[‡] inquired whether his Brother was ^{*} Robert at the head of a band of adventurers waged war upon the widowed Countess Gertrude, who ultimately accepted his hand, invested him with her former husband's titles, and consigned to him the guardianship of her children.

[†] There is some confusion of dates in these transactions. Philip's marriage is sometimes assigned to the year 1072.

[‡] William, according to Mezeray, appears to have put himself in training; semit ditte à Rouen pour se decharger de trop de graisse.

^{*} Epist. Greg. VII. lib. i. Ep. 35.

[†] Ibid., ii. Ep. 5.

History. yet delivered? "When I come to my Churching, I will offer him 100,000 tapers,"* was the indignant reply with which William answered this taunt; and he made good his threat by pillaging and burning Mantes. But he purchased his revenge at no less a price than that of life. A severe bruise received while on horseback, joined to the heat which he encountered by approaching too near the flames of the burning town, fatally affected his gross and inflammatory system; and he was conveyed to the Monastery of St. Gervais, near Rouen, conscious of his approaching end. The six weeks during which he languished were given to remorse; a comrade which did not smooth his dying pillow, and which appeared to gain strength in proportion as life was ebbing away. His last order was for the release of his Brother, Eudes, Bishop of Bayeux, from imprisonment; an act of ambiguous clemency, since he acknowledged, while delivering the command, that the treachery, the licentiousness, and the love of blood which marked that most dissolute Priest, were hopeless of reform, and must be destructive to all with whom he might become connected. His parting breath was spent in an aspiration to the Virgin; and no sooner was it drawn, than the death-chamber of the most powerful Prince of his time was deserted as if it had been his tomb. The Nobles, hitherto surrounding his couch, if not with attachment, certainly with respect and anxiety, took horse and fled to their Castles, uncertain of the future. The menials also looked for safety in the abandonment of the corpse of their late master, but not until they had glutted their cupidity by general pillage. Even the bed of the deceased Sovereign was coveted by these sordid plunderers, and his remains, stripped naked for the sake of their clothes and coverlets, were tossed rudely on the floor, unguarded, unhonoured, and uncomposed. A single boat, furnished at the expense of a poor Provincial Knight, conveyed the body to Caen, where the funeral pomp, arranged with some greater regard to decency, was interrupted in its progress by an alarm of fire which dispersed the mourners. Nor when the grave was dug, and the coffin was about to be lowered, did it appear that their tenant was likely to find a resting place: for the six feet of ground, all that now remained to him of his great Duchy, and his still greater Kingdom, were claimed by a bystander. William, when he built his Cathedral, had forcibly wrested the plot of ground selected for his burial place from the father of the interpellant; who now protested, in the name of God, against covering the plunderer with earth which was not his own. The Prelates and the Barons around the grave contributed at the moment a small sum for the redemption of the disputed property; and sixty souls were gathered among them as alms, to purchase repose for the bier of the Conqueror of England!†

The bloody rivalry of the three sons of William desolated Normandy, after his decease; and during the progress of that unnatural struggle, Robert Courthouse allied himself to a party with whom Philip also was destined to be intimately, but less amicably, connected. The aid of Foulques le Rechin, (the crabbed or morose,) Count of Anjou, was important to Robert's success;

and it was won by pandering to the veteran debauchée. Cruel, treacherous, and ambitious, the usurper of his Brother's dominions, the gowler of his person, stricken in years, and already the husband of two living wives, Foulques nevertheless dared to encourage a passion for the most beautiful woman in France, Bertrade, daughter of Count Simon de Montfort; and Robert promised and obtained her hand for his new friend. It was not likely that a marriage, compulsory on the part of the Bride, with one so revolting in character and disproportionate in years, should be attended with happiness; and Bertrade, after a short period of gloomy wedlock, anticipating from the fickleness of her husband the lot of her predecessors, and tempted by the ambition of a Royal conquest, threw out lures for Philip during a visit which he paid to the Castle of Foulques, at Tours. That weak and unprincipled Sovereign, long since wearied of his Consort Bertha, had once before wished to repudiate her, notwithstanding she had borne him four children; and Bertrade, without awaiting any dissolution of his existing compact, abandoned her own husband, and threw herself into Philip's arms, on the mere promise of marriage. Not a Bishop was found in France who would dishonour himself by solemnizing the mock ceremonial; and it is thought that the fitting benediction of the venal and profligate Eudes of Bayeux was obtained to seal the adulterous union.† Loud and vehement were the reclamations of the Clergy; more so than those of either the injured husband or of Robert le Frison, the step-father of Bertha, who herself died broken-hearted within two years after her endurance of this great wrong.‡ Nevertheless the recent marriage, notwithstanding the King's hand was now free, continued to be regarded as illegitimate; so that Urban II. despatched a Legate into France for its formal annulment; and Ahab and Jezebel were largely admitted into the Ecclesiastical correspondence which ensued, as types of Philip and his unrecognoised Consort.

The Legate assembled a National Council at Autun which excommunicated the King and Bertrade, and further punishments were meditated by the Pope in a General Council convened at Piacenza in the year following. But the enthusiasm kindled by Peter the Hermit diverted that Assembly from its original purpose, and the same influence prevailed yet more forcibly in that greater Council at Clermont, which decreed the Ist

* In the year 1086, Philip, reckoning upon the facility with which the Canonical prohibitions might be pleaded in favour of divorce, (for they extended to the seventh degree of kindred, and the frequency of Royal intermarriages had mutually allied almost every great House in Europe,) demanded the hand of Emma, daughter of Roger of Sicily. The offer was eagerly accepted, and the Princess was sent to the care of her Brother-in-law, Raymond, Count of St. Gilles, in Languedoc, in order to be betrothed. That Noble, however, learning that Philip had not hitherto succeeded in dissolving his ties with Bertha, saved the honour of his Wife's Family by marrying Emma to the Count Clermont d'Auvergne. Gaufridus Malaterra, Hist. Sicil. iv. 8. ap. Muratori, Script. Ital. v. 592.

† Il se trouva un Evêque, ce fut Eudes de Bayeux, qui son les mariers ensemble, moyennant le revenu de quelques Eglises que le Roy lui donna. Mezeray. William of Malmshury ascribes the disgraceful compliances to the Archbishop of Rouen. (v. p. 96.) It is to be lamented that there were two Prelates existing who could be even suspected of so foul a prostitution of their holy office.

‡ Velly, from total absence of all feeling in his account of the death of Bertha, is, unconsciously, most pathetic. Berthe n'étoit plus ni jeune, ni belle, son sort n'exalta qu'une atroce pitié. On la vit tranquillement reléguer à Montreuil sur mer, où elle mourut quelque temps après de chagrin et de misère. (i. 511.)

France.
From
A. D.
957. to
A. D.
1108.
Bertrade, wife of Foulques le Rechin.
A. D.
1059.

Elopes with Philip I.
A. D.
1092.

Their marriage.

Excommunication of Philip I.
A. D.
1094.

* Cum ad Mianum post partum iervo centum nullis candelas ei habebat. Will. Malmshury, iii. p. 63.

† These particulars of the last moments and Burial of William the Conqueror are taken from the end of the VIIth Book of Odricus Vitalis, ap. Duchesne Normannie, p. 662.

History.

From
A. D.
987. to
A. D.
1108.
A. D.
1095.

Crusade. Urban, indeed, on that occasion, renewed the anathema already pronounced; and the King, tendering obedience on points indifferent to him, and disobeying on those which opposed his inclinations, while he continued to retain Bertrade, forbore from wearing the Crown, and divested himself of the purple. This empty compliance with the letter of Urban's Bull was graciously accepted as submission to its spirit; the Pope did not remit the Excommunication, but he addressed the King as his dear Son; he forbade the performance of Divine Service, and the use of Bells in any City which might be profaned by the Royal presence, but he allowed the celebration of Low Mass in the Chapel of the Palace. So dead, however, to shame, although keenly alive to fear, was the now drivelling Philip, that when the Bells of a town which he was quitting, as if to atone for their long silence, began to peal at the moment of his departure, he burst into an idiot laugh, and remarked to Bertrade, "Hark'ye, my dear, how they are driving us away!"*

Philip contributed neither in purse nor in person to the gathering of the Ist Crusade; and he regarded with indifference, if not with contempt, the active devotion with which his brother Hugh enrolled himself in the pious armament. When he had passed the meridian of life, his mind, weakened by excesses, readily yielded to superstitious terror; and still reluctant to surrender his vices, he endeavoured to compound for them. Alarmed by a few slight bodily infirmities, from which he had as yet been exempted by vigour of constitution, he attributed a rash and a tooth-ache to the anger of Heaven, or of the Pope; and in order therefore yet more fully to comply with the provisions of the Bull depriving him of the Crown, he resolved to associate his Son Louis in Government; to devolve on him the outward state of Royalty which he had been enjoined to abandon, and yet more its heavier cares, from which he was constitutionally disinclined. The precise year of the association is uncertain; but it was about the commencement of the XIIIth Century that Louis l'Eveillé, for the Son was thus honourably distinguished from his supine and slumbering Father, was intrusted with the administration of France.

Association
of Louis l'Eveillé circa

A. D.
1100.

Activity of Louis.

Louis, now in his eighteenth year, was the first of the Capetian Race who had received an education fitting for a Prince. He was skilled in all chivalrous exercises, in the management of a horse, the lance, and the sword; his temper was brave, courteous, affable, just, frank, and generous; in one word, he was trained to be an accomplished Knight. During some short hostilities with William Rufus in the Vexin, unable to prevail upon the inert Philip to levy a force adequate to regular operations, the young Prince had nevertheless greatly distinguished himself by his activity as a partisan; and at the head of three hundred horse he had grievously harassed an enemy much superior in numbers. He now addressed himself to the restraint of such Vassals as had encroached upon his Father's weakness; and among these he boldly and successfully asserted the Royal authority. Some were terrified into obedience by arms, all were diminished in strength by a wise policy which prevented their union; for although each singly might be mastered by the Crown, a confederacy would have been irresistible.

* Cum discedente eo tantius ingruum undique conciperet, incensam fititatem cæcibus expressit, "Audis iniquus? Belle, quàm nua effugit!" Will. Malmesbury, v. p. 90.

While thus occupied, his chief danger arose from the hatred and the artifices of Bertrade, the fire of whose more youthful passions had now become concentrated in ambition. Although herself unquenched by the decision of the Church, her sons, but for Louis, might hereafter sway the sceptre of France; and when this brilliant hope was once awakened, there were few means from which a woman so unprincipled was likely to recoil in order to secure its accomplishment. Accordingly when Louis visited England to attend the Coronation of Henry I., and to receive Knighthood from his hand, Bertrade, either by fraud or by caresses, obtained the Royal signet from Philip; and fortified by that authority she wrote Letters to the King of England, enjoining him to secure the person of the young Prince, and to commit him to perpetual imprisonment. Regardless of cruelty or treachery whenever his own interests could derive profit from their commission, Henry nevertheless demurred at perpetrating a gratuitous crime; he showed the despatches to his guest, and counselled his immediate return.* The Court of France then arranged itself in opposite factions under the Prince and the Queen; Louis is said to have attempted to poniard his step-mother, and Bertrade in return summoned to her aid the more covert arts of secret poisoning. Clerks,† were styled, skilled in Magic and in Medicine,† were instructed to devise a potion which should make slow inroads upon life; and although Louis was saved from the uttermost effect of that insidious cup, by the timely aid of a Physician who had studied under the Arabians,‡ he carried to his grave a pale and bloodless complexion, avouching the great peril which he had encountered.

Rome at length consented to relieve Philip from her censures. Her pride was satisfied, because, notwithstanding the offender persisted to the end in disobedience, his opposition had never been accompanied with seeming respect.§ The Ecclesiastics themselves now recommended indulgence, and the King was permitted to appear before a Council assembled at Paris to conduct his reconciliation. There, barefooted, and in a Penitential garb, he swore in presence of the Legate that he would no longer regard Bertrade as his wife, and that for the future he would never even converse with her, unless in the presence of witnesses. On these conditions, absolution was pronounced; and as for the perjury which ensued, the Vatican no doubt expected, and therefore did not too closely investigate it. A yet more remarkable instance of Philip's infatuation for his mistress than any he had hitherto shown, remained to be exhibited; and on this occasion he was not without a partner in his delusion. Bertrade was desirous that one of her sons by Foulques le Rechin should succeed to the domain of Anjou, at the expense of the just rights of an elder half-brother. In order to

* Henry I., the craftiest Prince of his time, most probably felt a bitter contempt for Philip. Philipus, Rex Francorum, Regis moxto nec utilis nec infestus fuit, propterea quod casti vultus magis quam negotii dedidit, is the short and pithy character given by William of Malmesbury, (v. p. 90.) Ordericus Vitalis, the Norman Chronicler, every where abounds with similar marks of scorn; corpulentus Rex Francorum (xi. p. 818.) Philipus vero Rex, piger et corpulentus, belique incongrua erat. (x. p. 766.)

† Tribus de numero Clericorum maleficus. Ordericus Vitalis, xi. p. 843.

‡ Quidam hircutus de Barbaris, as the enlightened Moors are termed by the ignorant Norman. (Id. Ibid.)

§ Tant il se fermait cet efface même dans le mal, is Momey's just remark on the transaction.

compass this intrigue, reconciliation with her former husband was an indispensable preliminary; and she not only obtained Philip's consent to the attempt, but she was moreover successful in her apparently hopeless enterprise. Fouques readmitted her to his confidence; she effected a breach between the Father and Son; and in order to accelerate her purpose, she procured the assassination of the latter. In the course of this nefarious transaction, all Europe was astonished at the scandal of a visit paid by the Royal Pair to Fouques, at Angers. They were received with distinguished honours; and the favour of the ambiguous wife was cultivated with equal obsequiousness by each of her husbands, who sat with her at the same table, and even shared the same chamber. This singular and most disgraceful accordance of the rivals has been sometimes considered as a proof of the commanding ascendancy of Bertrade's intellect. To our eyes, however, it exhibits nothing more than a striking example of that dotage which is the sure temporal punishment of protracted voluptuousness. Destitute of all self-respect and of every manly emotion, the two jaded sensualists struck a bargain for community in the strumpet's smiles, all which they now either coveted or could enjoy; and while the adulterer, in right of Sovereignty, as may be imagined, shared her seat, the tame and contented wittol reclined on her footstool.*

These disgusting spectacles were at length to be terminated. Debauchery had weakened the mental faculties no less than the bodily frame of the King; and in his fifty-seventh year he was overtaken by premature old age. Assuming on his death-bed the habit of a Benedictine, he confessed and bewailed his many sins, and acknowledged that, like his predecessor Charles Martel, his portion on their account ought to be with the Devil.† Then professing his unworthiness to be interred, like other French Kings, near the tomb of so great a Martyr as St. Denis, he urged as his last request that his body might be conveyed to a Church on the Loire dedicated to St. Benet, a Saint who had ever been his Patron, and to whose intercession he now looked especially for forgiveness.‡ It remains only to dismiss the other chief personage of this most unhonoured reign. Bertrade, says William of Malmesbury, more fortunate than her paramour, because in the full enjoyment of health and vigour, and with a forehead unfurrowed by a single wrinkle, received the veil at Fontevreux, and died not long afterwards: "God's Providence most likely foreseeing that a Lady of habits so delicate could not long endure the labours of Religion."[§] According to the good Monk's reflection, it would appear as if Piety were altogether constitutional; and that those persons who have probably greatest need of Repentance, are of all others the most disqualified by Nature to obtain its benefits.

II. The immature death of Otho III. without issue, transferred the GERMAN Crown to a collateral branch of the House of Saxony, and Henry Duke of Bavaria, grandson of a Brother of Otho the Great, triumphed over two other competitors by that which Dittmar terms hereditary right.† One of his rivals, Herman Duke of Suabia, for a while continued in arms, and to the profane sack and burning of Strasburgh by his troops on Easter day, the Monks attribute his final defeat and submission. It was not, however, in his German dominions that Henry II. was to be most vigorously opposed; the Lombards asserted independence, and in a Diet assembled at Pavia, called Arduin Marquis of Ivrea to their throne. Two years elapsed before Henry felt sufficiently established in the North to venture upon a passage of the Alps; and then, without opposition from the phantom King, who fled at his approach, he received the Crown in Pavia, notwithstanding its recent hostility. Of the support of the Milanese he was well assured, if it were but on account of their jealousy of the rival metropolis;‡ and the secret grudge long subsisting between the two Capitals first openly manifested itself on this occasion. On the very day of Henry's Coronation, the collision of some drunken German and Milanese soldiers with the irritated partisans of Arduin, excited a popular tumult. The Palace was attacked; and when the troops encamped without the walls advanced to support the slender body-guard by which it was defended, they fired several houses in order to clear the barricaded streets, and unhappily reduced the greater part of the superb city to ashes. It was not easily that Henry himself escaped from this scene of flame and carnage; and to an injury which he is said to have received in leaping from a window of the Palace, is sometimes ascribed the lameness under which he suffered for the remainder of life, and which attached a sobriquet to his name.§

* Ordens Vitalis, xi. p. 818.
† Charles Martel used the treasures of the Church in order to defend France against the Saracens; and the Monks, smarting under the loss which they actually suffered, and forgetful of the infinitely greater miseries which they had thereby escaped, very ungratefully damned the Hero by whom Christendom had been saved. In a Letter addressed by certain Prelates to Louis le Germanique, in the year 538, it was said that the condition of Charles had been revealed soon after his death to Kucher Bishop of Orleans, by whose order some brother Bishops had opened the warrior's Tomb. They found in it a monstrous Dragon, who disappeared in clouds of sulphurous smoke; thus giving plain evidence of the nature of the abode of the deceased. (Capitula Caroli Calvi, ii. 23.) The chief difficulty attending upon the tale is that Kucher died some years before Charles Martel.

† Ordens Vitalis, xi. p. 835. It can scarcely be credited that Velly, after narrating the reign of Philip I., with very little difference as to main facts from those which we have given above, should sum up the Prince's character in the following words, after praising him for not joining the Crusades: Il est d'un monde constant qu'il avait de grandes qualités. C'était le Prince de son siècle le mieux fait, de la taille la plus majestueuse, de l'extérieur le plus adhérent. Ses personnelles qualités might be such as they are here represented, but the language below belongs to Titus or Alfred. Brave dans les combats, sage dans le conseil, maître dans l'art de parler, l'Histoire lui donne toutes les grâces d'esprit et de caractère. i. 544.

‡ Ordens Vitalis, xi. p. 835. It can scarcely be credited that Velly, after narrating the reign of Philip I., with very little difference as to main facts from those which we have given above, should sum up the Prince's character in the following words, after praising him for not joining the Crusades: Il est d'un monde constant qu'il avait de grandes qualités. C'était le Prince de son siècle le mieux fait, de la taille la plus majestueuse, de l'extérieur le plus adhérent. Ses personnelles qualités might be such as they are here represented, but the language below belongs to Titus or Alfred. Brave dans les combats, sage dans le conseil, maître dans l'art de parler, l'Histoire lui donne toutes les grâces d'esprit et de caractère. i. 544.

§ Pulvis et Fortuna illa, quid ante et anate integre, nec specie rugata, apud Fontem Ercaldi Sancti monachum appetit celum. Nec multis post præsenti viae fecit. Deo fortiter providente non posse delicate matris corpus Religione laboribus interire. (v. p. 90.)

† v. ad init.
‡ Pavia, from its commanding site was the frequent residence of the Lombard Kings. Milan, the Capital of the Lombardi and of all Christian Gaul, had been honoured by the abode of some of the last Western Emperors.
§ Claudius, Haffebolz. (Haffebolz, wooden legged.) Other authorities attribute Henry's infirmity to a wound received from a wild boar in Hunting. But the Monks would not admit less than a supernatural origin to the bodily defect of a Prince so greatly their favorite. Henry, they say, while praying by night in a Church dedicated to the Virgin, saw our Saviour himself, clad in Pontifical robes, proceed to the celebration of Mass; he was followed first by St. Lawrence, then by St. Vincent as Subdeacon; after these came the Virgin Mary with a throng of Maidens and Angels; St. Peter and St. John heading the Apostles and Evangelists; St. Stephen with the Martyrs, and St. Martin with the Confessors. The Angels commenced the Introit, "Suscipimus, Deus, misericordiam

France.
From
A. D.
987,
to
A. D.
1109,
King of Bertrade.

GERMANY.
From
A. D.
1002,
to
A. D.
1106,
Accession of Henry II.
A. D.
1002.

The Lombards choose Arduin of Ivrea King.

Henry II. is crowned at Pavia.
A. D.
1004.

Burning of Pavia.

History.

From
A. D.
1002.
to
A. D.
1106.

Few transactions of this reign demand any special notice, although its course was by no means inactive. The struggle with Arduin continued during thirteen years; it was conducted far more as a feud between Milan and Pavia, than as a war between Germany and the Lombards, and it terminated by the voluntary retirement of the Pretender to a Monastery. Long and not inglorious wars with Boleslaus of Poland, the subjugation of Bohemia, the vigilant control of his own Vassals, and a partly successful contest with the Greeks in Puglia and Calabria, furnished ample occupation for the two and twenty years of Henry's rule; and notwithstanding his exaggerated superstition, he could not have been devoid either of energy or ability. He received the Crown of the Empire from Benedict VIII. at Rome, and the wily Pope is said to have entrapped him by an artful inquiry, before entering St. Peter's, whether he would always preserve his fidelity to himself and his successors? a question to which the simplicity of the Emperor replied in the affirmative. More than once, jaded with the cares of State and deeply tinged with the bigotry of his Age, he projected an exchange of the Crown for the Tonsure. On the first occasion, he was dissuaded by the urgency of his Nobles, and in lieu of taking the cowl himself he founded a rich Prebend in the Church of Strasburgh, for a Canon whom he named King of the Choir. At a later date, during a progress through Lorraine, not long before his decease, he absolutely tendered his vows to the Abbot of St. Vannes, in Verdun.

"Do you promise," asked the discreet Priest, "obedience throughout life to your Superior, according to our rule?" "I do so," replied the Emperor. "Fulfil then your vow, receive my injunctions without opposition, as becomes one professed in my Cloister, and return to the administration of your Government."^a

But the chief weakness which Henry II. exhibited regards his Empress Cunegunda, daughter of Sigefrid Count of Luxemburg. Prompted by a false estimate of moral duty, and not improbably also by coldness of temperament and constitutional imbecility,† he had made, even before marriage, a vow of total abstinence from the bed of his Consort. That such an arrangement was unsatisfactory to the youthful Bride, and that she endeavoured to remedy her nominal husband's neglect can scarcely be a matter of surprise. But the Ecclesiastics carefully protected her reputation. They declared the handsome Knight who on three successive mornings was seen to quit her chamber, to be none other than the Devil, who, envious of her inviolable chastity, had assumed that form in order that she might labour under a false imputation of adultery. Thus powerfully supported, Cunegunda could have little dread of encountering the ordeal of the red-hot Ploughshares which the Priests superintended; and she demanded, and trod them," and while they were chanting "Dextera tua est plena justitie," the whole Choir, following the example of our Sovereign, pointed with their fingers at Henry. After the Gospel had been read, an Angel presented the holy volume to receive a kiss from each person in the assembly, and when it had gone round, the Virgin made a sign that it should be offered to Henry. Enraptured by the honour, he was lost in ecstasy, till the Angel touched him on a sinew of the leg, saying, "This shall be a token to you of the love of God on account of your chastity and justice;" and from that moment the Emperor fell lame. Annales Fuldensis, iii. 15. ad fin.

^a Albericus Trut Fontium, p. 286.
[†] Moribus erat, colto, calidoque epilepsia plurimum laborans, Struvius, Corpus Germanic. i. 271. and the authorities there cited. C'était se déclarer impuissant on fanaïque, is the just remark of Voltaire. Annales de l'Empire, ad ann. 1024.

over them unscathed, as two still preserved in a Church at Bamberg attest with evidence once considered incontrovertible.* Her husband's conviction of her innocence, the point most important to Cunegunda, was effectually established by this boldness; and when on his death-bed he restored her to her relations, it was with a solemn attestation of her maiden purity.† That which her Spouse avouched it did not become a Pope to question; and when Innocent III. canonized Saint Cunegunda, his Bull was rested, perhaps with equally firm foundation in each point, upon the Devil, the Ploughshares, and the Empress's Virginity.‡ Henry died at Grone, near Bamberg, in his fifty-second year, having recommended Conrad Duke of Franconia as his successor. About twenty-five years after his decease, Eugenius II. advanced him to the Calendar of Saints; and it must be admitted that many a Prince with inferior pretensions has received similar distinction.§

The Diet of the Empire chose as their Sovereign, Conrad, the Prince whom the late Emperor had bequeathed to their approbation, who was descended maternally from Otho the Great, and who is known most generally as Le Salic, from his birth-place on the river Sâle. The Lombards again refused assent to the German nomination, and tendered their Crown successively to Robert of France, to his son Hugh, and to William Duke of Aquitaine. Each of those Princes had ultimately sufficient discretion to decline the hazardous offer, and Conrad, having entered Italy in arms, quieted all opposition, received the Imperial Crown at Rome, and invested his son Henry with the right of succession at Aix-la-Chapelle. The Kings of Poland, of Hungary, and of Bohemia, and the Count of Champagne by turns called him to the field, and against all those enemies he was triumphant. His success over the last, Eudes of Champagne, secured an important accession to the Crown of Germany, and no doubt prevented a Revolution in the Dynasty of France. The Kingdom of the two Burgundys|| had passed to Rodolph III., deservedly named Le Fainéant, who dying without issue after an imbecile and protracted reign of thirty-nine years, bequeathed his dominions to Conrad, in return for succours and subsidies which he had more than once received both from him and his predecessor. The possession of the Lance of St. Maurice, the most precious * Judicio voveram Cunigunda Virgo probatur. Nevertheless Krantzius either had not seen the Ploughshares at Bamberg, for which Struvius is our authority, (i. p. 282. n. 8.) or he did not believe in them; for he states that Cunegunda carried in her hands a red-hot iron bar, and adds a striking instance of Henry's uxorious simplicity at the close of the Ordinal. Id puen compertum erat pudicissimam feminam quod apud Regem ea suspitione non careret, jussit igniri ferrum, et in conspectu Regis condens deportant, ostenditque viro manus intactas. "Uti te mi," inquit, "vir intacta permanni, sic ab omni mari: pone suspitionem." Ille incantissima feminam ad pedes provolvi incipiens, ab ea non sinitur, veneratione humiliter deprecatus. Saxonia, iv. p. 97.

† Both Struvius and Leibnitz are inclined to interpret Virgo as no more than barren; but a doctrine fully similar to that of Henry II. is recorded of Edward the Confessor. R. Higden, Polychronicon, ad ann. 1043.

‡ See the words of the Bull. Struvius, i. 283. note 10.

§ M. de Simondis has drawn an admirable parallel between the Emperor Henry II. and King Robert II. of France; much and deservedly to the advantage of the former. Hist. des Français, v. ch. iv. p. 163.

|| Krantzius assures us that a cup is preserved at Mersburg, which St. Lawrence threw into the scale in which Henry's good deeds were weighed against his sins; and that when the Devil found he had no portion in the dying Emperor, he spitefully broke off its handle. Saxonia, iv. p. 99.

¶ Consolidated a. d. 926. See p. 472 of this Volume.

German
From
A. D.
1002.
to
A. D.
1106.

Death of Henry I.
A. D.
1024.

Accession of Conrad the Saint.

Accession of Burgundy.
A. D.
1032.

History.
From
A. D.
1002.
to
A. D.
1106.
War with Eudes of Champagne.
A. D.
1033.

relic belonging to the Kingdom, and the symbol of Royalty,* was esteemed by Conrad, to whom it was delivered by express command of the dying Prince, as ample investiture: but Eudes of Champagne, husband of one of Rodolph's Sisters, preoccupied Burgundy with his troops, and contested the succession. Conrad, after a few efforts in that Kingdom, wisely transferred his military operations to the territory of Eudes himself; which he entered with a force so overpowering as to terrify his rival into speedy submission. If Eudes had been able to unite Burgundy to his hereditary possessions of Champagne, Blois, Chartres, and Tours, it can little be doubted that his predominating influence by this attainment of the greater part of France, must have substituted his own Family on the Throne of that Kingdom in the place of the Capetians.

To Lombardians.
Eudes, however, was destined once again to enter into competition with the Emperor. The pride and tyranny of Heribert Archbishop of Milan had occasioned disturbances in Lombardy; and Conrad, actuated more by a sense of justice than of expediency, arrested and imprisoned that Prelate, hitherto the chief stay of his Italian interests. But the citizens of Milan, jealous of their rights, and profiting by the oppressions which their Metropolitan had exercised, not over themselves but the district by which they were surrounded, rose in his favour and liberated him from confinement. When Conrad hastened in person to quell this insurrection, he was repulsed from the walls of his Capital, and suffered the great additional mortification of hearing that the Crown of Lombardy was offered by the rebels to his former opponent Eudes. The exaltation of the Count of Champagne, however, was but of short continuance. In an action near Bar le Due with the Duke of Lower Lorraine, he was totally defeated; and when his flying troops were rallied, their Leader was among the missing. No one in the German camp could explain his absence to the Herald sent to treat for ransom, on the supposition that he had been taken prisoner; and no Knight remembered engaging with him in personal conflict. His Countess, Ermenguard of Auvergne, obtained permission to search the field of battle, where the dead, for the most part already stripped, were lying in heaps and almost undistinguishable; but, as in a similar touching instance in our own Annals, after the Battle of Hastings, the keen eye of female affection detected the remains of one whom she had loved, and the headless and disfigured corpse of Eudes, recognised by his widow, received due honours of interment†.

To the death of Conrad.
The death of the Count of Champagne freed Conrad from a powerful foe, but he was not yet successful in Italy. On his advance into the South, the pestilential heats of an Apulian Summer, fearfully diminishing his ranks, compelled him to retreat; and before he could renew the campaign in the following year, he was seized with gout at Utrecht, and fell its victim after a short illness.

Henry III.
We need not dwell upon the campaigns against the Barbarian Poles and Bohemians, with which the reign of his son and successor Henry III. commenced, and we pass on to his first transactions with Rome. The Counts of Tusculum, retaining the wealth, power, and ambition of Theodora and Marozia, from whom they traced their descent, were animated also with a similar spirit of simoniacal traffic; and their influence over the Roman populace secured to them a lucrative monopoly of the Pontificate. Since the beginning of the XIth Century three Cadets of the House of Tusculum had been raised successively to the Tiara; and Benedict VIII. in 1012, his brother John XIX.* in 1024, and their nephew Benedict IX. in 1033, appeared to have fixed the Papacy, as if by hereditary right, in a single Family. The last-named of these Vicars of Christ is said to have assumed the supremacy of the Church in his tenth year; during his reign the Chair of St. Peter was profaned by unspeakable abominations; and the Roman People, at length provoked to insurrection, rose in a body, chased the tyrant from the City, and on their own authority elevated to the Papedom a Bishop who assumed the style of Sylvester III. Within three months, however, Benedict partially reestablished himself by force of arms; but more desirous of free indulgence in his licentiousness than of the exercise of active power, he found means to dispose of a share of the sovereignty for a considerable sum of money to one John Gratian, who under the title of Gregory VI. completed the triumvirate of simultaneously existing Popes. Each Pontiff received a distinct portion of the Apostolical Revenue; and it is noticed that the share allotted to Benedict arose from the Peterpence of England.‡ Each also, guarded by his own faction, occupied a different Palace; and Benedict from the Lateran, Gregory from Sta. Maria Maggiore, and Sylvester from the Vatican, asserted a Spiritual Dominion which must not a little scandalize the staunch Believers in the unity of that Church which has acknowledged them all.

More than two years had elapsed since the commencement of this schism before the general murmurs of Christendom determined the King of Germany to bring it to a close. For that purpose he proceeded to Italy, assembled a Council at Sutri, summoned the three Pretenders to its sitting, and deposed Gregory who obeyed, no less than his contumacious brethren who refused attendance.§ He then filled up the Papacy by his Chancellor Sudger, who held the Episcopal See of Bamberg, and who having assumed the style of Clement II. placed the Crown on the brows of his Imperial Patron and his Consort. By a similar exertion of Germany.

From
A. D.
1002.
to
A. D.
1106.

The Triple Papacy.

Deposed by Henry III.
A. D.
1046.

* John XIX. was Consul, Duke, and Senator of Rome; uno eodemque die Laicus et Pontifex fuit, says Romsdualdus of Salerno.

† Puer ferat decem. Galfridus Rodolphus, iv. 5.

‡ Benedictus redditibus Angliæ, quia majores redditibus auctoritatis, rivit. Otto Frisingensis, vi. c. 33. That writer, who has been followed by the Authors of the Universal History, and by Voltaire in his Annales de l'Empire, mentions four simultaneous Popes, Benedict IX., two others to whom he does not assign names, and lastly, religiosus quidam Presbyter Gratianus, who commiserated the state of the Papacy, simoniacally contracted for a share in it. Struvius, who cites the passage from Otto in a note, alludes by three Popes in his text, Benedictus, Sylvester, et Gregorius, cui prius Gratianus nomen erat. (i. 287.) The mistake of the other writers has arisen from splitting Gregory VI., on account of his two names John Gratian, into two persons. Muratori properly styles him Giovanni chiamato Graziano. Annales, ad ann. 1044; and so also do the Benedictines, L'Archiprêtre Jean Gratien—Gregory VI., qui est ce même Gratien. L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, i. 276.

§ According to the Annalista Sazo, ad ann. 1046, Henry was stimulated to this good work either by a Hermit or an Angel, who addressed him in the following triplex.

*Una Summis super tribus moris;
Res Henrice, Omnipotens vice,
Solve convulsum trifurcæ, dubium!*

* Hugo Flaviniensis, xxix. p. 185.

† Galfridus Rodolphus, iii. 9. who destroys the pathos of the incident which he is relating by a most perverse and misplaced particularity.

History.

From
A. D.
1002.
to
A. D.
1106.

Commencement of Hilde-brand's influence.

Insurrection in the Low Countries.
A. D.
1049.

The Emperor challenges
the King of France to single combat.
A. D.
1056.

Death of Henry III.

Minority of Henry IV.

plenary authority, taking upon himself the sole and absolute right of appointment, instead of that of mere approbation and confirmation which had been exercised by his immediate predecessors, Henry, when vacancies again occurred in the Pontificate, named Damasus II. in 1048, Leo IX. in 1049, and Victor II. in 1055. The last of these Popes was indebted for his elevation to the ascendancy obtained over the Emperor by Hildebrand, a Monk of Clugny, a personage already known to our readers by his fierce denunciation of Philip I. of France, and soon about to engross an important portion of our narrative. One of the earliest manifestations of the fervent spirit and predominating influence of that most remarkable man was exhibited by his persuading Leo IX. not to content himself with the Emperor's nomination, nor to rest his appointment upon the will of a mere Secular Power, incompetent to the high duty of which it arrogated to itself the performance. St. Bruno, (as he afterwards became,) convinced by Hildebrand's zealous representations, consented to forego the title which he derived from the Emperor, and entering Rome in the habit of a Pilgrim, solicited and obtained the suffrages of the Clergy and the People.

The Emperor's return from Rome, after annulling the Triple Papacy, was accelerated by troubles in his dominions nearer the Seat of Government. A powerful confederation of Nobles in the Low Countries invited Henry I. of France to join his arms with theirs for the recovery of Lorraine, that ancient and coveted appanage of his Crown. If the King of France ever hesitated as to the course which it was most politic that he should adopt, discretion ultimately prevailed, and he refused all connection with the Insurgents. The Emperor succeeded in repressing them, and afterwards held an amicable conference with the French King, in which their alliance was closely cemented. Fresh provocation after the lapse of a few years led him once again to the Low Countries in hostile guise; and in a second interview with Henry I. that King remonstrated so bitterly upon the ravage of the territory of his Vassals, and accused the German Monarch of perfidy in terms so unmeasured, that the Emperor treated the invectives as a personal affront, and challenged the King to single combat.* So chivalric an appeal ill suited the tame and inglorious spirit to which it was addressed, and the King of France avoided the difficulty of a reply to the cartel by hastily breaking up his quarters at nightfall.

Having secured, so far as association could guarantee his title, the succession of his infant son, having established peace for the most part in Germany, purged the Romish See of manifold abuses, and confirmed himself in paramount authority as disposer of its Tiara, this wise, good, and active Prince terminated his reign prematurely and unhappily. The Slavonians of Lusatia, pressed by famine, made a fierce irruption into Saxony, overthrew the Imperial forces in a bloody action, ravaged the entire Province, and retired with an enormous booty. The evil news struck Henry to the heart; he languished but a short time, and after committing the guardianship of his son to his Consort, Agnes of Poitiers, and the reigning Pope, he expired to the great loss of his subjects, in the thirty-ninth year of his age.

The minority of Henry IV., a child but five years old at his Father's death, was troublous and stormy. Pope Victor died in less than a year from the assumption of his intelligence, and the single guardianship of the Empress Germany. was watched with jealousy by the Saxon Nobles. The inroads upon secular power made by Nicholas II. who succeeded Victor in the Pontificate, and the double election of Alexander II. and Honorius II. on his death, will be more fittingly introduced in our Chapter on the Ecclesiastical History of those times; and in approaching the great struggle about to ensue between Rome and the Empire, the reader will bear in mind, once for all, that in this place we treat of no more than the position which relates to Civil affairs.

Henry Bishop of Augsburg shared the intimate confidence of the Imperial Widow, and the virulence of faction has charged their correspondence with less pure motives than those supplied by friendship; an imputation easily advanced, and which it is but just to state derives no support from any known particulars of the conduct of Agnes. It was enough, however, for the discontented that this base rumour had been spread abroad and was partially accredited; and the leading Nobles and Prelates, headed by the Dukes of Saxony and Bavaria, resolved upon a daring attempt to obtain custody of the young Emperor's person; and thus to remove him from a guardianship which they represented to be dangerous and immoral. A grand banquet, at which Agnes and her Son were entertained at Kayserswerth on the Rhine, presented facilities for this plot; and to Hanno Archbishop of Cologne was intrusted its execution. As the wily Prelate strolled with the simple and unsuspecting youth on the borders of the river, the admiration of the latter was strongly attracted by a new and richly decorated barge floating at hand; and the proposition of Hanno that they should embark and inspect it more closely was joyfully accepted. No sooner, however, were they on board, than the rowers sprang to their oars, and directed their course to the opposite bank. The boy, terrified at this unexpected movement, and uncertain of its object, threw himself into the stream, with the intention of swimming back; and but for the promptitude of the Count of Brunswick, who leaped after him, he would have been drowned in this attempt to escape. He was transferred to Cologne, and placed under the care of Hanno, by whom his ear was daily fed with the foulest calumnies against his Mother. The Empress herself, hopeless of recovering her Son, took a step which ought to have been effectual in the rebutment of scandal. She retired from Germany, and from the society by which it was affirmed she had been most passionately attracted; and after passing a short time in the dominions of her brother the Duke of Aquitaine, she embraced a monastic life at Rome, and finished her days in the cloister.

Under the tuition of his new guardians, and by the disgraceful connivance of a Bishop placed more immediately about his person, Henry's early youth was abandoned to licentiousness. Nevertheless most authorities speak with admiration of his natural endowments. Elegance of person, courtousness of bearing, quickness of comprehension, extensive acquaintance with Letters, a hand brave and bountiful, lips eloquent and persuasive, are among the choice possessions assigned to him.* The state of Germany, when he attained his majority and escaped from the virtual thralldom in which he had been detained by the Dukes of Saxony and Bavaria, was most unfavourable to the Imperial Prerogative; and

* Lambert Schnafnburgensis, ad ann. 1056.

* Albericus, ad ann. 1083.

History. those great Lords, reluctant to surrender the authority which they had so long exercised, formed an open league against their Sovereign. Jealous, however, of the ascendancy of their overgrown brother Feudatories, the majority of Barons supported their young King; and by their aid Henry for a time dissipated the opposition, proclaimed Otho of Bavaria to be under the Ban of the Empire, stripped him of his Duchy, and bestowed it upon Guelph, son of Azxon of Este. It was not with equal success that he engaged in transactions with Rome. Fickle in his attachments to women, and dissatisfied with a Consort, Bertha of Suza, who had been provided for him in his sixteenth year, he protested that the marriage had never yet been consummated, and earnestly entreated Alexander II. to sanction a divorce. The Pope, guided on the other hand by the counsels of Hildebrand, and conscious that he was sufficiently powerful to gain his own object without submitting to a bargain, refused assent to this solicitation; but he at the same time urged Henry, under pain of the utmost Spiritual penalties, to abandon his simoniacal distribution of Church Patronage, and to concede all the other demands which Rome was now pressing on the Crowned Heads of Europe. Henry, with an ill grace, submitted to domestic disappointment rather than to an abandonment of his Regal privileges; he consented to retain Bertha as his wife, and a numerous issue proved his sincerity. But on the second point, he was not so readily subdued; he tendered countless vague protestations of obedience, spoke humbly of his penitence, acknowledged by words the paramount superiority of the Holy See; but at the same time perseveringly framed new pretences to delay compliance with its injunctions. The Pope, equally resolute not to admit this temporizing, assumed a more commanding tone; and issued a citation by which Henry was summoned to appear at Rome, and to give answer in person relative to the offences with which he had been charged.

The death of Alexander diverted the storm for a short season. On the morning which followed that event, the fervid and vehement Monk of Clugny was raised by acclamation to the vacant Chair of St. Peter, under the style of Gregory VII.* Feeling, nevertheless, that he was mistrusted by a numerous party of Ecclesiastics, and willing to establish himself firmly in the Pontificate before he attempted to compass, in its full extent, the dangerous and difficult scheme of universal domination which he had long meditated, he signified to the Court of Germany, that he set no value upon the irregular and tumultuous election which had proclaimed him Pope; that it had taken place without his previous wish or knowledge; that he was fully prepared to lay aside the Tiara; and that he would on no account permit the Ceremony of his inauguration to be solemnized until he should receive a formal announcement of Henry's consent. Deceived by these idle pretences of humility, the young King promptly signified his approbation; and Gregory hastened to atone for the first and only mark of deference which he ever condescended to offer to a Secular Power.

The grand object to which Hildebrand addressed the whole energies of his vigorous mind, was a withdrawal of the Church altogether from that extrinsic authority asserted over the Ecclesiastical States by the Emperors as Kings of Italy. The prerogative thus claimed by them manifested itself in countless shapes, offending the pride and restricting the power of the Holy See; by nominating and confirming the Popes themselves, by appointing Prefects of Rome, by exercising judicial functions in their names, by levying annual tribute, by dating the Pontifical Acts according to the years of the reigning Emperor, by stamping money with the Imperial symbols, and by investing all Prelates with the Ring and Crosier. This last-named right, claimed similarly throughout their own Realms by other European Sovereigns, although at first sight it appeared to be little more than a Ceremony, virtually placed the Superior Ecclesiastics under the control of the Prince within whose dominions their Benefices might happen to be situated; for the Fiefs and Revenues could be granted or withheld, the Prelate therefore in truth could be appointed or rejected, at the Sovereign's pleasure. The Ring and Crosier were the Feudal badges of Ecclesiastical Livery and Seisin; and at the time of their presentation by the Royal hand, the Bishop or Abbot pledged an oath of fealty and allegiance to the Lord under whom he held. It was this dependence of his Clergy upon their Princes that Hildebrand sought to terminate, by a Decree issued from Rome in the year 1074, which denounced as Simony all payments to Royal Treasuries on Investiture, and all Lay Investiture itself, as a usurpation of Spiritual power. Of the Spiritual right, however, he felt little jealous, it was the temporal supremacy which he really panted to overthrow; and if he could once emancipate his Prelates from their subjection, it followed as a matter of course, that the Pope, the Head of those Prelates, would no longer depend upon, nor be nominated by the Emperor.

It was not from Italy, however, that Hildebrand was most likely to obtain support, and had he relied wholly on the Cisalpinæ, the degradation of Henry would never have been accomplished. One distinguished exception indeed is to be noticed; and to the unbounded wealth and extensive influence which the Pope derived either from the fanaticism or the personal attachment of a woman, may be attributed a great portion of his success. Matilda, sole surviving child of Boniface, Lord of Tuscany and Canossa, and of Beatrice, sister of the Emperor Henry III.,* by the death of both her Parents united in her own person the largest possessions in Italy; and these she dedicated to the single purpose of enriching and aggrandizing the Pontificate. From her Mother, who had been harshly treated by Henry III., the Great Countess, as she was called, inherited bitter hatred of the Imperial House; and to her wealth, her power, and her impetuosity of feeling, were added unwearied energy and a masculine understanding. Strengthened on the one hand by this alliance, which placed at his disposal the chief resources of Italy,

* Matilda therefore was Cousin to Henry IV. The influence which the successor of Gregory continued to maintain over her sufficiently refutes the scandalous imputations relative to her connection with that Pope. It was plainly to the offer not to the man that she was devoted. Sed apud omnes nomen aliquid impetente luce clarior constabat solita esse que dicebantur. (Lambert Schaffnaburgensis, op. Boqueti, xl. 68.) Matilda's possessions embraced Tuscany, Mantua, Parma, Reggio, Piacenza, Modena, Verona, all the Country now passing under the name of the Patrimony of St. Peter from Viterbo to Orvieto, parts of Umbria, Spoleto, and the March of Ancona.

* Gregory VII. is said to be the first Bishop of Rome who assumed the title of Pope, (Papa), to the exclusion of all other Prelates, who equally employed it before his accession. Canteius, Metropolitanarum Urbium Hist. Diss. i. cap. i. p. 7.

Germany.
From
A. D.
1092. to
A. D.
1106.

The Countess
Matilda.

History.

From
A. D.
1002.
to
A. D.
1106.

Gregory
cites Henry to Rome.

A. D.
1076.

Henry degrades Gregory and is himself deposed.

The Saxons
rebel,

and invite Gregory to Augsburg.

and on the other by a knowledge of the ill-suppressed disaffection of the Saxons, ever ready for an outbreak, Gregory soon renewed, yet more fiercely than they had hitherto been urged, the demands of his predecessor, and added others from himself. Four leading German Prelates were excommunicated on the plea of their marriage; for the celibacy of the Priesthood, which ensured the concentration of all their exertions for the interests of their Order, was another favourite object with Gregory; similar anathemas were directed against every Ecclesiastic who should submit to receive Investiture from Lay hands, no less than against the Investor himself; and Legates were despatched, not to invite the King of the Romans to receive his Imperial Crown, according to ancient usage, from the hands of the Holy Father in his Capital, but to summon him as a criminal before the Tribunal of the Vatican under the pain of Interdict and Deposition.

Roused to ungovernable anger by this unseemly arrogance, the young and impetuous King permitted the Legates to be treated with disrespect, and anticipating the menaces of Gregory, took the first step by a solemn degradation of the Pope himself. He was answered, as might be expected, by a no less solemn Bull of deposition. Thus far the contending parties were by no means unequal, each alike triumphed in words, each carried a similar appearance of victory, each to his heart's content insulted his antagonist by unworthy re-creation. But in order to hurl Gregory from his Throne, it was necessary that the King of the Romans should first levy, and then lead an army to the gates of Rome; while effectually to realize his menace on Henry, the Pope was already in possession of weapons far more manageable. Excommunications were the sure and prolific seeds of Civil War, and the Saxons, freed by the Head of the Church from an allegiance under which they had always chafed and struggled, once more appeared in arms against their Sovereign. It was still a Duke of Bavaria by whom they were headed; not the inveterate and hereditary foe of Henry, but that very Guelph upon whom he had recently bestowed the possessions of which that very foe had been deprived. The insurgent Confederation was also strengthened by the majority of Nobles and Bishops who had but lately sanctioned the deposition of the Pope;* and who with disgraceful apostasy now invited that same Pope to Augsburg, to sit in judgment upon their King, whose Crown they spoke of proffering to Rodolph Duke of Suabia.

Abandoned at all hands, and fully conscious of the result of any assembly at which Gregory should preside, and his own Nobles be assessors, the only hope remaining to Henry was in the prevention of this menaced Council. His citation to Rome named the second week in Lent for his appearance; it was now midwinter; not a moment therefore was to be lost. Together with his Queen and their infant son, accompanied by a scanty suite, he traversed hazardous and unusual Passes of the Alps in order to avoid the common route beset by Rodolph and his followers. The Queen and her women were conveyed in hides, slung probably from the bearers' shoulders; and the horses were lowered from precipice to precipice, sometimes by machinery, at others by ropes

after their legs had been tied together.* Gregory was at that time already on his way to Germany, when hearing of the King's approach, uncertain of his intentions, and not knowing whether he was appearing hostilely with an armed force, he turned aside for security to the Castle of Matilda at Canossa, near Reggio. Even when he learned the humble guise in which the King presented himself, long and earnest intercession was requisite before he would consent to admit the suppliant to his presence. He at first demanded that Henry should place in his hands the Crown and Regalia as tokens of sincere and lively repentance; that he should acknowledge his contumacy; and confess himself to be unworthy of his Throne; leaving the result to the discretion of the Pontiff. When further entreated not to break the bruised reed by pressing measures so extreme, it was with difficulty that he could be persuaded to relax those hard conditions, and to consent to an interview. On the appointed morning, the King was admitted within the second of the three walls with which the Castle was encircled, his retinue being detained in the outermost Court. Stripped of all the pomp which might betoken Royalty, habited in a private, perhaps in a sordid garb, fasting and bewailing himself with many tears, and standing with naked feet on ground deeply buried in snow, Henry, from dawn till sunset, awaited admission to the presence of his Judge. Another and another day passed in like sorrow, contempt, and humiliation. On the fourth morning, he was permitted an audience, chiefly, as is believed, through the prayers of Matilda, and after long and doubtful discussion he was relieved from excommunication for a season. This boon, however, was not granted unconditionally. He was condemned to abstain from the usage of all outward symbols, and from the exercise of all essential prerogatives of Royalty, until he had returned to his dominions, and there having presented himself before a Diet of his Vassals, the Princes of Germany, at a place and time which Gregory would appoint, he was to plead his cause and receive final sentence from the Pope. The establishment of his innocence might obtain his restoration, provided he swore perpetual obedience to the Holy See. The proof of his guilt involved the certain loss of his Crown, and subjection to such punishments as the Ecclesiastical Law might think fit to impose. Furthermore, he was enjoined as an act of penance, to reside for an entire year in Rome, during which period he was never to mount a horse, and daily to attend as a Penitent with prayer and fasting in the stations of certain appointed Churches.*

The Italians had received their King with marks of esteem and loyalty; for Gregory, like other Prophets, was not most honoured in his own Country. They were accordingly both indignant at the Pope's unbending and unmitigable resentment, and disgusted at the lameness of Henry's submission; and they talked loudly of naming another King and another Pontiff; choosing for the former Henry's infant son, whom they resolved to carry to Rome, that he might be crowned Emperor by the new Pope, whom they intended to establish. Encouraged rather than dispirited by these appearances, Henry adroitly turned them to his own account. No sooner had he quitted Canossa than he openly renounced all the conditions into which he had been terrified and

Germany,
From
A. D.
1002,
to
A. D.
1106.

* Ego Henricus Rex, Dei gratia, cum omnibus Episcopis nostris tibi dicimus "Decende, Decende!" were the words with which the emissive sent to Gregory from Worms concluded. Ursinus, i. 394.

* Lambert Schnafnaburgensis, ad ann.

† Idem, ibid. and Albertus Stadenius, ad ann.

Henry's values in situation

History. entrapped, hastened back to Germany, and confident of support from the Italians, defied the Saxon Rebels. The German Diet in return at once proclaimed Rodolph King. That Noble, represented as the best and bravest, or the basest and most atrocious of mankind, according as the pen is held by a Papal or by an Imperial Chronicler, in earlier life had become brother-in-law to Henry; but both his attachment and his allegiance had decreased after the death of his wife, and he had long distinguished himself among the King's most active enemies. The two conditions required by the Nobles before they permitted his Coronation were, that he should abstain from all simoniacal Investitures, and from any attempt to establish an hereditary Throne for his family. The Pope at first was dissatisfied with this election, as made without his privity; but not long afterwards, in token of his sanction and approval, he sent the new King a Crown of Gold, bearing an inscription, which from its Leonine jingle has been often remembered, when the event which gave it birth was, perhaps, either forgotten or unknown, *Petra dedit Petra, Petrus diadema Rodolpho.

History. It was on this renewal of the quarrel that the Countess Matilda made her celebrated and magnificent donation to the Holy See, and enriched the Church of Rome with her entire vast possessions at the expense of her legitimate heir. "For the salvation of my own soul, and that of my parents," as the deed of gift declares, "I give to the Church of St. Peter, through the medium of Lord Gregory the VIIIth, our Pope, all and singular my possessions which I now enjoy or may enjoy hereafter, either by right of succession, or by any other right, whether on this or the other side of the Alps."† Thus fortunate in his Civil transactions, the Pontiff was less so in the field, now taken by his instruments the Saxons. Bohemia and Bavaria recruited Henry's ranks, and so evil appeared the prospects of Rodolph, that before the close of the first campaign, Gregory peremptorily enjoined a truce between the rivals, and instructed his Legates to confirm on the Throne that one of them who should first prove obedient to the command, and to excommunicate the other if he should refuse assent. Rodolph was in this instance also the favourite of St. Peter. The campaigns of the two following years witnessed engagements with various fortune, and it was in the middle of the second October that the rivals found themselves for the last time in each other's presence near Merseburg. Hildebrand had boldly prophesied that before that year concluded, the false King should perish; and the juggling and ambiguous oracle was verified, like many others, contrary to the wishes and expectations of the deliverer.‡ The Saxons remained masters of the field, but Rodolph, although victorious, was grievously wounded in the body, and his right hand was also cut off by Godfrey of Bouillon, the Hero afterwards so celebrated in the Holy Wars. Rodolph died on the following day at Merseburg, and it is said that before his last agony, he pointed to the mutilated stump, and confessed to the bystanders, with much bitterness of lamentation, that it was with that hand, "that guilty hand," he had sworn allegiance to Henry. His funeral was celebrated with great pomp in the Cathedral, where Struvius informs us,* that so late as his time, a Cenotaph and the amputated hand (probably contained in an urn) were still to be seen. The grave itself was rudely violated in the middle of the XVIth Century, by a boozing German Burgomaster, who disturbed it in order to make wine vaults.† It is said that when Henry IV. visited the tomb, and some flatterer remarked to him that it ought to be destroyed because it was decorated with a Crown and Sceptre, he pointedly replied, "God forbid! would that all my enemies were as sumptuously buried!"

Having bestowed the hand of a Daughter and the Fief of Rodolph on Frederic de Hohen Stauffen, (the parent stem of the illustrious and unhappy house of Suabia,) Henry passed into Italy, directing his first vengeance against the territories of the Great Countess. Those dominions were easily overrun, for Matilda's troops had already been beaten on the same day which witnessed the Battle of Merseburg; but Rome, upon which the co-King afterwards marched, protracted her defence during a long and tedious siege. That quarter termed the Leonine City was at length taken either by assault or treachery, and Henry entering the Vatican with Guibert, Archbishop of Ravenna, whom he had previously named Pope as Clement III., first invested the new Pontiff, and then in turn received at his hands the Crown of the Empire. The Romans, it appears, in order to escape pillage, had given a pledge that they would compel Gregory himself to perform that ceremony, but he was already beyond their control. Justly alarmed at the near prospect of Henry's resentment, he had withdrawn into the Castle of St. Angelo, the strength of which defied attack; and either willing to relieve his citizens from their promise, or in derision of the conqueror, he offered to drop the Crown on Henry's brows by ropes from the battlements of his fortress.‡ A Crown thus descending might have proved too weighty a burthen, and the expedient was prudently declined. A deliverer, however, awaited Gregory in one whose still more brilliant exploits in Southern Italy we have yet to notice; and Robert Guiscard, with his strong host of Normans and Apulians, 6000 horse and 30,000 foot, drove Henry from the Capital by the mere terror of his advance. Unhappily, this succour was to visit the Eternal City with yet greater calamity than she had endured even from Attila and his Huns. Some injury had already been inflicted by the Emperor, and the Septizonium of Severus, at the foot of the Palatine, into which a few of the partisans of Gregory had thrown themselves, mourned the loss of a portion of its finest marbles, shattered by engines and dislodged from the magnificent triple colonnade by which it was encircled. But when the Normans appeared, and the walls of the City were mined and scaled near the gate of S. Lorenzo,§ every monument of antiquity, behind which the retreating Imperialists could obtain shelter, suffered equally from its assailants and its defenders. On the third day the populace rose tumultuously, and Guiscard, little touched by remembrance of the former glory or the present sanctity of the noble edifices surrounding him, called impetuously for fire, and the City

Germany.

From
A. D.
1002.
to
A. D.
1106.

Henry invades Italy.
A. D.
1081.

is crowned
at Rome.
A. D.
1033.

Burning of Rome by Robert Guiscard.
A. D.
1084

* Ordericus Vitalis, i. p. 371. Baronius gives the first word Roma.

† The original Deed was lost; and the words translated above are those of a Second Instrument, accorded by Matilda to Pucal II. in 1102. They are cited by Struvius, i. 327. See also Koeler, De Donatione Matildæ, and Fontenini, Memorie di Matilde.

‡ Sigebertus Gemblacensis, ad ann. 2.

* See the authorities ap. Struvium, i. 330.

† Fabricius, Orig. Sax. iii. 350. ap. Struvium ut sup.

‡ Leo Ostiensis, iii. 39.

§ Giannone, x. Introd.

History.

From
A. D.
1002.
to
A. D.
1106.

Death of Gregory
VII.
A. D.
1085.

The Saxons elect Count Herman
King.

His remarkable death.
A. D.
1058.

Revolt of Henry's eldest son Conrad.
A. D.
1091.

was in an instant blaze. Death, slavery, or violation was the indiscriminate portion of both friend and foe; for the Normans in their avarice of plunder wholly disregarded the particular source from which it might be drawn. From the Lateran to the Colosseum, that fair part of the ancient City became a ruined waste, which has never been rebuilt; and Gregory, flying from the carnage and desolation of his Capital, with a well-founded mistrust of the fidelity of its citizens, took refuge with his protector at Salerno. He lived but a year longer, perhaps in specious captivity; and till his last hour he renewed his anathemas against the Emperor and his Antipope. "There is but one name in the world, that of the Pope," say the Dictates of this Spiritual despot, the authenticity of which, since they are recorded by a Cardinal,* is hardly to be doubted, and which we cite as a specimen of Gregory's temper. "He alone can use the symbols of Empire. Every Prince ought to kiss his feet. He alone ought to nominate and to degrade Bishops, to assemble, to preside over, and to dissolve Councils. No one can sit in judgment upon him. His choice bestows canonization. His Church never has erred, and, on the testimony of Scripture, never can err. He can depose Kings, and release subjects from their allegiance."

The Civil war raged long and furiously in Germany after Henry's return from this checkered expedition; for the Saxon Nobles elected a successor to Rodolph in Count Herman of Luxemburg, a puppet of whom little is known, excepting the remarkable manner of his death. Ultimately compelled to abdicate a throne which he had never really enjoyed, he was killed ingloriously while pretending, in a frolic, to assault the castle of a friend, in order to try the mettle of the inmates. He had pressed his horse securely across the drawbridge and under the gate-tower, when a woman, who mistaking him for a real enemy had fled for refuge to the battlements of a lofty turret, dashed a huge stone upon his head and killed him on the spot.† Thus freed from his more domestic enemies, Henry retraced his steps to Italy, where the course of Gregory had been pursued by his immediate successors, Victor III. and Urban II. The persevering hatred of Matilda also had lately received fresh stimulus from her nuptials with the ungrateful Guelph of Bavaria; a Prince from whom the anti-Imperial faction, which so long agitated Europe by its contests with the Ghibelines, is said to have derived its name. That of its opponents did not originate till many years afterwards, on the birth of Henry VI. at Ghibeling.‡ During the short period in which the married pair lived together in concord, they raised an enemy against the Emperor, who occasioned him deeper bitterness of soul than any whom he had as yet encountered. Conrad, his eldest son, and already his declared successor, either impatient of the course of Nature, and panting before his time for the possession of a sceptre, or believing the foul accusations propagated against his father, leagued with Matilda, the Pope, and the Normans, and received the Iron Crown of Lombardy, together with the hand of a daughter of Roger Guiscard. Henry, indeed, is represented to have been capricious and a lover of pleasure, and it is far from impossible that he may have used harshly a bride to whom he had recently been exposed; but for the honour of Human Nature, it requires far stronger proof than has ever yet been advanced, to obtain credit for the detestable charges by which Adelaide, flying from his arms, roused her step-son and all Italy to revolt.* So profoundly was Henry moved by the announcement of this breach of filial duty, that he is said to have attempted suicide. Alas! how far more deeply were his affections to be wounded hereafter by similar impiety!

In the next few years, events crowded rapidly on each other. Guelph of Bavaria discovering the transfer of Matilda's property to the Church, and bitterly resenting his consequent loss of its inheritance, abandoned her party, and renewed his allegiance to the Emperor; meantime Pascal II., who had succeeded to the Pontificate, excommunicated Henry afresh, and chased the Antipope Clement into exile which but shortly preceded his death. Strengthened by this termination of the schism which had so long distracted the Romish See, (for three shadowy whom the Emperor opposed to him disappeared almost so soon as they were raised,) the new Pope urged Conrad to yet further outrages by dazzling him with the bright prospect of the Imperial Crown. The youth was saved from deeper guilt than that already perpetrated, by a death not unattended with suspicion of poison; but his place was too soon occupied by another. Not long after his revolt, the Emperor had procured the election of his second son Henry as King of the Romans. On Conrad's death, after the Prince had sworn upon the Cross and the sacred Lance of Constantine that during his Father's life he would never intermeddle with affairs of State, his Coronation was solemnized; and Henry yet further meditated abdication in his Son's favour, in order that he might undertake a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. But the lures held out by the artful policy of the Vatican rendered the young King discontented with his present nominal aggrandizement, and his tardy hope of future real power; and when Pascal absolved him from his oath, and whispered that rebellion against an excommunicated Sovereign did not partake of sinfulness, every barrier which had heretofore restrained ambition was finally broken down. It was not difficult to find support among the restless and turbulent Saxons; and ere long the hostile army of the Son was separated from that of the Father solely by the intervention of the Danube at Ratisbon. An unnatural combat was avoided, but it was at the expense of not less unnatural perfidy. The Prince contented himself at present by seizing the Imperial treasures at Spire; but early in the following year, he repaired unattended to Coblenz, and throwing himself at the Emperor's feet, solicited pardon for his disobedience. Touched by the feigned repentance of the dissembler, Henry listened as a Father rather than as a Sovereign; and consented to accompany his Son to a Diet assembled at Mentz, before which their reconciliation might be publicly declared. But to approach his

* Baronius, ad ann. 1076, sec. 31.

† Struvius, i. 334, and the authorities there cited. Pyrrhus, the all but equal antagonist of Rome, perished by a similar death; and Boremondo Thiepolo, who nearly overthrew the Oligarchy of Venice, in the commencement of the XIVth Century, very narrowly escaped a like catastrophe.

‡ Cette origine de ces deux mots de guerre est aussi probable et aussi incertaine que les autres. Annales de l'Empire, ad ann. 1089.

* Henricus Rex Adelheidem Reginam quam duxit uxorem ad se capere habere; idcirco incarcerationi eam, et concessit ut periret non e inferret; immo filium hortari. Quo reconvalescit Patria palatii stratum, cum Rex non suum sed peregrini filium esse agnosceret. Doulichius, ad ann. 1093.

† Albert, Thedore, and Manulphus.

Germany
From
A. D.
1002.
to
A. D.
1106.

Death of Conrad.
A. D.
1101.

A. D.
1103.

Birth of the Emp-er's son, Conrad.
A. D.
1104.

A. D.
1105.

History.
From
A. D.
1002.
to
A. D.
1106.
He betrays
imprisoned, and departs in faith.

Barons with an armed force, it was said, might awaken jealousy; better it would be that the Emperor should demonstrate undoubting confidence in their loyalty, by presenting himself unaccompanied with troops. The crafty suggestion prevailed. The Father and Son pursued an amicable journey almost in privacy to Bingen, where, under pretext of making arrangements for their reception by the Diet, the Prince moved forward singly, and the Emperor from that moment found himself declassified a Prisoner.*

The Diet assembled; the Papal Legates rehearsed anew Pascal's Bull of Excommunication; Henry IV. was deposed; his Son was proclaimed Emperor. Three Prelates were deputed to notify these transactions to the dethroned Monarch; and not content with the simple execution of their charge, when demanding the Regalia, they upbraided him with his former Simony: "Was it our love of gold, or our special grace and personal favour," said the Monarch, struck with their ingratitude, to the Archbishops of Mainz and Cologne, "that placed the Mitre on your brows, and is it you who are now employed to tear the Crown from mine?" Then robing himself with the Imperial Mantle, circling his head with the Diadem, and seated in a Chair of State, he addressed them further. "With these attributes of Empire I was invested by the free election of my Princes, and by the grace and bounty of my God. That God can still preserve them to me, abandoned, destitute, and deserted as I appear. If your reverence for his authority has ceased, proceed to force, which I am without power to resist." A short pause ensued, till mutual encouragement prevailed over the first hesitation of the Ecclesiastics. One by one the emblems of power were rudely stripped from the Emperor's person; and the spoilers, hastily retreating after the performance of the odious task, closed their ears to Henry's parting words: which admitted that for himself he was paying a penalty justly due to the offences of his youth; but that for them no other portion could remain but with the traitor Judas who had betrayed his Master.†

The few remaining days of the elder Henry were passed in wandering and wretchedness, and it is from his own pen chiefly that we learn the tale of his miseries. In a Letter to his rebellious son soliciting permission to remain in the abode which he occupied at Liege, he urges the request, he says, not as an Emperor, but as an exile. "Let it not be told to my shame, or rather to yours, that I am forced like a beggar to look abroad for a new asylum during the holy season of Easter. If you refuse, I should prefer living as a peasant in some foreign Country to strolling about exposed every hour to fresh scorn in an Empire which I once swayd." In a similar strain he depicted his sufferings to the chief Princes of Europe,* whom he was unable to animate in his behalf, and to his own Nobles, who replied with insult. "By your schisms with Rome," was the answer of a Diet at Cologne to one of those Memorials, "you have reduced yourself to Apostasy, almost to Paganism, and we, the Sons of the true Church, the daughter of Christ, now visited by divine clemency, agreeing in unity of Faith, through the influence of the Holy Spirit, have rejected you, the incorrigible head of that schism; we have compelled you to abdicate on account of our zeal in God's service, and our obedience to the Apostolical See; and we have chosen a Catholic King, sprung though he be from your seed;" they then upbraided him with attempting to arm other nations against them, in order that, like a wild beast of more than ordinary ferocity,† he might ravage the Vineyard of Christ, now beginning to recover; might destroy it by his foxes; and might retort, by the sacrilege of Priests of Belial, the anathemas which had been directed against himself. On these accounts, in the name of their King, of themselves, and of the whole orthodox army of Christians, they summoned him before their tribunal for judgment.

A few partisans still remained to the deposed Emperor. Cologne baffled an attack of the rebels, and a favourable skirmish on the bridge of Liege for a while encouraged hope of restoration. But a second and more decisive engagement left him prisoner in his son's hands, and reduced him for ever to despair. A dungeon was allotted him in the first instance; scorn, beggary, and houselessness were his subsequent portion. The Bishop of Spire had been his familiar friend in earlier days, and owed his consecration to the Emperor's patronage; and the old man now stood in his destitution at the gates of the Episcopal Palace, and besought a Prebend in the Cathedral which his forefathers had erected, and himself had richly endowed. He was answered that he was excommunicated, and therefore that he had no share in the Church.‡ "Give me pity, I am touched by the hand of the Lord!" was his single meek remark as he again sought refuge in Liege, and offered to sale a portion of his wardrobe to obtain daily bread.§ Nature could not long support these joint mental and bodily afflictions; and he was freed from his complicated miseries at Liege, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and the forty-ninth of his reign. With his last breath, he bequeathed his sword, almost his only remaining possession, to his ungrateful Son; "Had you left me more," was his dying message, "I would have sent you more." His obsequies were immediately celebrated with a mockery of pomp; but the vengeance of the Holy See pursued him even beyond the grave. By a man-

Germany
From
A. D.
1002.
to
A. D.
1106.

Unsuccessful attempts for his restitution.

He solicits a Prebend fruitlessly.

His death.
A. D.
1106.

Insult to his remains.

* Epist. Imper. ad Hugonem Abbatem Cluniacensem, ap. D'Acheri Spiciliegium, iii. 441. It was on Christmas day 1105 that the Emperor was imprisoned, and he grievously laments exclusion from the Eucharist at that holy season. Besides that privation, he was exposed to apprahe, injurias, minas, gladios in cervicem exercitos, furores, sitim.

† Our narrative is framed from the Chronicles of or near the time of the events which they relate, and who are plentifully cited by Struvius. Krantzius, without noting his authorities, and writing in the XVIIIth Century, differs widely, not in facts, but in colouring. The Emperor, according to his representation, entirely tenured deposition, the Son was actuated solely by a pious abhorrence of his Father's enormities. No more convenient disguise than that of Piety could indeed be assumed by Ambition; and we believe that the Emperor's accusation is just when he declares in an expostulatory Letter to the German Diet, Non festina est cum non divine legis zelo, vel Romane Ecclesie dilectione, et concupiscentia Regni, Patre injuste privato, hoc incipisse. (Krantzius, Saxon. v. p. 120.)

* See especially the pathetic Letter addressed to Philip I. of France, ap. Bouquet, xiv. 807. Contra ipsam jus Nature laborantes, quod sine maximo cordis dolore, sine multis lacrymis dicere non valeo, et quia dicitur vehementer contristatus, fletum meum, meum inquam dolum dulcissimum, non solum contra me armaverant, &c.

† Singularum utique feram. Krantzius, Saxon. v. p. 121, where the whole Letter from the Diet is given.

‡ Id. ibid.

§ Struvius, i. 339.

History

From
A. D.
1002.
to
A. D.
1106.

ried body day and night during his stay. The coffin was thence removed to Spire; but Christian rites were still denied, and during a period of five years longer it rested on its trestles in an unconsecrated outbuilding of the Cathedral, into which it was at last admitted. On the sum of this Prince's character much difference of opinion has existed, but not even his bitterest enemies have denied him the possession of numerous great and brilliant qualities; whether those qualities were on the whole more employed in good or ill may perhaps be questionable, but no doubt has ever arisen that he is to be classed among the most remarkable and the most pitiable examples of the mutability of human fortune.

III. ITALY.

From
A. D.
1000.
to
A. D.
1111.

State of Southern Italy at the commencement of the XIII Century.

III. The Annals of ITALY during the XIII Century are so closely interwoven with those of the German Empire that in treating of the latter we have necessarily anticipated much which belongs to the former also. The two chief Historical events which remain to be noticed are: 1. the establishment of the Normans in Sicily and Naples; and 2. the rise and progress of the great maritime Republics of Pisa, Genoa, and Venice.

1. At the commencement of this period the Greek Emperors retained only Puglia and Calabria, as remnants of the great Theme of Lombardy* which they had conquered towards the close of the IXth Century; Bari was their metropolis, and the government was administered by a Lieutenant under the title of Catapan. Over the German Princes they had been for the most part successful; and each of the three Othos had ineffectually attempted their expulsion; but their supremacy was but nominal as it regarded the petty Principalities of Salerno, Capua, and Benevento, and the Republics of Naples, Gaeta, and Amalfi; and they were perpetually exposed to the inroads of the Saracen Conquerors of Sicily. The anarchy resulting from the frequent collision of these numerous hostile parties, was to be terminated by the establishment of a single great Power founded and constructed by the adventurous valour of a wholly new People.†

Pilgrimages of the Normans.

Comparatively civilized by the adoption of Christianity, and by the residence of a Century in the Province wrung from France, the Normans had diverted their fierce passion for Piratical enterprise into gentler channels. Not yet wholly weaned from a life of wandering, Piety now supplied them with an ostensible motive for indulging that propensity; and in the general rage for distant Pilgrimages by which all Europe was animated, the Normans appeared preeminent as Devotees. In their passage to Jerusalem, the focus to which all zeal was attracted, whether to escape the tedium of a long voyage through seas widely differing from their own Northern Ocean, or in order that they might visit other holy stations in their progress, they usually crossed the Alps and traversed Italy. Rome, and the Puglian mountain Gargano, which had been sanctified by the presence of the Archangel Michael, as of old time its caverns had reechoed the soothsayings of Calchas,* were among the places of their most frequent resort; when the alms of the Faithful were wanting to supply their necessities, they had swords which they well knew how to employ; and from Bari, Naples, Gaeta or Amalfi, they could at any time procure ready means of transport to Syria.

It was early in the XIII Century that a band of forty Norman Pilgrims, on their return from Palestine, lauded at Salerno; and on the solicitation of Guaimaro its Prince, delivered his City from a Saracen flotilla then anchoring in its bay, and demanding tribute. The valour of his new allies gained lavish praise and reward from the grateful Italian; and he anxiously urged the settlement either of themselves, or of some of their Countrymen equally brave with themselves, within his dominions. His offer was not accepted at the moment; but on their arrival at home, the glowing representations which they made of this brilliant proposal; of the prospect of rich booty from the Infidels; and more than all, as we are assured, of the gentle climate and luscious fruits, the dates, oranges, and figs; of the South, roused numerous candidates for establishment in Italy. Osmond Drengot, a distinguished Baron in the Court of Duke Richard, had avenged himself on a brother Noble, who boasted of the favours of his daughter, by striking him dead during a hunting match in the very presence of his Sovereign. Driven into exile by this violence, he gladly undertook the promising adventure; and placing himself at the head of somewhat more than a hundred comrades, most of them of generous birth, he crossed the Alps in order to proffer service to any of the native Princes who would engage him.‡ The first Chief with whom he treated was Melo, a rich Citizen of Bari, whom his fellow-

* The name Lombardy retained by Eastern Europe for the North of Italy, was appropriated by the Greeks to the Kingdom of Naples which the Beneventan Lombards governed as independent Sovereigns during five Centuries.

† Thema, from thema, the Byzantine Greek for a Legion, was the name given to a Province in the division of the Lower Empire. There were 17 Themes in Asia, 12 in Europe. Katawaia is sometimes derived from κατά νύκτα,—thus William of Apulia

*Quod Catapan Graeci, non juxta dicitur omne.
Quisquis apud Donnos vice fungitur hujus honoris
Dispariter populi parat omne quod exoptat illi;
Et juxta quod cuique dari decet omne ministrat.*

Apud Muratori, v. p. 254.

Du Cange, however, in his notes to the Aletrid of Anna Comnena, (p. 275) and in his Glossary ad v., ridicules this etymology, and affirms Catapanos to be no other than the Latin Cyprianus. The word was (and perhaps still is) in modern use at Naples, for a Taxor, or Officer who inspects weights and measures.

‡ The Political state of Southern Italy just before the arrival of the Normans is fully treated by Giannone, Ist. Civile di Napoli, l. viii. cap. ult.; and a rapid but most distinct outline is compressed into a few paragraphs by Mr. Hallam, Middle Ages, i. 238. 4to. ch. iii. part i.

* Strabo, vi. (436 ad 234). Baronius, ad ann. 493. sec. 42. According to Leandro Alberti in his Descrittione di tutta Italia, there is an altar in Monte Gargano consecrated by the Archangel himself. The room in which he lived during his abode on the mountain must have been singularly uncomfortable. We cite Hænenberg's translation which is at hand. Ad destrum capiti mirabilis apparuit in orientem explicata, Duxi Michaelis Archangelus domesticus, tota ex vivo conspectu: lapide purum liquorem peritum stillante horrida, profunda, et obscura, hanc in altum ut pulvis factum, quam saluta animum causis. (p. 379.) This dark, deep, and fearful cavern, appears less adapted to Christian Pilgrims than to the Heathen votaries who consulted the Oracle of Calchas, by sleeping in it on the fleece of a black ram.

† Leo Ostiensis, ii. 37.

‡ M. de Simondis states that the Varangian Body Guard was originally enlisted to Constantinople by the flavour of the rich fruits which its neighbourhood produced; and he adds, on the authority of Bonstetten, that in Icelandic, the word figuabata, to long for figs, is still used as expressive of any vehement desire. Rep. Isl. vol. i. ch. iv. p. 255, note 2.

§ I Normanni, gente che sapeva pescare nel torbido, e seguita senza scrupolo ora l'uno, ora l'altro di que' Principi, entrepando sempre chi gli dava a promettere di più. Muratori, Annali, ad ann. 1029.

History. townsmen, in a fruitless attempt to throw off the Grecian yoke, had elevated for a short time to nominal power, and had afterwards abandoned with treachery and cowardice. After some short opening success, the Normans were completely routed at Cannò; those who survived the fight distributed themselves under the pay of the Princes of Capua and of Salerno, and Melo himself died in Germany, while soliciting aid from the Emperor Henry II.

It was not, however, till three years after the decease of Melo, that the threatening attitude of the Greeks, by which Rome itself was endangered, drew Henry across the Alps. The Normans were then invited to his standard, and did good service under it; till the Emperor, satisfied with the glory acquired by the capture of Troja,* and alarmed by the ravages of a contagious disorder among his troops, commended his allies to the regard of his Feudatories, and retired to Germany. The Italian Princes, now more secure from the attacks of the Catapan thus checked by Henry's invasion, forgot their promised gratitude to their most active deliverers; and the Normans, no longer retained in their service, appear for the most part to have supported themselves by pillage. We hear no more of Drengot; but Turstin, the warrior chosen as his successor, appears to have united in himself enough valour and bodily strength to qualify him for a Hero of Romance. From a Legend of one of the Chroniclers, there can be little doubt that he perished by treachery.

He was a man, says William of Jumieges, of numerous tried excellences; on one occasion, he tore a kid from the jaws of a Lion, and when the disappointed beast was raging for the loss of his prey he seized him also with his naked hands. At another time he tossed an Italian, with whom he had quarrelled, over the wall of the Duke of Salerno's Palace, no less easily than if he had been but a kitten. The Lombards, envious of his great qualities, enticed him to a spot inhabited by a huge Dragon,† in company with a numerous smaller fry of Serpents. No sooner had the Dragon shown himself, than the Lombards fled; and while Turstin was asking his Esquire the cause of their hasty retreat, the fire-breathing monster with open gape snapped at the head and neck of his horse. A second blast from the hellish nostrils of the scaly beast melted in an instant the hero's shield upon his arm; but so well did he ply his sword, that the Dragon was soon conquered and slain; Turstin himself dying three days afterwards in consequence of the poisonous fumes which he had inhaled;‡

This doughty champion was succeeded by Rainulf, a brother of Drengot; who in a feud between Sergius Duke of Naples and the Prince of Capua, served the former so effectually, that he was rewarded with a small district between the rival Cities, upon which he erected the town of Aversa. The central situation of that town rendered it an important outpost to Naples; and Sergius, in order to ensure the fidelity of a powerful garrison on his most exposed frontier, obtained from Conrad II. the investiture of Rainulf as Count, and cemented the alliance by a family intermarriage. Such was the first step to titular authority and permanent abode trodden by the Normans in Southern Italy.

The foundation of the County of Aversa naturally heightened the attractions which Italy presented to emigrants, and Rainulf hourly increased in power and in numbers. Of the twelve sons of Tancred of Hauteville, a Noble distinguished in the Court and Camp of Normandy,* ten repaired from time to time to the new Settlement. In their trade as condottieri, they passed from the service of the Duke of Salerno to that of the chief enemy of the Italian Princes, Maniaces, the Catapan of the Greeks. But it was not to assist him against their former master that they engaged their swords; it was against the common adversary of all Christendom, the Saracens of Sicily. Thus seconded, Maniaces rapidly stormed Messina and invested Syracuse; wherever danger was most ripe, three sons of Tancred, Drogon, Humfrey, and William, were always foremost; and to a personal conflict in which the last-named overthrew and killed the gigantic Saracen Governor of Syracuse, he was indebted for the title of Bras-de-fer, bestowed by the acclamation of the confederate army.

But a quarrel, arising out of the cupidity and dishonesty of the Greeks in the distribution of spoil, soon dissolved the foundations of this ill-assorted alliance; and the discontent thus awakened among the Normans was fomented by a wily Italian, yet more grievously injured than themselves. Ardouin, a noble Milanese, having unhorsed a Saracen, claimed the charger of the vanquished enemy as his booty. It was seized, however, by Maniaces, who, offended at the complaint of the rightful owner, ordered him to be shamefully scourged round the camp. United by common wrongs, the aggrieved parties planned schemes of revenge, and having dissembled their resentment until they had communicated with Rainulf, and secured his cooperation, the whole Norman contingent, accompanied by Ardouin, embarked by night, crossed the Reggian Straits, and spread themselves over the Greek dominions in Puglia. The Greeks, weakened by their expedition to Sicily, which totally failed soon after the departure of their allies, opposed but feeble resistance; their strong holds surrendered in succession, and thrice when they mustered in sufficient strength to dispute the open field, they were signally overthrown. The conquest of almost the whole of Puglia was achieved in two campaigns, and the confederates divided their spoil without a diminution of friendship. Melfi, a well-fortified and considerable town, almost in the centre of the Province, became the Capital of their new dominion, under the joint government of Ardouin and Bras-de-fer, the latter first Count of Puglia; and twelve other Norman Counts were established in equal authority over the twelve places next in importance.† The Government was not that of a Feudal Sovereign supported by his Vassals, but a military Oligarchy in which all were peers.

The birth of this new and powerful State was not likely to be viewed without jealousy by its neighbours, and the conquering Normans probably were not very scrupulous as to the methods by which they strengthened

Italy.
From
A. D.
1000.
to
A. D.
1111.
Emigration of the sons of Tancred.
A. D.
1035.
Expedition with the Greeks against Sicily.
A. D.
1041.

Quarrel with the Greeks.

Conquest of Puglia.
A. D.
1042.

Death of Bras-de-fer.
A. D.
1046.

* Gibbon has adjusted the descent of Tancred in due equisance between the malice of Anna Comnena, who degrades him to Peasant extraction, and the adulation of his own Chroniclers, which derives him from the Ducal stem. His ancestors were vaivassors, or Bannerets, of the middle order of private Nobility, in the Duchesse of Coutances in Lower Normandy. (ch. lvi. p. 271.)
† Siponte, Ascoli, Venosa, Lavello, Monopoli, Trani, Canosa, Montepuloso, Trignano, Acerenza, S. Arcangelo, Minervino.

History. and enriched themselves in a Country won at the sword's point. Bras-de-fer soon died; and if we believe the Chroniclers, together with him expired the chief hope of tempering the rude settlers into a community regulated by Law. To discretion and valour he is said to have united extraordinary powers of persuasion which secured obedience; and he is described by a contemporary as a very Lion in War, a Lamb in Social life, and an Angel in Council.* His brother and successor Drogon was foully assassinated by a Puglian whom he had admitted to familiarity, and who had been bribed to that great crime by the Greek Catapan. The scene of murder was the porch of the Church of Montoglio, and the greater part of Drogon's immediate suite perished together with their master.† The sanctity of consecrated places was indeed of little protection against bloody and barbarous violence. We read of a company of Normans headed by their Count, who rode to the gates of the Abbey of Monte Cassino, dismounted, and left their horses and arms in the Galilee, while they bent their knees in prayer before the Altar. The servants of the Monastery, either suspecting that the present design of the strangers was pillage, or resolving to profit by a favourable opportunity of wreaking vengeance on those by whom they had already been plundered, closed the gates, sounded the alarm bell, and summoned the whole neighbourhood to their assistance. Fifteen of the Normans were slain on the pavement of the Church, and their leader was not released from imprisonment till all former levies upon the Monastery had been paid back as his ransom.‡

These detached outrages were but a prelude to a formidable and organized League for the total expulsion of the Normans from Italy: and the hardy adventurers became involved in a struggle against an alliance of both Empires, consolidated by the Head of the Western Church. Leo IX., on his assumption of the Pontificate, made frequent visitations to the Churches of Puglia, and was deeply affected by the representations of the Ecclesiastics every where groaning, as they affirmed, under the Norman tyranny. In his project of a Crusade against the new settlers for the deliverance of his Clergy, he received ample promises of support from the Greeks, suffering also under their own peculiar grievances; and his kinsman, Henry III. of Germany, provided him with a body of 500 men at arms, to form a nucleus for a general gathering of the Italians.§ If numbers could have secured victory, the Pope might have advanced with confidence to battle. Greeks, Germans, Puglians, Calabrians, and Campanians, the inhabitants of the March of Ancona and of the Patrimony of St. Peter, young and old, devout and profane, Clerks and Laics, followers both of the gown and of the sword, poured down upon the South, under the banner of the Church. The blessing of the Virgin and of the Saints was promised to this great but confused host, as it made a pilgrimage to Monte Cassino while on its march; and when Leo compared the strong-knit limbs and gigantic frames of his German allies with the shorter stature and slighter figure of the Norman foe, he doubted not, in his simplicity, that the approval of Heaven, the righteousness of his cause, the sanctity of his own person, and the superiority of his numerical force, would amply atone for any deficiency in military skill or any want of combination.

To oppose this overwhelming force, the Normans mustered no more than 3000 horse, and a much smaller proportion of infantry; and these were arrayed under Humfrey, the survivor of the three sons of Tancred who first entered Italy, Robert Guiscard, a half-brother, who had recently joined him from Normandy, and Richard Count of Aversa. These Chiefs well knew the bodily vigour, hardihood, courage, and warlike ability of the Germans; but with the smallness of their contingent, and the weakness of the remaining undisciplined rabble by which the ranks of Leo were swelled, they were unacquainted. Some superstitious reverence they doubtless cherished for the holiness of the Pontiff's character, person, and authority; and to this was added a total and very natural want of confidence in the fidelity of any Puglian whom they might intrust with arms. It was upon their own single swords, therefore, that they must rely; and against those, when they computed numbers, the odds were fearful. One slight check would be their ruin, for in the general defection and rising which must be consequent upon it, the bitterness of hatred would raise every man's arm against them; and even if they possessed a spot to which they could retreat, all retreat would be intercepted. These doubtless were powerful motives for negotiation; and they asked for who for Peace; promising unlimited Spiritual obedience to the Pope, Holy See; suing that they might be permitted to retain the lands which they had won by toil, wounds, and blood; and proffering their swords to the future service of the Church, with expressions of humility and reverence heretofore unknown to their lips. The reply was and was a stern denial of compromise. Peace it was said might perhaps be granted when Italy was evacuated.

The desperation awakened among the Normans by this impolitic refusal received additional force from a consciousness that it was by their own act they had been exposed to indignity; and as victory was now the only safeguard of their dominion, so without victory death was the only purifier of their honour. Thus grimly resolved, they determined to give battle; and mounting an eminence which separated the two armies, they reconnoitred from its summit, with well-founded hope, the loose array and disorderly encampment of the host which blackened the plains of Civitella beneath. Dividing their scanty force into three squadrons, they first charged the Italians with their right wing, under Richard of Aversa; threw their careless and unwarlike ranks into instant confusion, which soon became hasty flight; and pursued them vigorously and with unsparring slaughter. Meantime Humfrey directed himself upon the firm and serried phalanx of the German auxiliaries. A volley of arrows on either side preluded a murderous close engagement; and fortune continued doubtful till Guiscard, who had been intrusted with a reserve composed partly of Normans, but yet more of picked Calabrians devotedly attached to his person, charged at a favourable moment; and although thrice unhorsed, bore down all opposition, and slew his enemies to a man, disdaining as they did to give back one foot from their position. The Pope at a short distance observed the fluctuations of the Battle;

* Gualtinius Apulus, ii. 12.

† Gausfredus Malaterra, i. 13.

‡ Leo Ostiensis, ii. 71.

§ Henry would have granted, and indeed had commissioned a much larger force for the support of Leo; but he was deterred by the remonstrance of the Bishop of Rhaetia, a Prelate greatly in his confidence, who forcibly exposed the unseemliness of a Vicar of Christ heading an army against Christians. The Bishop when he became Pope as Victor II., heartily repented his interference, Giannone, ix. 3.

Italy.
From
A. D.
1000.
to
A. D.
1111.

who for Peace.

Battle of Civitella,
June 18.
A. D.
1053.

Defeat and capture of Leo.

History. and no sooner did he perceive that it was lost than he retired within the walls of Civitella; but that town, ill prepared for an assault, was speedily surrendered; and the terrified and astonished Pontiff became the prisoner of those warriors to whom but a few hours before he had refused every hope of Peace; and whom he had described to the Emperor Henry, and considered in his own mind, as Barbarians without law, humanity, or Religion.

It was as a Military Chieftain, not as a Minister of Peace, that Leo had confronted these supposed Savages. He had waged War as a Secular Prince, and by the rules of War he was now a captive, and might be treated according to the pleasure of his conquerors. What then was his surprise to perceive himself approached with submission and respect, and conducted with every mark of honour to the victorious Camp! Not only did Count Humfrey restore him to liberty upon his parole, but he escorted him with distinguished attention to Benevento, and assured him of a similar guard whenever he wished to proceed onward to Rome. This unexpected gentleness opened new views to the eyes of Leo; instead of enemies to God and his Church, he recognised in the Normans devout and faithful servants; and relieving them from all spiritual censures, assuring them of his own friendship, and sanctioning their arms by his benediction, he gave them a solemn investiture, as Vassals of St. Peter, of all that Country which they had hitherto conquered in Puglia, of all which they might hereafter conquer in Calabria.* By this remarkable donation, the Papacy acquired a far greater and more lasting dominion than it affected to confer. Naples was still to be won by the sword of the Normans, but after it was won, in consequence of this gift by a Priest who had no right to that which he gave, it remained during seven Centuries a Fief of the Pontificate.

The Normans pursued their victory, Humfrey in Puglia, Robert Guiscard in Calabria; and the latter the destined founder of a race of Princes, and now in the commencement of the spring-tide of his fortunes, seems for a few years to have passed the life of a Brigand and a Preboster. Often, says Malaterra,† would his Steward announce to him that there were neither provisions for the morrow's meal, nor money by which they might be purchased; and indeed that if the latter were at hand no one was to be found willing to sell within many leagues' circuit. The Count and his suite alarmed at the tidings of approaching hunger, then sprang to their saddles, and marauded through every village within reach, in pursuit of a dinner. The person of Robert Guiscard is described as well adapted to hardy adventure. He was tall, strong, active, and graceful; a breadth of shoulders denoted vigour, a ruddy complexion, health; his eyes sparkled with the fire of courage and intelligence; his voice inspired terror or encouragement as it sounded to the ears of friend or foe. Even the colour and measure of his hair and beard have been preserved to us; they were long and flaxen; and in the exercise of all martial weapons he was ambidexter. His mental qualities and disposition fitted him no less than his Physical powers for distinction in the rude Age in which he lived, and among the half-civilized People to whom he belonged. If he extorted treasure rapaciously, and even barbarously, from his prisoners, it was that he might dispense it with proportionate lavishness among his followers; and if he rigorously compelled the observance of discipline in the field, no one understood better how to gain the soldiers' hearts by frankness, courtesy, and affability in seasons of relaxation. His ambition is attested by the elevation which he attained; his discretion and policy by the surname which contemporaries bestowed; for Guiscard, or Wiscard, in the Norman idiom, implies a cunning man.‡ Such is the representation of the sixth son of Tancred who passed the Alps as a Pilgrim, and who on the death of his brother Humfrey succeeded to the guardianship of his infant children, and virtually to the dignity and power of Count of Puglia. It was not long before he pushed his conquests to the extreme verge of Italy; and when Reggio yielded to his arms, affecting a loftier title on the attainment of a larger dominion, he styled himself, or was saluted by acclamation, Duke of Puglia and Calabria. After some differences with Pope Nicholas II., who, perceiving that the Normans were not the sort of people to be managed by excommunication,† discreetly recalled one of those Bulls which he had rashly issued; Robert received the consecrated Standard of Rome as Gonfaloniere of the Church, from the hands of the Pontiff in a Council assembled at Melfi; and he there also swore allegiance to the Holy See in a style distinguished by proud confidence of future conquest: "I, Robert, by the grace of God and of St. Peter Duke of Puglia and Calabria, and hereafter of Sicily!";

In his latter conquests, Robert had been greatly assisted by his youngest brother Roger, a youth destined to compete with himself in glory. Roger, lately invited from Normandy, had been invested as a Count on his arrival; but jealousy or avarice on the part of Robert, denied fitting appointments for the maintenance of his dignity. Money he had none; a single steed was his recompense for long and perilous services; and in his after hours of prosperity, when dictating some of his early adventures to Malaterra the Chronicler, he insisted that these particulars should be recorded in his pages, in order that posterity might know how laboriously, and from what a deep slough of Poverty, he had attained the pinnacle of wealth and honour. "It is not therefore to his disgrace that I mention it," says the Historian, "but by his own desire I inform you that he was supported by robberies which his followers committed." Many a time did he pillage merchants while travelling, and once, accompanied by a favourite Esquire, who afterwards became a rich Count, he stole some horses from their stables in Melfi. Even his Brother did not escape un plundered; and for a while, until the subjugation of Calabria demanded Roger's active cooperation, intercourse was suspended between them, and open hostility was almost avowed.

On the reduction of Calabria by their joint forces, Robert bestowed its government on his Brother; and the

* Gibbon, whom character of Robert Guiscard we have here freely paraphrased, says that in our old word Wiscard he can discern something of similar sense and termination. Does not Wiscard approach more nearly?

† Il Papa considerava che co' Normanni erano inutili le accomunche; e ch'essi non erano gente di lasciarsi niente, se non s'adoperassero que' medesimi mezzi che usavano tenuto per conquistarle. Giannone, x. Intro.

‡ Barrois, ad ann. 1099. sec. 69.

§ Jeffrey Malaterra is eloquent in the character of his Patron Roger Guiscard. Erant enim juvenis pulcherrimus, procerus statura, eleganti corpore, ingenio ferventissimus, consilio callidus, in oratione agendarum rerum providus, omnibus jocundus et affabilis, viribus fortis, nullius ferrox laudis appetens. i. 19.

• Gaufridus Malaterra, ii. 14.

† Ibid. i. 16.

History.

From

A. D.

1000.

to

A. D.

1111.

He invades

Sicily.

A. D.

1060.

Occupation of Traina.

near prospect of the Sicilian shore soon awakened in Roger Guiscard's breast an eager desire for the possession of that Island. This hope was encouraged both by the effeminacy into which the Saracen occupants had degenerated, and by their intestine dissensions. Almost each separate town was swayed by a separate Emir; and in a feud between two of those Chieftains, the application of one of them for Roger's aid against his rival, greatly facilitated the Norman project of invasion. His first attempts were little more than predatory incursions; and the sixty men who traversed the fabled dangers of the Sicilian strait in open boats, returned satisfied with their booty, after having chased the Saracens within the walls of Messina. Encouraged by this and similar early successes, Roger became more enterprising, and favoured by certain Greeks who inhabited the town of Traina at the foot of Etna, he appeared before its gates with 300 Knights, (the largest number which he appears to have been able to collect at any time,) and established himself in its possession. The fickle Greeks, soon weary of their new friends, recalled the Saracens; and opposite quarters of the town were respectively occupied by the hostile forces. In contact thus close, daily skirmishes were unavoidable; and each party, exposed to the perpetual observation of its foe, and denied free egress, occasionally suffered the extremity of privation. According to the chivalrous habits of his time, Roger was accompanied by his youthful bride; and the Countess and the few Ladies of her suite prepared with their own hands the scanty repasts of her husband and his comrades. Clothes were no less wanting than food; and the single mantle* which remained to the Noble pair was worn alternately by each as they happened to be called abroad. On one occasion, Roger left alone, environed by enemies, who were dragging him like a struggling Bull from his horse which had been killed under him, cleared a passage for himself with his sword; and disengaging his saddle from the dead beast, in order that the Saracens might not vaunt it as a trophy, he placed it on his shoulders, and made good his retreat slowly and on foot. During four months of continued peril, want, and difficulty, the Normans maintained their arduous post; and on the approach of Winter, when the snows covered the neighbouring summits and embedded Traina itself, these hardy warriors, accustomed to endure severity of climate, continued vigilant and alert, while the Greeks and Saracens relaxed into inactivity. Profiting by their want of energy, Roger mastered the disputed quarter of the town in a night attack, and having slain or dispersed its garrison, defied all future efforts for its reconquest.

His further successes.

The above is but a sample of the numerous romantic adventures ennobling the tedious struggle which preceded the entire conquest of Sicily; and were it not that St. George; performed for the Normans a like kind office to that which St. Jago was in the habit of exercising for the Spaniards, and fought on horseback in their ranks, we might hesitate in assenting to some of the victories which they claim. In full confluence of Divine protection, thirty-six Christian Knights fearlessly attacked and put to flight 30,000 Infidels, and on the plain of Ceramio, another handful, under the special leadership of the Bishop Knight of Cappadocia, overthrew a host. Beaten in every field, chased from every castle, the Saracens at length concentrated their whole remaining force, their treasure, and their military equipments in Palermo, the Capital of the Island, and the strongest fortification. It required five months' investment, the aid of Robert, whom Roger called to the siege, and the cooperation of a Pisan Fleet, before its reduction could be effected; but on its surrender, the sovereignty of the Island was virtually transferred to the Normans, and Roger became first Count of Sicily, by investiture of Roger as Count of Sicily. A. D. 1072.

Meantime, the progress of Robert Guiscard on the continent of Italy had been not less brilliant than that of his Brother in the adjacent Island. Of the three Lombard Principalities, Capua long since had passed under the sway of the Counts of Aversa; Bari, the Capital of the Greeks, after an obstinate defence of four years, surrendered with its Catapan to Robert; and no sooner did the prosperous course of events in Sicily permit him to renew operations in Calabria, than Salerno and its dependence Amalfi were united to his Duchy.* The conquest of the former City relieved him from some domestic enemies by whom he had been long embarrassed. The two sons of his deceased Brother Humphrey were legitimate heirs of their Father's Duchy, and during many years they had solicited aid from the Byzantine Court for the recovery of their inheritance. They were in Salerno at the commencement of its siege; but dreading the severity of their Uncle, they escaped from its walls, and after a short delay in Italy, took refuge in Constantinople, where they passed a long subsequent life in penury, neglect, and obscurity. Robert's crowning success was the conquest of the Duchy of Benevento; its territory he retained, the City itself was ceded to Rome in compliance with a claim asserted by Hildebrand; and contributed doubtless to purchase a relaxation of the Spiritual wrath with which that most energetic of Pontiffs had visited the Norman Conqueror,† in common with every other Potentate in Europe. Of the powerful assistance which Robert afterwards afforded to Gregory, during the occupation of Rome by the Emperor Henry IV., we have already spoken; and to the gratitude which the Pope cherished for that benefit, or to the constraint which he endured under Norman protection, may be referred a renewal of the investiture which Robert had obtained from his predecessors in the Holy See. The haughty spirit of Gregory manifested itself in that grant. Robert asked confirmation in the territories which he had recently subdued. "I give you that," replied the Pope, "which Nicholas and Alexander have given." For the rest he wrote as fol-

* Non nisi unam capiam habentes. Gualfred. Malaterra, ii. 29.

† Quasi tantum reluctantem. Id. ii. 30.

‡ Apparuit quidam equus apud apud in armis, equo alio insidens, alium vexillum in summis hastis alligatum ferens, et draperis appendicibus crucem, et quasi a nostris acceperat, ut nostris ad certamen promptiores redderet, fortissimo impetu hostes ut denique erant irumpens. Id. ii. 33. From the day of that victory, Roger bore on his shield and annexed to his coat of arms the motto Dextera Domini fecit virtutem, Dextera Domini exaltavit me. Estell, Hist. Sic. Dec. Post. lib. vii. c. 1. p. 397.

* We have followed the order of dates given by Giamnone. Salerno is made Robert's final acquisition by M. de Sismondi.

† Questo Errore che merita di essere notato sopra il nome di Conquistatore. Giamnone, x. 6.

lows. "As to the dominions which you unjustly occupy, as Salerno, Amalfi, and part of the Firm March, for the present I patiently leave them to you, relying on Almighty God and your own righteousness that hereafter, for the honour of that God and of St. Peter, you will so conduct yourself, as it becomes you to do and me to receive, without the peril either of your soul or of mine.*" Thus unbroken in its steady purpose of aggrandizement was the proud temper of the old man, while an exile from his Capital, a more than ambiguous prisoner, and now verging to the confines of the grave.

Thirty years since, Robert Guiscard had quitted Normandy, a poor and private Gentleman, the younger brother of a Noble House with numerous scions and scanty revenues; he now united under his sway dominions corresponding in extent to the modern Kingdom of Naples. But his ambition was rather excited than wearied or satiated by this most astounding elevation; he coveted still wider rule, and already grasped in fancy the sceptre of the East. A pretext was easily found for aggression; but the splendid, although less auspicious expedition against the Byzantine Emperor, which occupied the closing years of his life, will be more fully narrated when we reach the Annals of Constantinople. It was on his return from that Oriental enterprise interrupted by the troubles of Italy, that he afforded the above-mentioned deliverance to Gregory VII.; and in the following year, after having signally defeated the combined fleets of Greece and Venice, on an element novel to himself, but familiar to his enemies, while renewing his preparations for a second invasion of the Empire, he expired in Corfu, in his seventieth year.† The dream of Oriental conquest was dissipated with his last breath; and the hasty flight and rapid dispersion of his terror-stricken armament, forcibly manifested the importance of this great man's single life. Sepulture was nearly denied to his remains, for the galley which conveyed them to Italy was lost upon its coast. The corpse of the Hero was at length recovered, and as if the Cities under his rule disputed the possession of their deceased Sovereign, the heart was deposited at Otranto, the body itself at Venusia.

The sway of Apulia passed to his second son Roger; for Boemond, the eldest by a former marriage dissolved on the plea of consanguinity, had been pronounced illegitimate by the Church, and was consequently disinherited by his Father. Reluctantly surrendering his claims, the excluded Prince long urged them even by the sword; and till the Crusades diverted him into that course of glory which has immortalized his name in Song, the throne of Roger I. could scarcely be deemed secure. That Prince's reign was protracted through the first eleven years of the new Century, but it affords little worthy of record. His uncle, the greater Roger, appears to have ruled Sicily undisturbed after the year 1090; for although the surrender of Palermo had given him a superiority which ensured ultimate tranquil sovereignty, it was not till that date that resistance altogether subsided. The close of his reign was distinguished by the attainment of an immunity from the Holy See, for which every other nation in Christendom in vain employed both force and supplication. Urban II., devoted to the single object of the Crusades, and deeming no price insufficient to conciliate a Family so necessary to his views as that of Guiscard, recalled the Legate whom he had despatched to Sicily; and freed the Island for ever from the risk of groaning under the rapacity of a successor, by nominating Roger and his heirs born Legates within their dominions, and investing them with Spiritual no less than temporal authority. This most important privilege was exercised by all Roger's posterity; and afterwards was transferred with their Crown to the Kings of Arragon. It is known in History by the name of Lu Monarchia di Sicilia,† and its origin and extent have not escaped dispute among the Roman Writers. Having obtained this great Civil benefit for the Kingdom, as it was about to become, which he had won by his prowess in the field, Roger Guiscard closed a life of singular glory and prosperity, when, like his elder and no less fortunate brother, he had fulfilled the years of man.‡

2. It is to the North of the Italian Peninsula that our scene must now be shifted, where we shall throw a brief glance in the first instance on the birth and adolescence (terms much affected by her own Historians) of the eldest horn of European States. About the middle of the Vth Century, during the invasion of Attila, the inhabitants of the North-Eastern angle of Italy between the Alps and the innermost coast of the Adriatic (the Venetia of the Romans) abandoned their towns at the

* In a Battle fought between the Brothers at Farnito in the Beneventan territory, it is said that only one man was killed in the two armies. (L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, iii. 808.) This was an anticipation of the engagements of the Condottieri of the XVth and XVIth Centuries.

† On the Monarchy of Sicily and the controversies respecting it enough for complete satisfaction may be found in Giannone, x. 8, Baronius (ad ann. 1097.) attacks it, and it has been defended by Dupin and Ludewig. But whence did it receive its name? Maratori certainly was at a loss for its origin; la decantata Monarchia di Sicilia, nome veramente strano. Annali ad ann. 1098.

‡ The early authorities for the History of the Guiscards are the contemporary History of Gausfredus Malaterra and the Poems of Guilielmus Apulus in the Vth volume of the Script. Ital. of Muratori and the Chronicle of Leo Odoenus in the IVth volume of the same Work. Fazell in his Hist. Sicil. has a full Chapter on the subject; and Giannone abounds in curious matter. Denina is simple and satisfactory; Gibbon as usual exhausts his authorities, without leaving one syllable of his story impressed on the reader's memory, and M. de Sismondi narrates accurately, vigorously, and eloquently, Italy.

From

A. D.

1000.

to

A. D.

1111.

Roger I.

Duke of Puglia and Calabria.

His death.

A. D.

1111.

Roger of Sicily

obtains from Urban

II.

A. D.

1098.

Spiritual authority over that Island.

A. D.

1098.

His death.

A. D.

1101.

Origin of Venice.

* Giannone, x. 1. No one has better described the character of Hildebrand than the fearless Neapolitan. Ma non altro più meglio, e più al vivo ci diede il ritratto di questo Pontefice, quanto quel giudiziooso Dipintore che lo dipinse nella Chiesa di S. Severino di Napoli. Vedasi quivi l'immagine di questo Papa, tra le altre de' Pontefici dell' Ordine di S. Benedetto, avere nella sinistra mano il pastorale col' croce, nella destra, alzata in atto di percuotere, una terribile scure, e sotto i piedi scarti, e corone Imperiali, e Regali, in atto di freggiargli. E dopo avere così mostrato essere stato Gregorio il terrore, ed il flagello de' Principi, e capitane scettici, e corone; volendo ancora far vedere, che tutto ciò poteva ben accoppiarsi colla santità, e modestia de' suoi costumi, sopra il suo capo scritte in lettere cubitali queste parole: SANCUS GREGORIUS VII.

† Roger Hoveden twice affirms that Robert Guiscard was poisoned by his Consort, bribed to that crime by an assurance from the Greek Emperor that so soon as she became a widow he would marry her. He fulfilled his promise, and after she had been crowned, declared her guilt, and condemned her to the flames. (x. Scriptores, pp. 1010. 1218.) Gibbon, who has noticed this story, concerning which far more authentic authorities, William of Apulia, Jeffrey Malaterra, and Romuald of Salerno are silent, has himself fallen into a slight error in correcting Hoveden. "The English Historian," he says, "is so blind that he ranks Robert Guiscard or Wiscard among the Knights of Henry I. who ascended the throne fifteen years after the Duke of Apulia's death." (ch. lvi. n. 92.) In both the passages referred to above, Hoveden speaks of Robert Guiscard as div in curia Willielm Rufi, Regis Anglie, consensatus. Even with this detraction, however, the anachronism is sufficient to condemn him. Robert Guiscard died in 1085, William Rufus did not ascend the throne till 1087.

History.

From

A. D.

1000.

to

A. D.

1111.

Occupation
of the Lagoons.

A. D.

452.

First Doge
of Venice.

A. D.

697.

Was with Pepin.

A. D.

804.

Foundation
of Venice.

A. D.

809.

St. Mark.

A. D.

827.

advance of the Barbarian Conqueror. Their choice was limited between flight and extermination; and the spot selected by them for refuge was one, the barrenness of which, combined with its difficulty of approach, afforded promise that it might be forgotten, neglected, or despised by the avarice of the pursuer. A nest of Islands bedded in the shallow water of Lagoons, navigable only in the estuaries of the numerous rivers which descend from the Alps or Appennines to the Adriatic, and protected from the inroads of the sea by a long bar or sand-bank, (aggere), deposited by those rivers, was colonized by the fugitives. During the progress of nearly a Century and a half, a continued influx of fresh emigrants, chased by new invaders, contributed to swell the numbers of the first exiled fishermen; and the powers of a Government more vigorous than that of the annual Tribunes, at first depu- ted by each of the Islands, were finally concentrated in the person of a single Chief Magistrate, who possessed authority little short of despotism, and bore the title of Doge, or Duke.

The reigns of the early Doges were for the most part oppressive, perpetually stained with blood, both of the Prince and the People, often terminating in the expulsion of the Tyrants. During an intestine contest of this nature, not long after the accession of Pepin, son of Charlemagne, to the Crown of Lombardy, that King accepted the invitation of one of the rival parties who solicited his assistance. Taking advantage of the footing thus obtained, with a policy often repeated in History, after his admission as an ally he endeavoured to establish himself as a master; and but for the firmness of a private citizen, Angelo Participazio, he would probably have succeeded. The fleet of Pepin rode victoriously in the Lagoons, and captured all the outposts which protected Malamocco, at that time the Capital of the State; his troops, disembarked on an island separated from it but by a narrow canal, were preparing to cross the bridges already constructed, when Participazio advised the entire abandonment of the invested City, and a retreat to another island, Rialto, in the very centre of the Lagoons; an asylum which the besieged might easily gain in their own light craft, although the shallow soundings forbade all approach to the heavier ships of the invader. This bold proposition was adopted; Pepin, to his surprise and discomfort, entered deserted walls; failed, after the loss of a great portion of his fleet, in an attempt upon the new position of his enemies; and retired to the Continent baffled and disgraced. Angelo Participazio received the Ducal Bonnet as his reward; and under his auspices, Rialto, connected by bridges with numerous smaller adjacent islands, was speedily covered with houses and public buildings, with a Cathedral and a Palace; and VENICE arose upon the waters which she was to rule for a thousand years.

The new City rapidly increased, by the special protection, as was believed, of the Evangelist St. Mark, whose remains were transported from Alexandria to the Lagoons; and whose Lion became the symbol, as himself was the tutelary Saint of the Republic. Before the close of the Xth Century, Venice, rich, active, and powerful, commanded all the trade between Europe and the Levant; established factories on the coasts of Syria, Egypt, and the Sea of Marmora; and maintained free and privileged intercourse both with the jealous Sultans of the East and the haughty and exclusive Court of the Byzantine Cæsars. Her first step to continental dominion was taken by the suppression of a horde of Pirates at Narenta on the Eastern coast of the Adriatic; and the conquest, or the voluntary surrender, we know not which, of a large portion of Dalmatia almost immediately followed; an acquisition which annexed to the title of Doge of Venice, that of Duke of his newly attained territory. Every year of the succeeding Century increased the wealth and dominion of this great Republic; and when we enter upon the period of the 1st Crusade, we shall discover her supplying its sinews to that chivalrous and romantic enterprise, not only in ships, money, and equipments, but yet more in a band of statesmen and warriors preeminent in wisdom and in valor, and consequently among the most successful reapers in the profuse harvest of glory which it afforded.

Of the two Italian Cities which cradled their Naval power on the Mediærranean, GENOA claims only incidental notice during the period now under consideration; but PISA, if we credit some of her own Annals, may assert a far earlier date than that which is allowed to PISA, Venice without controversy. The anonymous writer of a Breviary of Pisan History, printed by Muratori,* commences boldly, "once upon a time, among the Greeks, there was a certain man named Pelops," and continues that, "concerning the time of the foundation of Pisa, it is certain, that it occurred long before that of Rome; so that I do not think any State can be found boasting so high an antiquity." Be its claim just or otherwise, this ancient People is unknown to History till we learn with surprise that before the close of the Xth Century its maritime resources were sufficiently powerful to be coveted by Otho II. in his Calabrian expedition; the earliest Nobili of Pisa sprang, indeed, from seven Barons deputed by the Emperor to conduct this negotiation, who struck by the beauty and fertility of the Country settled and became naturalized in it. The chief connections of the rising City were formed with the Calabrian Greeks; and the injuries which their commerce with the ports of Southern Italy endured from the Piracies of the Saracens, kindled in the Pisan bosom an inveterate enmity against those general foes of Christendom. The representations made by some merchants who had suffered from the Moslem aggressions awakened an enthusiasm not to be repressed; the population with one voice demanded revenge; and the City poured forth her bravest youth to man a fleet destined to seek the Infidels within their own fastnesses.

The departure of the flower of her inhabitants and the main strength of her Navy was watched for with keen expectation and beheld with eager joy by an enemy nearer home; and Musa, a Moorish Chief, who had established himself in the neighbouring Island of Sardinia at the head of a band of Corsairs, grappled with his prey so soon as he believed it to be defenceless. Penetrating the Arno in the dead of the night, he disembarked in the middle of the City, and fired one of its suburbs. The intrepidity of a woman preserved her birth-place from destruction, her fellow-citizens from captivity; and when Chinzica de' Simiondi, regardless of her own peril, had crossed a bridge and traversed a road in possession of the Saracens, which connected the suburb with the main town, she aroused in the Consular Palace an armed force sufficient to check the configuration, and to repulse the invaders. The suburb when rebuilt was called after the name of the Heroine, and her statue still existing, half sunk into the wall of that quarter, testifies the admiration with which her noble daring was regarded by contemporaries.

* Script. It. Med. vi. 163.

The armament returned in triumph from Calabria, and the first cry was for revenge on the Sardinian Corsairs. But from causes unknown to us, the day of vengeance was postponed till after a second insult by an incursion from the Moors of Spain. The aid of the Genoese, a people for some years past increasing in maritime reputation, was then solicited; and the most powerful Christian fleet which as yet had ploughed the Mediterranean, entered the Ports of Sardinia, and landed the allied troops; who, seconded by the resident Christians, speedily overpowered the Mussulmans, drove them to their ships, and delivered the Island from their sway. Partition of the spoil, however, that fruitless source of discord in combined armaments, soon generated a quarrel between the allies, their swords were turned against each other, and the Pisans remained sole masters of Sardinia. Eighteen years were spent by Mussa in ineffectual attempts to dispossess them of their conquest; and even at the expiration of fifteen more of reluctant peace, we find him at the very close of a long life renewing the struggle, and, by the aid of his Spanish Countrymen, triumphantly reentering all his former territory, excepting Cagliari. A second Confederacy again dispossessed him; he was wounded, taken prisoner, and although past his eightieth year, barbarously condemned to languish in fetters through his few remaining days; while Sardinia and its neighbour Corsica were divided among the allies. We obtain our scanty knowledge of these particulars from one of the ancestors of Napoleon Bonaparte,* and they are the sole incidents of any note in the obscure early annals of Pisa and Genoa, till we find them united with Venice as Partners in the 1st Crusade.

IV. The confusion in SPANISH History arising from its numerous subdivisions is increased rather than diminished in the course of the XIII Century; and on returning to it we must prefix an observation by Mariana with which we most cordially sympathize, "How is it possible in such distraction to be plain?" Hixem, the son and successor of Alhakem, mounted the throne of Cordova in his eleventh year, and his long and impotent reign forcibly reminds us of the Roi Fainéant in France. Neither was he wanting in his Mayor of the Palace; and fortunate was he in the hands by which his protracted tutelage was administered. The guardianship of his person, even after he attained manhood, continued with his Mother Sobeha, a Princess by whose wisdom the imbecility of her Son was screened from observation. The Khalif, immured within his Palace or his Gardens, devoted himself solely to the inmates of the Harem. When conducted to the Mosque in which he was used to perform his devotions, from the lofty seat enveloped in draperies which he occupied, he was scarcely visible to the assembled worshippers; as he approached or quitted the holy building, he was surrounded by an impenetrable throng of guards; and if audience or admission to his person were ever granted, they were regulated by the strictest forms, in order to secure him against private communication. Forgetting and forgotten, his name was pronounced by his subjects only during their formal prayers, and his image was unknown to them unless as impressed upon his coinage.* The whole executive power of the State devolved upon Sobeha's chief Secretary, Mohammed ben Abdala ben Ali Amer, better known by the name Almansor, "the Victorious;" a title with which he was saluted by acclamation on his return from a second invasion of Galicia, productive alike of glory and of spoil. The great qualities of that distinguished warrior have thrown his feeble Sovereign into obscurity; and the name of Almansor and his two successors, have frequently superseded with the Spanish Chroniclers, that of the real Khalif, Hixem.

The career of Almansor, indeed, was one of brilliant and almost uninterrupted triumph; and the Christians, quelled by his powerful genius, and weakened by their own divisions, surrendered or abandoned every strong hold against which his arms were directed. After the storm of Zamora, he reentered his Metropolis, preceded by 9000 slaves, his own peculiar share of booty; 4000 had fallen to the second in command; and an equal number were put to the sword in an attempt at escape. The King of Leon, Bermudo II., terrified by the announcement of this calamity, stripped his Capital of all movable treasure, disinterred the bodies of his Royal predecessors, and transported them, together with the precious furniture and reliquaries of his Churches, to the mountains of Asturias, fixing his seat of Government at Oviedo. This precaution was indeed not more than reasonable, for Almansor appeared rapidly under the walls of Leon, with a train of powerful battering machines. The Spanish Historians aver that the City maintained itself for almost a year; the Arabians on the contrary boast that, despite its lofty towers and gates of bronze, five days sufficed for a breach; when Almansor himself heading the storming party was the first man who sprang upon the ramparts, with a sword in one hand, a banner in the other.† The Governor, Count Guillen, was carried from a sick-bed to the battlements; and from the litter in which he was placed at the breach, continued to encourage his men, till his guards were slain around him, and himself fell beneath Almansor's sword,‡ an easy and inglorious conquest to his adversary, a proud testimony of the devotion of her sons to his Country.

The fall of Astorga speedily followed; Barcelona in the extreme East was the fruit of a later campaign; next retracing his steps, Almansor desolated Castile to its furthest boundaries; continuing onward into Galicia he sacked Compostella, and notwithstanding the miraculous light which is said to have scared the Unbelievers from the Tomb of Saint Jago himself, the Bells of the Apostles' Church were dragged by Christians, contemptuously substituted for beasts of burden, in order to heighten the profanation, and suspended to serve the purpose of lamps in the great Mosque of Cordova.|| During these brilliant exploits in Spain, Almansor suppressed, also by his son Abdalmalech, a dangerous revolt in Africa; terminated the dynasty of the Edrissites; and

Spain.

From

A. D.

976.

to

A. D.

1109, and Al-

mansor,

A. D.

978.

Almansor's

Conquest.

A. D.

981.

Capture of Leon.

Conquest

of the Kingdom of the Edrissites.

A. D.

985.

* See p. 490. note 2.

† Mariana, viii. 6.

‡ De Marles, vol. ii. p. 22.

§ Id. ibid. Mariana says that Count Guillen's illness was occasioned by the fatigues of a defence protracted during many months; that he sat in the breach for three continuous days; and that when he saw all was lost, he threw himself into the midst of the assailants and perished, ad sup.

|| Mariana, ad sup. who does not explain the process by which the bells were converted into lamps. Ferreras (Partie iv. § x. tom. iii. p. 106, par d'Hermilly) says the gates were carried off; whichever was the spoil it probably was melted down.

* Sismondi, Rep. Ital. i. ch. iii. Muratori, Scrip. Ital. iii. part i. p. 401.

History.

From

A. D.

976.

to

A. D.

1109.

Story of the Infantes of Lara.

annexed their territories with the Metropolis of Fez, after two hundred years' possession, to the European Khalifate. It was about this time that he participated also in a Tragical incident, in itself more of private than of public interest; but which nevertheless, since it has afforded a favourite theme to the Chronicles, the Romances, and the Traditions of Spain, must not be wholly omitted in any review, however brief, of her History.

The nuptials of Ruy Velasquez, Lord of Barcelona, with Lambra, a near relative of the Counts of Castile, were celebrated with unusual splendour during five weeks' continued feasting; and among the most distinguished guests were seven nephews of the Bridegroom, the Infantes of Lara. In a chance quarrel at a martial sport, between one of these youths and a kinsman of her own, Lambra conceived herself to be insulted; and in revenge she instructed a slave, a few days afterwards, during a Hawking party, to fill a gourd with blood, and to fling it in the young Knight's face. The brothers, indignant at so gross an affront, pursued its wretched perpetrator, and laid him dead, notwithstanding he sought refuge at the feet of his mistress, whose mantle was stained with the blood of the murdered victim. Lambra indignantly represented her wrong to her husband, and Ruy Velasquez conceived, promised, and executed a deep and most perfidious vengeance upon the offending family. Dissenbling his resentment, he engaged Gonzalo Gustio, the Father of the Youths, to undertake a mission to Almansor, with whom he was connected in bonds of friendship; an intercourse not unsrequently maintained, during these singularly romantic times, between individuals of the two nations so dissimilar in Faith, and so constantly opposed in open War. A Moor was employed to write a letter in his native Tongue, of which Gonzalo was to be the bearer; and lest the scribe should betray that its contents enjoined Almansor to put the messenger to instant death, Ruy Velasquez struck off the slave's head at the moment at which his penmanship was concluded. Almansor, too generous to stain his hands with the blood of a defenceless and confiding guest, spared Gonzalo's life, but committed him to prison; and a Moorish damsel of high birth, probably a sister of Almansor himself,* deeply interested by the captive's misfortunes, consoled them by her love.

One other part of Velasquez's request was more strictly fulfilled; some Arab troops were placed in ambush at a spot agreed upon for the capture of the Infantes, and their treacherous uncle betrayed them into the snare. The seven Brothers after a gallant defence were slain, and their heads were conveyed as trophies to the Palace of Almansor in Cordova. No other portion of Almansor's recorded history, certainly not his subsequent conduct to Gonzalo, justifies our belief that he intended cruelty in the horrible exhibition to which he led the aged Father; and if the occurrence (unnoticed by the Arabian Chroniclers) really took place, it is but charity to suppose that it resulted from ignorance. Almansor, it is said, visited his prisoner, informed him that in a skirmish with the Castilians seven Christians had been killed, with whose features Gonzalo might perhaps be acquainted. He was accordingly brought out to a chamber, in which the seven heads were arranged on a fair linen cloth; and when the old man recognised his sons he fell on the ground as if life had passed away. Recovering from his swoon, he announced that they were his children, and taking up the heads one by one, he talked wildly with each, and recounted their good deeds. Then overwhelmed by the fury of grief, he snatched a sword from a bystander, slew several Moors near him, and when at last disarmed, prayed death from their Chief as the close of his great miseries. Almansor pitied, consoled, and released him; but on his return to Castile the bereft Father was much too weak to attempt the punishment of his guilty kinsman. Many years rolled away, when a youthful Moorish Knight appeared with a brilliant escort at Gonzalo's castle; presented to him as his voucher a well-known ring, which had passed as a love-token between the former captive and his noble mistress; announced himself as Mudarra Gonzalez the issue of that amour, and avowed his intention of avenging his Brothers' death and his Father's imprisonment. Ruy Velasquez fell by his hand; Lambra is said to have been stoned by the indignant populace; and Mudarra having abjured Mohammedanism, was formally adopted into the Family of Gonzalo and his Consort, and became the stem of the illustrious House of Lara.*

In a new invasion of Castile, Almansor inflicted a signal defeat on its Count Garcia Fernandez, who survived but a few days the grievous wounds which he had received. The conqueror embalmed his body, placed it on a gorgeous barge decorated with scarlet and cloth of gold, and delivered it without ransom to his Family. But this act of generosity by no means preluded a more pacific course. On the contrary, fire and sword were carried throughout the devoted Country; and save in the mountains, refuge seemed unknown to the trembling Christians. Resolved at length upon a great final blow which should terminate these long ravages by the total extinction of the Kingdom of Leon, Almansor devoted many months to the assembling of an overpowering armament. Troops poured in from the chief cities which the Moors had either inherited or had conquered, and to the levies of Merida and Valencia, of Toledo and Andalusia, was annexed a ferocious band of African auxiliaries. It is difficult to conceive, after the long desolation of her lands, and the slaughter and captivity of

* The most copious account of the story of the Infantes of Lara may be found in a passage of the Chronica General de España, translated by Mr. Southey in a note on The Chronicle of the Cid. The reader may turn likewise to Mariana, vii. 6. and to De Maribus, vol. ii. p. 35. Mr. Lockhart has given a spirited translation from a Spanish Ballad, The Seven Heads, in which Almansor is made guilty of a cruelty paralleled only in the history of Harpagus and Astyages. He invites Gonzalo to feast with him in his Palace where the heads of his seven sons are displayed on the table in charges. No doubt can be entertained that this addition to the story is false. The Frangence of Mudarra forms the subject of another Ballad. The singular method of Mudarra's adoption, as described by Mariana, should not be omitted. "By this vengeance which he took for the murder of his seven brothers, he so won to himself the good liking of his step-mother, Donna Sancha, and of all the kindred, that he was received and acknowledged as heir of the Signories of his father. Donna Sancha herself adopted him; as her Son, and the manner of this adoption was thus, not less memorable than rude. The same day that he was baptized and stretched Knight by Garcia Fernandez Count of Castile, his father's wife being resolved to adopt him, made use of this ceremony; she drew him within a very wide snuck by the sleeve, and thrust his head forth at the neck-band, and then kissing him on the face, delivered him to the family as her own child."

* So De Maribus conjectures, because she is frequently styled the Sister of the Khalif, and Hixem had neither brother nor sister. Almansor, as we have before said, was easily mistaken for the Khalif; and in the Chronica General, "the honourable Moorish woman" is in one place said to have been reputed Almansor's sister.

her inhabitants, how Spain was able to present a force which might cope with this mighty gathering; but, for the first time perhaps in their History, Leon, Castile, and Navarre united their confederate arms; and the hostile forces met at a spot, not now to be recognised, under the name of Calat Anasor, but which probably may be fixed on the right bank of the Douro, between Medina Cæli and Soria. The fight continued from dawn till sunset; more than once the Christian cavalry, overwhelmed as it seemed, by the charges of the Arabians, rallied and bore terror in return among the squadrons of their foe. Almanzor, prodigal of life, rode to every spot in which danger was most apparent; but victory for the first time refused his call. Night closed on a field apparently undecided, and each army reposed amid its dead. But when the Moorish Chief held a Council of War, and summoned his Generals to his Pavilion, few obeyed the invitation; and when he inquired for the remainder by name, he was answered that they were either slain or disabled by wounds. His loss was far too great to be dissembled, his surviving forces were too scanty to renew battle on the morrow, and he gave orders for speedy and immediate retreat.

So great a triumph of the Christian arms could scarcely fail to generate a Prodigy; but that which Mariana has chosen but little ennobles the victory. "The same day that the Battle was fought," says the credulous or crafty Historian, "one in the habit of a fisherman was seen at Cordova on the bank of the River Guadalquivir, singing in Arabic and Spanish metre,

'At Calat Anasor, at Calat Anasor Almanzor lost his drum!'

It was believed the Devil in Human shape proclaimed the defeat, because the People of Cordova endeavouring to lay hold of him, he vanished like a shadow." Almanzor, defeated and humiliated, abandoned him to despair, refused to allow his wounds to be dressed, and, unable to mount a horse, was conveyed in a litter to Wolorari on the frontiers of Castile. There, heart-broken, and, as it is said, rejecting sustenance,† he expired in the arms of his son Abdalmalech, in the sixty-fifth year of his age. A Moorish tradition records that during his first victorious incursion into Galicia, when he returned to his tent after every battle, he shook the dust from his armour into a chest. That chest accompanied him in each of his fifty-two triumphant expeditions; and its accumulation, the testimony of his glory, was now heaped into his coffin. He was buried in his arms, at Medina Cæli, where his tomb still exists; and the Khalif's mother Sobeiha soon followed to the grave the great and faithful servant who, during five and twenty years, had supported and ennobled the sway of the most imbecile of the Sovereigns of Cordova.

With Almanzor terminated the glory of the Khalifat; for notwithstanding the vaunt of the Arabians that during the six years of Abdalmalech's administration he was no less successful than his Father, it is plain that the germs of Civil dissension, soon about to prove fatal to the Omniad dynasty, were already fast ripening. His second brother, Abdalrahman, who took up the reins of power on his death, was less politic than his distinguished predecessors; and not content with that virtual sway which they wisely preferred to nominal Sovereignty, he prevailed upon the weak Hixem to declare him his successor. A great grandson of the illustrious Anasir was still living in the person of Mohammed Almahadi; who naturally jealous of this invasion of his family rights, raised partisans among the more distant relatives of the Khalif, and the numerous discontented Moors who regarded with disgust the now hereditary aggrandizement of the Almahadis.* Thus supported he surprised Cordova, defeated Abdalrahman, and condemned him to the cruel and ignominious punishment of the Cross. The very error, however, which had occasioned his rival's destruction was to prove fatal to Mohammed himself. Dazzled by his near approach to the Throne, and coveting its immediate possession, he was less scrupulous than Abdalrahman had been of the means by which that consummation was to be obtained; and but for the wise and faithful interference of Wadhah, the Chamberlain of Hixem, Mohammed was already prepared to imbrue his hands in the blood of the feeble and unsuspecting Prince. Wadhah forcibly represented that a crime so heinous was altogether unnecessary; that it would be enough to seclude the Khalif in some well-guarded secret spot, and to propagate a report of his natural death. Hixem accordingly was privately removed; an individual somewhat resembling him in person was conveyed to the Palace by night, stifled, and placed in the Royal Couch; rumours of Hixem's increasing illness were spread abroad; and when the chief officers of State, in compliance as was supposed with the dying Khalif's instructions, had acknowledged Mohammed his heir, the decease of the Monarch was publicly announced.

The usurpation was but of short continuance; some tyrannical acts of Mohammed gave birth to a conspiracy which soon found a leader in Suleiman, Commander of the African Guards, whom the new Khalif had disbanded. But we need not trace too minutely these convulsions of the expiring Kingdom. Suleiman allied himself with the Spanish Princes, and Navarre, Castile, and Leon are said to have furnished troops which he led to victory at Quintos. Nor was Mohammed without his Christian supporters also. It is not easy to determine why the Spaniards should be more disgraced by enrolling under his banners than under those of his rival; for a similar motive, that of gain, probably operated in each case. Nevertheless, the offer of Mohammed, accepted by Raymond Count of Barcelona, is condemned as shameful by De Mariès;‡ and although it by no means appears that so unseemly a spectacle was presented as the conflict of Christian Warriors armed against each other in the opposite armies of Unbelievers, Mariana seems to consider the death of three Bishops slain on the field of Acaballbacar, among Mohammed's Catalonian auxiliaries, but a just retribution for their profane warfare.‡ This victory for a while restored Mohammed to his throne, but a third battle

* Anasor was the family name of Almanzor; hence his kinsmen and adherents were termed Almahadis.

† ii. 72. Yet within half a dozen pages the same Writer informs us that, on Mohammed's final defeat, the fanatical Arabians avowed that God abandoned him on account of his alliance with Infidels. How true is Schiller's remark, Nach dem allgemeinen Wahn jener Zeiten stand jedes Volk unter dem Schutz einer besondern Nationalgöttheit; und es schmeichelte dem Nationalstolz, dass Göttheit über die Güter aller andern Völker zu setzen.

‡ viii. 7. Acaballbacar is placed by De Mariès ten leagues North of Cordova. He adds, that in consequence of the rival Princes having by turns employed Christians in their armies, the year in which this battle was fought was computed by them from the Era of Christ, not from that of the Hegira.

Spain.
From
A. D.
976. to
A. D.
1109

is crucified.
A. D.
1005.

Usurpation of Mohammed Almahadi.
A. D.
1009.

Struggle between Mohammed and Suleiman.

History. wholly changed the fortunes of the competitors. Mohammed escaping almost alone after total defeat, took refuge in Cordova, and prepared for a siege. The toils and privations consequent upon this design excited bitter murmurs among the Citizens, and Wadha, profiting by a moment which appeared favourable to the restoration of that ancient Master whose interests he had never ceased to cherish, drew Hixem from his concealment, and exhibited in the Royal seat of the chief Mosque a Prince whom his astonished subjects had long numbered with the dead. The effect was most striking and instantaneous. The Khalif, recalled to new existence, was borne on the shoulders of the enthusiastic citizens to his Palace, and seated once more upon his throne; and Mohammed dragged to its steps from some hiding place in which he had ineffectually sought protection, received sentence of death, which was executed on the spot.*

Death of Mohammed.

Famine and Pestilence succeeded the horrors of Civil War; the clamours of the Populace, as is usual, found an object upon which they might be vented in their Governor; and one of the first acts of Hixem, hitherto unused to act at all, was to throw the head of his restorer Wadha, as a Peace-offering to the rabble of Cordova. It is not improbable that Suleiman shared in the intrigue which occasioned the downfall of this Minister; certain it is that not long after his death he approached the Capital in great force, fought in its streets till they were clogged with dead, and when the troops of the Khalif gave way, delivered the City to his infuriated soldiery for three days' pillage and massacre. The fate of Hixem is unknown; and it remains doubtful whether he perished obscurely amid the general carnage; whether he was imprisoned by Suleiman till an alarm of insurrection rendered it dangerous to permit his longer existence; or whether, as Mariana thinks,† he escaped to Saragossa, and passed the remainder of his days in privacy.

Victory of Suleiman. A. D. 1012, and second deposition of Hixem.

These Revolutions shook the Khalifate of Spain to its foundation; Cordova no longer maintained her supremacy, nor was the jealousy between the rival Tribes of Africa and of Andalusia as heretofore the only cause of intestine distraction. Every petty Chief in every City in the Moorish dominions asserted independence, and keenly vigilant of his own self-created authority neglected or sought to overthrow that of the general Sovereign. Had the Christians known their season, and in what manner its advantages might be employed, the Arabian domination would now have terminated. For ever in the field, Suleiman maintained himself during four years on his ill-established throne, and perished in Overthrow and death of Suleiman. A. D. 1016

* Oheydalla, or Abdalla, a son of Mohammed Almehadi, during these transactions declared himself King of Toledo. He is said to have obtained from Alfonso V. King of Leon, the hand of his sister Theresa; and 'on the wedding night when he refused to accept Baptism the reluctant Bride invoked upon him the vengeance of Heaven. A strange malady fell upon Oheydalla in consequence of this appeal; and well knowing its origin, he sent back Donna Theresa to her Brother, with costly presents. The Lady died as a Nun in the Monastery of St. Pelagius at Leon; her story is told by Mariana, (viii. 8.) and is the subject of one of Mr. Lockhart's Ballads. Oheydalla was captured by Wadha, and beheaded after the restoration of Hixem.

† viii. 8. Mariana, however, expresses a doubt whether this was the same Hixem or another of like name, the last Khalif of the race of the Omeyyads. During the anarchy which succeeded the fall of that dynasty, the reappearance of Hixem was on one occasion falsely announced as a political stratagem. De Maris, ii. 147. Ferreras, tom. iii. p. 138. says that after the capture of Cordova Hixem escaped to Africa, where he died.

the end, after a hard fought battle, by the sword of the executioner. His destroyer, Ali, had taken arms in the name of Hixem, a belief in whose reappearance, like that of our own Arthur or of the Portuguese Sebastian, was long fondly cherished; and when all inquiry after the rightful Prince had failed, the Crown was seized, as was but natural, by the most recent conqueror. But we gladly listen over the obscure, monotonous, and sanguinary annals of the few following years, all stained alike with blood and treachery in quarrels between Chiefs who coveted a diadem even for an hour, and all tending to the final extinction of the Omeyyads. A second Hixem (in whom terminated the dynasty of that illustrious race which had swayed the sceptre of Moorish Spain for nearly three Centuries) was dragged from his beloved privacy, and soon compelled, not unwillingly, once more to return to it, by the discontent of a People unworthy of his rule. It was then that one Omeyyada more was still found, who expressed wishes for a Crown, long placed upon the brows of its possessor but as the symbol of approaching death, like the gilded ornament between the horns of the victim led out to sacrifice. "Seat me but for this day upon the throne, and to-morrow I will meet my fate without repining," was the blind request of the deluded youth! Even to entertain such a desire was perilous; his Family had been proscribed, and scarcely had he given utterance to the promptings of his hope, before he disappeared.

Moslem Spain at this epoch presented a rabble of petty Kings; no less than eleven Cities* maintained their separate Princes; and numerous other districts formed themselves into States unconnected with their once powerful Metropolis. Among the Christians, Leon, which had surrendered to the victorious arms of Almansor, was now restored to its former masters, reinstated in its rights as a Capital, and repossessed of its holy treasure of deceased Saints and Monarchs. Its late King, Alfonso V., after a peaceful reign dedicated to the improvement of his People, had been killed before a fortress in Portugal; and his successor Bermudo appeared well inclined to cultivate his Father's policy. An unexpected event for a while disturbed his intention. Garcia of Castile, already betrothed to his sister, was treacherously assassinated while proceeding to celebrate his nuptials; and the inheritance of his extensive dominions devolved upon his brother-in-law, Sancho King of Navarre and Aragon; whose ample possessions, no less than his distinguished qualities, had already won for him the merited title of the Great. Jealousy of this largely increased power, and some apprehension, perhaps, for the safety of his own Kingdom, which since he was without issue must fall to his sister on his decease, precipitated Bermudo into a War with Navarre. In that contest Sancho was eminently successful, and it terminated in additional prospective advantage to his Family, by the marriage of his second son Ferdinand with the heiress of Leon.

Sancho the Great is said to have affected a title unknown to the Goths in their season of loftiest preeminence; but the dominions which this Emperor of Spain had concentrated under a single hand, were again to be

* The survey of Spain taken at this point by De Maris is clear and distinct. ii. p. 135—144. The Moslem Kings were those of Saragossa, Huesca, Valencia, Toledo, Seville, Badajoz, Grenada, Algeiras, Almeria, Denia, and Carmona. Gibraltar, Huelva, Niebla, Ocenobla, (near Faro), Lerida, Tudela, and Tortosa declared themselves independent.

History. spread abroad at his death, by an unwise partition. He was assassinated while on a Pilgrimage to Oviedo; and of his four sons, Garcia became King of Navarre; Ferdinand had already received Castile, erected for him into a Kingdom; and Gonzalo during three years wore the crown of Sobrerra, till at his death it merged in that of Aragon, the portion of the illegitimate Ramiro.* Dissension, as may be anticipated, was the speedy result of this divided power. Ramiro first took arms against his brother Garcia; and not long afterwards Bermudo of Leon, dissatisfied with the arrangement which had prepared a successor to that Throne in his Brother-in-law Ferdinand, projected his entire overthrow. The childless Monarch paid dearly for this selfish and personal ambition. In a bloody engagement near Lantada on the banks of the Carion, willing to terminate the conflict by singling out King Ferdinand, he broke into his enemy's ranks, and received a mortal wound. The consequent annexation of Leon to Castile, rendered Ferdinand the most powerful Sovereign in Spain; and believing, as we are told, that "nothing could gain him more reputation among his People, or be more pleasing to God, than to make war upon the Moors," he employed his great resources in piously desolating the territory of the Unbelievers. Having swept the whole of Estremadura between the Tagus and the Guadiana and skirting the Douro, he advanced beyond the borders, "wasting all the country about Merida and Badajos without sparing any thing that came in his way, but driving a vast number of cattle and prisoners." Such, without needless and painful repetition, may be accepted as a general picture of the exterminating conquests extended over Arabian Spain, which won for Ferdinand the ambiguous title of the Great; and so far terrified the Infidels, that the Kings of Toledo, of Saragossa, of Portugal, and of Seville, consented to pay him tribute, "to the great honour of the Christians, and the shame of the Moors, who were now subject to those they had not long before lorded it over. These were special blessings of God for the good lives the Christians then led, following the example of their King; whereby many Moors were converted, and the Bodies of Saints held even by them in great veneration."†

It was not only against the Moors, however, that the sword of Ferdinand was drawn triumphantly; it prevailed also in a contest which Religion must have dis-

* Mariana (viii. ult.) relates a story of Ramiro, which even he admits to near the air of Romance. Garcia and Ferdinand falsely accused their mother of adultery, and the stake would have been her lot but for the successful championship of Ramiro. It is to this incident that some authorities ascribe Ramiro's possession of the Crown of Aragon, but it is far more probable that he derived it from Sancho's Will. Ferreras (tom. iii. 171.) treats the story as an idle fable.

† Mariana, ix. 2. Ferreras relates an amusing Legend which proves how greatly King Ferdinand was abetted by Saint Jago in these conquests. "A Greek Bishop, on a pilgrimage to the Tomb of the Apostle, during the siege of Coimbra, was much scandalized at often hearing the Saint, whom he knew to be no other than a poor fisherman, invoked as a brave soldier and a gallant knight. One evening as he was praying at the Tomb, the Saint appearing to him with some keys in his hands, addressed him as follows: "You treat as ignorant persons those who invoke me as a knight and soldier, but undecieve yourself, and credit that I am so. To-day I am going to Coimbra, and to-morrow at the hour of Three I will deliver that City into the hands of King Ferdinand." At the same moment the church-gate flew open, a sword magnificently caparisoned and glittering with a blaze of light was seen in waiting, the Saint sprang upon its back and galloped off, and the news of the surrender of Coimbra arrived according to his prediction. (Tom. iii. p. 184.)

avowed; and after long bickerings and more than one act of perfidy and injustice on either side, Garcia of Navarre lost both his life and his dominions in battle against his brother. Even in his old age the martial spirit of the Conqueror was rekindled; and when the Moors struggled against his yoke, although his revenues were exhausted, and his subjects wasted by heavy taxes, Ferdinand accepted the money, plate, and jewels which his Queen Sancho contributed to the charges of war, and took the field to emulate the victories of his youth. At his death, a fresh partition scattered piteous seeds of future intestine war. He bequeathed among his sons, Castile to Sancho II.; Leon to Alfonso VI.; Galicia and the conquered districts of Portugal to Garcia; Zamora to one of his daughters Urraca; Toro to the other, Elvira.* The reign of Sancho was one perpetual warfare with his brothers, equally ambitious and equally powerful with himself. His first efforts were directed against Alfonso, and sometimes victor, sometimes vanquished, Sancho at length stripped him of his dominions in a decisive battle: in which his success was mainly owing to a Hero distinguished alike in History and in Romance, the very Proverb and household word of Spanish Chivalry, Don Rodrigo Diaz de Bivar.† It is by no means easy to separate Truth from Fable in the countless adventures recorded of this greatest man of his times; and indeed if it were so, the main outline of his story has become so familiar to the mind, by the bold and spirited sketches in National ballads, and the more finished, but less deeply interesting pictures completed from them in the Modern Drama, that the task would be both ungrateful and unprofitable. The birth of Rodrigo took place at Burgos in the year 1026; his lineage was among the most noble in Castile, that of Layn Calvo §. While still a youth, he avenged an insult offered to his Father, too old for feats of arms, by challenging the aggressor, Don Gomez Earl of Gormaz, and slaying him in single combat. His marriage, at her own request, with Ximena, daughter of the Nobleman whom he had killed, so repugnant to the feelings and habits of later times, is not on that account to be hastily rejected; because if it had equally violated probability in his own days such an invention would never have been hazarded. It is moreover asserted, without any doubt or remark upon its singularity, in numerous early documents; and the tomb of the Lady has been exhibited time out of mind in the church of St. Peter at Cardena, without suspicion of its authenticity.‡ The great wealth of this Heiress, added to his own patrimony, enabled Rodrigo to maintain a force amply sufficient for private warfare against the Infidels; and indeed, before his nuptials, he had overthrown and captured five Moorish Kings in battle, and granted them freedom on condition of the payment of a yearly tribute. This

* "These cities were then called Infantadas, signifying thereby the estates left for the support of younger children." Mariana, ix. 5.

† Ruydiaz, as he is called by abbreviation, Ruy being short for Rodrigo. Campeador, which is sometimes attached to his name, according to Sanchoval's very probable explanation, means the Camp-marshal, the officer whose duty it was to select proper sites for encampment.

‡ Il y a peu de Monumens sur lesquels on puisse faire fond, touchant les exploits de cet, et il n'est pas facile de distinguer le vrai du faux dans sa Chronique fabuleuse. Ferreras, tom. iii. p. 228.

§ When Ordoño II. treacherously cut off the Earl of Castile about a century before, Layn Calvo was one of the two Judges who administered the government of his Country then left without a head.

¶ Southey's Chronicle of the Cid, p. 6. note.

History.

From
A. D.
976. to
A. D.
1109.

Alfonso takes refuge with the King of Toledo.

A. D.
1071.

Sancho overthrows his brother Garcia.

Besieges Zamora, and is assassinated.

A. D.
1072.

Alfonso VI.

tribute was on one occasion discharged while Rodrigo was present in the train of King Ferdinand at Zamora; and the Moslem envoys on presenting it, addressed Ruy Diaz as *Cid or Lord. The King of Castile inquired the particulars of the adventure from which so much honour was derived; and he was so delighted by the prowess of his Knight, that he confirmed him in the possession of that title by which he is best known to posterity.

Alfonso, taken prisoner after his late defeat, was secluded in the Monastery of Sahagun; but ere long finding means of escape, he threw himself on the protection of Ali maymon King of Toledo,† by whom he was generously entertained. Not content with this acquisition of Leon, Sancho next attempted Galicia; and in spite of the assistance which Garcia derived from Portugal, he was defeated, taken prisoner, and languished till his death, during the successive reign of each of his brothers, in seventeen years' captivity;‡ The whole of the late King Ferdinand's dominions, except the two Cities bequeathed as a provision for his daughters, was now united under the ambitious Sancho; and he turned his arms in the next instance against Toro, which he captured,§ and afterwards against his sister Urraca's portion, Zamora. The siege had lingered on during many months, for the walls were strong, the garrison was brave, and the town well stored; when a traitor, under pretext of showing an unguarded postern, enticed Sancho without followers to a remote spot, and there, striking him a mortal wound, escaped within the City.

Tidings of his brother's assassination were speedily conveyed to Alfonso in Toledo; and the Moorish King, gratified by the frankness with which his guest revealed to him the posture of affairs in Christian Spain, freely permitted his departure, and furnished money for his present necessities.¶ The first care of Alfonso was to secure the person of his brother Garcia, and then assembling the Nobility of Castile, he demanded their allegiance. The Cortes, in a preliminary debate among themselves, hesitated on one point only; was he pure from his brother's blood? Would he swear that he did not participate in the murder? But who, it was also asked, would have the daring to propose or to administer such an oath as this to his future King? To the honour of Castile an instrument was not wanting for this noble purpose. The Cid, when the late King notified his intention of attacking Zamora, had fearlessly remonstrated against the justice of that spoliation, refused cooperation, and quitted his Sovereign's Camp; and he now with equal high-mindedness demanded that test from Alfonso which his peers wished, but feared to require. The suspicion of the Nobles was not without grounds; Urraca, deeply wronged, is said to have avowed her determination of bloody revenge; she permitted the assassin to escape, when within her power; and she was most affectionately and confidentially attached to Alfonso, whose peaceable accession was secured chiefly through her assiduity for his interests. In Sancho's Epitaph she is openly accused of his murder; and the belief in her guilt endured in Spain through many Centuries; for so late as the reign of Philip II. a place of penance was shown in the Cloisters at Bamba, said to have been erected and frequented by Urraca in atonement for her fratricide. Alfonso, therefore, most probably was acquainted with, if not accessory to, the murder. According to the legal custom, the Cid tendered the oath upon the Gospels, thrice successively to the King and twelve chosen followers; and each time as Alfonso repeated the expurgatory words, his colour changed. It might be either consciousness of guilt or offended pride which produced that emotion; but assuredly from that same hour there was no love in the King's heart towards Don Rodrigo de Bivar.*

In the second year of his reign, Alfonso testified his gratitude to Ali maymon by personally aiding him with a large auxiliary force against the rival King of Cordova. While the Moorish and Castilian Monarchs were on one occasion seated at table in the pavilion of the latter, Ali maymon observed with consternation that on a signal from his host he was surrounded by five hundred armed knights; and at the same moment Alfonso demanded release from the solemn oath of amity to which he had pledged himself during his exile. The Moor, in his necessity, consented; and then Alfonso, calling for the Gospels, renewed his former oath that he would injure neither Ali maymon nor his sons. "This vow," he said, "once made under compulsion, might have been legitimately broken; I now make it of free will, and it must be religiously observed."†

The Cid meantime continued his incursions upon the Basins Moors, and captured many strong castles and much rich booty. On one occasion, the chance of war led him to ravage part of the Kingdom of Toledo, and Alfonso gladly took advantage of the outcry raised against this violation of a friendly territory, to gratify the resentment which he had long dissembled. His anger was sedu-

* Cid, or rather Sid, an abbreviation of the Arabic Sagid, Lord, Ruler.

† The Moorish Chroniclers name this Prince Aben Dylunus.

§ Garcia committed suicide, he opened his veins and suffered himself to bleed to death. Mariana, ix. 8. Ferreras passes this fact in silence, and probably, therefore, disbelieves it; but he states that Garcia was interred with great pomp in the Royal vault at Leon, and that by his own desire his letters were buried with him. (iii. 271.)

§ Ferreras, tom iii. p. 230.

¶ Mariana, ix. 7. De Marés, ii. 188. According to the account of Archbishop Rodrigo, vi. 20. Alfonso did not reveal the whole truth to Ali maymon; he spoke only of troubles in his own Country which required his presence; and although the Moor had heard of Sancho's death from other sources, he doubted that intelligence in consequence of Alfonso's silence. When he gave permission for departure, he assured his guest that any attempt at secret escape must have proved fatal, since all the passes were vigilantly guarded; and he besought him to renew an oath of friendship to himself and his sons; his grandsons, as Alfonso afterwards recollected to his profit, were not included in this compact. The Coronica del Cid, 67, on the other hand, relates that Ali maymon detained him day after day, on various pretexts, so that in the end Alfonso lowered himself from the walls by ropes, and escaped under the cover of night. Southey, 34. 36. We are far more willing to believe with Ferreras that an unreserved and generous confidence existed between the two Princes. History is not rich enough in such incidents, to afford the surrender of them without a struggle.

* Southey, 88, and the authorities there cited.

† Id. 92. Castile, a daughter of Ali maymon, is a Spanish Saint. Touched with pity for the Christian slaves in her father's Court, she used to carry provisions to their dungeon in a basket. The King suspected and watched her; and one day crossing her path inquired the contents of her basket. She answered unhesitatingly roses, and when her Father lifted the cover, they indeed proved to be roses. This miracle completed her conversion; and having occasion to visit Spain for the benefit of some medicinal waters, which cured a disease under which she laboured, she was baptized, and took up her residence in a Hermitage near Bilibica. Her remains after death worked so many miraculous cures, especially in cases of dysentery, that Castile was canonized, and her Feast is celebrated at Burgos and elsewhere on the 9th of April. Ferreras, (iii. 240.) who is sceptical enough regarding general Historical facts, relates this and countless other prodiges without a misgiving.

Spain.
From
A. D.
976. to
A. D.
1109.
The Cid
breaks as expurgatory oath.

Alfonso aids the King of Tolosa.

Alfonso captures the King of Toledo.

History. lously encouraged by his Courtiers, jealous of the superiority of the Cid; and the King sternly commanded Ruy Diaz to quit his dominions at the expiration of nine days; a sentence of unusual severity, since the Hidalgos claimed a right of thirty days' law previous to banishment. The achievements of the Cid during his exile would fill volumes; but the gallant bearing of his mettled steed Baviaca, and the temper of his good swords Colada and Tizona,* must be sought in his own peculiar records. It would be unjust both to the Hero and to our readers, if we were to dim the brilliancy of his great exploits by a scanty and abridged narrative.

Ali maymon and his son who had succeeded him were now dead; Alfonso was released therefore from the letter of his oath; and the misgovernment of the new King Yahia, and consequent dissensions among the Moors, afforded a favourable opportunity for the recovery of Toledo. Six years were spent in preparations, and in obtaining mastery of the adjacent Country, and when the City itself was at last invested, a mighty army of many different nations sat down under its battlements. Castile, Leon, Biscay, Galicia, and Asturias gathered under the banner of their own King, Alfonso; the Kings of Aragon and Navarre each headed his respective contingent; and France, Italy, and Germany supplied auxiliaries for this "so great and catholic a war." The Cid also, himself a host, restored to his Sovereign's favour for the occasion, mingled with the leaders. Toledo, wonderfully strong by nature, had exhausted all the military art of those times in its fortification. It is encompassed with high and craggy rocks, and the girdle of the Tagus breaking through them, surrounds the City on all sides except on the North, where a steep and difficult ascent is surmounted by a double wall. Even when the engines of the besiegers had effected more than a single breach, the ruggedness of the scarped height, the loftiness of the houses, the narrowness and sinuosity of the streets, and above all the numbers and bravery of the garrison, appeared to forbid any hope from assault. If provisions became scarce within the walls, they were equally so without; the heats of approaching Summer generated disease in the army; and there were those in it who thought the enterprise must be abandoned, when St. Isidore appeared to the Bishop of Leon, and announced the joyful tidings of surrender if they would tarry only fifteen days longer.† His prediction was verified: the Moorish populace, jaded by toil and privation, exhibited symptoms of mutiny; all hope of relief was abandoned; and the King, having in vain attempted to appease the clamour of his subjects, reluctantly acceded to a capitulation. Thus after a possession of three hundred and sixty-nine years by the Arabians, did this powerful City, the ancient Capital of the Goths, revert to the descendants of its former masters.‡

* Baviaca, says Mr. Southey, "is an old and obsolete word of contempt; lubber would perhaps represent it." The Cid, it seems, required a heavy and powerful horse. Colada may be rendered Scrubber; Tizona, Fire-axe.

† Mariana, ix. 9.

‡ The Chronicle of the Cid records that while Alfonso was in exile at Toledo, one day as he was lying on a couch in the Royal Gardens, he overheard a conversation between Ali maymon and some of his Courtiers relative to the strength of the Capital. One of them observed that it was impregnable, unless the country round it should first be wasted for seven years, in which case it must be at last surrendered. As they retired, they perceived Alfonso, and when the King was troubled, the Courtiers recommended that

The ambition of the conqueror was stimulated by this great success; he spread his forces on each bank of the Tagus, and we read, among his other acquisitions, of Madrid, at that time a small fortress protecting the river Manzanarez.* It was in no small degree owing to the alliance of the Moorish King of Seville, Muhamad, that Alfonso had triumphed at Toledo, and the events which follow plainly arose out of that connection; whether we accept their immediate cause from the Arabian or from the Spanish Historians, whose accounts widely differ from each other. The Spaniards assign six wives to Alfonso, the third of whom they say was Zaida, a daughter of Muhamad, who renounced Islamism on her marriage, and was baptized either as Mary or Elizabeth.† In order to reduce the whole of Spain under the rule of himself and of his Father-in-law, it is added that Alfonso consented to the introduction of a powerful force of Africans. The Moors, on the contrary, admitting a political alliance, but denying any family connection between the Christian and Moslem Kings, attribute the invitation of foreign auxiliaries to the natural jealousy felt by Muhamad of the insatiable appetite for dominion which Alfonso exhibited after the conquest of Toledo.

About the middle of the XIth Century, a Tribe of Africans, advancing across the Western Desert from the range of Atlas, spread themselves over Mauritania, and it was not long before these Almoravides, or "Men of God," as they termed themselves, chased the native men and wild beasts from the district between the mountains and the sea; and on a spot then named Eylama, laid the foundation of Morocco. When Yusuf, one of their leaders, who partly by superior intellect and valour, partly by treachery, so often the handmaid of ambition, had elevated himself to supreme authority, undertook the subjugation of Fez, he already numbered more than one hundred thousand horsemen under his command; and new warriors, allured from beyond the Desert by the fame of his magnificence, daily increased his ranks. With feigned or real humility, he declined the proud title of Al Mumenin, tendered by his followers, and was content to bear the lower designations of Al Muslimin, Prince of the Musulmans, and Nazaradin, Defender of the Faith. Peaceably seated on the throne of a powerful Kingdom, and meditating plans of future aggrandizement, the conquest of Spain, perhaps, had been one of the dreams which floated before this aspiring spirit; when a near prospect of realizing the bright hope was afforded by an embassy from the King of Seville, denouncing the aggression of Alfonso, and the inertness and timidity of the Andalusian Princes.

A powerful fleet and army were equipped for the expedition which ensued. Whether Muhamad was at war or in league with Alfonso, we find, according to the records of both Nations, that the entire Moslem force was soon directed against the Christians. Before the hostile armies confronted each other in the plains of Zalacca, we are informed by the Arabians that Alfonso for many successive nights was harassed by fearful dreams;

he should be despatched on the spot. Ali maymon generously protested against this breach of faith; and in order to ascertain whether Alfonso had really slept or not, the Courtiers said they would observe whether he had drifted. We need not add that the sleeper awoke took good care to wet his pillow. c. 50.

* De Mariès, ii. 213. note.

† Ferreras says Mary Isabella, but that she never used the latter name. iii. 280.

Spaia.

From
A. D.
976. to
A. D.
1109

Establishment of the Almoravides in Morocco.

A. D.
1070.

A. D.
1085.

Yusuf invades Spain.

History.

From
A. D.
976. to
A. D.
1109.

he seemed mounted on an elephant, and a huge drum suspended at his side distracted him by its thunder. The Monks assured him that he might depend on victory; the elephant which he bestrode was, as they said, the vanquished Yusuf; the echo of the drum the celebrity of Alfonso's triumph. In spite of this favourable interpretation, the King, overcome by gloomy forebodings, resorted to a Moslem Fakir of great repute in Oneirocritics. "Behold," said that holy man, "the certain tokens of defeat. When the King of Ethiopia, heading a mighty host, marched against the Arabians to overthrow the Temple of the Eternal, he rode upon an Elephant, and Alla rained fire from Heaven, which consumed his army, as it is written in the Koran; 'Hast thou not seen how thy Lord dealt with the masters of the Elephant? Did he not make their treacherous design an occasion of drawing them into error?' As to the drum, it signifies that the day on which its sound shall be heard will be a day of death and desolation to the Gisors." The Musulman made the shrewder conjecture of the two, for Alfonso was defeated with great slaughter.

Defeat of Alfonso
at Zalaca.
A. D.
1086.

Origin of the Kingdom of Portugal.

Trembling for his Kingdom after this disaster which endangered all Christian Spain, Alfonso sought assistance from Philip I. of France, a near relative of his Queen; and many brave Knights were despatched to his succour. Among them were Raymond Count of Toulouse, his namesake the Count of Burgundy, and a kinsman of the latter, Henry of Lorraine. The services of these Nobles were honourably rewarded, and each received the hand of a daughter of Alfonso. To Henry of Lorraine was assigned as a marriage portion with the illegitimate Theresa, all that district of Portugal which had been conquered from the Moors; and this Country, under his son, was erected into a Kingdom, which remained in his line during the long period of four Centuries. Yusuf, meantime, too powerful to apprehend any immediate renewal of hostilities from the Christians, matured his plan for supremacy over the Kings of Andalusia. He had been more than once recalled to Africa, and it was not until his third visit to Spain that he was sufficiently prepared to abandon his mask altogether, and to show that he came no longer as an ally but as a master. Mutual jealousy had long severed all bond of union among the Moorish Princes;

* Al Koran, ch. cv. which continues, "and send against them flocks of birds which cast down upon them stones of alk clay, and render them like the leaves of corn eaten by cattle." The following is the incident to which this passage relates. Abresham, King of Yaman, an Ethiopian by birth, and a Christian, built a magnificent Church at Ansis, in the hope of rendering it a more attractive spot of pilgrimage than the Caaba. The Korish, malignant at his success, defiled the Church by night, and Abraham in revenge vowed to destroy the Temple of Mecca. In the army which he led out for that purpose were several elephants, borrowed from the King of Ethiopia; and that upon which Abraham himself was mounted, when approaching the Holy City, refused to advance, and kneeled down whenever the guides forced him towards its gates, although he moved briskly enough if they turned his face in another direction. At the same time a large flock of birds came up from the coast, each bearing three stones, (one in either talon, one in the bill), and dropped them separately with certain death upon the heads of the invaders. Sable labours hard to establish "that there was really something extraordinary in the matter;" forgetting that he thus retracts upon his own head a charge of partiality, perhaps not unjustly, adduced by him against Dean Prideaux; who rejects this miracle, and yet gives more credit than they deserve to the marvels related of the attack of Brennus on Delphi, and the mortal wound received by Cambyse in the very same part of the body in which himself had struck the sacred Apis of the Egyptians.

and one by one they fell an easy prey to their oppressor. Muhammad, who too late discovered his error in having forged his own chains, too late also sought to redeem himself by an alliance with Alfonso. The confederates were defeated, the Christians after severe loss made good their retreat, but the army of the King of Seville was annihilated. The Almoravides soon afterwards entered his Capital, and Muhammad was transported to Africa, where he lingered four years in captivity till death terminated his sorrows.

A general opinion is said to have prevailed in Andalusia, that the fulness of time had arrived for their Princes, and that henceforward the dynasty was to be swayed by a single African hand. The Astrologers, who accommodated present events to ancient obscure predictions, gave birth to or encouraged this belief; and never was there a fancy more likely to produce its own verification. Before the close of the year 1094, each of the petty Kingdoms which had maintained a stormy independence since the overthrow of the Omniads, with one exception, submitted to Yusuf, Saragossa enjoyed a mild and humanized government, and its resistance, if attacked, was likely therefore to be obdurate. The Conqueror accordingly listened to representations, true in themselves, that its territory afforded the surest barrier between his own dominions and those of the Christians; and willing both to spare himself a doubtful contest, and to leave the frontier to the defence of another, he concluded an alliance instead of insisting upon submission. The first fruits produced by this amicable understanding were the repulse and death of Sancho II. of Aragon, who had long spread terror through the Kingdom of Saragossa; the Almoravides uniting their arms with those of the native Prince chased this invader from all his conquests, and saw him receive a mortal wound by an arrow from the battlements of Huesca.

Valencia had been betrayed two years before by the Cadi to whom its temporary administration had fallen after the death of its King in battle. The Cid, still exiled, chose it as the scene of new and extraordinary exploits, reduced it by famine after a long siege; maintained it in spite of powerful attacks till his death; and then bequeathed its defence to his noble-minded widow Ximena. Twelve days did that Lady sustain the assaults of the Moorish Buear and his train of six and thirty Kings, before the preparations were completed for fulfilling the dying injunctions of her Lord. Soon after midnight on the thirteenth morning, one part of the garrison escorting Ximena, the whole of their stores and treasure, and a burden more precious than all, the remains of their beloved master, slowly and silently quitted the gates of Valencia, and proceeded on the road towards Castile. At daybreak another division of the Spaniards fell upon the Moorish Camp, and by dint of surprise, of valour, and of prodigies, chased King Buear and his host into the sea, so that all those who were fortunate enough to gain their ships, "hoisted sails and went their way and never turned their heads." Were it not that the little handful of Christians led by Alvar Paez in that engagement seemed to the Moors "full seventy thousand Knights all as white as snow; and before them a Knight of great stature upon a white horse with a bloody cross, who bore in one hand a white banner, and in the other a sword which seemed to be of fire, and he made a great mortality among the Moors which were flying"—if it were not for this most impudent miracle,

Spain
Fue
A. D.
976. to
A. D.
1109.
Fall of Muhammad
A. D.
1091.

Alliance between Yusuf and the King of Saragossa.
A. D.
1091.

Death of Sancho II. of Aragon
A. D.
1094.

Death of the Cid
May 15.
1099.

History. we would endeavour not to refuse belief to the assertion of the Chroniclers, that of the Infidels "more than 10,000 died in the water, and of the six and thirty Kings, twenty and two were slain."^{*}

Valencia, as may be supposed, was soon occupied by the Almoravides after this victorious abandonment. Alfonso in vain attempted its recovery, and the force despatched for that purpose was completely routed. Yusuf established his Court at Cordova, not so much from a desire to restore supremacy to that ancient Capital, as to gratify the wishes of a larger population than he found elsewhere. Having approached his hundredth year, and secured his throne to Ali, (his younger son, but the one whom he deemed most worthy of sovereign power,) he peaceably closed a life of unusual extent and glory, a few days after his return to Morocco. Alfonso survived him but a short time, too long, however, for his happiness. The new Moorish King, ardent with youth and the recent attainment of power, speedily made preparations for war, and Alfonso's first loss, while guarding against these hostile menaces, was that of one of his best Captains, his son-in-law, Raymond of Burgundy. One son had been born to the old age of the King of Castile, and Prince Sancho, in his eleventh year, was now to enter upon his maiden campaign. His Governor, Don Garcia de Cabres, accompanied him to the field; and so brilliant was the company of Nobles, so strong, numerous, and well-appointed the host of their retainers arrayed under the banners of the Heir of Castile, that the Almoravides distrusted the issue of a battle and meditated retreat. The proposition was overruled, the armies engaged near the Castle of Uclés, and victory was long doubtful. At length the Moorish cavalry by a desperate charge penetrated to the centre of the Christian line; the young Prince spurred into the melee animating his followers by a war-shout, when, unhappily, his horse stumbled, and ere he could rise, himself and Don Garcia, who attempted to cover him with his own body, were pierced by a thousand swords. The remainder of the battle was a massacre, and the flower of the Spanish Nobles and twenty thousand of their vassals fell in the pursuit. Notwithstanding the severity of this disaster, the acuteness of his sorrow, and the infirmity of his advanced years, Alfonso retained sufficient energy to protect Toledo, now threatened by the conquerors, and they turned aside Eastward. His next care was an adjustment of the vacant succession; and having fixed it on his daughter Urraca, (married after the death of Raymond of Burgundy to Alfonso King of Aragon,) with reversion on her demise to Don Alfonso Raymond, a son by her first husband,[†] he expired at Toledo after a reign of forty-three years, in which he had earned the distinguished Historical memorial, that he was "modest in prosperity and undaunted in adversity."[‡]

Spain.
From
A. D.
976. to
A. D.
1109.
Battle of Uclés.
May 29.
A. D.
1108.
Death of Prince Sancho of Castile.

Death of Alfonso VI.
July 1.
A. D.
1109.

^{*} Chron. del Cid, c. 284. Chr. Gen. ff. 308, cited by Southey 338. from whom we have borrowed the citations in the text. The striking description of the Cid's funeral cortege is too long for our brief summary, and it would be unjust to deprive it of one drop of that richunction which Mr. Southey has bestowed upon it. The body is said to have been embalmed, clad in armour of painted hose and pasteboard, with Tizona in the right hand, and then mounted on Baveca. Those who remember the scarcely less singular account of the treatment of the remains of Don John of Austria, as recorded by Strada, (De Bello Belgico, x. ad fin.) will see little cause for regretting this history of the Cid's funeral because it differs from modern habits.

^{*} Galicia, according to Fernas, (iii. 307,) was left in the first instance to Alfonso Raymond; so that Leon and Castile formed Urraca's portion.

[†] Mariana, x. 4. Both the order of events and their dates in the period of Spanish History treated in the above Chapter are frequently confused, and differ widely in different authorities. For the most part we have abided by De Marâs, whose narrative has the merit of consistency. In the date of the extinction of the Omeyyades, however, since, without assigning any reason, he has anticipated all other authorities with which we have met by seven years, placing it in 1031 instead of 1038, we have been guided by the general voice.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXX.

ANNALS OF THE GREEK EMPIRE DURING THE IXth, Xth, AND XIth CENTURIES: OF THE KHALIFATE FROM THE RISE OF THE ABASSIDES TO THE END OF THE XIth CENTURY.

FROM A. D. {802.} TO A. D. 1081.

History. As Nicephorus was the first Sovereign of Constantinople who recognised the revival of the Western Empire by Charlemagne, his accession, in A. D. 802, has been generally considered by Historians as an epoch from which they might change the denomination of Roman for the more appropriate and perspicuous title of the Byzantine or Lower Empire. Contemporary writers exhaust the language of invective in describing the character and conduct of the unlucky Nicephorus; yet as the vices charged against him are set forth far more strongly in the declamations of the Byzantine Chroniclers than in the tenour of his actions, perhaps much of the hideousness of the portrait should be attributed to the invention of those writers, who detested him as an Iconoclast, and regarded his toleration of the Paulicians a sufficient ground for stigmatizing him as a Manichean.* He is charged with ingratitude to Irene, whose favour raised him to that power which he exerted for her ruin; yet the enormity of her guilt would have rendered any indulgence towards her in some degree a participation in it; and in executing the punishment demanded by the public voice, he restricted his sentence to banishment to the Island of Lesbos, where in declining years the labour of her own hands supplied her with means of support.† Avarice, the besetting sin of Nicephorus, induced him to deny the exiled Empress an adequate allowance; and actuated by the same passion, he wrung money from all classes of his people by vexatious inquisitions. He withheld also from his troops the necessary arms and equipments, and was thus himself principally conducive to the disasters of his military enterprises.‡ Yet at few periods did the Byzantine Empire more need the guidance of a firm and prudent ruler. To the West lay the mighty Monarchy of Charlemagne; to the East the Asiatic Khalifate, then in the meridian of its glory and strength, and ruled by the renowned Haroun Al

Raschid, whose power and talents were rendered more formidable by his haughty and martial disposition. Cautious negotiation conciliated the friendship or forbearance of Charlemagne;* but the furious hostility of the Khalif was provoked by a rash defiance. Our narrative of the War which resulted must be prefaced by a concise retrospect of the History of the Khalifate subsequent to the rise of the Abbasside dynasty.

Saffah, the first of the line of thirty-seven Abbassides who held the Khalifate during five hundred and twenty-four years,† claimed that dignity as the descendant of Abbas, the uncle of the Prophet.‡ He owed his elevation to the exertions of his uncle Abdallah, and to the zeal and talents of Abou Moslem, who possessed one of those commanding intellects which appear destined by Providence to confer superiority on any cause which it may espouse. Originally the slave of Ibrahim, uncle to Saffah,§ he had been commissioned to promote among the Khorassanites the cause of the Abbassides, both by preaching and by arms; and having levied a considerable body of that warlike race, he defeated the Ommiadan General, and escorting Saffah to Coufah, there proclaimed him Khalif. The battle of the Zab decided the contest between the rival Families.|| Merouan, the Ommiadan Khalif, was there defeated, and having loaded four thousand camels with his treasures at Haran, fled to Egypt. Thither he was hotly pursued, and when overtaken at Busir on the confines of Nubia, his head was cut off, and his tongue torn out and thrown in scorn to be devoured by a cat.¶ Saffah, although naturally humane, in the exultation of victory gave an instance of frightful cruelty. He caused seventy of the Ommiades to be slaughtered in his presence, and as they lay struggling in the pangs of death, he ordered carpets to be thrown over them, on which he and his followers took their seats and feasted, regardless of the groans of the wretches beneath. The victorious dynasty chose black as the distinguishing colour of their dresses and ensigns. Saffah died A. D. 754, and was succeeded by his brother Mansur.

* Cedren. 480. Baron. Annal. A. D. 810. iii. Baronius loses all patience with this many-headed monster. Tot habuit capita cornuta monstrum unum, quorum singula duri infestant Ecclesiam, he observes, in allusion to the various ways in which he levied exactions on the Ecclesiastics.

† Cedren. 475. Zonar. ii. 122. Gibbon remarks, ix. 34. that Irene's treatment of her son Constantine, "may not easily be paralleled in the history of crimes;" the Image-worshippers of Constantinople, however, regarded her as a Saint, and celebrated her anniversary. Pagi, critica in Baron. ad ann. 803. l.

‡ Cedren. 481.

* Baron. ad ann. 803. cum Pagi crit.

† Till A. D. 1256, when Mostasssen, the last Khalif, was put to death by the Mongol Hologu. D'Herbelot, in ev. Abbas-Abbassides.

‡ D'Herbelot, in ev. Abbas-Abbassides.

§ Fundgruben des Orients, v. 28.

|| D'Herbelot, in v. Marwan.

¶ Fundgr. v. 35.

 Ibid. v. 39.

The title of this Khalif was disputed by his uncle Abdallah, who, however, was defeated and made prisoner by Abou Moslem in a battle at Nisibis. Mansor confined him in a prison, the walls of which had been built on masses of rock-salt; and when this frail foundation was melted by water secretly directed against it, the captive was crushed beneath the ruins.* The unbending and haughty spirit of Abou Moslem was ill calculated to soothe the jealousy felt by the Khalif at the influence which he had acquired, and as he had now ceased to be necessary, Mansor, with the usual ingratitude of despots, caused him to be assassinated.† This Khalif possessed in a high degree the qualities calculated to confirm and consolidate the power of a recent and unstable dynasty; he was active, resolute, penetrating, and frugal. His sagacity led him to consider Coufa, hitherto the Capital, as too remote from the Western Provinces, and in 765, in a moment declared auspicious by Astrologers, he laid the foundation of Bagdad, which he named Medinat al Salam, or Dar al Salam, the "Dwelling of Peace."‡ The future prosperity of this City avouched the judicious selection of the site, since, although the turbulent spirit of the citizens provoked many of the Khalifs to choose other places of residence, the increase of population was so rapid, that within a Century after its foundation, eight hundred thousand men and sixty thousand women attended the funeral of a popular teacher of the law.¶ The habitual parsimony of Mansor withheld his hand from the distribution of alms, in general so much practised by the Commanders of the Faithful, either through policy or a sense of duty. On one occasion, when repeatedly solicited for relief by a man who represented how much he stood in need of clothing, the Khalif took off his own threadbare robe and gave it to the clamorous mendicant.¶ By a long course of similar penuriousness, he accumulated a treasure of above twenty-five millions sterling. Nor was the aggrandizement of the Khalifate during his reign merely financial; by the conquest of Armenia, Cappadocia, and Cilicia, he restored it to a territorial extent equal to that which it possessed before the revolt of Spain.

Mansor was succeeded by his son Mahadi, a Prince of widely dissimilar character, whose wanton and extravagant luxury in a few years dissipated this enormous treasure. In the course of a pilgrimage to Mecca, he expended six million dinars,†† and was attended by a long train of camels carrying snow, a natural production which had never before been seen in that City.‡‡ His reign was disturbed by one of those strange impostures which have often shaken the Empires of the East. Its projector, Hakem, or Mocanna, for he bears both these names, is supposed to have been by birth a Jew. By dint of valour he rose to a high command in the army of the Khalif, and having received a severe wound in the face which deprived him of an eye, he wore a golden mask to conceal the defect, and hence obtained the surname of Barcai, or "the Masked."

Skilled beyond his Age and Country in scientific attainments,* and ambitious of a control over the minds of men equal to that which had been attained by the Prophet himself, he attempted to establish not only an independent Government, but even a new Religion. His pretensions were set forth in Khorrassan, a Province in which the restless and warlike disposition of the people, and their imperfect attachment to the tenets of Mohammedanism, made them ever ready to throw off allegiance to the Khalif. His followers were principally drawn from the Jews and Christians, whom he led to regard him as an incarnation of the Divinity; and his project succeeded till defeated by Mahadi. Besieged in a fortress without hope of relief or resistance, he poisoned his followers, and then plunged into a vessel of some corrosive liquid which totally consumed his body. A female who had contrived to conceal herself, opened the gates of the castle, and gave the besiegers an account of the manner of the catastrophe. But the volaries of the Impostor long maintained that he had been miraculously translated to the regions of bliss, whence he would return to establish his glorious reign on Earth.†

Mahadi, although fond of luxury, sustained the reputation of the Sarcenic arms by a successful campaign against the Greeks. He advanced in person into Asia Minor, as far as the river Pyramus, whence he sent forward his second son, Haroun, who at the head of ninety-five thousand men penetrated to the shore of the Bosphorus, and there compelled the terrified Empress Irene to promise payment of an annual tribute of seventy thousand dinars.‡

His life was terminated by an accident during a hunting party; while intent upon the chase, he spurred his horse through a ruined gateway, the low architrave of which gave him a fatal blow. As the spot was remote from any civilized habitation, no bier could be procured, and the body of the late master of the wealth of half Asia, was borne on a door to an humble grave dug at the foot of a tree under the shade of which he had previously reposed.§ His spirit was frank and generous, and he was studious of popularity. It is related that on one occasion, when he was about to commence the public prayer, an Arab of the lowest condition exclaimed, "I have not performed my ablutions, yet I am anxious to join with you in devotion." The Khalif stopped, and remained standing in the midst of the Mosque, until the person

The Greek Empire. The Khalifate.

From A. D. 802. 780. to A. D. 1081.

Mocanna, the Masked Impostor.

Mahadi invades the Greek Empire.

A. D. 780.

* D'Herbelot, in v. Abdalla.

† Ibid. in v. Abou Moslem.

‡ It should here be observed, that it is impossible to determine with complete exactness the early dates of Mohammedan History, as the most competent judges differ so much as a dozen years in fixing the era. See D'Herbelot, in v. Hyrah. In the present narrative his selection of A. D. 622 has been generally followed.

§ D'Herbelot, in Bagdad. Elmacin, 102. Kutysh Annals, ii. 399.

¶ D'Herbelot, v. Hamid.

¶ Elmacin, 104.

 £18,750,000 in silver, and £5,417,000 in gold. Price. Chronological Retrospect of the Principal Events in Mohammedan History, ii. 33. Gibbon, guessing from the translation of Elmacin (104.) by Kræpinus, sets down the amount at thirty millions sterling. x. 36.

†† £2,750,000, taking the dinar according to Malcolm, History of Persia, i. 161. 8vo. ed. at 9s. 2d.

‡‡ Abulfed, ii. 41. D'Herbelot, v. Mahadi. Gibbon, x. 36. transfers the passages without any sceptical comment, yet the account seems incredible, as the snow of Libanus, probably the nearest, is 500 miles distant from Mecca.

* One of the artifices practised by Mocanna was the elevation of a luminous body resembling the Moon from a well near the City of Nekseeb. It rose to a great height, and shone with surprising brilliancy. Was the Impostor acquainted with Aerostatics? The story of Mocanna has been treated by Mr. Thomas Moore in his Poem of Lalla Rookh, or the Fried Prophet of Khorrassan.

† D'Herbelot, v. Hakem. Abulfed, ii. 45—49. Abulpharaj, 146. Price, ii. 25.

‡ Elmacin, 106. Abulfed, ii. 49. Abulpharaj, 146. Price, ii. 25.

§ Elmacin, 107. Abulfed, ii. 53. Abulpharaj, 147. D'Herbelot, v. Mahadi.

History who thus addressed him was qualified to join in the service.*

From A. D. 802. 780. to A. D. 1081
Hadi Khalif. A. D. 784.

Mahadi was succeeded by his eldest son, Hadi, a cruel Prince, whose short and inglorious reign presents nothing remarkable, except the rebellion of the descendants of Ali, under the conduct of Houssain, the hereditary Chief of the family who assumed the title of Khalif at Medina. The Alides were defeated, and all who could be seized were put to death. Among the remnant that escaped was Edris, who took refuge in Egypt, whence he pursued his course into Barbary, and soon after, assuming the dignity of Khalif, founded the dynasty of the Edrissites.† This must be regarded as an important event, since, after the revolt of Spain, it is the next instance of the falling asunder of the Saracenic Empire. Hadi viewed with the malignity of offended jealousy the superior talents and popularity of his brother Haroun, whom he treated with great indignity. His cruelty and violence of temper became intolerable to his family and Ministers. He ordered Harthamah, one of his officers, to put Haroun to death, to massacre a number of the Alide party then in prison, and to burn the City of Coufa, which had zealously espoused their cause.‡ These furious mandates were disclosed to the mother of the Khalif, and as her parental affection was engrossed by Haroun, the more worthy object, she caused Hadi to be assassinated by her female attendants, who as he slept threw on him a great quantity of coverlets, and pressed them down until he was suffocated.§

Haroun Al Raschid Khalif. A. D. 786.

On the succession of Haroun Al Raschid, the dominions of the Khalifate stretched from the Atlantic to the Indus, and from the Straits of Babelmandel to the Sea of Aral. The superficial extent was about three-million of square miles, but much of this vast expanse was occupied by the sandy Deserts of Arabia, of Persia, and of Caubul. The public income is estimated at £34,375,000, a sum double that drawn from nearly the same dominions in the period previous to the conquest of Alexander. The example of revolt which had been given by the Omniades of Spain, was followed by Edris the Alide, who made himself master of the Northern part of Africa West of Tunis, and assumed the title of Khalif.¶ Haroun received the intelligence of this audacious rivalry with extreme anger and mortification. The remote position of Edris, and the attachment of his followers, secured him against the arms of the Khalif; but poison was easily administered by an emissary of Haroun. The Alide cause, however, survived in his posterity, who retained the title of Khalif until a. d. 941, when they were deposed by the more powerful Fatimites of Egypt.

The ardent fanaticism of the Arabs had given them energy sufficient to reverse the usual course of conquest, and to extend the dominion of the Southern Asiatics over the Northern and more warlike inhabitants of Khorassan and the adjacent Countries. But when the first fever of enthusiasm and ambition had passed away, the Khalifs found the government of those fierce and restless Provincials, dangerous and difficult. The rapid alternation of Magian, Christian, and Mohammedan tenets in the Nations bordering on the Caspian, produced an endless variety of Sects, whose wild practices and struggles for superiority, accelerated the anarchy already beginning to overspread the Northern dominions of the Khalifate. The Zendicisms, by their numbers and singular tenets, especially claim the notice of the Historian. Their belief appears to have been a medley formed from the doctrines of the Magians and Paulicians. They permitted the intermarriages of nearest relatives, and they are said to have denied the Resurrection. Their enmity and contempt was particularly directed against the Moslems, whose procession round the Temple of Mecca they compared to the circuits made by oxen on the threshing-floor, and whose prostrations were especial objects of contemptuous merriment.* The Moslems avenged these taunts by massacre, and the Khalif Hadi on one occasion hanged a thousand of the detested Infidels on as many gibbets ranged round the walls of Bagdad.† A large number eluded the exertions made by Haroun for their extirpation, and half a century later the subversion of the Khalifate was threatened by their leader Babek, who at various times gave up two hundred thousand Moslems to the executioner.‡

The title of Haroun encountered a formidable disturber also in Jahia the Alide, who laid claim to the Khalifate, and raising the standard of revolt in Ghilan on the Southern shore of the Caspian, by means of his emissaries extended his influence over the whole Empire. Haroun, doubtful of the event of an appeal to arms, succeeded in inducing the Chief to surrender, by solemnly pledging his faith for his impunity; but this pledge did not secure the unfortunate prisoner from the treatment of a criminal.§ The indulgence with which the Vizier Giarfar received the captive, led to his own ruin and that of his family, the Barmeides, whose generosity and benevolence had given them a degree of popularity suspected by their Sovereign and dangerous to themselves. When the devoted Minister received an unexpected summons to execution, he observed to the messenger, without any appearance of surprise or terror, that the order had probably been given under the influence of wine, and advised him to return and ascertain whether the Khalif persisted in the fatal mandate. The messenger refused this indulgence until Giarfar agreed to accompany him to the door of the Khalif's chamber. Haroun awaited the event with impatience, and as the executioner appeared, demanded whether he had brought the head of the Vizier. The officer accordingly retired to obey this reiterated command, and striking off the head of the disgraced favourite, brought it and laid it at the feet of his relentless Sovereign. Haroun was too politic or too vindictive to leave the relatives of the executed Vizier in a condition to avenge his fate. With few exceptions they were put to death, and their possessions confiscated, so that little remained of this once opulent and powerful family but their memory, preserved in the affectionate traditions of the people. The wealth of Giarfar, amounting to three millions sterling, replenished the coffers of the Caliph; his head and mangled limbs were placed on the most

* D'Herbelot, v. cit.

† Price, ii. 61. D'Herbelot, v. cit.

‡ Price, ii. 55.

§ D'Herbelot, v. Hadi. Almfled. ii. 59. Abulphar. 150.

¶ Gibbon, Miscellaneous Works, vol. v. p. 141, estimates the public revenue of the ancient Persian Empire at sixteen millions sterling.

¶ De Guignes, Histoire Générale des Huns, vol. i. 359. Cardonne, Histoire de l'Afrique, &c. sous la Domination des Arabes, tom. ii. 58.

 De Guignes, Ibid.

* Price, ii. 61. Abulphar. 149.

† D'Herbelot, v. Hadi.

‡ Price, ii. 148.

§ Elmacin, 114.

History.
From
A. D.
802.
730,
to
A. D.
1081.
Aglabites of Africa.

conspicuous parts of the city as objects of terror to the disaffected populace of Bagdad. At the same time the apprehension and disgust with which the Khalif viewed the insubordination of the citizens, induced him to remove the seat of government to the neighbouring town of Raecah.*

Ibrahim, the son of Aglab, had been appointed by Haroun Governor of the Province extending from Egypt to Tunis; and his successful revolt, in A. D. 800, established the dynasty of the Aglabites,† who governed that region until A. D. 928, when they were expelled by Abdallah, whose short-lived power sank before the arms of Moez the Fatimite.‡ The haughty Khalif had hitherto been baffled by Moslem Powers, whose names appear as points scarcely perceptible on the great page of the History of the World, he was now to vindicate his fame and power in a conflict with the Christian Empire, whose actual weakness was rendered more striking by the memory of its former might. Nicephorus, not content with refusing to continue payment of the tribute, due according to the Treaty signed by Irene, demanded restitution of the sums already disbursed on that account. The ambassadors, at the close of their address, threw down before the Khalif a number of swords, adding, "These, in the event of your refusal, must be the arbiters of the dispute." Haroun, drawing his sabre Samsamah, showed at once its temper and the wonderful strength of the arm which wielded it, by shattering at a blow the puny weapons of his enemies;§ without injuring the edge of his own blade. The insulting defiance of Nicephorus was answered on the back of his letter in these terms: "In the name of the most merciful God, Haroun al Raschid, Commander of the Faithful, to Nicephorus, the Roman Dog. I have read thy letter, O thou son of an unbelieving mother, thou shalt not hear, thou shalt behold my reply." That reply (to borrow the spirited language of Gibbon) was written in letters of blood and fire on the plains of Phrygia. Nicephorus, who attempted to check the rapid and wide devastation inflicted by the Khalif, was defeated with the loss of forty thousand men|| In the next campaign, Haroun invested Heraclea with an army of one hundred and thirty thousand regular troops, and the clouds of irregular followers raised the whole amount to above three hundred thousand. The town was stormed after a month's siege, and sixteen thousand of its surviving inhabitants were led into slavery. At the same time the Isle of Cyprus¶ was again reduced under the dominion of the Khalifs. Alarmed by these great losses, Nicephorus implored Peace, which was granted on condition that the tribute should be raised from seventy thousand to three hundred thousand pieces of gold,* and that the captured towns should remain in ruin as a lasting memorial of the vengeance of the Khalif.

Haroun al Raschid, amid the splendour of his conquests, found time for the most close attention to the observances of the Mohammedan Law. A hundred daily prostrations and nine Pilgrimages to Mecca are commemorated among his acts of devotion. One of these Pilgrimages was performed on foot, yet so little of real humiliation attended that display of the Khalif's piety, that his path was then strewn with carpets. During the year in which a personal visit to the Caaba was out of his power, he defrayed the expense of no less than three hundred Pilgrims; and his death was accelerated by a superstition which has found a parallel in more than one Sovereign, even professing a more enlightened Faith. As he advanced towards Khorassan, to chastise a rebellious subject, he dreamed that a naked arm extended towards him a hand containing some red clay, whilst a voice exclaimed, "Such must be the earth of your tomb." Soon after he was attacked with illness at the town of Tus, and in his despondency he ordered Mesrour, his favourite Eunuch, to bring him a handful of earth. The earth happened to be red, and as the messenger presented it, the sleeve of his robe fell back, and left his arm uncovered: "Such," exclaimed Haroun, "was the earth and such the arm which I beheld in my dream;" and his disordered imagination produced so

The Greek Empire.
The Khalif-
ate.

From
A. L.
802.
730,
to
A. D.
1081.
Devotion of Haroun.

His death.

violent an effect on his health, that in a few days he was deposited in the grave which he had caused to be dug by the side of his couch. The Khorassan rebel, against whom his expedition was directed, had been seized and brought into the presence of the dying Khalif, who exerted his sinking powers to order him to be cut to pieces, and in his last moments witnessed the execution of the barbarous sentence.† Some years before his death Haroun committed the baneful error of dividing the succession between his three sons. To Amin, the second, was allotted the Khalifate, with that portion of the Empire South of the Caspian and West of the Gulf of Persia. The Northern and Eastern parts were given to his eldest but illegitimate son, Mamoun, who was admonished to acknowledge the supremacy of his brother. Armenia and the North of Mesopotamia formed an appanage for his third son, Mutama.‡ In relating this arrangement, Elmacin observes, "Some said Raschid has given stability to his Empire: but others said nay, but he has sown discord amongst them, and the event will be terrible."

Division of his Empire.

But to revert to Constantinople. Nicephorus was now engaged with a less illustrious, but a yet more destructive foe than he had encountered in Al Raschid. The Bulgarians, a Slavonian race, had emerged from their wilds North of the Danube, and extended their dominion to the Balkan, in the fastnesses of which they were firmly established.§ Whilst the Greeks were engaged in the Saracenic war, those Barbarians had ravaged Thrace, and sacking the City of Sardica led six thousand of its inhabitants into slavery.|| The expedition by which Nicephorus retaliated this invasion was at first Bulgarian.

Nicephorus invades Bulgaria.

* Price, ii. 68. Abulfed. ii. 89.

† D'Herbelot, v. Giafar. Elmacin, 116. Abulphar. 151. Abulfed. ii. 81. Price, ii. 75. Our limits do not admit room for the romantic story of the marriage of Giafar to Abbassa, the sister of Haroun, and its fatal consequences. It may be read in the authorities just stated.

‡ Abulfed. ii. 79. Cardonne, i. 1.—59. De Guignes, i. 359—365. D'Herbelot, v. Ibrahim ben Aglab.

§ D'Herbelot, v. Haroun. Gibbon, v. 54. Abulfed. ii. 87.

|| Elmacin, 119.

¶ Abulfed. ii. 91. Cedren. 477. Theophaues, 407. Of the other great Islands of the Mediterranean, Sardinia had been wrested from the Byzantine Empire by the Saracens, A. D. 714; Price, i. 471.; Sicily was conquered by them between the years 827—878; Crete, 823; Corsica was seized by Pope Leo IV. in 852, and a moiety assigned to the Genoese on the annual payment of a pound of gold. Baron. Annal. ad 852. v.

* Price, ii. 65. D'Herbelot, v. Hagge. Elmacin, 120.

† Abulfed. ii. 93. Abulphar. 152. D'Herbelot, v. Haroun. Price, ii. 84—87. Kutchy, Annal. 412.

‡ Elmacin, 115. D'Herbelot, v. Haroun. Price, ii. 65.

§ D'Anville, Etat des fornic en Europe apris la Chute de l'Empire Romain, p. 248.

|| Cedren. 478.

History.

From
A. D.
802.
730. to
A. D.
1081.

is defeated and slain.

A. D.
811.

Stauracius
Emperor.

Michael I., surnamed Rangabe, Emperor.
A. D.
811.

Leo V., surnamed the Armenian, Emperor.
A. D.
813.

marked with success. He extensively desolated the Bulgarian territory, and making himself master of the Royal residence, appropriated the vast store of plunder which it contained, the accumulation of many a predatory excursion. Crum, the Bulgarian Prince, offered unmolested retreat to the invaders, together with their spoils, provided a stop were put to further devastations. His proposal was rashly and disdainfully rejected. But a wild and mountainous tract lay between the Greeks and their homes; the passes were secured by strong palisades guarded by powerful detachments of Bulgarians; and Nicephorus, viewing the toils which enclosed him, exclaimed, "Unless we were birds, escape must be impossible." For two days he remained in his camp in the inactivity of despair; on the third, the impatience of the Bulgarians anticipated the effect of famine: they broke through the Greek lines, and the Emperor, with nearly his whole army, fell in the carnage which ensued. The head of Nicephorus was cut off, and in barbarous exultation exposed for some days on a pole. His skull, formed into a drinking cup and set in silver,* gave the zest of triumph to the carouses of the victor.

Stauracius, the son of Nicephorus, escaped from the field of battle, but with a wound which eventually proved mortal. Having determined that his Empress Theophano should succeed him, he prepared to seize and deprive of sight his brother-in-law Michael, surnamed Rangabe. The design failed, Stauracius was deposed and secluded in a Monastery, within the walls of which he died in six months after his accession.† Michael, raised to the throne by the public choice, was mild, pious, benevolent, and generous, and his dignified carriage and aspect were well suited to command popular respect; but he wanted the stern energy requisite for controlling a restless and seditious people; and his army, although timid in the presence of an enemy, despised the gentle and peaceful disposition of their new Emperor. A fresh defeat, inflicted by the Bulgarians, was attributed rather to his incapacity than to their own cowardice; and in his absence at Constantinople, they declared that Leo the Armenian, a rough but valiant soldier, was alone worthy to wear the diadem. Michael might have defended Constantinople against his rebellious army; for the Senate valued his mild and equitable sway, and the Clergy and People were zealous in the cause of an Emperor who had evinced his orthodoxy by persecuting the Iconoclasts;‡ but reluctant to agitate a Civil contest, he declared that not a drop of Christian blood should be shed in his cause. At the same time, regardless of the remonstrances and reproaches of his Empress, the bold and ambitious Procopia, he sent the Imperial ensigns, the diadem, and purple robe, and slippers to Leo, who at the head of the army had taken a threatening position at the gates of the city. The Emperor, after this abdication, was allowed to retire unmolested to a Monastery in the Island of Prote, in the Propontis, where the thirty-two years during which he survived were spent in tranquil piety.§

The military talents of Leo were well suited to the exigencies of the Empire, which continued to bleed under the fierce inroads of the Bulgarians. Crum their King led a numerous army to the suburbs of Constantinople, whose citizens viewed from their ramparts with mingled terror, curiosity, and abhorrence, the uncouth rites and bloody sacrifices* performed by the Barbarian to propitiate his idols. The invader suspended attack whilst he set forth his insolent demands; in which the delivery of a costly ransom was less galling to the pride of the besieged than an intimation that the Conqueror intended to strike his lance into the Golden Gate.† Leo proposed that the terms should be adjusted in a personal conference; and when Crum repaired to the place of meeting, some Greeks, ambushed in a ruined building, moved forward to cut off his retreat. Crum's suspicions, however, were seasonably alarmed, and he escaped with a slight wound.‡ In his fury he levelled the suburbs, and bearing away all movable spoil, he relinquished the siege and dispersed his hordes to ravage Thrace and Macedonia. Adrianople was among the Cities which he sacked.§ and having sated his cupidity and anger, he led home his troops laden with booty, and driving before them fifty thousand Greeks destined to a hopeless servitude. In a subsequent invasion, Leo totally defeated the Barbarians, and vigorously following up his success, drove the Bulgarian Prince and the dismayed relics of his army back to their wilds.¶ The Emperor now had leisure to turn his attention to the futile and mischievous Polemics which distracted his subjects. Although an unlettered soldier, he was not content to employ force against the worshippers of Images, but in a Council§ held to take cognizance of the dispute, he exerted himself to prove that the adoration of those inanimate objects was at variance with the precepts of Christianity and the principles of Reason. The courtiers applauded the eloquence of their Sovereign, declared that his arguments were irrefragable, and Leo, whose inflexible purpose needed no such encouragement, removed the Images which had been restored by his predecessor, and punished the refractory sect of his votaries with the rigour of a military despot. His attention was diverted from this controversy by the terrors of a new Bulgarian irruption. Crum a second time invested Constantinople, and taking his station at the gate Blacherna, prepared on a vast scale those engines, the employment of which had enabled him to destroy the fortifications of Adrianople. His death opportunely relieved the apprehensions of the Greeks, as the Bulgarian host immediately retreated.

The unsettled nature of succession to the Byzantine diadem stimulated the rashness of adventurers to seize so rich a prize, and Michael, surnamed Traulus, or the Stammerer, was encouraged to form treasonable designs against an Emperor unpopular from his severity. Michael, who had been mainly instrumental in the elevation of his Sovereign,†† long experienced his forbearance, even after his designs were more than suspected; but as kindness failed to soothe, or threats to intimidate his dangerous enemy, he was at length convicted of treason, and sentenced to be burned alive. The anniversary of the birth of Christ had been fixed for this execution, but it was postponed in consequence of the remonstrances of the Empress Theophano, who regarded with abhorrence the desecration of that great Festival by so inhuman a spectacle. The delay gave time to ripen a conspiracy

* In silver, Theoph. 416. Cedren. 482. Zonar. ii. 114. not in gold, as Gibbon (x. 199.) represents.

† Zonar. ii. 125. Cedren. 482. Theoph. 418.

‡ Cedren. 483.

§ Cedren. 484. Zonar. ii. 118.

• Leo Gram. 414.

† Ibid. 432.

‡ Zonar. ii. 129. Cedren. 487.

 Leo Gram. 438.

† Ibid. 445.

† Ibid. 433.

¶ Ibid. ed. ann. 814. iii.

†† Zonar. ii. 128. Cedren. 484.

History. From A. D. 802. 780. Michael II. married A. D. 820. formed by the friends of the criminal, and they attacked Leo whilst he attended early service in the Chapel of the Palace. The Emperor seized a massive crucifix and attempted resistance, but his right arm was cut off, and he was slain at the foot of the altar.*

Michael was thus raised from a dungeon to the Throne, and as in the tumult a Smith could not readily be procured, he wore his fetters for some hours beneath the Imperial Purple. Since he imitated his predecessor in excluding Images, the Historians who advocate their adoration relate with marked delight that, sprung from Amorium, he retained the Jewish observances and prejudices prevalent among the concourse of Hebrews and Manicheans by whom that city was inhabited. The example of his own successful treason was imitated by his fellow-soldier Thomas the Cappadocian, who asserting that he was a son of the Empress Irene, drew together in his native Country an army of eighty thousand irregular troops, and laid siege to Constantinople. Michael solicited the aid of the Bulgarians; and those hardy Barbarians soon dispersed the myriads of effeminate Asiatics. Thomas was made prisoner, and in vain implored the mercy of his former comrade in arms. His hands and feet were lopped off, and thus mutilated, he was borne by an ass through the streets of Constantinople to the stake on which he was impaled.

During the inglorious reign of Michael, the conquest of Crete by the Saracens is one of the few instances in which the foreign relations of the Empire merit the notice of History. A band of Corsairs from Spain, during a predatory expedition, were so struck with the fertility and delicious climate of the Island of a hundred Cities, that they renewed the attack with a large reinforcement of their Countrymen, who landing from forty galleys achieved its conquest.† The post fortified for the security of their colony received the name of Candax, which, subsequently softened by the Franks into Candia, has been extended to the whole Island. In the last year of the reign of Michael, the Saracens commenced those invasions of Sicily, which, after an occasionally intermitting warfare continued through half a Century, rendered them masters of the Island. The treachery of a native first exposed its shores to their arms. Euphemius, a youth holding a high command in the Sicilian military force, carried off a Nun from a Convent, and when his amorous sacrilege was about to be punished by the Emperor's command with mutilation, he escaped to Africa, and invited the Prince then on the throne of the Aglabites to invade his native Country. The proposal of the apostate, for Euphemius had abjured Christianity, was favourably entertained, and returning with the command of seven hundred horse and ten thousand foot, he laid siege to Syracuse. The invaders were baffled by the vigour of its defence, but they established their dominion over the Western part of the Island, and made Palermo the Capital of their conquest.‡

Theophilus, undisturbed by any rival claimant, inherited the Imperial dignity on the decease of his father Michael. One of his first acts was the punishment of those conspirators who had raised that Father to the throne by the assassination of Leo; and this proceeding, in itself indiscreet and of doubtful merit, was rendered utterly unjustifiable by the insidious means employed for its execution. In a full Senate he declared his pleasure that those who had caused the death of Leo should come forward, in order that he might reward them. When, in hopeful eagerness, they had separated themselves from the rest of the Senators, he demanded of the Assembly what those persons merited who, in the very Church, had slain the Lord's anointed. This question sufficiently intimating the views of the Emperor, was answered by the general exclamation, "Death!" and the award was executed without delay.*

The new Emperor distinguished himself as a zealous Iconoclast; but we pass on to his more important transactions with the Khalifate.

Amin, the successor of Haroun Al Raschid, was a dissolute and imbecile Prince, vigorous only in the unjust attempt which he made to deprive his brother Mamoun of his dominions. An army of sixty thousand men, despatched for this purpose under the command of Ali, was encountered by Mamoun's General, Taher, who, near Rei, defeated this numerous host with an insignificant number of the valiant soldiers of Khorrassan. This victory encouraged Mamoun to assume the title of Khalif, and the successes of his Generals soon enabled them to besiege Bagdad, where the infuriated Amin, relinquishing to his courtiers the management of his affairs, sought to exclude care by an incessant round of trifling amusements and debauchery. The citizens, afflicted by oppression within the walls and by the operations of the besiegers without, rose in tumultuary insurrection, and gave up the town to the troops of Mamoun. The Khalif, seized in flight, was immediately put to death by the order of Taher, and his head was despatched to Mamoun, who awaited the event in the remote city of Merou.†

The humane disposition of Mamoun was so shocked by the melancholy fate of his brother, that he never saw Taher without shedding tears; and that Chief, from the impulse either of resentment or of alarm, retired to Khorrassan, a Province which had been assigned, in nearly full Sovereignty, as the reward of his services. With this successful soldier, commenced the dynasty of the Taherites, who ruled the North of Persia for four generations;‡ and the establishment of that Power is the next step in the dismemberment of the Khalifate after the loss of Spain and Africa. At the accession of Mamoun, the State had attained its greatest financial prosperity, and his revenue, it is probable, considerably exceeded thirty millions sterling.§ His liberality kept pace with, or even outstripped his opulence. On one occasion, as he returned on horseback to the Palace, the Syrian payments, amounting to three millions sterling, were displayed before him, and observing that his courtiers wistfully eyed the glittering hoards, he told them that they should not crave in vain while he possessed means for their gratification, and distributed four-fifths of the treasure

The Greek Empire, The Khalifate.

From A. D. 802. 780. to A. D. 1051.

Amin Khalif. A. D. 809.

Mamoun Khalif. A. D. 813.

Taherites.

* Zonar. ii. 141.

† Elmacin, 124—129. Abulfed. ii. 105. Abulfar. 157. D'Herbelot, v. Amin.

‡ Abulfed. ii. 139. Malcolm, History of Persia, i. 146, 147. 8vo. D'Herbelot, re. Mamoun, Taher.

§ 279, 970, 714 dirhems. Von Hammer (Fundgruben des Orients, vi. 364.) considers the dirhem equal to the piastre forte, 2s. 2d. Mamoun, besides, received very great payments in kind, according to the natural productions of the respective Provinces. Fowiger, Hist.

* Zonar. ii. 132—134. Leo Gram. 417.

† Zonar. ii. 135. Cedren. 496.

‡ Zonar. ii. 139.

§ Zonar. ii. 140. Baron. Annal. de ann. 820. xx. Muratori, Annali d'Italia, vii. 440. 8vo. Milan, 1819. St. Marc, Abregé Chronol. i. 474.

History. before he drew foot from the stirrup.* On his marriage, a thousand pearls of uncommon size and lustre, showered on the head of the bride, became the property of those who could gather them, and lottery tickets, thrown among the spectators, (after the manner of some of the Imperial despots of Rome,) entitled the fortunate holders to rich possessions in lands and houses.† Mamasen was also a munificent patron of letters, and expended three hundred thousand pieces of gold in translations of the most eminent Christian writers.‡ During an expedition against the Greeks, he died in consequence of a surfeit of dates, rendered more deleterious by excessive draughts of the chill water of the Bezizon, or Cydnus,§ a river once before nearly fatal to a far more illustrious Sovereign.

Amin was succeeded by his brother Motassem, whose short-sighted policy accelerated the dissolution of the Empire of the Khalifs. Intent on surrounding himself with a strong Body-guard upon whose fidelity he might implicitly rely, he purchased a great number of Turkish youths, and after they had been disciplined, stationed them in his Palace. The insolent rapacity of those rude foreigners led to frequent quarrels with the Citizens of Bagdad, and Motassem, retiring in disgust from his Capital, laid the foundation of the Town of Samara. By a whimsical display of power, he commanded each soldier in his cavalry, said to amount to a hundred and thirty thousand men, to fill with earth the little sack, or (as it is familiarly called in English) the nosebag, used in feeding his charger, and all of these being emptied at an appointed spot formed an eminence on which was raised the Palace of the Khalif.¶ The transfusion of Turkish hardihood into the military force of the Khalifate gave it some transient vigour, and the reiterated invasions of Syria by the Emperor Theophilus afforded occasion and scope for his exertion. In his fifth expedition, Theophilus besieged the town of Sozopetra, the birthplace of Motassem, who, engaged in tranquillizing some disturbances in Persia, sent an embassy to intercede in his favour. The Emperor eagerly seized the opportunity of mortifying the Khalif's pride, and having taken and razed Sozopetra, he treated the captives with ignominious cruelty. In the subsequent invasion by which Motassem revenged this insult, Theophilus was defeated, and fled precipitately from the field on which thirty thousand of his soldiers had fallen. The victorious Khalif then, in retaliation, laid siege to Amorium, the birth-place of Theophilus, who in vain sued that it might be spared. The strength of the fortifications, and the desperation of the garrison protracted the siege for two months, and the gratification of Motassem's vengeance cost the lives of above seventy thousand Moslems.¶ But the city was at length destroyed, the inhabitants suffered death in its most cruel forms, and after a profuse expenditure of life and treasure, the Khalif evacuated the country which his troops had overrun, and led them back to Samara. Motassem, like most of the Abbasside Khalifs, was generous. Having been separated on one occasion from his attendants, he saw an old man who fruitlessly attempted to extricate himself and his ass from a deep slough. The Khalif alighted, and plunging into the mud, with which he was thoroughly bemired, drew out the old man and his beast, and when rejoined by his courtiers, bestowed on him an alms of four thousand pieces of silver.*

The deep anguish which Theophilus felt in consequence of his defeat and the destruction of Amorium preyed upon his health, and irritated into cruelty his temper naturally severe. A woman complained to him that a powerful Nobleman, the brother of the Empress, had raised his Palace to so great a height as to exclude light and air from her humble dwelling. Not content with adjoining to her the Palace and ground, Theophilus ordered the unhappy Patrician to be stripped and scourged in the presence of the people. In a similar spirit of rigour, officers, recommended by the length and importance of their services, were banished, mutilated, or burned alive for venial acts of carelessness or negligence. The Emperor's former zealous persecution of the Image-worshippers also was at this time rendered more active from the exposure of a fraudulent attempt to raise a popular commotion, by means of a contrivance which caused milk to exude from the breasts of a statue of the Virgin.† His suspicions and cruelty increased as his strength decayed, and since his son Michael was but five years old, he feared lest his succession might be prejudiced by the eminent qualities of Theophobus, a Prince of Persian extraction, but allied to the reigning family of Constantinople by marriage. Theophilus issued his mandate for the death of his unsuspecting kinsman, whose great services and tried loyalty merited a different recompense. His head was brought to relieve the apprehensions of the dying despot, who, recognising the features, said in a faltering voice, "Thou art no longer Theophobus, and I soon shall be no more Theophilus." Then intrusting his Empress Theodora with the guardianship of Michael, and the powers of government during his minority, he spent his expiring breath in exhorting her to persist in the exclusion of Images.‡

Theodora, however, was zealously opposed to the Iconoclastic faction, and disregarding the injunctions of the deceased Emperor, she assembled a Council, and declared her resolution to restore Images; which accordingly, on the first Sunday in Lent, amidst sumptuous ceremonies and the noisy exultation of the populace, were replaced in the Greek Churches. The streets of the Capital were crowded with swarms of Monks who descended from Athos, Ida, and Olympus, and the Imperial halls were filled with Confessors recalled from exile and relieved from persecution. In an entertainment given by Theodora to the most eminent of those sufferers, her eyes were often directed towards the countenance of one Theophanes scarred with wounds inflicted by the Iconoclasts. That Confessor, divining her thoughts, asked what attracted her attention; and when he received the expected answer, "I admire your patience and detest the cruelty of those who have inflicted those scars;" he retorted with savage and vindictive fanaticism, "Detest then the late Emperor Theophilus your own husband. I have made a vow that he shall decipher those marks, and will see it performed in presence of that just Judge who no more regards the War between the Emperor and Khalif.

Samara founded. A. D. 836.

Motassem. Khalif. A. D. 833. Introduction of Turkish Guards.

His splendour and munificence, and death.

From A. D. 802. 730. to A. D. 1051.

* Price, ii. 163.

† Ibid. ii. 140. Abulfed. ii. 147.

‡ Ibid. ii. 142.

§ Elmacin, 158. Abulfed. ii. 123. Price, ii. 142. D'Herbelot, v. Mamasen.

¶ D'Herbelot, v. Motassem. Price, ii. 143. The eminence was called by the people, Tel al-nahab, "the hill of satchels."

¶ Eutyech. ii. 439. D'Herbelot. Zonar. ii. 150—152. Cedren. 529—532.

* D'Herbelot, v. Motassem. Abulphar. 166.

† Elmacin, 152.

‡ Zonar. ii. 152. Cedren. 533.

purple than the beggar's sackcloth."* This uncharitable insolence was reproved by the Patriarch Methodius, but the uneasiness felt by Theodora on account of her husband's eternal woe, could be relieved only by the assurance of the Image worshippers that their prayers had been heard in his behalf, and by a dream in which she saw him penitent, pardoned, and beatified †

The turbulence of her Court soon disgusted Theodora, and when, relinquishing her guardianship, she retired to a Monastery, Michael availed himself of uncontrolled Sovereignty to lavish the treasure of the State in the most wanton extravagance and debauchery. The frugality of the Empress Mother had accumulated a treasure of above six millions sterling; and from this stock the profuse youth distributed thousands in rewards for acts of gross and disgusting buffoonery. His thoughtless impiety treated Religion itself also with mockery. Himerius, his favourite Jester, was arrayed in the robes of the Patriarch Ignacius, and when the Empress Theodora came forward to receive the benediction of so revered a personage, she was undeceived by a brutal insult. § On the day of a solemn festival, Michael and the companions of his debaucheries, attired in Episcopal robes, rode on asses through the streets, and encountering the Patriarch at the head of his Clergy, disturbed the procession with shouts and gestures; and the Emperor and his minions are said to have profaned the Eucharist in their revels, by a mock administration of it in a composition of vinegar and mustard. The follies and crimes of the Emperor were stimulated by the insidious policy of his uncle Bardas, who hoped that he might supplant so unworthy a possessor of the Imperial dignity. His intrigues, however, were rendered abortive by the superior abilities or fortune of Basil the Macedonian, who had been introduced to the notice of Michael by his adroitness in horsemanship, and had acquired unrivalled influence over him by his talents at once insinuating and commanding. Bardas fell by the dagger of this new favourite, who rose from the dignity of Grand Chamberlain to a participation in the Imperial Throne. He confirmed his influence by surrendering his sister to the passion of Michael, and still further by his marriage with the discarded concubine Eudocia. || Yet during this period of crime and degradation, the Peloponnese was restored to the Empire by the subjection of the Slavonian intruders, ¶ and Bogoris, the Prince of the Bulgarians, embracing Christianity, voluntarily declared himself a vassal of the Emperor.  The consummation of Basil's ambition was hastened by a drunken frolic, in which Michael associated with himself in the Imperial dignity one Basilinus, a rowdy, admitted to join the degrading revels of his Sovereign. When Michael unloosed his mantle and threw it over Basilinus, he looked at Basil, and observed that he was at full liberty to associate this second colleague in his Throne. The remark excited the jealousy and resentment of Basil, who taking advantage of the familiar access which he enjoyed to all parts of the Palace, introduced assassins by night, and cruelly butchered his Master as he lay sunk in sleep and intoxication.

Basil the Macedonian was born at Adrianople, of parents who, although they earned their subsistence by manual labour, are represented by contemporary Historians to have derived their descent from the Arsacide of Persia, from Alexander the Great, and from the Christian Hero Constantine. * The power which he had attained not without the commission of many and great crimes, was employed by him with wisdom and activity in retrieving the deplorable condition of the Empire. Of the great treasure inherited by Michael, but three hundred pounds of gold remained. † But the frugality of the new Emperor, and the moneys which the Favourites of the late prodigal reign were compelled to refund for the public service, afforded means for giving equipments, number, and discipline to his naval and military force.

The Paulicians of Asia Minor, formidable from their fanaticism, their despair, and their alliance with the Saracens, had long ravaged with impunity the Eastern frontier of the Empire. Under the conduct of Chrysocheir, their Spiritual as well as temporal leader, they extended their devastating incursions to the Eastern shore of the Archipelago. Basil having in vain tried the effect of negotiation, marched into Pontus, the principal seat of those sectaries; where, after laying waste the open country, he retired, baffled by the strength of the fortifications and the numbers and bravery of the garrison of Tephrike. After his retreat, he offered up incessant prayers that his warfare might so far be blessed with success, as to permit him to discharge three arrows into the head of Chrysocheir; and his wishes were gratified. In an inroad, Chrysocheir was surprised and slain. His head was sent to the Imperial presence, and Basil, who had not forgotten the military exercises of his youth, pierced it with three arrows. In a second expedition the Emperor made himself master of Tephrike, which he immediately razed to the ground. This success greatly diminished the power of the Paulicians, who nevertheless continued to assert independence against every effort of the Byzantine Emperors. †

The Saracens, by their superiority of Naval force, Recovery were now masters of the Mediterranean, and they took of Southern advantage of this command to desolate or to occupy the Italy: maritime cities of Southern Italy. Their principal garrison in Italy was at Bari, on the Eastern shore, whence they infested all the Southern and central Provinces. To check their alarming progress an alliance was concluded between Basil and Louis II., Emperor of the West. While the German army under the command of the Emperor invested Bari by land, a fleet of four hundred ships, despatched by Basil, blocked it up by sea. The Greek Admiral, either through dread of his enemies or jealousy of his allies, withdrew with his fleet to the Gulf of Corinth; and as Sergius the Christian Duke of Naples, took advantage of that retreat to supply the besieged Saracens with provisions and warlike stores, four years elapsed before the town was captured. The power of the Saracens in Southern Italy was effectually broken by the arms of the Germans. But on the death of Louis, Bari

The Greek Empire. The Khalifat.

From A. D. 802. 730. 10 A. D. 1081. Basil I. was named the Macedonian, Emperor. A. D. 867.

Successful war against the Paulicians.

* Baron, Annal. ad ann. 842. xvi.—xviii. cum Pag. crst. Genesius, 39. Cedren. 534.

† Zonar. ii. 154.

‡ One hundred and nine thousand pounds of gold, three hundred thousand pounds of silver. Zonar. ii. 157. Cedren.

§ Cedren. 544.

|| Zonar. ii. 167. Leo Gram. 464.

¶ Constant. Porphy. in Banduri, vol. i. 108.

 Zonar. ii. 135. Cedren. 540. Stritter, Memoria Populorum, &c. vol. ii. 569—571.

* Constant. Porphy. in Scriptor. post Theoph. fol. Par. 1685. p. 135. Scylitz. 32.

† Zonar. ii. 167.

‡ Zonar. ii. 165. Genes. 57. 60.

History. with his other conquests were occupied without resistance by the troops of Basil. The Theme of Lombardy, as this acquisition was styled, was included between the Adriatic and Mediterranean Seas, and a boundary extending from Mount Garganus to Salerno.* This Province was administered by an officer who bore the title of Catapan.† The talents of Basil as a Legislator were displayed by an adaptation of the Code of Justinian to the altered state of Society, promulgated under forty titles styled Basiles; and this Prince's salutary reign was terminated, too soon for the welfare of his Empire, by an accident in hunting. A stag of enormous size having been driven to bay, entangled one of his antlers in the dress of the Emperor, dragged him from his horse, and inflicted a mortal wound.

Leo VI., surnamed Philosopher, Emperor. A. D. 886.

Basil was succeeded by his son Leo, a Prince ill adapted indeed for the active cares of Empire, but distinguished for other talents which have obtained him the title of the Philosopher. His younger brother Alexander was associated with him in the Imperial dignity, but so lost was he in debauchery and sloth, that his name and character have almost escaped the notice of Historians. The unwelcome Leo was unable to chastise, or even to repel, the incursions of the Bulgarians headed by Simeon, their able and valiant King, who owed much of his superiority to an education at Constantinople; and the Greeks, without power to resist, invited the dangerous assistance of the Hungarians, a people whose ferocious habits and first appearance in Europe we have already noticed.‡

Their diversion in favour of the Greeks was at first successful, and, assisted by the Imperial fleet which conveyed them over the Danube, they defeated Simeon, entrenched on its Southern bank. In a second engagement, the Hungarians were in turn defeated, and few escaped across the river into the wasted region of Pannonia, which they now began to regard as their Country, or, at least, as their principal retreat. The Bulgarians, now unresisted for many years, ravaged the tract extending from the Adriatic to the Euxine Seas, from Mount Hæmus to Thessaly. The fortifications and maritime power of Constantinople alone prevented them from subverting the Eastern Empire. To these disasters was added the ruin of the populous and wealthy City of Thessalonica, taken by a predatory force of Saracens, who departed unmolested, with an immense booty and a numerous train of captives.§ The peace of Constantinople itself, also, was disturbed by an impolitic marriage of Leo, who, regardless of the canons by which the Greek Church forbade the repetition of the matrimonial union, had declared the beautiful Zoe his fourth Empress, after she had presented him with a son, Constantine, his sole offspring. The Patriarch Nicholas resented this disregard of Ecclesiastical authority, and degradation and persecution failed in compelling him to sanction the union. Notwithstanding this blemish of illegitimacy, the infant was associated in the Imperial dignity under the name of Constantine Porphyrogenitus; an illustrious appellation, denoting that he had been born the heir of the Empire in the Porphyry chamber appropriated to the accommodation of the pregnant Empresses.

Constantine in early infancy succeeded to the Empire on the death of his father. The guardianship of the young Prince was held at first by a Council of seven of the chief Nobles, and subsequently passed to Zoe, through whose intrigues their removal had been effected. Her influence yielded in turn to that of Romanus Leptenus, an adventurer, who by his talents and bravery had raised himself to the command of the maritime force of the Empire. The marriage of his daughter to Constantine was followed by his admission to a participation in the Imperial dignity. The Bulgarians continuing their ravages, defeated the army of the Emperor, on the banks of the Achelous, with great slaughter; and the victorious Barbarians advancing to Constantinople, threatened it with siege, till a repulse under its walls obliged them to sue for Peace.*

The Bulgarians and Greeks, exhausted by their mutually hostile operations, were unable to resist a furious invasion of the Hungarians, who passed the Danube, ravaged the territory of both people, and approached Constantinople with so great boldness, that one of their warriors drove his battle-axe into the timbers of the Golden Gate. The fortifications of the Capital, however, bade defiance to their rude ferocity, and their retreat was procured by the payment of a large tribute. A formidable attack by the Russians was met in a manner more worthy of the Roman name. In the reign of the infamous Michael III. those Savages or (as Karamsin styles them) those heroes of the North first descended the Dnieper in boats, entered the Bosphorus, and terrified the Greeks with the apparition of unknown enemies from the interminable wilds of Scythia. The Patriarch Photius is then said to have displayed a robe preserved through Ages from the wardrobe of the Virgin in view of the armament of the freebooters, which immediately was scattered as a sport to the winds and waves, so that but a small residue of the invaders returned to inform their Countrymen of the divine protection extended over the Greeks.† Christianity, first preached in Russia in A. D. 866, and received, at least nominally, to a great extent, might be supposed to have rendered their hostilities less inhuman, yet their expedition at the date now under consideration was distinguished by horrible barbarities, exceeding those practised in their former invasion. Their armament, stated by the Byzantine Historians to amount to above ten thousand boats, was encountered by fifteen of the Imperial galleys, equipped with an extensive and well-arranged artillery for the discharge of the Greek fire. The Barbarians were panic-stricken at the effects of this terrible instrument of destruction. Most threw themselves into the sea to avoid being burned, some took refuge on the shore of Thrace, where they fell into the unsparing hands of the peasantry, and about one-third succeeded in regaining their homes under the command of their Prince, Igor.‡

Three sons of Romanus were associated in the Imperial rank, and thus was exhibited the singular spectacle of five individuals, each wearing, with acknowledged right, the emblems of Sovereignty. Constantine * Muratori, Annal. d'Italia, vii. 648—661. 665. ix. 156. S. Mare, ii. 534—616.

† See p. 540, note 1.

‡ P. 470.

§ Cedren. 606. Georg. Mon. 558. Sym. Mag. 465.

* Zonar. ii. 185. Cedren. 613. Georg. Mon. 568, 569. Sym. Mag. 485.

† Russian History, French translation, Paris, 1819, l. 146.

‡ Zonar. ii. 152. Cedren. 552.

Cedren. 630. Zonar. ii. 190. Sym. Mag. 490. Georg. Mon. 589, 589. Karamsin, i. 183.

History. was reduced to the lowest station in this Pentarchy, and Romanus himself was ultimately deposed and exiled to the Island of Prote by the unnatural ambition of his sons. The indignation of the people, however, soon compelled the usurpers to share their Father's banishment. The sole administration to which Constantine was thus restored, was characterised by mildness till after a lapse of fifteen years he was poisoned by Theophrastus, the wife of his son Romanus.

Romanus II. who, profiting by the guilt of his consort, succeeded to the throne, although remarkable for his beauty, strength, and symmetry of form, was feeble in intellect. His reign, however, is signalized by military achievements performed by his Generals. Crete, important on account of its extent, its fertility, its commodious havens, and its position, admirably adapted, when in the power of an enemy, for interrupting the maritime intercourse between Constantinople and the West, was reduced by Nicephorus Phocas. Candia, its metropolis, was stormed after a siege of seven months, and its plunder, the accumulation of a long series of successful piracies, was conveyed triumphantly to Constantinople.* The weakness of the Khalifate, and the dissensions between the various subdivisions into which it now began to be resolved, opened to Nicephorus a more enlarged and splendid field of conquest. He either received, or pretended, a command from Romanus to lead the Imperial forces into Syria, then ruled by Seifeldoulat, the most magnificent and powerful Prince of the Hamadanite dynasty. The Greek Commander ravaged the country far and wide, and after the capture of many towns of less importance, besieged and stormed Aleppo, the Capital, in which, among other spoil, he seized three hundred bags of gold and silver, the hoarded treasure of the Hamadanites.† The Khalifs, whose dominions had been contracted by successive revolts to Bagdad and its immediate vicinity, were pitiable victims of the brutal caprice of their Turkish Guards, and possessed neither spirit nor power to resist the progress of the Greeks.

With the death of Motassem had departed the glory of the Khalifate, and that Prince himself must be regarded the principal agent in its degradation. A standing army is ever a dangerous instrument to the power which wields it, and that which Motassem formed of foreign and barbarous mercenaries, was of all others the most likely to prove mutinous and faithless. Their insolence was fostered during the weak reign of his son Wathek whose debaucheries and deviations from orthodox Islamism have qualified him to serve as hero in a singular Romance which renders his name familiar to readers of the present day. He was succeeded by his brother Motavakel, a weak and dissolute Prince, whose only energy was displayed in the persecution of both Jews and Christians. His son Montasser, one of the objects of many wanton and degrading cruelties perpetrated by this Tyrant, avenged himself fearfully in his Father's blood, and the parricide succeeded to the throne, which he retained only for six months, distracted by the agonies of remorse. Elmacin relates that the horrors of the Penitent were aggravated by a remarkable incident. He happened to be present at the unrolling of a piece of antique tapestry, which represented a horseman bearing a diadem, round which was a scroll inscribed with Persian characters. Montasser, ignorant of the Language, demanded the meaning of the inscription from an interpreter. The pale looks of the person to whom he applied, expressed his terror while he answered in a faltering tone, that it was merely a trifling legend; but the peremptory mandate of the Khalif compelled him to declare the real meaning of the words, which ran as follows: "I am Siroes, the son of Chosroes, I murdered my father and retained the Royal dignity but six months." This fearful omen of the retribution awaiting his crime, gave a fatal shock to Montasser, who died soon afterwards, either a victim to the terrors of a wounded conscience, or as other accounts represent, to poison.

We hasten over the short reign of Mostain. In that of his successor Motaz a severe blow was inflicted on the Khalifate by the loss of Egypt.

Ahmed, the son of Toulun, was of Turkish descent, and by birth an Arab. Invested with the Government of Egypt and part of Syria, he by his activity, talents, and popular qualities, rapidly acquired power sufficient to enable him, after a few years' possession, to found an independent dynasty. The accounts given by the Arabian Historians of the opulence and splendour of Ahmed, startle the most accommodating credulity. His revenue, we are informed, amounting to three hundred million pieces of gold, was distributed in the relief of misery, or the reward of merit. On one occasion, a million two hundred thousand pieces were sent to Bagdad, and divided amongst the learned and devout. Three hundred thousand pieces were bestowed each month on the indigent. A thousand pieces were daily expended in the purchase of bread, bees, and goats, which, prepared in the kitchens of Ahmed, were spread forth on the pavement of the great court of his Palace. The gates were then thrown open, and a crier proclaimed, "Let all who will, enter and dine;" whilst the Toulunide Prince, seated above at a window, feasted his benevolent disposition with the sight, and returned thanks to God who provided for the wants of his people.‡ We read with more confidence, that he adorned Fostat (as Cairo was at that time named) with magnificent Mosques; replenished its cisterns by means of a deep well and a costly aqueduct; provided for its defence by the construction of fortifications; built alms-houses and hospitals; raised the Pharos of Alexandria to the height of five hundred feet; and guarded the navigation of the Nile with a hundred ships of war; that his zeal and talents enabled him to retain, verbatim, all the passages of the Koran; that his justice, or his vengeance, gave eighteen thousand individuals to the hands of the executioner. His death, occasioned by a surfeit of buffalo's milk, presents a vestige of the pastoral manners of his ancestors. Feeling his last moments approach, he ordered the Christians and Jews to join the Moslems in prayers for his eternal welfare, and besought God's mercy for a wretch who knew not the extent of his own power.† He left a treasure of ten million pieces of gold

The Greek Empire. The Khalifate.

From A. D. 802. 730. to A. D. 1061. Montasser Khalif. A. D. 861.

Mostain Khalif. A. D. 862.

Toulunide dynasty of Egypt.

The Khalifate from the death of Motassem to the invasion of Nicephorus. Wathek Khalif. A. D. 842.

Motavakel Khalif. A. D. 847.

* Meursius, Cvet. 158. Zonar. ii. 196. Cedren. 642, 643. Sym. Mag. 498. Pagi ad Baron. a. n. 961. xi.

† He did not engage in this expedition after the death of Romanus, and when he was Emperor, as Gibbon erroneously represents, vol. x. 87, 88. edit. 12 vols. 8vo. Fide Zon. ii. 197. Sym. Mag. 498. Cedren. 645. In the summary of Byzantine History, in his XLV. 11th Chapter, Gibbon with greater accuracy intimates, that the success of Nicephorus was achieved under the auspices of Romanus.

‡ Elmacin, 223.

VOL. XI.

* Roorda, Abul. Abbas. et. 175. Elmacin, 160, 173.

† De Guignes, i. 237. ii. 131. D'Herbelot, v. Tholom. Roorda passim.

History. His posterity ruled Egypt until A. D. 905, when it was reunited to the Khalifate, to be again severed by the Turkish adventurer Ikschid.

From
A. D.
802.
730. to
A. D.
1081.
Mothadi Khalif.
A. D.
869.
Mothamed
Khalif.
A. D.
870.
Soffarides.

Motaz, like his predecessor Mostain and his successor Mothadi, was put to death by the Turkish Guards. In the reign of Mothamed which followed, the Khalifate was deprived of Persia by the revolt of Yacoub Ben Leis, the founder of the powerful but short-lived dynasty of the Soffarides. From the trade of a brazier, the employment of his youth, Yacoub by his dislike of industry and love of adventure was converted into a robber, and his valour, talents, and good fortune soon placed him at the head of an army with which he conquered Persia. He put an end to the dynasty of the Taherites, which since the reign of Mamun had ruled Khorassan; and thus encouraged, he advanced to the siege of Bagdad. The natural death of the invader at a critical moment probably averted the fall of the Khalifate.* His brother Amer received from Mothamed the investiture of those Provinces which he already held by the sword. In the pride of power he ordered each commander of a thousand horse to appear bearing a golden mace, and the number of those officers was found to amount to one hundred. This display of splendour and power was dissipated by the storm of a Turkish invasion. Ismail Samanee, the leader of a powerful Tribe of that race, at the instigation of the Khalif, led twenty thousand horsemen over the Oxus and encountered the cavalry of Amer, four times more numerous. Amer, defeated and made prisoner, was sent in chains to the Khalif, by whom he was put to death. His dominions were bestowed on Ismail, the founder of the Samanides, who ruled the North of Persia until the close of the Xth Century, when their power yielded to the ascendancy of Mahmood of Ghizni.

Caram-
114 as.

But the severest blow of all was inflicted on the Khalifate by a spirit of fanaticism resembling that to which it owed its rise. The origin and name of the Carmathians is generally attributed to Carmath, who in the beginning of the IXth Century was tempted by remembrance of the success of Mohammed, to commence a somewhat similar career of imposture. His less bold and less inventive mind was content, however, with modifying or enlarging the tenets of the Koran. He increased the prescribed number of prayers from five to fifty, but allowed a relaxation from the rigid precepts which forbade wine and the flesh of various animals. One of his leading doctrines inculcated absolute submission to the Imam, or Chief of the Sect, to whom the Faithful were bound to render a fifth of their income. This formidable schism, although successfully restrained by the Khalifate during its vigour, contributed largely to accelerate its decline. The Carmathians, defeated for a while by the valour and conduct of Muffick, the brother and General of the Khalif Mothamed, awaited in their Deserts an opportunity for successful vengeance.

Mothamed
Khalif.

A. D.
892. to
A. D.
902.

This season occurred in the succeeding reign of Mothaded. The Carmathians appeared in arms to the number of a hundred thousand, and under the command of their Imam Taher, overspread Bahrein, Syria, and Mesopotamia. The great and rich cities, Cufa, Bassora, Racea, and Baalbec were stormed, pillaged, and depopulated. Taher, naturally adventurous, and rendered confident by uninterrupted success, crossed the Tigris, and at the head of five hundred horsemen made an inroad to the very gates of Bagdad. As the bridges were broken and the bold invaders surrounded by the Khalif's army, the capture of Taher seemed inevitable, unless he adopted the expedient suggested by the respect or fear of the hostile General, that he should save himself by secret flight. "Your master," said he to the messenger, "may number thirty thousand followers, but among them are not to be found three men such as these of mine." At the command which followed this boast, one of his soldiers plunged into the current of the Tigris; another pierced his own bosom with a dagger; a third leaped from a height and was dashed to pieces. "I will spare your life" (Taher proceeded to say to the Envoy) "that you may soon behold a still more wondrous sight, your General chained among my dogs."* In the following night the Khalif's troops, panic-stricken by the desperate onset of the Carmathians, deserted their General, who was taken prisoner and bound among the dogs of Taher, according to this menace. The storm then passed away to the South. Mecca was sacked, thirty thousand of the Moslems were slaughtered, and the Caaba was polluted. The fall of this Sect was as obscure as its rise, but the deep wounds which it inflicted may be regarded among the chief causes of the dissolution of the Khalifate. Yet still although helpless and humbled, the Khalifa by their external splendour continued to excite the amazement and admiration of strangers. In the nominal reign of Mactader, during which the public prayers and the inscriptions on the coins exhibited his name and attested his sovereignty, the Government was virtually in the hands of the Turkish Guards and female minions, whose influence prevailed to so great an extent, that a Woman presided in the Courts of Justice. The Turks twice deposed and twice restored Mactader; but their pride or policy exhibited him to the Nations of the West in the utmost magnificence of an Oriental Court. When he gave audience to the Ambassador of Constantin VII., "the Khalif's whole army both horse and foot was under arms, which together made a Body of one hundred and sixty thousand men. His State officers the favourite slaves stood near him in splendid apparel, their belts glittering with gold and gems. Near them were seven thousand eunuchs, four thousand of them white, the remainder black. The door-keepers were in number seven hundred. Barges and boats, with the most superb decorations, were seen swimming upon the Tigris; nor was the Palace itself less splendid, in which were hung up thirty-eight thousand pieces of tapestry, twelve thousand five hundred of which were of silk embroidered with gold; the carpets on the floor were twenty-two thousand. A hundred lions were brought out with a keeper to each lion. Among other spectacles of rare and stupendous luxury was a tree of gold and silver, spreading into eighteen large branches, on which, and on the lesser boughs, sat a variety of birds made of the same precious metals, as well as the leaves of the tree. While the machinery effected spontaneous motions, the several birds warbled their natural harmony."

Kaher, the successor of Mactader, after a reign of twenty years, was deposed by the Turkish Guards and deposite

The Great Emper
The Khal
ate

From
A. D.
802.
730
to
A. D.
1081

Mactadi
Khalif

A. D.
902.

Mactader Khalif

A. D.
906

Splendour
of his Court

* Elmacin, 169. Abulfid. ii. 253—257. Price, ii. 164. Malcolm, i. 147—152.

* For the Carmathians, see Elmacin, 174. &c. Abulfid. ii. 267. &c. De Guignes, ii. 143, 143. D'Herbelot, v. Carmath. Price, ii. 167—171.

† Gibbon, x. 38. from Abulfid. ii. 329. See also D'Herbelot, v. Mactader.

History. of sight. A striking and pitiable spectacle of fallen greatness, for the rest of his life he begged his bread; stationed every Friday at the door of the great Mosque in which he had formerly recited public prayers, and repeating "Remember him who once your Khalif now implores your alms."* With his successor Radhi terminated the temporal power of the Khalifs, who after his death were regarded merely as the chief Pontiffs of Islam, holding a powerless title at the mercy of the military rulers of Bagdad. The Bowide Sovereigns of Persia had destroyed the power of the Turkish Guards to replace it by their own more systematic and steady tyranny. The Hamadanite dynasty severed Mesopotamia from even the nominal dominion of the Khalifs, which was now restricted to Bagdad and its vicinity; and their names until their final ruin by the Tartars merit notice no further than as they regulate the Canon of Oriental Chronology. Elmacin† describes the state of this once great dominion with the simplicity of truth. "The world was in the hands of rulers who had intruded into the Government, and every one who could seize a Province, or a City, assumed the title of King and waged war against his neighbours."‡ Thus the unstable and contracted Kingdom of the Hamadanites was left almost singly to oppose the vigorous and well-directed invasions of the Byzantine Emperors, to whose History we revert.

Nicephorus II. Pausanias, Emperor. A. D. 963. Theophano, as the guardian of her infant sons, attempted to retain the power which she had nefariously acquired; but finding the Soldiery impatient of female rule, and the Clergy and People loud in expressing their detestation of her crime, she sought a protector by marrying Nicephorus, the conqueror of Crete, who through her intrigues was raised to the Imperial dignity by a tumultuary election of the army.‡ The recollection of his former successes allured him to a fresh career of conquest. He subdued the open country of Cilicia, stormed Mopsuestia, where two hundred thousand Muslims were slaughtered or enslaved, and acquired possession of Tarsus by capitulation. The Hamadanite Princes of Syria, too weak to resist the army of Nicephorus, amounting according to the Oriental Writers to above two hundred thousand men, had sought the aid of the more powerful Ikshidites of Egypt; a fleet of numerous and well-appointed auxiliaries arrived from that Country to witness the delivery of Tarsus to the Christians. A furious storm assailed their armament, and a well-timed attack by the fleet of Nicephorus effected its total destruction. This success was followed by the conquest of Cyprus, and the dominion of the Emperors was extended anew over the Islands of the Western part of the Mediterranean.§ In a rapid expedition, which more resembled a predatory inroad than any steady effort of conquest, Nicephorus widely ravaged Mesopotamia, where a large detachment of his army had been cut off in the defiles of Kurdistan. Antioch was invested on his return; and as he held his march homeward he was surprised by the welcome intelligence that the bold enterprise of a subaltern officer had made him master of that great and opulent Capital. Less happy fortune attended an expedition despatched for the invasion of Sicily; where the Saracens, encouraged by a prophecy which declared that their subjugation was reserved for the Franks, defeated the Greeks with the loss of above twenty thousand men.* The death of Nicephorus adds another murder to the long list of crimes which shock and disgust us in the Byzantine Annals. Although his personal valour and military skill had extended the boundaries and exalted the glory of the Empire, his severity rendered him unpopular in the Capital, and his moroseness and repulsive appearance excited no other feeling than aversion in the abandoned Theophano. For a while she endured her ill-sorted union with extreme impatience; and in the end turned her affections towards John Zimisce, (the little, as this word of Armenian origin is supposed to mean,) an officer who in a small but finely proportioned body, possessed in a high degree the spirit and talents of a statesman and a warrior. Nicephorus, apprehensive of treason, immured himself in a fortress built with the most jealous precaution; but the windows were accessible by ropes, and by their assistance Theophano admitted assassins who despatched her husband.

Zimisce, in possession of the Imperial residence, found no resistance in his assumption of sovereignty, except from the remonstrances of the Patriarch, who, reproaching him with the assassination of his Prince, refused to place the diadem on his brows unless Theophano, divorced and deprived of power, were consigned to penitential retirement. Zimisce readily consented to the removal of a woman whose audacity and wickedness excited both his apprehensions and detestation.† He conciliated the favour of the people by the association of Basil and Constantine, the youthful sons of Romanus, in the Imperial power; by affability, by the profuse distribution of his private wealth, and by an alleviation of the public burthens. The necessities of the State early summoned him to the field. The late Emperor Nicephorus, repeating the error which in the IVth Century led to the dissolution of the Roman Empire, had invited and assisted the Russians to pass the Danube, and those formidable Barbarians quickly made themselves masters of Bulgaria.‡ The union of the subjugated Bulgarians with the Russians, and their confederates the Patzinacæ,§ swelled the Barbarian host to three hundred thousand men. A traitorous Greek, who hoped to ascend the Imperial throne by the assistance of the invaders, conducted them through the intricacies of Mount Hæmus to the walls of Adrianople. There, the Russian Prince Svatoslav gave audience to the Ambassador of Zimisce, who ordered him to repass the Danube, and threatened an immediate attack in case of refusal. The haughty Barbarian replied, "that the Emperor need take no trouble in seeking him out, as he was on his march to Constantinople to drive the Greeks into Asia." That Capital, so often assailed by less formidable and less determined enemies, was now rendered inaccessible by the unwonted energy and valour of its defenders. The protection of Adrianople was intrusted to Bardas Sclerus, who chased the Barbarians over the Hæmus into Bulgaria.¶ That desolated Country

The Greek Empire. The Khalif, etc.

From A. D. 802. 780. to A. D. 1081.

His assassination. John Zimisce,

Basil II., Constantine IX., Emperors. A. D. 969.

* Pag. crit. ad Baron. A. D. 963. xii. Cedren 653. Zonar. ii. 200. St. Marc. Abreg. Chron. ii. 882.
† Zonar. ii. 208, 209. Cedren. 664.
‡ Karaman, i. p. 215, 216. Cedren.
§ This powerful Tribe, the Tav-gissau of the Byzantine Historians, the Petchenegues of Karaman, issuing from Central Siberia, extended their dominion in the Xth Century from the Caspian Sea to the lower part of the Danube. Karaman, i. 179—182.
¶ Zonar. ii. 209. Cedren. 666.

* Elmacin, 200. D'Herbelot, v. Cakher.
† 203.
‡ Cedren. 647, 648. Zonar. ii. 200.
§ Abulfed. Annot. Mosl'm. ii. 483. Elmacin, 224. Zonar. ii. 200, 201. Cedren. 654, 655.

History.

From
A. D.
802.
730. to
A. D.
1081.

Successes of Zimisceas against the Russians.

and the Saracens.

Basil II.
Constantine IX.
Emperors.
A. D.
976.

Basil conquers
the Bulgarians, and treats them with unheard of cruelty.

was still held by Svatoslaf at the head of above a hundred thousand men, against whom Zimisceas advanced leading an army of thirteen thousand cavalry and ten thousand infantry, formidable by their discipline and equipments; while a fleet of Greek vessels entered the Danube and cut off the communication of the Russians with its Northern bank. Their vanguard was surprised by the Greeks, who cut in pieces eight thousand men, and pursuing their success stormed Pereyslavetz the Capital, where the garrison perished either by the sword or flames. Svatoslaf, entrenched with sixty thousand men on the Southern bank of the Danube, was attacked at once by the army and fleet of Zimisceas, and after a series of desperate engagements was compelled to surrender on condition of an unmolested retreat. As he in his return ascended the Dnieper, the Petchenegues, tempted by the rich plunder borne off by the Russians, fell upon them; Svatoslaf was slain, and his skull formed into a drinking cup.* The feebleness of the Khalifate, the example of his predecessor, and his own successes, encouraged Zimisceas to form the bold project of once again extending the Empire to its ancient boundaries in the East. He crossed the Euphrates, ravaged Mesopotamia, stormed Samosata, Edessa, and Nisibis, and in hope already grasped the wealth of Bagdad.† But intelligence that those treasures had been already dissipated by the domestic rapine of the Turkish Guards, checked his eagerness to attack a populous and strongly fortified city, against which he must advance through an arid Desert occupied by the brave and active cavalry of Persia and Turkestan. Leaving a Country which he had strength to devastate but not to retain, he retreated to Syria where he extended his conquests Southward, until arrested by the impregnable fortress of Tripolis on the sea-coast of Palestine;‡ As his march homeward lay through the richest lands of the conquered Provinces, he inquired how their revenues had been allocated by those intrusted with the management of the public finances; and when informed that these possessions had been appropriated by the Eunuchs of the Court, he exclaimed indignantly, "Is it for the aggrandizement of such wretches that we have toiled and bled?" This implied resumption of their plunder irritated the powerful Slaves against whom it was directed, and they prevented the fulfilment of the menace by poisoning the Emperor.§

The reign of his joint successors Basil and Constantine is the longest and most obscure in the Byzantine Annals, and indeed affords little worthy of notice except the successful but inhuman warfare of Basil against the Bulgarians. The power of that once mighty People had been broken by the inroads of the Russians and the conquests of Zimisceas, but the death of that Emperor was the signal for revolt, and Santuel the Bulgarian Prince dared to measure arms against Basil. He was defeated in a succession of sanguinary battles, and obliged to fly from Lychinides, his Capital, which was sacked by the Greeks, and among other rich plunder gratified their cupidity by a booty of ten thousand pounds weight of gold. Fifteen thousand Bulgarian soldiers were made prisoners, and Basil, who regarded death as too light a punishment for their assertion of their Country's rights, divided those captives into bands of one hundred, of whom ninety-nine had their eyes torn out, while to the hundredth a single eye was left by which he might guide his blind companions homeward. The piteous sight of his warriors thus savagely mutilated struck Samuel to the heart and speedily occasioned his death.* The spirit of the People was broken by this terrible example, and Bulgaria submitted to the Greek dominion, under which it acquiesced until the close of the XIIIth Century. The Empire by the late conquests had been restored nearly to its extent in the reign of Heraclius, and comprised Italy South of Mount Gargano; the vast and rich tract bounded on the North by the Danube, on the three other sides by the Adriatic, Mediterranean, and Euxine Seas; the Islands of the Archipelago, together with Cyprus and Crete; Syria North of Libanus; and Asia Minor with Armenia as far as the Euphrates. The obedience of the remoter parts of the Asiatic dominions was precarious and intermittent, and they often served as a field on which the aspirants to the Imperial purple set forth their claims and exercised their powers before they entered on the more conspicuous and perilous arena of Constantinople. During many years of this reign the Asiatic Provinces were involved in an active and widely diffused war, maintained by two rival Generals, Phocas and Sclerus; who laid aside their mutual dissensions whenever the approach of the Imperial armies threatened them with a common danger. Phocas fell in battle as he rushed forward to engage in personal conflict with Basil. Sclerus long evaded or defied the power of his Sovereign, but was at length admitted to an honourable capitulation.‡ The fierce, restless, and enthusiastic disposition of Basil prompted him, even in his sixty-eighth year, to embark in person in an expedition against the Saracens of Sicily; but he died before the sailing of the armament, to the great joy of his unwelcome subjects, whom he had harassed with compulsory levies and financial exactions. His brother Constantine survived him three years, during which he seemed to value the sole possession of Sovereignty merely as it afforded the means of unbounded indulgence in sensuality.

In adjusting the succession, Constantine had determined that his daughter Zoe should be at liberty to select a Patrician, on whom she might confer her hand and the Imperial dignity. With that disregard for morality and decency which so often shocks us in the Byzantine History, she made choice of Romanus, who, already married, declined the proffered honour through conjugal affection. As it was intimated, however, that loss of sight, or even of life would be the penalty of his obstinacy, his wife, the generous Helena, terminated his perilous embarrassment by voluntarily taking monastic vows.§ The Bride whom Romanus was thus compelled to receive, had nearly attained her fiftieth year, yet no less inconstant than impetuous in her choice, she ere long poisoned the husband, upon whom she had forced herself, in order to make room for a successor.||

Michael, who thus ascended both the Imperial couch and throne, was by birth a Paphlagonian, and had originally exercised the trade of money-changer, whence he had risen to the office of Chamberlain to the Empress. His reign was short, and his Crown passed to a Nephew of his own name, whom Zoe was persuaded to adopt.

* Karamzin, i. 240, 241.

† Abulfed. Annal. Moslem. ii. 511. Kilmazin, 227.

‡ Elmacini, 233. Zonar. ii. 215. Cedren. 683.

§ Zonar. ii. 215. Cedren. 684.

* Cedren. 707. Zonar. ii. 226.

‡ Zonar. 216—222. Cedren. 685—701.

§ Zonar. ii. 227. Cedren. 719. Pagi in Baron. a. d. 1025, &c.

|| Zonar. ii. 229. Cedren. 722.

|| Idem. ii. 233. Not. 733.

One of the first acts of the new reign was the merited degradation and exile of that weak and wicked Princess, a measure so resented by the citizens of Constantinople, that they rose tumultuously, and having dethroned Michael, recalled the deposed Empress, who, associated with her sister Theodora, drawn from a Monastery in which she had long resided, was again placed on the throne.* This preposterous reign, after two short months' duration, was terminated by the third nuptials of Zoe, who, at the age of sixty, gave her hand to Constantine Monomachus. This Emperor, sunk in debauchery, heard with indifference that the unprotected Provinces of Asia were a prey to Saracenic invaders. After his death, Theodora resumed the Imperial dignity and appointed as her successor Michael Strategicus, a decrepit veteran, incapable of wielding or retaining the sceptre. By the death of Theodora, the Basilian dynasty became extinct, and in spite of her nomination of Michael, the suffrages of the Soldiery offered the diadem to Isaac, of that family of Comneni whose Government, continued afterwards through several successive generations, gave some degree of dignity to the decline of the Empire. The military electors vindicated their choice in a battle near Nice, where Michael was defeated, and as his insignificance could not excite the apprehensions of the victor, he was permitted, after taking monastic vows, to pass his remaining years unmolested. Isaac, during his short reign, was happily not called either by ambition or the necessities of the State to display those military virtues which had recommended his advancement; but his domestic administration was marked by vigour and wisdom exerted in restoring the financial prosperity and military force of the Empire. Worn with the toils of Government, in declining years he wished to abdicate in favour of his brother John; and on his refusal to accept the arduous dignity, it was transferred to a retainer of the Comnenian House, Constantine Ducas, upon whose acceptance by the People, Isaac retired to a Monastery.†

The character of Constantine Ducas did little credit to the penetration of Isaac. The attention of the new Emperor was engrossed by the pernicious project of establishing his three sons, Michael, Andronicus, and Constantine, in equal dignity as joint Emperors, whilst he allowed the Turks to ravage the Asiatic Provinces with impunity, or impoverished the Imperial Treasury by purchasing their forbearance. On his death, his widow Eudocia was invested with the administration during the minority of her sons, and the parental solicitude of the dying Constantine exacted a written promise that she would never by a second marriage endanger the rights of the young Princes. In spite, however, of this solemn pledge, deposited in the hands of the Patriarch, Eudocia, ere many months were passed, bestowed her hand on a brave soldier, Romanus Diogenes.‡

The impatience with which this warlike Prince viewed the devastation of his Asiatic Provinces, hurried him into a conflict with the Turks, in which he lost both his liberty and throne. The rise and progress of that fierce Tribe which now swayed Asia Westward of the Indus, will briefly occupy us before the close of the Chapter, but we hasten onward for the present in an unbroken course, to complete our assigned period of Byzantine History.

The captivity of Romanus gave uncontrouled Sovereignty to Michael, Andronicus, and Constantine, the sons of Constantine Ducas. They confined Eudocia to a Monastery, and declared the unfortunate Emperor an outlaw and public enemy. His conqueror, indeed, restored to him liberty, and prepared an auxiliary force which might enable him to reascend the throne; but Romanus, after bravely but unsuccessfully contesting two battles, fell into the hands of his enemies, who tore out his eyes with so great barbarity that in a few days he died of the injury.§

The joint reign of Michael, Andronicus, and Constantine presents nothing worth notice, except the event by which it was terminated. Their divided and feeble Government held forth the prospect of impunity, and even of hope, to adventurous ambition, and Nicephorus Botaniates assumed the title of Emperor, and at the head of the Asiatic Legions advanced to terminate both the reign of the Triumvirate and the rivalry of another insurgent, Nicephorus Bryennius. The latter was successful; but it was in advanced age that he obtained the Crown, and his suspicions were soon excited by one who had served him with fidelity, Alexius Comnenus, the third and most illustrious of the sons of that John who had before declined the offered diadem.

Timely warned of the Emperor's intention to deprive him of liberty and perhaps of life, Alexius sought safety in flight, and, compelled in self-defence to rebellion, he returned at the head of an army which with little opposition placed their commander on the throne, from which Nicephorus was transferred unharmed to the retirement of a Monastery.¶

It is here that we may most conveniently notice the early History of that conqueror who overthrew Romanus Diogenes. Of the three great Tartar nations, the Huns, the Mongols, and the Turks, who have spread their devastations and dominion over the largest and most populous portion of the civilized World, the last alone have retained existence as an independent People. Their first appearance in Persian History in the early part of the XIth Century exhibits them as one of the most numerous and formidable of the Pastoral Nations. When that mighty destroyer, Mahmud of Ghizni, had, by his twelve fanatical expeditions to Hindustan, exhausted the energies of his people, the reported bravery and numbers of the Turks who roved over the wastes of Bokharah alarmed the caution of his declining years. Under the guise of friendship, he asked a Turkish Envoy what assistance his Tribe could afford him in case of attack. "Send this," said the Turk, holding forth an arrow, "and fifty thousand horsemen will repair to your standard; add another from my quiver and the number will be doubled; if you need further aid, despatch my bow through our Tribes, and two hundred thousand mounted warriors will obey the summons."‡ Mahmud listened to the answer with deep alarm, but the storm of invasion was averted until his death; after which his son Massoud was utterly defeated at Zendenac, in Khorassan, by Togrul Beg, the Turkish Chief, and this decisive action at once shattered into fragments the colossal Empire of the Ghiznevdes.§ The descendants of Buyah, the Bowides as they are named, had put an

The Greek Empire. The Khalif-ale.

From A. D. 802. 730. to A. D. 1081.

Michael VII., Andronicus I., Constantine XII. Emperors.

A. D. 1071. Nicephorus III. Emperor. A. D. 1078.

Alexius Comnenus Emperor. A. D. 1081.

Rise of the Seljukian Turks.

They destroy the Empire of Ghizni. A. D. 1028.

* Zonar. ii. 246. Cedren. 749—752.

† Idem, ii. 263, 272. Hnd. 792—805.

‡ Zonar. ii. 275—277.

• Zonar. ii. 284, 285.

† Idem, ii. 286—295.

‡ D'Herbelot, v. Seljouk.

§ Abulfid. ii. 111. De Guignes, i. 242. D'Herbelot, v. Theg ral Beg. Makrolm, i. 199.

History. end to the capricious and brutal tyranny then exercised over the Khalifs by the Turkish Guards,* and under the title of Emir-al-omra, or Chief of the Nobles, ruled Persia, until they themselves sank beneath the power of the Ghiznevides.† The Turkish Prince, as a consequence of his victory, enjoyed the high consideration resulting from the custody of the Khalif, and the possession of Bagdad. Togrul Beg, the grandson of Seljuk, and the first Sultan of the Seljukian Turks, reigned from Bokhara to Syria, from the vicinity of the Indus to the Black Sea; and at his death, in his seventieth year, bequeathed the vast Empire which he had conquered to his Nephew, Alp Arslan. That great Prince reigned without a rival among the Mohammedans, as The Fatimite Khalifs of Egypt, happy to maintain their independence, sought by obsequious missions the friendship of the warlike potentate, whose double sway, as the ruler of the East and West, was denoted by the formidable symbol of a scimitar girt on each thigh.‡

The founder of the Fatimite dynasty was Obeidallah, who, although he claimed the Khalifat, and the name which attached to his descendants in virtue of an alleged descent from Fatima, the wife of Ali and daughter of the Prophet, is represented to have been the grandson of a Jewish mechanic of Emmaṣ.§ This adventurer conquered the Aglabite Princes of Tripoli, and soon after expelling the Edrisites from Western Africa, reigned from the borders of Egypt to the Atlantic.|| His descendant Moez made himself master of Egypt, and forbidding the name of the Abbasside Khalif to be used in the public prayers, himself assumed that title. The suspicious origin of those Princes was a tender point to which their enemies often adverted; and Moez, having been once addressed on the subject of his lineage, drew forth his scimitar, and exclaimed, "Behold my genealogy!" then, throwing handfuls of gold among his soldiers, added, "Those are my family!"¶ He laid out a city, adjoining to Fostat, the existing Capital of Egypt, and gave it the appropriate name of Coherah, (or the victorious,) which the Franks, by an easy corruption, have changed into Cairo. His grandson Hakem was a lunatic, and by a delusion not very rare among such unfortunate persons, imagined himself the Deity, and insisted on the adoration of his subjects. His extravagance has interest for the Christian investigator of the History of that period, since it impelled him to destroy the Church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem, and to obliterate the cave which tradition represented as the receptacle of the body of Christ. This outrageous act agitated the minds of all Christians with horror and indignation, and first raised that spirit which burst forth so fiercely in the Crusades.

A. D.
1009.

* Price, ii. 155. Malcolm, i. 167. D'Herbelot, v. Ernak.

† De Guignes, i. 410. ii. 169. Price, ii. 267.

‡ Malcolm, i. 208. De Guignes, iii. 197, 198.

§ D'Herbelot, v. Fathemah.

|| Kilmacn, 187. D'Herbelot, v. c. i. See De Guignes, who, however, (i. 363, 366.) cannot be reconciled with himself.

¶ D'Herbelot, v. Moez.

 Bibl. v. Hakem. Baron. Annal. ed. a. d. 1009.

Thus the spiritual preeminence of the Abbasside Khalifs sank before the pretensions of this recent dynasty, whilst their temporal power was lost as it had been gained, by the arbitration of the sword. That sword was now wielded by a bold, a strong, and not unskilful hand. Romanus Diogenes, encouraged by the success of three campaigns, in which he slaughtered or dispersed the numerous armies led against him by the seditionaries or the Generals of Alp Arslan, advanced adventurously at the head of a hundred thousand men to the confines of Media. Alp Arslan, leading forty thousand cavalry, hastened to chastise the invader; but a near view of the strength of his enemy suggested moderation. When his overtures for Peace were met by an insulting demand that he should surrender his Capital as the pledge of his sincerity, the Turkish Sultan arrayed his squadrons on the plain of Konongo, with his own hands equipped his charger, clothed himself in his shroud, and having perfumed his body with musk, according to the fashion of Mohammedan burial, declared his determination, if defeated, to find a grave on the field of battle. The event was such as had been usual whenever infantry met on open ground the cavalry of the Asiatic powers. The rapid evolutions of the Turkish horsemen evaded the onset of the Greeks, whose dense columns were exposed, without hope of retaliation, to the carnage inflicted by the skilful archery of their enemies. Romanus, at the close of a long and hard fought day, in which he had exhibited admirable valour and presence of mind, found himself left almost alone amidst his enemies, by the fall or flight of his troops. He was disarmed and led to the presence of Alp Arslan, who, in the first ungenerous exultation of triumph, is related to have set his foot on the neck of the Emperor. This was but a momentary impulse; he afterwards treated Romanus with considerate kindness, released him on promise of a ransom of a million pieces of gold, and was preparing to assist him in the recovery of his throne, when he received information that the unfortunate Monarch had been put to death by his subjects.* The attention of the Seljukian Sultans was so much engrossed by the conquest of the regions of the South, that Bokhara, their original Country, had escaped from their dominion, and Alp Arslan was on his march to invade it with two hundred thousand men, when he fell by the hand of an assassin.† The Empire of the Seljukian Turks attained its highest pitch of splendour and power in the reign of his son and successor, Malek Shah, on whose death it fell to pieces as rapidly as it had risen. The vast territory was divided between the four principal Seljukian dynasties of Kerman, of Persia, of Syria, and of Roum, and their ruinous dissensions presented a favourable opening for some of the most splendid successes of the CRUSADES.

* Zonar. ii. 282—285. Abulfed. Annal. Moslem. iii. 214, 215. De Guignes, iii. 206—211.

† Abulfed. Annal. Moslem. iii. 223. De Guignes, iii. 212, 213. D'Herbelot, v. Alp Arslan.

HISTORY.

CHAPTER LXXI.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF THE Xth AND XIth CENTURIES.

Xth CENTURY.

GENERAL STATE OF THE CHURCH.

THE Xth Century is commonly styled the Dark Age or the Iron Age of the Church, and the deplorable state of Christianity is freely acknowledged by the Romanist Historians.* The Christian Religion suffered little from the persecutions of its enemies, but much from the ignorance and vices of its professors. Its external state has been deemed not unprosperous, for Christianity was propagated in this Century, although in a corrupted form, yet with considerable success.

The Nestorians displayed great industry and zeal in the dissemination of their tenets, and they now extended their spiritual conquests beyond Mount Imans. Through them a knowledge of the Gospel was introduced into Tartary, particularly among a most powerful Tribe known by the name of Karit, bordering on the Northern part of China. In Europe, the Christian Religion spread among the uncivilized Tribes of the North with equal rapidity; and when Rollo with his Norwegian band was invested with the Duchy of Normandy, he, together with his followers, embraced the Christian Faith.†

Christianity was introduced into Poland through Dambrocka, daughter of Bolislaus, Duke of Bohemia. She succeeded in persuading her husband Micislaus, Duke of Poland, to renounce Paganism. Her exertions were seconded by the reigning Pontiff John XIII. Egidius, Bishop of Tusculum, with a numerous train of missionaries, was sent into Poland, and the exhortations of these Ecclesiastics were enforced by Regal edicts and penal laws. Two Archbishoprics and seven Suffragan Bishoprics constituted the establishment of the Polish Church.

By similar influence the Faith of Christ also extended itself even into Russia. Wiodemir, Duke of that Country, having married Anne, sister of Basilus II., was persuaded by his consort to embrace the Christian Faith. The Russians, without the terror of penal laws, adopted the Religion of their Prince, and Wiodemir and his Duchess are still placed among the Saints of Russia.

Through the indefatigable zeal of Charlemaigne, the Hungarians and Avari had received some faint notions of Christianity in the preceding Century, but these notions were almost obliterated, until Bolosules and Gylas, two Turkish Chiefs, made a public profession of the true Religion, and were baptized at Constantinople. The former of these powerful Chieftains soon apostatized, but the latter was an active promoter of Christian education. Grysa, the Chief of the Hungarians, was an unsteady and lukewarm convert, but his son Stephen founded the Hungarian Church. He stationed Bishops with large revenues in various places of his Kingdom, erected Churches and Schools, and thus induced his subjects almost without exception to renounce the superstitions of their ancestors.

In Denmark, Christianity was in a state of great depression, until Harald its King embraced the Gospel, about the middle of this Century. It is said that his public profession of Christianity was in obedience to the command of his conqueror Otho the Great, but it is probable that his own conviction cooperated with the will of his victor. Upon the conversion of Harald, two missionaries, named Adaldagus and Poppon, employed their ministerial labours among the Cimbrians and Danes, and Poppon, in addition to the ordinary means of conversion, resorted to those which were miraculous. His miracles were indeed of such a kind as evinced them to be the effects of Human art, and not of Divine Power.* While Harald lived, he used the most prudent measures for the propagation of the Gospel among his subjects, but his son and successor Swein apostatized from Christianity, and became its persecutor. Adversity, however, wrought in him a salutary change; he was driven from his Kingdom, and during his exile he sought consolation in the Faith which he had renounced. He was restored to his dominions, and exerted the most ardent zeal in promoting the knowledge of Christianity.

The conversion of Norway also belongs to the Xth Century. Its King Hagen Adelstun had been educated in England, and he employed English missionaries to instruct his subjects. Slow was the progress of Religious light in this barbarous Country, and dim were its rays; yet it was from this source that the Orkney Islands derived their knowledge of Christianity.†

These accessions to the Church were of far less importance than the stability and consistence which it acquired in Germany, under the protection of Otho the Great. That illustrious Prince was constantly employed in supporting or founding establishments for the propagation of the Christian Religion. He erected and endowed the Bishoprics of Brandenburg, Havelburg, Meissen, Magdeburg, and Naumburg. His munificence was not always guided by prudence, but this defect must be attributed to the ignorance of the Age, and perhaps to the superstition of Adelaide his Empress.

In no Age were the corruptions of the Clergy greater than in this, and they increased in proportion with the Ecclesiastical History of the Xth Century.

In Denmark. A. D. 949

In Norway. A. D. 933.

In Germany. Otho the Great.

* Novum inchoatur seculum, quod auspiciate et boni sterilitate Ferrum; malique exundantis deformitate Plumbum; aliqui scripturam appellare consuevit Obscurum. Batoniun.

† Rollo at his baptism assumed the name of Robert.

‡ Their government lay on the banks of the Danube.

* Pontoppidan, Annal. Eccles. Diplom. tom. i. p. 59.

† Ibid. p. 66. For the conversion of the Orkneys, see Turpin hist. Rerum Orkad. lib. i.

RATHEIR.

OB. A. D. 973,

was Bishop of Verona, more fitted for a life of retirement and study than for a public station. His Works, which are yet extant, discover great sagacity as well as learning.

Hist. Lit. de France, tom. vi. p. 339. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 95. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sec. x. sec. 10.

ATTO,

OB. POST A. D. 960,

was Bishop of Vercelli, and the author of a Treatise De pressuris Ecclesiasticis, i. e. concerning the sufferings and grievances of the Church.

Hist. Lit. de France, tom. vi. p. 251. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 99.

DUNSTAN.

OB. A. D. 988.

The only Work of Dunstan (whose life has already been amply detailed in our ANGLO-SAXON ANNALS, ch. lxviii. p. 506.) which remains, is a book in favour of Monachism, entitled De Concordiâ Regularum, or The Harmony of the Monastic Rules. It contains twelve Chapters, and has been placed as an Appendix to Keimer's Work, on the Antiquity of the Benedictine Order in England, Douay, 1626.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 102. Collier, Ecclesiastical History of England, vol. i. Cent. 10. p. 181—203. Warner, Eccl. Hist. vol. i. book iv. Cent. 10. Godwin, De Præsul. tom. i.

ÆLFRIC, or ALFRIC.

OB. A. D. 1006.

A successor, though not the immediate one, of Dunstan in the See of Canterbury. He was an Englishman by birth, a disciple of Ethelwolf, Bishop of Winchester, and the successor of this Prelate in the Monastery of Abingdon. There has been a controversy concerning Ælfric; whether there were one or two of this name, or rather whether Ælfric the Monk were Ælfric the Archbishop? The author before us was a man of great learning, and obtained a high reputation in the Anglo-Saxon Church. There is a Grammar, and also a Lexicon by him; an Anglo-Saxon Translation of the first Books of the Holy Scriptures, a History of the Church, and 180 Sermons.

Fleury, Hist. Eccl. lib. lviii. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 109.

BURCHARD.

OB. A. D. 1005.

A German by birth, and educated in the Monastic life, but at length Bishop of Worms. His reputation is founded on his compilation, entitled Decreta, divided into XX Books, although a part of the merit of this collection is due to Olbert.

Hist. Lit. de France, tom. vii. p. 295. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 105. VOL. XI.

ODILO,

OB. A. D. 1002.

Ecclesiastical Writers and Heresies of the Xth Century.

is commonly reputed to have been Archbishop of Lyons, but, according to Fleury, he obstinately refused that eminent station, notwithstanding the urgent entreaties both of Pontiffs and Emperors, choosing to remain Abbot of Clugni. His writings never attained mediocrity, and are now sunk into total oblivion.

Fleury, Eccl. Hist. lib. lviii. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 114.

HERESIES OF THE Xth CENTURY.

The profound ignorance which prevailed in this Age, prevented the rise of heterodox doctrine; but ancient Heresies continued in their former vigour. That branch of the Manicheans, denominated Paulicians, whose origin has been already related, became formidable in Thrace, under the reign of John Zimisceas. A great part of that Sect had been banished thither by the order of Copronymus, so early as the Vth Century, and they carried their turbulence with them. The contests concerning Predestination and the Eucharist, which disturbed the Church in the preceding Century, in the Xth were reduced to silence. The followers of Pelagius lived in peace with those of Augustin; so also did those who believed in the corporal presence, with those who denied it. But the calm of the Church was that of stupidity, not of toleration. The controversies between the Greek and Latin Churches, though not entirely suppressed, were also carried on with less impetuosity than before. The Greeks had divisions among themselves, which diverted their attention from the causes of dissension with the Western Church.

No new Sects in the Xth Century.

State of the ancient Sects.

Xth CENTURY.

GENERAL STATE OF THE CHURCH.

The Xth Century, as we have before said, has been styled by Ecclesiastical Writers Sæculum Obscurum; the Xth has been distinguished by the title of Sæculum Hildebrandinum. It is useless to dispute whether a more appropriate title might not have been found.

With the exception of the Crusades, the History of which is reserved for another place, little was done for the propagation of Christianity among Barbarous Nations, and that little was effected chiefly by the Nestorians. In Tartary, taken in its most comprehensive sense, great numbers were gained to the profession of Christianity. Metropolitan Bishops, with Suffragans under their jurisdiction, were established in the Provinces of Casgar, Nunchata, Turkestan, Gendla, and Tangu; and these were governed by the Nestorian Patriarch who resided in Chaldæa.*

Propagation of Christianity, chiefly by the Nestorians.

On the other hand, Christianity suffered from the usurpations of the Saracens and Turks. Although they had many wars with each other, yet they united in opposing the Christian Religion; the Turks by cruelty towards their Christian subjects, and the Saracens by seducing them to the profession of Mohammedanism.

Persecution of Christianity by the Saracens and Turks.

Connected with the external state of Christianity, is the state of Learning; and the declining condition of the Eastern Empire had a fatal influence on Science and

State of Learning.

* Renaudot, Antiquæ Relationes des Indes et de la Chine.

History. Literature. In the West the Arts and Sciences seemed to revive. Schools flourished in Italy during this Century, and the Italian Literature transplanted themselves into France particularly into Normandy. The Normans in their turn were instrumental in restoring Literature in England. William the Conqueror engaged a considerable number of learned men from Normandy to settle in his new dominions.

Increase of Schools.

The increase of Schools throughout Europe in this Century was great, and they were supplied with able and eminent masters. In the preceding Century there were no Schools, but those which belonged to Monasteries, or Episcopal residences, and there were no other masters than the Benedictine Monks. But in the early part of the XIth Century, in many cities of France and Italy, there were laics of erudition who devoted themselves to the education of youth. They comprehended in their course of instruction more branches of knowledge than the Monastic teachers, and they taught in a better method. They had studied in the Schools of the Saracens, and had improved their own stock of Learning, by a diligent perusal of the Works of the Arabian authors.*

In the greater part of the Schools erected in this Century, the course of instruction comprehended those which were commonly styled the seven Liberal Arts. They consisted of Grammar, Rhetoric, Logic, Arithmetic, Music, Geometry, and Astronomy. The first three branches were generally known by the name of Trivium; by which the student was conducted to the last four, or the Quadrivium, this being the summit of literary fame. But the Learning of the Latins was principally confined to the study of Dialectics or Logic,† and the Quadrivium was seldom approached. The books of Aristotle had been brought by the Saracens into Spain, and a host of learned men arose, whose labours were exclusively devoted to the illustration of the Works of the Stagyrite.

Trivium and Quadrivium

Nominalists and Realists.

The revival of the study of Logic was followed by a schism among its Professors, and they were divided by the appellation of Nominalists and Realists. The two parties agreed that the object of Logic was the consideration of Universals in their various relations, but the grand question on which the Logicians differed was, Whether these Universals were real things or mere denominations? One party maintained, that Universals were Realities, and adduced in behalf of their opinion the authority of Plato; the other party affirmed that Universals were mere words, in which they were supported by Aristotle. The chief of the Sect of Nominalists was John, who, on account of his logical subtilty, was surnamed the Sophist, but whose history is involved in obscurity; the corporeus of the Realists is not so easily settled, though the most considerable of the Sect is Rosellinus‡.

Degeneracy
of the Clergy.

Whatever praise may be awarded to the patrons of Literature in this Century, little of the merit belongs to the Sacred Order. The degeneracy of the Clergy had now reached its acme, particularly in the Latin Church, and the cause of this decay in Piety and Learning may be found in the augmented power of the Roman Pontiffs. The five Popes who governed the Western

Church, at the commencement of the XIth Century, were not chargeable with those crimes which rendered their successors infamous; but the enormities of Benedict IX., the scandal of his sale of the Papacy, and the disgraceful spectacle of three simultaneous claimants to the Pontificate, are among the foulest pages of the History of the Romish See. After the death of Clement II., Benedict IX., though twice degraded, forced his way to the Papal chair a third time, but in the ensuing year was compelled to resign his power to Damasus II., the nominee of the Emperor. Damasus lived but three and twenty days, and the Emperor appointed Bruno, Bishop of Toul. This Pontiff was known by the name of Leo IX., and his virtues have obtained for him a place in the saintly calendar.

The two Pontiffs who succeeded Leo may be passed over in silence, but Nicholas II. fills a considerable place in the History of the Popes. As soon as he had obtained undisputed possession of his dignity he assembled a Council at Rome, which completely altered the ancient mode of electing the Bishops of that City. Before this time, the Popes were chosen not only by the suffrages of the Cardinals,* but by the whole of the Roman Clergy, the Nobility, the Burgesses, and the People. To prevent the tumults incidental on so popular a mode of election, the Council enacted that the Cardinals, whether Presbyters or Bishops, should elect a Pope whenever a vacancy occurred, though without any pretence to the Imperial rights. The consent also of the Clergy, Burgesses, and People was required to complete the election. But as the principal influence in the election devolved on the Cardinals, it led the way to their sole power in this matter, and in the succeeding Century the right of electing to the Apostolic See was altogether transferred to their College.

Although Nicholas had expressly acknowledged and confirmed, in the Edict of the Roman Council, the right of the Emperor to confirm the election of the Popes, yet on his death, the Romans, by the instigation of Hildebrand, then Archdeacon of Rome, presumptuously violated this privilege. They elected Arnulf, Bishop of Lucca, who assumed the title of Alexander II., without consulting the Emperor. Agnes, the mother of the young Emperor Henry IV., no sooner received an account of this transaction, than she assembled a Council at Basil, and, in order to maintain the authority of her son, as yet a minor, she elevated Cadolus, Bishop of Parma, to the Pontificate by the title of Honorius II. But in this contest the Imperial candidate was defeated, and although he never would resign his pretensions, Alexander II. was generally acknowledged as the lawful Pope.

* Cardinals, according to their original institution, were Priests or Deacons, placed in Cathedrals or large Churches, in opposition to those who were attached to small Churches or Churches. In former times, the title was by no means confined to the Priests and Deacons of the Church of Rome, nor to the secular Clergy; but it was in use in all the Latin Churches, and assumed by Abbots, Canons, and Monks. The Edict of Nicholas II. divides into two classes the Cardinals who were to have the right of suffrage in the election of a Pope, viz. Cardinal Bishops and Cardinal Clerks. By the former are meant seven Bishops who belonged to the city and territory of Rome; the Cardinal Clerks comprehended the Priests and Deacons. The name, origin, and rights of Cardinals are enumerated by Fabricius, Biblioth. Antiquar. p. 456. But there are two Dissertations which deserve particular notice: one is by Muratori, entitled De Origine Cardinalatus, Antiq. Ital. Medii Ævi, tom. i. p. 156. The other is that of Fred. Spanheim, entitled Cardinalatus dignitas alicuius Antiquitatis et Sacerdotii natalis, Hist. Christ. sæc. xi. sec. 6.

* Muratori, Antiq. Ital. tom. iii. p. 985.

† Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, was commonly called the Dialectician; Anselm, his successor, was equally versed in the same Science. The Dialogue of Anselm, De Grammatica, is to be found in his Works edited by Geruon, tom. i. p. 143.

‡ See p. 579.

The contest was carried on with a far greater degree of violence, when Hildebrand himself succeeded Alexander. This extraordinary man was a Tuscan, of humble parentage,* and educated in the Monastery of Clugni. By various gradations he rose to the dignity of Chancellor of the Church of Rome, and in that station governed the Roman Pontiffs from the time of Leo IX. On the same day in which Alexander was interred, he was raised to the Pontificate by the unanimous suffrages of the Cardinals, Bishops, Abbots, Monks, and People; this unanimity was obtained by bribing such as could be corrupted, and by poisoning such as could not be bribed. The election was confirmed by Henry IV., King of the Romans, to whom Ambassadors had been sent announcing the choice of the Clergy and the People.

Too soon did the Emperor perceive that, by consenting to the election of Hildebrand, who assumed the title of Gregory VII., he had raised up a powerful rival not only to his own authority, but to the independence of all temporal sovereignty. Seated in the Apostolic chair Gregory aimed at universal empire, and the project which his ambition formed, his dexterity fitted him to execute. He first denounced the terrors of Excommunication against Lay Investitures, though he had received the Confirmation of his own Election from the Emperor. He laboured to dissolve the jurisdiction of temporal Princes over the Clergy, and to exclude them from all share in the management or distribution of Ecclesiastical revenues. But not satisfied with exempting the Clergy from secular authority, he attempted to render all secular Princes tributary to the See of Rome. Whatever temporal privileges were enjoyed by the Popes, were derived from the Princes of France, but Gregory pretended that their Kingdom was tributary to the See of Rome, and commanded his Legates solemnly to demand the payment of an annual tribute. To William the Conqueror he addressed an Epistle, demanding the arrears of Peter-pence,† and homage for his new dominions as a Fief of the Apostolic See. In both these cases he was repulsed; in France the tribute was neither paid nor even acknowledged; in England, the payment was rendered as an ancient custom, but the homage was nobly refused.

Among the less powerful States of Europe the claims of Gregory were received with acquiescence. He pretended that Saxony was a Feudal tenure held in subjection to the See of Rome, to which it had been formerly yielded by Charlemagne. He maintained that the Kingdom of Spain was the property of the Apostolic See from the earliest period of Christianity, although the records were lost.‡ He wrote circular Letters to the most powerful of the Germanic Princes, to Grusa, King of Hungary, and to Suino, King of Denmark, recommending them to make a solemn grant of their Kingdoms to the Prince of the Apostles, and to hold them under the jurisdiction of the successor of St. Peter. The son of Demetrius, King of the Russians, in obedience to an Epistle of Gregory, set out for Rome, in order to obtain as a gift from St. Peter, his hereditary dominions. Suinimer, Duke of Dalmatia, was raised to the Kingly rank by the Legate of Gregory, on condition that he paid an annual tribute of two hundred pieces of gold, at every Festival of Easter. Basilius II. having assassinated the Bishop of Cracow, was excommunicated by Gregory, his subjects were absolved from their allegiance, and an Edict was issued, prohibiting the Nobles and Clergy of Poland from electing a new Poland. King without the consent of the Roman Pontiff.*

The zeal and activity of Gregory were employed with great success in enriching the patrimony of St. Peter, and in extending the Papal dominions. The splendid inheritance which the Church derived from the Countess Matilda was warmly contested at this time, and was not preserved entire, but a considerable portion still remains to the Ecclesiastical State. A similar power to that which Gregory arrogated over temporal Kingdoms and their Sovereigns, was assumed by him over the Spiritual Governors of the Church. In order to correct the evil of Simony, which had become one of the reigning vices among the European Clergy, the Pontiff not only excommunicated those who were guilty of it, but pronounced an anathema against any one who received the investiture of a Bishopric or Abbacy from the hands of a Layman, as well as against those by whom the Investiture was granted. The Investiture of Bishops and Abbots, so far as it regarded an oath of allegiance, and the performance of homage to temporal Princes, was of ancient date, and was a mode of receiving property similar to that practised by the Lay Feudatories; but the custom of investing Bishops and Abbots with the Ring and Crosier, the ensigns of the sacred function, differed from ordinary Feudal habits, and was not supported by any long prescription.†

By the law which Gregory enacted against Investitures, he raised a formidable opponent against himself in the Emperor Henry IV., and the History of their struggle has been related in our ANNALS OF GERMANY, (ch. lix. p. 535.)

Commensurate with the increase of the Papal power in this Century, was the increase of Monachism, for the Western Monks were remarkable for their attachment to the Roman Pontiffs. Gregory, intent on reducing the privileges and independence of the Bishops, exhorted the Monks to withdraw themselves and their possessions from Episcopal jurisdiction, and to place both under the dominion of St. Peter. The policy of Gregory was adopted by Urban II., and a considerable portion of the Monasteries received immunities both from the temporal authority of their Sovereigns, and from the spiritual jurisdiction of their Bishops.

Of all the Religious Orders the Monks of Clugni made the most rapid advances to opulence and dominion. Towards the conclusion of this Century, they were formed into a separate Society, and no sooner were they established, than they extended their authority on all sides, reducing under their jurisdiction all the Monasteries which had adopted their discipline. Hugo, the sixth Ecclesiastical History of the XIth Century.

Dalmatia, and Assumes a power over Bishops.

Difference between the Investiture of Bishops and of Nobles and Knights.

Increase of Monachism.

Monks of Clugni.

* Fabri ferrarii filius. Passo adhuc in officinâ patris, literas nascentes, cum for saxei ex ligni argumentis hoc dictum Davidas: Dominebatur a mari usque ad mare. Cave, Hist. Lat. p. 151.

† Peter-pence were so called, because they were collected on the Festival of St. Peter in Vinculis. They formed a tax of a penny on each house, first granted by Ina, King of the West Saxons, for the support of an English College at Rome.

‡ The Letter of William is to be found in Collier's Eccles. Hist. of Great Britain, vol. i. Appendix.

§ Ep. lib. x. 7. Regnum Hispania ab antiquo propriis juris S. Petri fuisse, et soli Apostolica sedi ex æquo pertinere.

* Numerous are the Historians Civil and Ecclesiastical who have written on the life and exploits of Gregory. Of the Ecclesiastical Historians it is enough to mention Eggenius, Introdec. ad Hist. Eccl. tom. i. who has furnished a Catalogue of these Writers. Spanheim has a chapter entitled Hildebrandi Historia et Dogmata, Hist. Christ. sæc. xi. ch. v.

† The History of Investitures has been written with great learning and impartiality by Cardinal Norria.

History. Abbot of Clugni, was not only in high credit at the Court of Rome, but was patronized by several Princes, and he availed himself of his reputation and influence to extend the privileges of his Order. This celebrated Monastic was the acknowledged head of thirty-two of the principal Religious Houses in France, and many other Societies, although they declined to form a union with the Clugniac Order, regarded the Arch-Abbot of Clugni, as he styled himself, as their spiritual Chief.

The example of the Clugniac Monks excited several pious men to erect similar fraternities, and the consequence was, that the Benedictine Order, which had been hitherto an universal and united body, was divided. To division in discipline succeeded hatred and hostility.

Braanches of the Benedictine Order.

The principal of these ramifications from the Benedictine Order were, 1. The Congregation of the Camaldulites founded by Romuald, an Italian fanatic, whose followers were subdivided into two classes, the Cenobites and the Eremites. 2. The followers of Gualbert, a native of Florence, settled at Vallombrosa, in the Apennines. 3. The Cistercians, founded by Robert, Abbot of Molema, in Burgundy.

Besides these Convents which were founded on the principles of the Benedictine Order, several other Monastic Societies were formed, distinguished by a peculiar code of discipline. The most remarkable of these were, 1. The Order of Grandmontains, founded by Stephen de Muret; 2. The Order of Carthusians, whose founder was Bruno, a native of Cologne and a Canon of the Cathedral of Rheims in France; 3. The Order of St. Anthony of Vienne in Dauphine, instituted for the relief and support of such as were afflicted with grievous disorders, and particularly with the malady called St. Anthony's fire.

A more copious account of these Societies will fall with greater propriety into a separate Dissertation on the Rise and Progress of the Military and Religious Orders. What has been now offered is connected with the rise and progress of the Papal power, to which these Orders were eminently subservient, and which they contributed to advance and confirm.

ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS OF THE XIth CENTURY.

THEOPHANES CERAMIOS,*

FLOR. CIRC. A. D. 1040,

was Bishop of Taormenum in Sicily, and the author of sixty-two Homilies on the Gospels appointed for Sundays and Festivals. They were published with Prolegomena and Notes, Greek and Latin, fol. Paris, 1644. He likewise wrote two Homilies for the Sunday before the Exaltation of the Cross, published in a Collection of Tracts De Cruce by Gretser, tom. ii. p. 1207. These Homilies possess the merit of a perspicuous style, and a rational mode of Scriptural interpretation.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 132. Fabric. Biblioth. Græc.

NILUS DOXIPATRIUS.

FLOR. A. D. 1043.

It is uncertain when this pillar of the Greek Church was born. He is chiefly remarkable for his knowledge relating to matters of Ecclesiastical polity, and at the request of Roger, King of Sicily, he composed a small Tract entitled De Majorum Patriarcharum sedibus. This Tract was afterwards enlarged. Copious extracts from it have been given by Leo Allatius, de Concord. Eccl. Orient. et Occident.; and it has been published entire by Stephen Le Moyne, in his Work Varior. Sacr. tom. i. p. 211.

* A. P. The Potter.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 133.

NICETAS PECTORATUS

FLOR. CIRC. A. D. 1050.

This formidable opponent of the Latin Church was a Monk and a Presbyter of Constantinople. His principal Work is entitled Liber adversus Latinos de Azyms, de Sabbatorum jejuniis, et nuptiis Sacerdotum. It has been edited by Canisius and Baronius.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 136.

MICHAEL PSELLUS

FLOR. A. D. 1050,

descended from an ancient and noble family at Constantinople, was raised to the highest offices of the State, but in this place he is to be noted only for his proficiency in Literature. Such was that proficiency as to obtain the highest encomiums from his contemporaries, and the important trust of Preceptor to the Emperor Michael Ducas. From the splendour of a Court, Psellus retired to the obscurity of a Monastery. His writings were numerous, and on various subjects, on Philosophy, Mathematics, Medicine, History, and Theology.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 136. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sec. xi. sec. 11.

MICHAEL CERULARIUS.

FLOR. CIRC. A. D. 1051.

Like Nicetas, this author is chiefly known for his hostility to the Latin Church. He was Patriarch of Constantinople, and consequently a natural enemy of the Roman Pontiff. A quarrel between Humbert and Michael was carried on with unexampled bitterness. The Works of this author relate to the matters of controversy between the Eastern and Western Churches.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 133.

JOHANNES XIPHILINUS,

OR. A. D. 1078,

was Patriarch of Constantinople under the Emperor Constantine and Michael Ducas. Although he took an active part in the controversy with the Latin Church, yet his Works are not altogether controversial. He was the author of Homilies on the Gospels, and made an Epitome of the History of Dion Cassius.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 147. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sec. xi. sec. 11.

THEOPHYLACT.

FLOR. A. D. 1077.

A native of Constantinople, and Primate of Bulgaria. His Commentaries on the Sacred Writings were received with universal approbation and esteem. They were edited, Lat. Paris, 1554. Basil, 1570.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 153. Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sec. xi. sec. 11.

FULBERT.

OB. A. D. 1028.

At the head of the catalogue of Latin writers in this Century, is placed Fulbert, Bishop of Chartres. He has obtained a certain degree of reputation for his love of Letters, and his zeal for the education of youth, but his notoriety rests on his extravagant and enthusiastic attachment to the Virgin Mary. He not only built a splendid Church dedicated to her at Chartres, but composed several Hymns in her praise. The Works of this Bishop were collected by Charles Villiers, and published at Paris, 1608.

Hist. Lit. de France, tom. vii. p. 261. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 125.

HUMBERT.

OB. POST A. D. 1061.

This celebrated Cardinal was the corypheus of the Latin Church, in the grand controversy between the Eastern and Western Churches. He was alike distinguished for his vehemence and his learning. His Works consist chiefly of Tracts against Michael Cerularius, and they have been collected in Biblioth. Patrum. tom. xviii.

Hist. Lit. de France, tom. vii. p. 527. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 139.

PETRUS DAMIANUS.

OB. A. D. 1072.

This truly learned man, according to the custom of his Age, received a Monastic education, and was Abbot of the Monastery at Avellino. He was promoted by Stephen to the rank of a Cardinal, and to the Bishopric of Ostia, against his inclination. He was employed on various embassies relative to Ecclesiastical affairs, in which he acquitted himself with great credit. His Works are numerous, and have been collected in three volumes folio, Rome, 1606, 1608, 1615.

Du Pin, Ecl. Hist. tom. ix. p. 83. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 140.

BERENGER.

OB. A. D. 1088.

With the life of this eminent Theologian is connected the History of the controversy concerning the Corporal Presence. Berenger was a native of France, principal of the Public School at Tours, and afterwards Archdeacon of Angers. He possessed an acute and subtle genius, and was renowned both on account of his extensive learning and the exemplary sanctity of his life.

In the preceding Century the controversy concerning the Corporal Presence was carried on with the greatest freedom, since no Council had given a definitive sentence on this point, so as to restrain discussion and debate. In this spirit, Berenger publicly maintained the doctrine of Johannes Scotus and Bertramu, in opposition to that of Paschasius Radbert—that the bread and wine in the Eucharist are not changed into the body and blood of Christ, but were no more than their figures and external symbols. The doctrine of Berenger was no sooner published than it was opposed by certain Doctors in France and Germany; and Leo IX. attacked it with the weapons of Pontifical power. In two different Councils, one of which met at Rome, and the other at Vercelli, the doctrine of Berenger was solemnly condemned, and the book of Scotus, whence it was drawn, publicly burned. The example of the Pontiff was followed by Henry I., and in a Council summoned at Paris, an anathema was denounced against Berenger and his adherents. Berenger was deprived of his revenues, and degraded.

Temporal punishments might have shaken the constancy of Berenger, and induced him to retract his opinions; but he was still permitted to enjoy them in the privacy which he sought. On the death of Leo IX. an active persecution against him began, for Victor II. undertook to institute a more severe examination of the Berengerian doctrine. He sent his Legates to two different Councils assembled at Tours for this purpose. In one of these Councils the famous Hildebrand appeared in the Legantine character, and opposed Berenger with his wonted violence. Berenger also was present; and overpowered by threats rather than convinced by argument, he not only abandoned, but, it is said, solemnly abjured his opinions, and thus was reconciled to the Church. The abjuration was soon proved to be an act of fear, not of sincerity, for he continued to teach, although with more circumspection, the opinions for which he had been censured.

When the account of Berenger's perfidy was brought to Nicholas II., the exasperated Pontiff summoned him to a Council at Rome. Berenger was again terrified with threats of punishment, and declared his readiness to subscribe such doctrines as the Council might think fit to decree. Humbert was accordingly appointed to draw up a Confession of Faith for Berenger, who signed it, and confirmed his adherence to his subscription by a solemn oath. The Confession contained the following declaration:—that the bread and wine, after consecration, are not only a Sacrament, but the real body and blood of Jesus Christ, and that this body and blood are handled by the Priests, and partaken by the people, not in a sacramental sense, but really and sensibly.

That the second abjuration of Berenger was equally extorted and insincere with the first, too soon appeared, for when he returned to France, he expressed his utmost detestation of the Confession which he had subscribed at Rome. Alexander II., the successor of Nicholas, employed expostulation and influence to induce him to return from his apostasy, but as he was powerfully supported, and at a distance from Rome, he was deaf to the remonstrances of the Pontiff. Hence the controversy was prolonged during many years, and the followers of Berenger largely increased.

When the chief antagonist of Berenger was elevated to the Papal chair, it might be supposed that he would not neglect a controversy in which he had been so actively engaged. Yet Gregory VII. displayed a different spirit, as a moderator, from that which he had shown as a disputant. He discovered an impartiality and candour which his proceedings on other occasions, and his former course in this very dispute, gave little reason to expect. He appears to have entertained a high personal esteem for Berenger, notwithstanding their difference of opinion. He sent an order to him to repair to Rome, and in a Council which met there, he permitted his old antagonist to restate the opinions which had been embodied by Humbert in a Confession of Faith. Berenger, therefore, made a second declaration

Ecclesiastical Writers of the XIth Century.

It is condemned by a Council at Rome, at Vercelli, and at Paris.

A. D. 1050.

Victor II. institutes a new examination of the Berengerian doctrines.

A. D. 1054.

Berenger abjures his opinions; but afterwards teaches them.

Nicholas II. summons him to Rome.

A. D. 1058.

He signs a Confession of Faith drawn up by Humbert.

He again relates.

Alexander II. endeavours to gain to reclaim him.

Gregory VII. summons him to Rome.

Council at Rome.

A. D. 1078.

History.
Berenger
signs a fresh declaration.

It satisfies
the Pope, but not his opponents.

A more definite form prepared.

He signs
a third Confession of Faith.

Again retracts.

Lenity of Gregory towards him.

His retirement to the Isle of St.
Cosme.

His death.
A. D.
1088.

His Works.

confirmed by an oath, that he would adhere to the following propositions: that the bread laid upon the altar becomes, after consecration, the true body of Christ, which was born of the Virgin, suffered on the Cross, and now sits on the right hand of the Father; and that the wine placed upon the altar becomes, after consecration, the true blood which flowed from the side of Christ.

Although this declaration satisfied Gregory, yet it did not satisfy the enemies of Berenger; they contended that it was ambiguous, and they required that he should be obliged to sign another, expressed in clearer terms. They added another demand, that he should be obliged to prove his sincerity by undergoing the ordeal of fire. Gregory absolutely refused this last demand, and would have refused the first, if he had followed his own judgment.

But the importunate clamours of the enemies of Berenger, prevailed upon the Pontiff to yield, and a new Declaration, or third Confession of Faith was framed. This took a middle course between the first and second, and Berenger, in a Council at Rome, once more performed the ceremony of subscribing, and of confirming his subscription by an oath. By this assent, he professed to believe—that the bread and wine, by consecration, were substantially changed into the true, proper, and vivifying body and blood of Jesus Christ.

No sooner had Berenger made this declaration, than he was dismissed by the Pontiff with the most honourable testimonies of liberality and friendship. But scarcely had he quitted Rome before he publicly retracted the declaration which he had subscribed before the Council, and even wrote an elaborate confutation of the doctrines contained in that declaration. The Council importuned Gregory to promulgate Ecclesiastical censures against the relapsed heretic, but the Pontiff seemed neither surprised nor offended at his inconsistency and tergiversation. Berenger had sufficient prudence not to return any answer to the bitter invectives of his adversaries, and tired with polemics, he withdrew from public life. He fixed his abode in the Isle of St. Cosme, in the neighbourhood of Tours, where he passed several years in fasting, prayer, and devotion. His retirement was embittered by a retrospect of his past conduct, and he submitted to a severe course of penance, with a hope of expiating the guilt of his repeated perjuries.

The memory of his failings was obliterated in the minds of his numerous followers,* and they retained only the deep impression of his extraordinary sanctity. The Canons of the Cathedral of Tours long continued to honour his name by a procession to the Isle of St. Cosme, where they performed a solemn service at his tomb.

Of his Works there are extant some Epistles; three Formularies of his belief concerning the Eucharist; Disputation with Lanfranc on the Corporal Presence; a Commentary on the Apocalypse; and several minor tracts.

Life of Berenger in the Works of Hildebert, Archdeacon of Mons; Hist. Lit. de France, tom. viii. p. 197; Spanheim, Hist. Christ. sæc. xi. sec. 8; Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 130.

* His disciple and biographer, Hildebert, honoured his memory by an epitaph, of which the following lines are the conclusion:

*Vix verè suspens, et parte brastus ab unni;
Qui cœles animi, corpore distul humanum,
Post obitum vivam tecum, tecum requiescam;
Nec fuit melior mors mea, sorte sua.*

LANFRANC.

OB. A. D. 1088.

This antagonist of Berenger was an Italian by birth, and received his education in his native Country; but in early youth he transplanted himself into Normandy. He embraced a Monastic life, but quitted it in consequence of having obtained the favour of Duke William. When this Prince made his successful descent on England, Lanfranc accompanied him, and was the prime adviser of the Conqueror in Ecclesiastical affairs. Before a year was expired from the commencement of the Norman dynasty, there was not an individual remaining in any high station in the Church who was hostile to it; and Stigand having rendered himself particularly obnoxious, was deposed. William had no hesitation in conferring the vacant Primacy on Lanfranc.

The election and consecration of this Italian to the See of Canterbury, were both remarkable and solemn. He was first chosen by the Church of Canterbury, and after this capitular election, the choice was ratified by the Clergy and Nobility at the Royal Court. He was then consecrated at the metropolitan Church, at which ceremony all the Bishops of England attended in person, or if absent excused themselves by letters. Being thus possessed of the highest dignity in the English Church, he wrote a letter to the Pope complaining of the arduous burthen which his office imposed on him, and preferred to his Sovereign a request which he knew would be refused, of being permitted to retire to a Monastery.

The English Bishops cheerfully recognised his authority, with the exception of Thomas the Archbishop of York, who made an ineffectual struggle for independence, if not for precedence. The quarrel between the two Archbishops was compromised for a time, and they set out together for Rome, accompanied by Remigius, Bishop of Lincoln. Lanfranc was received with the highest marks of respect; but the two other Prelates, though their first reception was civil, were deposed on account of some canonical objections. Lanfranc, it is said, made use of his interest in their favour, and having thus obtained a claim on their gratitude, he endeavoured to get the Pope to decide the controversy concerning the canonical obedience due from the See of York to Canterbury. The Pontiff prudently declined to interfere, and it was referred to the judgment of the King of England. On a full hearing of the matter in the presence of most of the Bishops and Abbots, it was determined that the Primacy was rightly vested in the See of Canterbury; that the Archbishops of York should be obliged to make a profession of canonical obedience to it at their consecration; that on the death of an Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of York should repair to that City, and in conjunction with the Bishops of the Province should assist at the consecration of the new Archbishop. The Archbishop of York was still to retain his title of Metropolitan, but he and his Suffragans were obliged to attend the Synods convened by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and to be governed by his directions.

The dispute being thus ended, Lanfranc's first Epistles to the Pope were replete with adulation, and he at first joined the Pope in a design of dispossessing the Cathedral Monks and placing secular Canons in their room. Yet he soon altered his policy, and took part with the King against the usurpations of the See of Rome. When Hildebrand ascended the Papal chair, he relied on the concurrence and cooperation of Lanfranc in his ambitious designs. He sent a confidential messenger to the English Primate, notifying his accession to the Popedom, and communicating some secret counsels. He urged his former friend to come to Rome, but Lanfranc would not leave England; and when solicitation was changed into the language of command, the Archbishop not only refused to go, but accompanied the refusal with a denial of the Papal authority.

When William nobly refused to render fealty to the See of Rome, Gregory, supposing that his repulse was in a great measure owing to the advice of Lanfranc, again issued a peremptory mandate summoning the Archbishop to his Capital. But the English Primate steadily resisted the Roman Pontiff, answering that his Sovereign would not permit him to leave England, and that it was against the laws of the Country for any subject to depart the Kingdom without the Royal permission.

Throughout the reign of William, Lanfranc cooperated in the designs of his master, and appears to have been equally careful of the dignity of the Crown and the rights of the English Church. As soon as the Conqueror perceived the approach of death, he wrote a pressing letter to Lanfranc, earnestly recommending the succession of his second son to the Kingdom which he had gained by his sword. Lanfranc obeyed the last injunction of his master, and had it not been for the influence of the Primate, the English nation would have placed the Crown on the head of Robert, the rightful heir.

The first two years of the reign of William Rufus were employed in subduing the Normans in the interest of his brother. The English who had assisted him expected protection, if not favour, but their hopes were disappointed, and their condition was rendered insupportable. Lanfranc, in terms of respectful firmness, remonstrated with the King on his falsehood and ingratitude; but by his honesty he drew on himself the resentment of the man whom he had raised to supreme power. Rufus, in an angry tone, and with an oath, asked the Primate whether he thought it possible for a King always to keep his faith? From this time Lanfranc was used with distrust and discourtesy, and mortified at the conduct of a Prince whom he had placed over the nation, he shortly died, lamented by both parties.

Although a large portion of the life of Lanfranc was passed in the administration of public affairs, yet his literary attainments were considerable for his Age. He was well acquainted with the ancient Latin Fathers, and with the Canons of the Church. His style is neither figurative nor florid, but plain and expressive, and his materials are well arranged. His two chief Works are a Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul and a Treatise on the Corporal Presence against Berenger. His entire Works were edited by Ducher, folio, Paris, 1648.

Hist. Lit. de France, tom. viii. p. 260. Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 147. Godwin, de Præmiliibus, vi. Collier, Eccle. Hist. of Great Britain, vol. i. p. 260—263.

HILDEBERT.

OB. A. D. 1132.

was Archbishop of Tours, a Philosopher and Poet, as well as a Divine. He was a man of respectable learning, the follower of Berenger, and therefore not fairly treated by the Historians of the Romish Church. His Works were edited by the Benedictine Monks at Paris, fol. 1708, with the Notes of Beaugendre.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 161.

GREGORY VII.

OB. A. D. 1088.

The Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers cannot be more properly closed than with that Pontiff from whom the Xth Century is denominated. Of his writings there are extant ten Books of Epistles, Concil. tom. x. p. 6—306; an Exposition of the Seven Penitential Psalms, though this has been ascribed to another Gregory; an Exposition of the Gospel of St. Matthew.

Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. ii. p. 151. Vid. Hen. Wharton, Auct. ad Hist. Dogmat. Cl. Umerii, p. 105.

HERESIES OF THE Xth CENTURY.

No Sect worthy of notice had its origin in this Century, and the state of the ancient Heresies suffered no material change. The Paulicians, either from a desire of propagating their opinions or of emancipating themselves from the Grecian yoke, now formed settlements in Europe. They first migrated into Italy, whence, in process of time, they sent colonies into many of the European States. Many of them led a wandering life in Germany and France, where they gained the veneration of the multitude. In Italy they were called Paterini and Cathari; in France they had the appellation of Albigenes, from the town of Albig in Upper Languedoc, and of Publicans, that term being a corruption of their first name. The first Religious assembly which the Paulicians formed in Europe, is said to have been discovered at Orleans. An Italian lady was at its head, and twelve Canons of the Cathedral of Orleans were its principal members. The character of these people differed from the other Paulicians, their tenets approaching to Mysticism, and the same observation will apply to another branch of the Paulician Sect, converted from their errors by Gerhard Bishop of Cambray.

In this Century a controversy arose of a subtle and difficult nature, begun by Rosellinus, a Canon of Compiegne. This Theologian maintained that the Father and the Holy Ghost as well as the Son became incarnate; and when it was objected that this doctrine led to Tritheism, he answered that the existence of Three Gods might be asserted with truth, whatever harshness there might be in the mode of expression. He was obliged to retract this tenet by a Council at Soissons, but he resumed it when the Council was dismissed. Persecution drove him to England, where he propagated dangerous tenets of another kind; and when he was banished thence he returned to Paris, where he revived the former Tritheistic dispute. After encountering many persecutions, he retired to Aquitaine, where he gained universal esteem, and passed the conclusion of his days in tranquillity.

* Hist. Lit. de France, tom. ix. p. 358.

Heresies of the Xth Century.

No new Sect. Paulicians first settle in Europe.

A. D. 1077.

Controversy of Rosellinus.

He is compelled to retract.

